What, then, needs be said, or shall be said, of the first concert of the Bostonians, wh'ch took place last night? Not much. The men were gladly seen, were gladly heard, and Dr. Muck was enthusiastically greeted when he came upon the stage, but more enthusiastically when he turned to bow his acknowledgments for the expressions of delight which followed the performance of Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony, which opened the programme. Thereafter the general happiness grew with what it fed on—Brahms's variations as a theme by Haydn, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," that truly German opera which Signor Toscanini selected for this season's Metropolitan list to bridge the chasm between Beethoven and Wagner. All the old opulence of tone, all the old technical precision, all the old harmonic brilliancy and clarity with which the public is familiar, was again in evidence, and the concert was a period of æsthetic refreshment and mental uplift.

H. E. K.

RECORD.

DECEMBER 12

THE SYMPHONY THIS WEEK

Beethoven. Eighth Symphony. F major.
Stravinsky. "Fireworks."
Haydn. Violoncello Concerto.
Soloist, Mr. Josef Malkin.

As usual with Dr. Muck, he surrounded his modern tonal wounds with classical poultices. Beethoven came before Stravinsky and Haydn after him. But even with these antidotes the modern tonal coruscations and explosions entitled "Fireworks" seemed anarchistic enough. Was it not of Whistler's painting entitled "Fireworks" that Ruskin wrote—"He has thrown a pot of paint at the head of the public"? (I quote from memory and may be mistaken in the exact sentence.) In this bit of fire-worship Stravinsky hurls a whole orchestra at the head of the public and calls it music. The effects of flame are more musically done in Wagner's "Feuerzauber," or even in Strauss' "Feuersnoth," says Louis C. Elson in his Symphony review in The Advertiser.

But viewed as a bit of musical impressionism, or perhaps sensationalism, the "Fireworks" were interesting enough. Of course there was a very large orchestra employed and there was mastery of many striking tonal effects. One could hear the pin-wheels, the flashes, and (very decidedly) the final bombs. The work is very short also, which is a rare virtue in modern music. It was performed with a technique that swept everything before it, but the musical content seemed very slight. What some of the brass dissonances meant we could not imagine, unless the man who lit the pieces had burnt his fingers and made a few resultant remarks. But the excitement of the short composition made amends for the absence of true music.

Haydn's Violoncello Concerto was somewhat less striking to the modern ear. It had neither the modern technique nor the modern orchestral combinations. The first object of a true concerto ought to be orchestral. The perfect concerto is a three-movement symphony with a thread of solo work interwoven. Taken from this standpoint the literature of the violoncello is very defective. There are not many real violin concertos, but violoncello concertos are as rare as white blackbirds.

But the work demanded pure tone, sympathetic quality, good phrasing and a generally clean-cut style, and these qualities Mr. Josef Malkin brought to it. There were several long orchestral passages (tutti) in the old-fashioned style, and there was a flavor of Mozart (Leporello in "Don Giovanni") in the first movement.

The solo work, as above intimated, was excellent,—the best violoncello playing that we have had in these concerts for a very long while. Mr. Malkin, our new violoncellist in the orchestra, is certainly a great artist on his instrument. The warm, sympathetic tone in the Haydn passages was commendable, while in the long cadenza there was plenty of modern display, such as runs and skips, some superb double-stopping, and some nobly broad work on the C string.

At the end Mr. Malkin was recalled over and over again; in fact he awakened the chief enthusiasm in a concert where there was very much applause throughout.

MONITOR,

DECEMBER 12,

NEW SYMPHONY CELLIST MAKES BOW AS SOLOIST

Josef Malkin Plays Haydn Concerto — Dr. Muck Presents Stravinsky Number and the Beethoven Eighth Symphony

SYMPHONY HALL—Seventh public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, afternoon of Dec. 11. The program: Beethoven, eighth symphony in F major, op. 93; Stravinsky, "Fireworks," op. 4 (first time at the Symphony concerts); Haydn, concerto in D major for violoncello (Josef Malkin, soloist); Schumann, overture to "Genoveva," op. 81.

Returning from a tour to New York and the other cities of its monthly southern circuit, the orchestra brought to the entertainment of the home public about as simple a program as it ever offers. The close attention of the listeners and their warm applause indicated that music which is meditative rather than exciting still has its days of favor. Perhaps to a few the selection by the new composer, Stravinsky, was exhilarating. If so, they must have been influenced by something they had read about the Russian beforehand, or they must have been persuaded into a mood of admiration by the title of his piece.

The picture is on the whole a pretty mild study in tonal pyrotechnics. Perhaps there was a little more flare to it on Friday than on the afternoon, early in the season, when the Philharmonic Society of New York produced it in Symphony hall; but if there was, the season must have been that the orchestral sky was [illegible] the second performance than at the first. There was Straussian dissonance hanging heavily over the scene at the original display. A Beethoven atmosphere was more indulgent to the Stravinsky rockets. It let the colors glint and the sparks prick their best.

In one respect Stravinsky excels all other masters of saltpeter pageantry. Civic committees should study his example and save expense. He makes his show short and he does not try for impossible climaxes.

The most significant part of the entertainment which Dr. Muck presented in his first December program was the Haydn concerto for violoncello, with a new player of his appointment, Mr. Malkin, as soloist. Mr. Malkin proved to be an admirable artist, one who can make an affected type of composition interesting and an attractive solo instrument charming. Mr. Malkin, with Dr. Muck's help, of course, very nearly made the concerto sound like a symphony. He almost merged the violoncello into the orchestra, so that there was one purpose, and that an honestly expressive one, in the music.

The new violoncellist's tone is rich and full of sentiment. His execution is smooth, his phrasing instinct with intellectual and emotional quality. In his playing he keeps the thread of the composer's thought. He holds each idea of the melody clearly related to its context. Necessarily such a performer has the attention of his listeners. Mr. Malkin should make a signal success of a richly characterized role, like that which Richard Strauss has given to the solo violoncello in his tone poem of "Don Quixote."

Dr. Muck is invariably appealing in his readings of Beethoven. And there are always pages of this master in which he is surpassingly brilliant, or rather say human. They are likely to be the ones in which the kindliness and cheerfulness of the composer shine out most conspicuously. There are passages of such quality in the allegretto of the eighth symphony, and Dr. Muck found them. He has not always evoked the fine moments of exaltation that await a conductor in the scores of Schumann. But he brought them into evidence in the "Genoveva" overture. One reason for this may have been that he directed with a moderate beat, and that he tried no forced effects. Perhaps the "Genoveva" was a little under-practised, but it was none the less pleasant to hear, as though the interpretation were here and there improvised.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

DECEMBER 12, 1914.

UNUSUAL PROGRAM AT THE SYMPHONY

Stravinsky's "Fireworks" Given for the First Time, Fails to Impress.

In the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven Stravinsky's "Fireworks," Haydn's Violoncello Concerto and Schumann's "Genoveva' 'overture Dr. Muck offered an interesting, if not always impressive, program in comparatively brief compass at yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert. Stravinsky has brevity as the chief recommendation for his offering. It makes unusual demands upon the orchestra, which were finely met, but after it is all over the listener cannot very well help wondering if the effort was worth while.

Coming as it did, after the Beethoven number, the audience had an excellent opportunity to compare rare merit with mediocrity. Beethoven is likewise brief, but speaks so eloquently that one would have welcomed more. Josef Malkin, a newcomer this year to the first 'cellists, succeeding Otto Urack, was heard to excellent advantage in the concerto and was recalled time and again at its close. The overture afforded another fine opportunity of hearing the incomparable string band of the orchestra.

Boston Post
December 14, 1914

3200 HEAR KREISLER AT HIS BEST

Wounded Violinist Is More Than Ever the Artist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Fritz Kreisler, the musical man of the hour, played to an audience of more than 3200 yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The stage was filled with seats, with only an open aisle from the door that opened on the platform to the piano; the aisles were choked with people. Mr. Kreisler is now, apparently, at the very zenith of his powers. Very few violinists, who also stand so high as artists, can command such a following. The hall would have been packed if Mr. Kreisler had not taken part in the present war, had not actually received wounds in the trenches, and if there had not been curiosity to see whether he would limp or not when he came on the platform. He has packed Symphony Hall before this. But he had had, from the press agent's point of view, the one necessary experience to place him on a par, in the eye of the public, with Mr. Paderewski, as an artist of sensational popularity.

SUSPICION OF LIMP

It is good to say that with all this, Mr. Kreisler is today more than ever a great artist. If his experience in the battlefield had had anything to do with his disposition or his performance, it was that the experience had removed the last lingering vestige of softness, or sentimentality, with which envious artists and austere critics have sometimes credited him. There was in his walk the faintest suspicion of a limp, as he came on the stage, and was applauded for minutes before he could begin to play, but it was obvious that instead of making the play to the gallery that many a well-known virtuoso would not have disdained to make, Mr. Kreislen was bent upon doing away with personalities and placing his art wholly at the service of the composer. He was more than ever modest in his bearing, more than ever careful to present only the appearance of an uncommonly well-groomed individual, come to play to an audience of ladies and gentlemen. The same attitude was evident in his performance.

More Virile Than Ever

Mr. Kreisler had made an excellent programme. The "A major" sonata of Handel; the "Devil's thrill" sonata of Tartini; the Bach "Chaconne" represented the first and the serious half of his list. Two later groups consisted of small pieces by Schumann, Gluck, Mozart, Dvorak-Kreisler, Kreisler, Paganini. It would be easy to decant on familiar characteristics of Mr. Kreisler's performances, which have before this endeared him to his public, but it would not be necessary. The old warmth and unrivalled beauty of tone, the refinement, the sentiment which yesterday never degenerated into sentimentality, the unqualified technical mastery and the sober musicianship which one was forced to praise in previous seasons, when Mr. Kreisler appeared at his greatest, was always in evidence on this occasion. He is a more serious, more virile player than ever. There was not a moment when he was less than a great artist who had taken a step higher than any he had taken before in his art—a man to elevate, not to pander to public taste. Witness, for only one thing, the surpassing art of the performance of Paganini's 24th caprice!

Gives Encores

The audience followed Mr. Kreisler, absorbed, through every note of his performances. He charitably refrained from encores until his last group. At the end of the concert many flocked to the stage, and there was the expectant group outside the stage door to see a virtuoso get into a carriage.

However distasteful this may have been to Mr. Kreisler, it could not detract from the value of his performances within, and he played encores far into the afternoon before the audience consented to leave the hall.

EVENING RECORD, NOVEMBER 24

Violinist Kreisler Tells of His Experiences in the War How He Killed a Cossack

NEW YORK, Nov. 24.—Fritz Kreisler, the Austrian violinist, who served as a lieutenant in the Third Kratz Regiment and was wounded in battle near Lemberg, reached New York today on the steamer Rotterdam. He was accompanied by his wife, who served as a Red Cross nurse in the Austrian army.

"I was wounded on the night of Sept. 16," said Mr. Kreisler. "While resisting a charge of Russian Cossacks I was knocked down by a horse. As the rider passed over me he sank his lance into my right thigh. It caught in my coat and before he could withdraw it I shot and killed. I lay in the trench for hours until I was found."

Mrs. Kreisler saw duty in German and Austrian Red Cross hospitals. She came into personal contact with the American Red Cross units, and she said that they were receiving unbounded praise everywhere.

"I was told by both German and Austrian surgeons that the American nurses could do 20 times the work that their own nurses could, and that their system of handling wounded was simply wonderful.

"As to wounds, I found that the Russian bullets were the most humane, and as foes the Russians were exceptionally courteous. While I was working in the Austrian hospitals I saw and talked with Emperor Francis Joseph many times."

NEW YORK TRIBUNE,

NOVEMBER 6,

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Orchestral Friends from "Hub" Opening Series of Concerts.

In the progress of the score of years during which the Boston Symphony has bestowed its benisons on New York the vocabulary of praise has been thoroughly exhausted; so has that of description and critical analysis.

It is only when the splendid body of musicians introduces a new work, or its conductor discloses a different conception of a familiar work from that held by his colleagues at the head of local organizations that the reviewer can get away from a simple record or a revamping of old utterances. It has become impossible even to chronicle growth in local appreciation of the visitors, for, so far as it can be measured by the attendance, that reached its limit some time ago.

When all the seats in a vast room like Carnegie Hall are subscribed for a year in advance the tale does not admit of many sequels. Nor is it necessary to popular knowledge that reiterations be made of the circumstances that the audiences have come to represent the fine flavor of New York's music lovers.

What, then, needs be said, or shall be said, of the first concert of the Bostonians, which took place last night? Not much. The men were gladly seen, were gladly heard, and Dr. Muck was enthusiastically greeted when he came upon the stage, but more enthusiastically when he turned to bow his acknowledgments for the expressions of delight which followed the performance of Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony, which opened the programme. Thereafter the general happiness grew with what it fed on—Brahms's variations as a theme by Haydn, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," that truly German opera which Signor Toscanini selected for this season's Metropolitan list to bridge the chasm between Beethoven and Wagner. All the old opulence of tone, all the old technical precision, all the old harmonic brilliancy and clarity with which the public is familiar, was again in evidence, and the concert was a period of æsthetic refreshment and mental uplift.

H. E. K.

RECORD.

DECEMBER 12

THE SYMPHONY THIS WEEK

Beethoven. Eighth Symphony. F major.
Stravinsky. "Fireworks."
Haydn. Violoncello Concerto.
Soloist, Mr. Josef Malkin.

As usual with Dr. Muck, he surrounded his modern tonal wounds with classical poultices. Beethoven came before Stravinsky and Haydn after him. But even with these antidotes the modern tonal coruscations and explosions entitled "Fireworks" seemed anarchistic enough. Was it not of Whistler's painting entitled "Fireworks" that Ruskin wrote—"He has thrown a pot of paint at the head of the public"? (I quote from memory and may be mistaken in the exact sentence.) In this bit of fire-worship Stravinsky hurls a whole orchestra at the head of the public and calls it music. The effects of flame are more musically done in Wagner's "Feuerzauber," or even in Strauss' "Feuersnoth," says Louis C. Elson in his Symphony review in The Advertiser.

But viewed as a bit of musical impressionism, or perhaps sensationalism, the "Fireworks" were interesting enough. Of course there was a very large orchestra employed and there was mastery of many striking tonal effects. One could hear the pin-wheels, the flashes, and (very decidedly) the final bombs. The work is very short also, which is a rare virtue in modern music. It was performed with a technique that swept everything before it, but the musical content seemed very slight. What some of the brass dissonances meant we could not imagine, unless the man who lit the pieces had burnt his fingers and made a few resultant remarks. But the excitement of the short composition made amends for the absence of true music.

Haydn's Violoncello Concerto was somewhat less striking to the modern ear. It had neither the modern technique nor the modern orchestral combinations. The first object of a true concerto ought to be orchestral. The perfect concerto is a three-movement symphony with a thread of solo work interwoven. Taken from this standpoint the literature of the violoncello is very defective. There are not many real violin concertos, but violoncello concertos are as rare as white blackbirds.

But the work demanded pure tone, sympathetic quality, good phrasing and a generally clean-cut style, and these qualities Mr. Josef Malkin brought to it. There were several long orchestral passages (tutti) in the old-fashioned style, and there was a flavor of Mozart (Leporello in "Don Giovanni") in the first movement.

The solo work, as above intimated, was excellent,—the best violoncello playing that we have had in these concerts for a very long while. Mr. Malkin, our new violoncellist in the orchestra, is certainly a great artist on his instrument. The warm, sympathetic tone in the Haydn passages was commendable, while in the long cadenza there was plenty of modern display, such as runs and skips, some superb double-stopping, and some nobly broad work on the C string.

At the end Mr. Malkin was recalled over and over again; in fact he awakened the chief enthusiasm in a concert where there was very much applause throughout.

MONITOR,

DECEMBER 12,

NEW SYMPHONY CELLIST MAKES BOW AS SOLOIST

Josef Malkin Plays Haydn Concerto — Dr. Muck Presents Stravinsky Number and the Beethoven Eighth Symphony

SYMPHONY HALL—Seventh public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, afternoon of Dec. 11. The program: Beethoven, eighth symphony in F major, op. 93; Stravinsky, "Fireworks," op. 4 (first time at the Symphony concerts); Haydn, concerto in D major for violoncello (Josef Malkin, soloist); Schumann, overture to "Genoveva," op. 81.

Returning from a tour to New York and the other cities of its monthly southern circuit, the orchestra brought to the entertainment of the home public about as simple a program as it ever offers. The close attention of the listeners and their warm applause indicated that music which is meditative rather than exciting still has its days of favor. Perhaps to a few the selection by the new composer, Stravinsky, was exhilarating. If so, they must have been influenced by something they had read about the Russian beforehand, or they must have been persuaded into a mood of admiration by the title of his piece.

The picture is on the whole a pretty mild study in tonal pyrotechnics. Perhaps there was a little more flare to it on Friday than on the afternoon, early in the season, when the Philharmonic Society of New York produced it in Symphony hall; but if there was, the reason must have been that the orchestra[illegible]sky was clearer at the second performance than at the first. There was Straussian dissonance banging heavily over the scene at the original display. A Beethoven atmosphere was more indulgent to the Stravinsky rockets. It let the colors glint and the sparks prick their best.

In one respect Stravinsky excels all other masters of saltpeter pageantry. Civic committees should study his example and save expense. He makes his show short and he does not try for impossible climaxes.

The most significant part of the entertainment which Dr. Muck presented in his first December program was the Haydn concerto for violoncello, with a new player of his appointment, Mr. Malkin, as soloist. Mr. Malkin proved to be an admirable artist, one who can make an affected type of composition interesting and an attractive solo instrument charming. Mr. Malkin, with Dr. Muck's help, of course, very nearly made the concerto sound like a symphony. He almost merged the violoncello into the orchestra, so that there was one purpose, and that an honestly expressive one, in the music.

The new violoncellist's tone is rich and full of sentiment. His execution is smooth, his phrasing instinct with intellectual and emotional quality. In his playing he keeps the thread of the composer's thought. He holds each idea of the melody clearly related to its context. Necessarily such a performer has the attention of his listeners. Mr. Malkin should make a signal success of a richly characterized role, like that which Richard Strauss has given to the solo violoncello in his tone poem of "Don Quixote."

Dr. Muck is invariably appealing in his readings of Beethoven. And there are always pages of this master in which he is surpassingly brilliant, or rather say human. They are likely to be the ones in which the kindliness and cheerfulness of the composer shine out most conspicuously. There are passages of such quality in the allegretto of the eighth symphony, and Dr. Muck found them. He has not always evoked the fine moments of exaltation that await a conductor in the scores of Schumann. But he brought them into evidence in the "Genoveva" overture. One reason for this may have been that he directed with a moderate beat, and that he tried no forced effects. Perhaps the "Genoveva" was a little under-practised, but it was none the less pleasant to hear, as though the interpretation were here and there improvised.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

DECEMBER 12, 1914.

UNUSUAL PROGRAM AT THE SYMPHONY

Stravinsky's "Fireworks" Given for the First Time, Fails to Impress.

In the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven Stravinsky's "Fireworks," Haydn's Violoncello Concerto and Schumann's "Genoveva' 'overture Dr. Muck offered an interesting, if not always impressive, program in comparatively brief compass at yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert. Stravinsky has brevity as the chief recommendation for his offering. It makes unusual demands upon the orchestra, which were finely met, but after it is all over the listener cannot very well help wondering if the effort was worth while.

Coming as it did, after the Beethoven number, the audience had an excellent opportunity to compare rare merit with mediocrity. Beethoven is likewise brief, but speaks so eloquently that one would have welcomed more. Josef Malkin, a newcomer this year to the first 'cellists, succeeding Otto Urack, was heard to excellent advantage in the concerto and was recalled time and again at its close. The overture afforded another fine opportunity of hearing the incomparable string band of the orchestra.

Boston Post
December 14, 1914

3200 HEAR KREISLER AT HIS BEST

Wounded Violinist Is More Than Ever the Artist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Fritz Kreisler, the musical man of the hour, played to an audience of more than 3200 yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The stage was filled with seats, with only an open aisle from the door that opened on the platform to the piano; the aisles were choked with people. Mr. Kreisler is now, apparently, at the very zenith of his powers. Very few violinists, who also stand so high as artists, can command such a following. The hall would have been packed if Mr. Kreisler had not taken part in the present war, had not actually received wounds in the trenches, and if there had not been curiosity to see whether he would limp or not when he came on the platform. He has packed Symphony Hall before this. But he had had, from the press agent's point of view, the one necessary experience to place him on a par, in the eye of the public, with Mr. Paderewski, as an artist of sensational popularity.

SUSPICION OF LIMP

It is good to say that with all this, Mr. Kreisler is today more than ever a great artist. If his experience in the battlefield had had anything to do with his disposition or his performance, it was that the experience had removed the last lingering vestige of softness, or sentimentality, with which envious artists and austere critics have sometimes credited him. There was in his walk the faintest suspicion of a limp, as he came on the stage, and was applauded for minutes before he could begin to play, but it was obvious that instead of making the play to the gallery that many a well-known virtuoso would not have disdained to make, Mr. Kreisler was bent upon doing away with personalities and placing his art wholly at the service of the composer. He was more than ever modest in his bearing, more than ever careful to present only the appearance of an uncommonly well-groomed individual, come to play to an audience of ladies and gentlemen. The same attitude was evident in his performance.

More Virile Than Ever

Mr. Kreisler had made an excellent programme. The "A major" sonata of Handel; the "Devil's thrill" sonata of Tartini; the Bach "Chaconne" represented the first and the serious half of his list. Two later groups consisted of small pieces by Schumann, Gluck, Mozart, Dvorak-Kreisler, Kreisler, Paganini. It would be easy to decant on familiar characteristics of Mr. Kreisler's performances, which have before this endeared him to his public, but it would not be necessary. The old warmth and unrivalled beauty of tone, the refinement, the sentiment which yesterday never degenerated into sentimentality, the unqualified technical mastery and the sober musicianship which one was forced to praise in previous seasons, when Mr. Kreisler appeared at his greatest, was always in evidence on this occasion. He is a more serious, more virile player than ever. There was not a moment when he was less than a great artist who had taken a step higher than any he had taken before in his art—a man to elevate, not to pander to public taste. Witness, for only one thing, the surpassing art of the performance of Paganini's 24th caprice!

Gives Encores

The audience followed Mr. Kreisler, absorbed, through every note of his performances. He charitably refrained from encores until his last group. At the end of the concert many flocked to the stage, and there was the expectant group outside the stage door to see a virtuoso get into a carriage.

However distasteful this may have been to Mr. Kreisler, it could not detract from the value of his performances within, and he played encores far into the afternoon before the audience consented to leave the hall.

FRITZ KREISLER GETS A WELCOME

Austrian Violinist Amply Compensates for Agonies Suffered at Small Concerts.

"AIDA" FOR ITALIAN HOSPITAL

Miss Geraldine Farrar as Mme. Butterfly and Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler at Aeolian Hall.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

Fritz Kreisler, the greatest of living violinists, Austrian, soldier and patriot, made his New York reappearance yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. Many of his good friends were under the impression that his advent on the concert platform would be the signal for an impassioned demonstration semi-political in nature, and therefore of rousing and provocative proportions. To the honor of New York be it said that hitherto all attempts to poison music and the fine arts with the gall of the present quarrels and discontents have proved failures, in whatever sense they originated. Mr. Kreisler is something more than an Austrian, and an approved gallant soldier. He is one of the most accomplished and celebrated of contemporaneous artists, and as such he was received by the composite audience, which in overflowing numbers had assembled to greet him. The applause had no political significance. No one was provoked into counter demonstrations.

I have a horror of violin recitals, similar to that which a convict might feel for the gallows. What are they? Imagine them. Think of a long hall filled with ill-dressed women and frizzy-haired moon-eyed men looking as if they had been temporarily and grudgingly relieved of the duty of minding the baby.

The audience room is dingy and half-dark, or oppressively gaudy.

The submissive chain-gang, knouted by the particular concert agent who is managing the entertainment, files dismally in. These carry with them an air of shabby and suburban depression that soon fills the hall like a mist or Bermondsey fog. Critics enter furtively and take up a position near an emergency exit. The violinist's friends rush to and fro, as the friends of an artist at a concert always do, with the bewildered squeaking and fidgetiness of semi-decapitated porkers.

Desolate Music Lovers.

The lover of music looks at the programme before him. Deeper and deeper he sinks into despondency. The composers who have written violin music are well represented. They are over-represented. There is a sonata which will last forty minutes. There is another which will last three-quarters of hour. Sometimes there is a sonata by a composer or devil. In this case the sonata will be longer than ever and more than venomous in the fatigue it inflicts. The violinist appears. He or she has studied with Mons this or Herr the other. He saws away. A scrawny tubercolotic thread of sound makes itself heard. The intonation is false or jejune. The rill of talent is puny to the point of pathos. You turn uneasily in your leather chair. You think enviously of the unforced and spontaneous joy with which certain naive spirits in other quarters of the town are contemplating the broad and native humors of Lydia Lollipop and her Brunette Burlesquers. But you know this thought is treason. You indulge in the mild and ineffective, but still just criticism of fretful sleep. The violinist flits across the landscape of your feverish dreams—a restless and pitiable figure, sawing and sawing and sawing and sawing away. You are awakened by a louder squeak, by applause, and then the miscreant encouraged begins all over again.

Next morning you open your newspaper and you read a long review of the funeral, described in the serio-pomposo style, with references to "double stopping," "passage work," "cadenzas" and other uses of the Dead Sea jargon and technical cant which are supposed to give a certain influence and majesty to the dreary drizzle of the hack musical scribblers.

Gatti's Cruel Jibe.

Mr. Gatti-Casazza in a moment of uncharacteristic impetuosity once described the writer of these lines as a "philosophic professor who laughed at everything." I do not know, and I do not suppose anybody cares, what I laugh at. But if I laugh at bad violin recitals it is because, like Figaro in Beaumarchais's delicious comedy, I do not wish to cry.

Nothing, of course, of that which I have had to say about the violin vermin who infest society and the smaller music halls has anything but a most indirect relation to Mr. Kreisler's recital. He reminded me of those who have inflicted so much suffering on me by being so different to them. He helped me to forget the noxious tribe. The quality of Mr. Kreisler's tone must be described as noble. He seems to be playing—let me express it this way—a heroic violin and producing [illegible] sounds that ordinary violinists [illegible] educe from it than the de- can no more [illegible] of Baal could educe fire [illegible] priests [illegible] I am told that tone [illegible]thingness [illegible] cannot be taught; that it is in the nature of a gift with which the violinist is endowed by nature.

XXVII

I did not hear all Mr. Kreisler's programme. But I did hear the Handel sonata in A major that led it. In the interpretation of this sort of music Mr. Kreisler is unapproachable. He has the purity, the sensibility, the taste and the balance of the classicist. And none of us is sufficiently degraded by the stupider and more affected of the Strepitist school not to enjoy the tender and lofty simplicities of George Frederic.

Oh! for a few more Kreislers.

If the Allies had got him, they would have kept him and made him play to them.

But Charlie Ellis got him.

The importance of Mr. Kreisler's recital perhaps overshadowed the presence of Mme. Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, as the Opera "Madama Butterfly" was given with Miss Farrar in the title part and "Aida" was heard in the evening as a special performance for the benefit of the Itaiian Hospital.

The usual scenes of mild pro-Italian enthusiasm prevailed.

RANS[illegible]RIPT,

, DECEMBER 12.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

STRAVINSKY, BEETHOVEN AND A NEW 'CELLIST

"Fireworks" as an Introduction to the Russian's Music — Beethoven's "Little Symphony" Perfectly Played — Mr. Malkin's Good Parts—The Work That Dr. Muck Is Doing

STRAVINSK'S orchestral jeu d'esprit, "Fireworks," filled as much as ten minutes of the Symphony Concerts yesterday afternoon. It is not an important or an interesting piece in itself, except to the curious about instrumentation and those that like to hunt out of an eminent composer's early work the germ of the achievements that have subsequently made him eminent. Outside imagination and ingenuity with instrumental timbres, individual fancy in delineative scheme and a characteristic brevity and concentration, "Fireworks" in no wise represents the matured composer of "The Fire-Bird," "Petrouchka," "The Sacrament of the Spring" and "The Nightingale," whose music has stirred such long and bitter debate in Europe between those that call it "an æsthetic outrage" and those that believe it epoch-making in its qualities and its influence. Stravinsky will not be truly represented in the repertory of the Symphony Orchestra nor will its audiences understand his present place and prestige in Europe until Dr. Muck adds to it the symphonic suites arranged respectively from "The Fire-Bird" and "Petrouchka" or, following the example of a Parisian conductor, plays the music of "The Sacrament of the Spring" as though it were a concert-piece.

"Fireworks," indeed, which went the round of European concerts several years ago, is no more than a youthful composer's exercise of his invention, skill and courage in harmony and instrumentation and of his delineative and daring fancy. Tonal pinwheels whirl in the air in figures for the wind choir; bombs burst resoundingly in the brass; flower-pots flare and rockets describe their glowing paths and rain down their showers of stars in the general play of harmonic and instrumental color, accent and suggestion. The ear hears, as the eye from a distance might see, the glow and glare of fireworks, the changeful and confused figures that they outline upon the darkness and the reflected and uncanny light that they shed upon shadowy objects. Here and there are songful measures as though Stravinsky had suddenly remembered that the piece was a decoration for the wedding of Miss Rimsky-Korsakoff; they make momentous contrast; they please the ear; and they contribute naturally to the cohesion and continuity of the piece. In essentials, however, it is only impressionistic tone-picturing, dependent altogether upon vivid and pliant rhythms, harmonic and instrumental color and a measure of half-fantastic and half-realistic imagination. It is also a terse and direct music. All these qualities pass for granted in Stravinsky's ballets and in his opera; while out of them shine his more striking and innovating straits, like his experiments with all tonalities and with none, his laying of sharp stroke beside sharp stroke; his command of impinging rhythms and of the vividest of instant delineation; his stark realism at one extreme and his super refinement at the other. Yesterday, Dr. Muck read out an introductory paragraph from the book of Stravinsky. The next time, he should open and expound a whole chapter. "Fireworks" is belated nowadays.

Yet passing trifle as the little piece was, the preparation of it had required hours of study and hours of rehearsal on the part of Dr. Muck and the orchestra. There is many a conductor who would have played it in public after he and the band had run once or twice through it. Dr. Muck prefers another way. For weeks, he has kept the score where he could scrutinize and ponder it at will. Hour upon hour, he has rehearsed the different choirs of the orchestra in their parts; and he has been as diligent in the practice of the whole band. For himself, he must discover the pace, the rhythms, the accents, the phrasings, the shadings that shall give the music the very voice and quality that the composer has designed for it. Dr. Muck would imagine both with and for Stravinsky.

Clear at last, in his own mind—or at least as clear as he can hope to be—the conductor then sets to the infusing of all that he has willed and imagined into his orchestra. He can take for granted the technical skill, ingenuity and imagination of his eager and loyal men. They can be trusted to perfect those virtues for themselves. Yet he must practise them so that the turnings of the smallest tonal pin- vinsky's design and make its due effect in the progress and the sum of his picturing. He must not overlook the flare of a single flower-pot or the whiz of a single rocket. And he must adjust all this tonal suggestion to the recurring measures of short-breathed nuptial song.

Then shall the music stand apprehended and revealed in its design and color, its form and substance, its imagery and expression and orchestra and conductor become as the divining and imparting voices of the composer. Then also will the listeners say that "they flung off the piece magnificently"; the reviewers write another of the appropriate clichés with perhaps a word about "the genius" of Dr. Muck. As a matter of fact in hours of application and by the exercise of many a faculty of mind, imagination, technical skill and professional intuition, the conductor and his men have literally worked out their performance of the piece. In ten minutes it is past; in ten days it is forgotten; their final reward is the satisfaction of work done to the utmost by all the standards of artistic honor. And the audience, being human, sits entertained.

It was so again with the performance of Beethoven's "little symphony" in F and of Schumann's overture to his opera, "Genoveva," that severally began and ended an unusually short, light and amusing concert. The sensitive and practised listener might almost hold his breath over the exquisite lightness and evenness of rhythm with which conductor and men played the ticking allegretto of the symphony; or at the dart of phrase after phrase out of the light and merry tumult of the finale. The filigree of the wood-winds—those arabesques that were almost an idiosyncrasy with Beethoven—became as light and lovely tracery in tones melting in and out of the air rather than written on it. The strings, the wood-winds, the brass even, moulded and fused their phrases, throughout the symphony, as though they were expert and intuitive Mozartean singers, singing Beethoven's instrumental song. The murmuring beginning of the finale sounded like the rustle of fancy: in a moment as in a little leap, it rushed into the full and songful sunshine of the rondo at play with itself in the lightest and merriest of return and suspension. Dr. Muck and the orchestra touched each with the lightest and the surest of fingers. The trumpets, so warm, so mellow and yet so brilliant, were almost thrilling to hear in the free and brightly rhythmed course of the minuet; and even the beat of the drums beneath brought its momentary delight. The balance and yet the individuality of the choirs and even of the separate instruments was perfection itself. As perfect was the smoothness, the roundness, the melting euphonies of the little jetting phrases with which Beethoven has strewn the first allegro, as though in sheer zest of his capricious fancy. In turn, the voice of the orchestra in Schumann's overture was the voice of shadowy and romantic mystery, of ardent and romantic passion against the fitful glamors, like the horn-calls, of romantic fantasy. Not until near the end does Schumann flag. Again, the performance had every technical virtue—in the higher sense that implies sensibility of mind and imagination as well as practised skill and taste—but as these virtues had been the means to the illusion of abstract tonal beauty and of the play of fancy upon it in the symphony, so now in the overture they were the instruments of a dramatizing, characterizing and poetizing eloquence.

No less than with Stravinsky's "ultra-modern" piece, such virtue and such illusion with the classics spring from ceaseless work and the minutest of pains until the glorifying end of such revelation as the audience received yesterday has been accomplished and made to wear the semblance of spontaneity itself. Nay, with these same classics, already familiar in their larger design, substance and manner to conductor and orchestra, there is the more opportunity for that mingled exactness, fluidity and perfection of detail upon which both in rehearsals and in concerts Dr. Muck has been more than usually insistent this year. He would have each choir and each player in the orchestra as perfect a master of the moulded and melting phrase as an idealized singer. His ear has become as sensitive and exacting for flawless symmetries and euphonies as Mr. Gericke's used to be. He has infused yet more deeply and finely into his men his own sensibility to rhythm and control of it. He holds them to the subtlest of inflections; he would have them do little miracles of graduated and blended shadings. And they, stirred by such a tireless and adroit pursuit of perfection, have come to share in it. Week after week Dr. Muck draws nearer and nearer to the goal that, after all, will as steadily recede before him—an absolute and ideal perfection of performance from the smallest detail to the largest eloquence and both and all between fused into a flawlessly adjusted whole. Therein lies the twofold secret of his preëminence as a conductor. He has the attributes of interpretative genius, and he will trust nothing to chance. He can impart music in all the manifold range of its voice and give it characteristic and eloquent utterance. Yet into the sum of this eloquence he can also weave a surpassing felicity and perfection of detail. And again his audiences take all this fine and rare and passionate achievement for granted. Sometimes the listener wonders whether Dr. Muck does not conduct for himself and his ideal.

Between Stravinsky's and Schumann's pieces, Mr. Malkin, the new first 'cellist of the orchestra, played Haydn's concerto—not the most interesting of music in itself yet perennial for the opportunity it offers to a sensitive and poised virtuoso. Mr. Malkin is indeed an accomplished violoncellist of high and just repute in Germany where he has played in operatic and symphonic orchestras and in concerts of his own and where that eager amateur of music and that cultivated man in many an art, General Hellmuth von Moltke, the chief of the General Staff, did much to smooth his way to his just deserts. The nervousness that is the tradition of a debut at the Symphony Concerts, especially when the "soloist' rises from his place in the orchestra, beset Mr. Malkin for a time. Once clear of it, he showed himself the expert and responsive master of his music and his instrument that he is. He shuns excess in all things. He does not exaggerate the sensuous quality of the tone of the 'cello in instrumental song; no more with laborious showiness does he set his bow a-capering and his strings a-vibrating through technical feats done that an audience may wonder at them. His tone is clear and pure, continent and rounded, of an exceptional lightness, fineness and suppleness in arabesque, ornament and figuration for its own sake. It is even in runs; fleet at need; and suave and sensitive in transition. In such quiet song as that of the slow movement, Mr. Malkin carried the melody, phrased and colored it, as though he felt the cool and gentle beauty of this old music and the finer capabilities of his instrument with it and would by not a whit exaggerate them into merely sensuous pleasings. Yet time and again he added his little touches of individual detail as in his artful use of a vibrato. From end to end of the concerto his sense of style with his music and his instrument commended him and finesse and sensibility spoke out of his playing. As Mr. Noack is to the violins so Mr. Malkin promises to be to the violoncellos.

H. T. P.

The New Symphony 'Cellist

Horner Photo

(Copyright by Homer)

Josef Malkin

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 16,

Schoenberg's Music Stoutly Championed

The Five Pieces for the Next Symphony Concerts in Clear and Warm Survey

By P. G. Clapp

ON Friday and Saturday of this week, Arnold Schönberg's "Five Pieces for Orchestra" will be heard for the first time in Boston, at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Probably fifty or more of the audience have already heard Schönberg's string quartet, which "The Flonzaleys" played here last winter; possibly a dozen have heard the "Five Pieces" in Chicago or elsewhere; perhaps two or three have studied or heard others of his works. Yet there is no doubt that most of the audience will have made up their minds for or against Schönberg—probably the latter—before Dr. Muck raises his baton to begin the first piece.

Two Points of View

Arnold Schönberg's compositions are not familiar in this country; they have not needed to be. His free use of more dissonance than his predecessors was long ago dwelt upon by overworked pressmen eager once again to cause the hair of a jaded public to stand on end; reportorial emphasis on lack of triads and resolutions duly impressed worthy souls who knew not the meaning of either term; aspersions as to the sanity of Schönberg were made, proved by reference to his music, and believed by people who had not heard the passages in question. As a result, Schönberg exists today for the American public as a freak, and audiences assemble to learn if he is as shocking, ugly, absurd, or what you please, as he is represented.

In the face of such exploitation, it is perhaps a dangerous undertaking to attempt quietly and without sensationalism to point out certain unpretentious but lasting virtues in Schönberg's work, to attempt coolly and impartially to appraise his qualities of style, not with regard to its "headline value," but with regard solely to its artistic achievement. The public seldom dares to question a derogatory review of a new piece, but it is nearly always sceptical when a critic speaks well of a new work which on first hearing has failed to attract. Moreover, just as our fathers quailed before the terms "heretical" or "atheistic," and our elder brothers before the term "socialistic," so we crumple at the thought of being caught admiring anything "freakish" or "abnormal."

It is always easier to pooh-pooh than to analyze, and the former attitude takes better with the crowd. Nevertheless, so much has been said against Schönberg that a little in his favor cannot do any harm; I therefore intend here to speak of his style in general and of the "five pieces for orchestra" in particular, deliberately trying so far as possible to take his part, share his point of view, and make plain such good qualities as in a two-years' study of this and other works by Schönberg have become apparent. As to whether he is freakish, abnormal or insane, that is his private affair, and he must make the best of it without help or hindrance from his reviewers; our critical duty ends when we have estimated his music on its merits.

Schoenberg and Dissonance

The greatest emphasis has been laid upon Schönberg's unprecedented fondness for what to the ear of the average concert-goer are harsh dissonances. He does not obtain his dissonant effects as Debussy does, with secondary seventh and ninth chords and the occasional use of the whole-tone scale; or as d'Indy sometimes does, with variants of these chords in which one or two elements are raised or lowered—"altered" is the technical term. He freely uses chords with not four or five, but nine or ten, independent constituents, and progresses from one of these chords to another in a manner which is not so much contradictory to the accepted harmonic practice as it is different from it. To account theoretically for this novel procedure, Schönberg has devised a system of chord-structure based on superimposed perfect fourths instead of the customary superimposed alternate major and minor thirds. To a mathematician, this system is interesting, musically, it is harmless and of little significance, for sooner or later someone would have used all the chords intuitively, or at least would have worked them out for purposes of expression without regard to their theoretic import.

Really, this question of dissonance is not so vital as one might be led to suppose. Repeated laboratory experiments as well as the experience of the concert-going public have proved that the external unpleasantness of any dissonance, no matter how harsh, disappears with frequent repetition. One may therefore assume that in ten or twenty years we shall have to judge Schönberg on other issues. Indeed, Schönberg undoubtedly uses these dissonances, not to shock us, but to express his ideas, and if his own ears had not already become at least reconciled to them, he would not have used them. As to the theory which he announces concerning them, let us not on that account repudiate his works; many creative artists of high rank have held absurd theories, and good theories never yet saved a mediocre man from mediocre creation. In my studies of Schönberg's scores I have never been particularly annoyed by his dissonances; they come about easily, even smoothly, and they never seem dragged in by the heels—of the would-be sentimental harmonies which we hear every day in popular songs.

Music of Mood

The first thing needful in a musical composition is that the composer shall have something to say; the second—a much wider matter—is that his style shall be adapted to his ideas and that it shall be technically adequate. Schönberg from his earliest published music seems to have shown himself preëminently a portrayer of moods. From small songs, rather overloaded with detail of the type nowadays pigeon-holed as "subtle," he made his way to chamber music, in which he proved himself an easy master of the sort of formal treatment indicated by Liszt in his more radical pieces—that is to say, the symphonic form condensed into one long movement, in which the usual elements appear, but not in the usual set order. After the string quartets and the sextet—the latter a marvel of beauty—Schönberg turned to the form consisting of a long series of episodes making a complete cyclic work. His tone-poem, "Pélléas and Mélisande," shows this tendency, and also shows that Schönberg is distinctly a mood-painter rather than a dramatist or a musical psychologist. Inevitably he turned to the small unified piece as the form in which he could do best; with practice he has become expert at packing into a short sketch-like form a mood and several developments of it.

The kind of mood which he chooses to portray should be a much more serious problem to the conventional hearer than the dissonances that have received so much attention. It is remarkable that in our young art of music the kind and quality of emotion which makes melodrama ridiculous to us holds so respected a position; we have not yet outgrown in music the schoolboy conception of heroism and the schoolgirl conception of love. About Schönberg personally I know nothing, but I observe that his compositions express the moods which might come to a man of sensitive perceptions and versatile thought, given to solitary reflections, more or less isolated in point of view. Quiet intensity, a love of rich and complex colors, elusive light and shade, gentle melancholy with occasional touches of impassive bitterness, sympathetic tenderness, and receptivity to nature are frequent in his compositions; on the other hand, outbursts of angry pride, willingness to dally with the fantastic and the horrible, and a grim realization of the cruel side of nature are also frequently in evidence. With so sophisticated an artist, even thoughts are felt and even feelings are thought out; naturally with the naiver emotions, sublime and otherwise, which every magazine-reader presumes to call by their first names, Schönberg has little or nothing to do.

Method Again

Of Schönberg's use of dissonance I have already spoken. Two simultaneous harmonic systems, neither of them using "triads" are frequent; three such simultaneous systems are to be found here and there, and I can think of one passage in which there are four. Such treatment must, of course, depend upon contrapuntal vitality to be effective, and it can be said that Schönberg's counterpoint is always alive and knows where it is going. Schönberg is also a colorist in orchestration; he knows the tonal quality of each instrument, and combines different qualities marvellously. For many he will seem to be over-fond of muted brass, and some of his climaxes are probably too thick with detail.

The thematic snatches—there are but few long themes—in these five orchestral pieces are all well characterized, and stand out distinctly. This fortunate quality is due to pronounced and individualized rhythm, and to easily remembered intervals and tone-colors. The formal treatment is free but very firmly knit; it is said that Schönberg consciously aims at a "purely thematic" structure—that is, music in which not only the principal themes themselves, but all accompaniment figures besides have thematic value and are developed—and this end he very nearly attains. His sense of climax and proportion can be ranked perfect; very remarkable is his knack of brevity, which enables him to write a complete and highly developed piece of only a few minutes' duration. The whole five of these pieces cannot exceed twenty-five minutes in performance.

The Five Pieces in Detail

The first piece, though without key-signature, is recognizably in D minor. A brief, sharply rhythmic motive in 3-8 time is announced at once by 'celli, clarinets, reinforced in the second and third measures by oboes, over descending runs for contrabassoon and contrabass clarinet. There ensue short passages of a restless and sinister character alternating with slower passages of melancholy pleading. Bassoons establish a drone bass of D, A, C-sharp; 'celli, later violas and still later violins play a long theme (4-8 time) in which the restless spirit prevails. The 3-8 motive repeatedly interrupts, and the two are varied and developed with rhythmic figures derived from the drone bass to a frantically shrieking climax. An orchestral storm now breaks forth in which the 4-8 rhythm predominates; the long theme in original and derived forms is treated contrapuntally over an accompaniment based upon the 3-8 motive. There is a quieting down, and a return to 3-8 time. The drone bass is reëstablished; bits of the 3-8 motive chatter in the woodwind; an echo of the 4-8 theme rumbles obstinately below; the descending run from the introduction is heard again; muted trombones roar the drone bass while the obstinate echo of the 4-8 theme dies protestingly away.

Contrasts

If the first piece is wild, grotesque, without hope, and horrible, the second is gentle, melancholy, almost amorous, with more than a suggestion of the forest and of a lonely man in it. A plaintive melody is given out by 'celli and continued by flutes, English horn and clarinet over acrid harmonies of muted brass; the tonality again is D minor. A soft rustling is heard from the woodwind; the plaintive melody is partly repeated. A new melody of tender and amorous character is introduced by viola, imitated contrapuntally by other instruments, and developed at some length. In an episode, celesta and flutes reiterate an accompaniment figure, and more and more woodwind instruments pick up a little running motive. The amorous melody is developed in conjunction with the running motive. At the end the original plaintive melody crowds out the celesta and flute figure, and there is a discouraged subsidence of the amorous theme.

Tone-Picturing?

Schönberg publishes no programme with the third piece, and probably had none in mind, but the piece is to me inseparable from a curious effect of light and waves which I once saw while watching the Irish Channel from the British coast. The hot summer sunlight was filtered and diffused through a gray fog until it seemed to come from no specific direction; after glowing like gold and silver from above and around, it was reflected in innumerable reds and greens from sluggish ripples slowly moving over the surface of an oily sea. This third piece opens with vague harmonies, alternating in a slow rhythm between two groups of instruments; later come little ripples, with less sluggish alternation of the harmony-carrying groups; the climax is such a tonal ripple spreading through the whole orchestra (still pianissimo!); the close is a return to the original harmonies.

Contrast Again

The fourth piece is again wild, restless. A series of shrieks and a grotesque fanfare for muted horns are followed by pleading harmonies, with gloomy rumblings below. An energetic motive leads into a relatively long development section, in which the foregoing motives are developed in keen and biting opposition to a point just short of a climax. The pleading harmonies are heard again; then a terrifying crescendo leads to a crash and a chord dying away while the grotesque fanfare is momentarily parodied.

The Lyric Close

In the fifth and last piece, Schönberg drops his relentless development of motives in favor of a flowing, rather lyrical structure in which individual instrumental voices are constantly introducing little melodic and counter-melodic snatches, producing a charming and elusive effect of tossing the focal point of interest from one instrument to another. The first portion of the piece is gentle, tranquil, not wholly free from melancholy but on the whole gracefully and quietly happy. A descending figure for 'cello answered by bass tuba changes the mood to a suggestion of foreboding. A long crescendo, steadily more and more agitated leads to a sub-climax based on the descending figure. Ghostly harmonies follow. Bass, clarinet and bassoon have a complaining melody, and there is another crescendo, based on the descending figure. A fortissimo climax, shrill and discordant, suggestive of protest and despair, follows; there is a melancholy diminuendo, and the piece ends with an unresolved suspension which is like an unanswered question.

Schoenberg and His Hearers

So much for as sympathetic a brief in behalf of Schönberg as facilities permit. If I have persistently praised him in this advance analysis of his style and of the pieces which we are about to bear, I am sure that I may be forgiven; there is certainly an advance opinion unfavorable to Schönberg, and it is only fair that someone should unearth and display his virtues. An impartial critical estimate is another matter. Is Schönberg what is commonly called a "great composer"?

Critics and public may quiet themselves about the influence of his harmonic procedure. Frequent performances of his music sometime and somewhere will smooth the sharp edges of his dissonances; but his style will hardly become standard. It is a significant fact that today no good parody of this style is obtainable, except the unconscious parodies furnished by his would-be imitators. I doubt if his idiosyncrasies will be incorporated wholesale à la Wagner into the daily musical idiom any more than Chopin's were, although he may, and I hope will, exercise such an indirect influence as Chopin did, in respect to counteracting the ever-present tendency of composers toward a lazy admission of the commonplace into details of otherwise noble pieces. In the main, however, his style is too closely adapted to his personal selection of ideas to express ever to be successfully imitated.

As to these ideas which Schönberg chooses to express, will he ever appeal to the general public with them? Probably not; the commuter element in music will never find him "human" enough. In literature there frequently have been, in music there will undoubtedly be, individual men who by virtue of their unusual points of view, fantastic imagination, lack of interest in everyday affairs and preoccupation remote thoughts and things interest the general public little or not at all. In literature, Lafcadio Hearn was such a writer; a comparison be[illegible] him and Schönberg may seem somewhat lame, as all such comparisons must be, but at least it is better than a comparison between Schönberg and Chopin, who expressed popular emotions in an individual way.

Schönberg, then, will eventually be recognized by a small public, who, it is to be hoped, will not misstate the accident of their sympathy with the thought and style of this unusual writer for a proof of mental superiority over the rest of mankind, but will prize his music as an extra delight in life which their good fortune permits them to enjoy. The rest of the public will fail to enjoy this music, not because of shortcomings either in the works or on the part of the public, but because Schönberg concerns himself with moods and fancies which few people happen personally to have experienced. In the meantime, fairness demands that his works be publicly performed, and heard in as unprejudiced an attitude as possible. Too loud a laugh at the unfamiliarity of his style would speak the vacant mind.

Cellist

Copyright by Homer)

BOSTON POST,

DECEMBER 19,

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE LAUGHING

Schonberg's 'Five Pieces' Inspire Smiles and Horror

BY OLIN DOWNES

Yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, at the eighth rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, a polite and well-intentioned audience laughed outright as the first of Arnold Schonberg's "Five Pieces for Orchestra" was played for the first time in this city. The other four pieces appeared to excite only wonder and bewilderment. After the last had come to an end some 10 isolated Schonbergers applauded persistently for a few minutes in one corner of the hall.

DR. MUCK BOWS TO PLAYERS

Dr. Muck's gestures had spoken for themselves. He had rapped peremptorily on his conductor's desk as he opened the score. He had raised his baton, as each piece came to an end without resting on any chord familiar to anyone in the audience, and proceeded without a pause and rather grimly to the next "piece," and at last he bowed several times to his orchestra, as to courageous, skillful colleagues, who had performed a difficult and dangerous task, and ignoring a few well-meant handclaps from the audience, marched off the stage, apparently in an unamiable frame of mind.

No one need have been surprised at this. Dr. Muck, in response to the oft-repeated persuasions of some admirers of Schonberg, one of the latest composers to make a sensation in Europe, had finally decided to play music for which, it is said, he has little admiration, for the sake of any who might wish to hear it. The strain of the rehearsals must have been considerable, since the music is not only intricate in its rhythms and its polyphony, but also, for the most part, very ugly. That it was possible to rehearse it at all with any results is at least as much of a wonder to us as rehearsals of Richard Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" must have seemed to nearly everyone back in the '70s.

Curiosity About the Music

There was much curiosity about this music, although curiosity of a rather sensational order. It was known that of all masters of discord that Europe has produced in the last 50 years, Schonberg was one of the most extreme in his tendencies. There had been reports of rioting in concert-halls of Germany, at performances of his works, before the Flonzaley Quartet performed Schonberg's string quartet, op. 7, last season in this city. The quartet was liked here. In Chicago, where the "Five Orchestral Pieces" were performed last year, there was either amusement or, as yesterday afternoon in the lobbies, outspoken irritation with such music.

This music, for the greater part, sounds very horrible. The sonorities of the orchestra are so intense in pitch and quality that it is a physically taxing experience for the ear. At a first hearing, the only pieces which conveyed any definite impression to this reviewer were the third, an impressionistic effect of pronounced individuality, and, if you can look at it that way, of a very subtle beauty; and the fourth piece, a piece which really communicates sensations of terror, or horror. The first piece appeared to ordinary ears, untuned to the intensities of Schonberg, simply laughable, and so it was received. The last piece was also very terrible, physically hurtful—and this is but sober statement of fact.

Music of Tortured Nerves

It should be added, that at first hearing much music now accepted has seem very ugly and very incomprehensible; that Schonberg's music, with all its strangeness, gives the impression of sincerity and clearly defined intention on the part of the composer. Furthermore, Schonberg has long since proven his technical acquirements as a composer. For ourselves, we can only say that at present this music is so disagreeable that, whatever its merits, we cannot find the courage to wish to hear it again. At the best, it appears as the music of raw and tortured nerves.

For us this music, however original and masterly in workmanship, is exceedingly unhealthy and disagreeable, having neither the grandeur of cleansing tragedy, nor the uplift of a great composition that makes all men akin.

Miss Hinkle's Singing

[illegible] other important features of this [illegible] were the superb singing of Miss Hinkle [illegible] aginative reading of the "Faust" overture of Wagner — it is true that the "Surprise" symphony of Haydn seemed very stupid. Miss Hinkle sang the "voi che sapete" of Mozart and the "Ave Maria" from Max Bruch's "Cross of Fire." In the first aria she showed unsurpassable purity of tone and of style, and she made the rather bombastic music of Bruch great by her splendid voice and her dramatic interpretation. On this music she conferred the grandeur to which it aspires and which it does not, in itself, achieve. No finer singing has been heard in seasons at a Symphony concert.

The use of the aerophore enabled the bass tuba player in Wagner's overture to play the opening phrase for the tuba with a real, sustaining legato—not, after all, that the phrase became particularly more eloquent by virtue of the mechanical assistance of the machine that pumped air into the big horn while the player was refilling his lungs, but it is a comfort to know that the wishes of a composer are being obeyed! The romanticism and the psychological quality of much of this music was the orchestral treat of the afternoon.

ADVERTISER.

DECEMBER 19

THE SYMPHONY THIS WEEK

AN EXCRUCIATING NOVELTY BY SCHOENBERG PLAYED

Wagner, Mozart, Bruch and Haydn Also Programmed — Miss Florence Hinkle, Soloist.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Wagner—A Faust Overture.
Mozart—Aria, "Voi che Sapete."
Soloist, Miss Florence Hinkle.
Schoenberg—Five Pieces for Orchestra.
Bruch—"Ave Maria" from "The Cross of Fire."
Haydn—Symphony in G major.

A programme which ranged from the most conservative to the most radical music. Next to "Romeo and Juliet," "Faust" has inspired the most music of any play ever written, and it has been treated in the most diverse fashions imaginable. Schumann and Boito steered pretty close to Goethe's original; Berlioz sent the hero to eternal damnation; Gounod made him simply the lover and betrayer of Gretchen and added a Liebel that the original Faust would have scorned; Liszt makes his best effects with Marguerite; and Wagner leaves her out of the picture almost altogether.

Wagner's Faust as depicted in the overture given yesterday afternoon, in Symphony Hall, is a rather discontented gentleman somewhat addicted to the deepest brass instruments. Nevertheless, the Faust Overture is a dignified work and was read in an excellent manner; it probably has never been so well given in Boston, and its dramatic power made a deep impression.

Then came a pleasing vocalist, Miss Florence Hinkle, with the suave and rather Chesterfieldian love-song "Voi che Sapete." Compared with the erotic songs of Wagner or Richard Strauss, this is rather sedate amativeness, it is iced passion, but it is music, pure, delightful music, and it exhibits the bel canto as none of the modern vocal composers can do.

Miss Hinkle sang this with just the smooth, tender effect that the song demanded, and made a decidedly good impression with it, although we would have preferred a deeper and broader voice in this particular song. Her second number was more of a novelty, being the "Ave Maria" by that belated Mendelssohn—Max Bruch. This is from the "Fiery Cross" by Sir Walter Scott, and reminds us that Bruch, who is the mildest mannered gentleman in the world, delights in songs of war as much as did Tyrtaeus of old, and takes to Scottish subjects as if he had been brought up on Haggis.

He is always melodic, in spite of his martial instincts, and he is utterly out of sympathy with the ultra-modern dissonances and cataclysms. Miss Hinkle sang this number with much sweetness. Perhaps it was intended to be one of the bandages to bind up the wounds of Schoenberg. Miss Hinkle's intonation was of the purest and she gives Canto Spianato in a perfect manner. She was recalled over and over again with real enthusiasm.

Yet the number itself is not one of Bruch's greatest arias. His "Penelope weaving a garment," from "Odysseus," or "Ingsborg's Klage," from "Frithjof," would have been more worth while, but since Miss Hinkle sang charmingly it seems hypercritical to object to her choice. Only we would have wished the best numbers of this intelligible school to have been placed beside the modern selections of this programme.

But now we must reluctantly speak of, as we still more reluctantly listened to, the vagaries of the musical radical, Arnold Schoenberg. His fine orchestral pieces had one only merit—brevity. Parts of them were not any more coherent than the tuning-up of the orchestra, which preceded them, that is to the average auditor. The earnest student can find coherency after studying the printed page many times, but the auditor never. It was Huxley, we believe, who once said that music was beginning to demand more of the brain than it was capable of giving, and Schoenberg's problems fearfully illustrate this fact; they depart from the true function of music.

The first and fourth of these orchestral pieces are ugly beyond anything we have yet heard even in modern music, yet they had a weird power that was undeniable. It has been said that it is difficult to score a noise well. Schoenberg has certainly succeeded in doing this. There were passages that suggested a bomb in a poultry-yard, cackles, shrieks, caterwauls, and then—crash!! That any orchestra could possibly play such a work speaks well for modern technique; but then, per contra, they might put in a few hundred false notes and nobody would be the wiser.

Yet a few, a very few, were pleased with these numbers, one musician saying that the harmonic fragments blended successfully into rhythmic life, vigor, and interesting variety, that the mosaics were woven into striking effects, and finding the presentiments of terrific evil absolutely awe-inspiring in the first movement,—the very fabric of a wild, disordered and tumultuous vision.

For ourselves, we can only say that our ears and mind and soul are sealed against any such impressions; we think this music the acme of artistic wrong-doing. We thank Dr. Muck for presenting the five numbers, and the orchestra for their great labor in studying them. It is only right that we should hear these radical phases, in order to judge for ourselves, but we are glad that the ordeal is past and the task done.

As usual, Dr. Muck swatted the ultra-modern blows with sterling, intelligible, classical music. In this concert the musical apologies for the temporary tonal dementia were Haydn, Mozart and Bruch, but even these could not quite neutralize the awful memories of Schoenberg. There are some who will accept this wild nightmare simply because they can detect a few grains of sense and logic in it; these fragments gain a fictitious value by their contrast with the irrational or fiercely ugly parts and are tremendously over-rated. We repeat our conviction that no man can invent a new religion so foolish but that he will win a few adherents, and no composer can write a work so absurd but that a few of the musical gropers or malcontents will cling to it.

A Haydn symphony closed the proceedings amicably.

HERALD. SATURDAY.

DECEMBER 19.

MISS HINKLE SHOWS SKILL AS SOLOIST

Symphony Orchestra's Playing of Schoenberg Pieces Received with Dignity.

By PHILIP HALE.

The eighth Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Miss Florence Hinkle, soprano, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

A Faust Overture.......................Wagner
"Voi che Sapete".......................Mozart
Five pieces for orchestra:
Presentiments, The Past, The Changing Chord, Peripteia, The Obbligato Recitative.......................Schoenberg
First time in Boston.
"Ave Maria" from "The Cross of Fire" Bruch
Symphony in G (The Surprise).........Haydn

Bill Nye said, many years ago, that the music of Wagner was better than it sounded. Arnold Schoenberg says today that his own music is better than it sounds.

The pieces played yesterday are extraordinary. It is easy to say that the composer is a maniac or a poseur. Neither statement would be accurate. Those who have read his treatise on harmony know that he is a man of unusual knowledge, force, originality. Those who heard his quartet last season know that he can write music of uncommon beauty and towering imagination in a more familiar form.

It would also be easy to say that when Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel" was first performed in Boston, the majority in the audience thought the music chaotic, incomprehensible and the composer mad. Today, in comparison with Schoenberg's pieces, this symphonic poem is as clear as music by Haydn. Remember, too, that when Debussy's "Nocturnes" were played twice in succession at Chickering Hall they were thought to be incomprehensible.

These instances will not answer the objectors to Schoenberg. What is to be said of his five pieces? Personal impressions are interesting chiefly to the person impressed. No two persons hear music in the same way. I could make little out of the first and the fifth pieces. There are fine moments in "The Past" and "The Changing Chord"; beautiful suggestions of mood; strangely beautiful effects of color. Nor is the fourth piece wholly inexplicable. To argue for or against this music, which might be of another planet, after even several hearings, would be presumptuous and foolish. It took many Bostonians, well acquainted with orchestral and chamber compositions, a long time to familiarize themselves with the idiom of Cesar Franck, and later with that of Debussy. These composers, however, are not so fundamentally radical, anarchistic, as Schoenberg.

Thomas Hardy in that noble prose epic, the description of Egdon Heath, asks if the exclusive reign of orthodox beauty is not approaching its last quarter. "The new vale of Temple may be a gaunt waste in Thule; human souls may find themselves in closer and closer harmony with external things wearing a somberness distasteful to our race when it was young. * * * The time seems near, if it has not actually arrived, when the mournful sublimity of a moor, a sea, or a mountain, will be all of nature that is absolutely consonant with the moods of the [illegible] thinking among mankind. And ultimately, to the commonest tourist spots like Iceland may become what the vineyards and myrtle gardens of South Europe are to him now, and Heidelberg and Baden be passed unheeded as he hastens from the Alps to the sand dunes of Scheveningen."

When Schoenberg's Five Pieces were performed for the first time in London, and in Chicago, there were scenes of outspoken disapproval. Yesterday the behavior of the audience was highly creditable to Boston. There was smiling; there was giggling at times; there was applause. Nobody rose to remonstrate. Nothing was thrown at Dr. Muck and the orchestra. There was no perturbation of Nature to show that Schoenberg's pieces were playing: the sun did not hasten its descent; there was no earthquake shock. It was as it should have been in Boston.

Miss Florence Hinkle has a beautiful voice which she uses with rare skill. The Canzona of Cherubino, sensuous in its suppressed passion, should be sung by a darker voice to gain full effect. It served yesterday to display the art of Miss Hinkle in sustained and flawless song. The lyrical measures of Bruck's "Ave Maria," conventionally suave, were sung with unexaggerated emotion, and the singer gave dramatic importance to the agitated passages that in themselves are of a perfunctory and meaningless nature. It has been said by some that Miss Hinkle is a cool, impassive singer. They probably mean by this that she is not spasmodic and hysterical. Seldom at Symphony concerts of late years has there been such a delightful display of pure vocal art as that of yesterday.

Dr. Muck gave an eloquent reading of the Faust overture in which there are hints at the Wagner to come. The symphony of Haydn, admirably performed, is not among his most interesting.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Franck, Chorale in A minor for organ; Volbach, symphony in B minor (first time here); Bach, pastorale from the Christmas oratorio; Liszt, March of the Three Kings; Weber, overture to "Der Freischuetz."

BOSTON JOURNAL—

DECEMBER 19, 1914.

HISSES FOR NEW SYMPHONY MUSIC

Much Laughter and a Little Applause for Pieces by Schoenberg.

Hisses and laughter and a little applause attended the performance of Schoenberg's "Five Pieces for Orchestra," at the Symphony concert yesterday. Altogether it was an extraordinary and perhaps unprecedented demonstration; but the cause was as unusual as the effect.

These five pieces have been called Futurist music. Schoenberg himself, who is a 40-year-old Austrian, now living in Berlin, denies the soft impeachment about Futurism. He says that he writes in his own way and to please himself. Yesterday was the first time any of his music obtained a hearing at a Symphony concert, but the "Five Pieces" had previously been played in other cities, on both sides of the ocean, and here and there stood up prophets to declare Schoenberg one of the great tone painters of the times. There was a little ripple of applause yesterday for the third piece, which is entitled "The Changing Chord," and which suggested the impressionistic pastels of Debussy and Ravel. But generally this new music was not taken seriously. It will be played again tonight, and probably for the last time while Dr. Muck is conductor of the Symphony Orchestra.

Fun for the Audience

Here are the effects noted yesterday in the audience: No. 1, "Presentiments," very amusing; No. 2, "The Past," not quite so amusing, but still puzzling; No. 3, "The Changing Chord," somewhat impressive and poetical; No. 4, "Peripetaia," disgustingly maudlin, and to be hissed; No. 5, "The Obbligato Recitative," also rather impressive, and certainly not as funny or offensive as Nos. 1 and 4.

At its best or clearest the music suggested the most fantastic flights of the new French school. At its worst or wildest it evoked suggestions of Chinese burlesque. This may be the music of the future, or it may be nothing but the work of an arch-humorist who dares to perpetrate classic jokes. It raises havoc with rules and traditions. Perhaps Schoenberg is an inspired musical psychologist living ahead of his time, or perhaps he is an inspired comedian. Unquestionably most of the people at Symphony Hall yesterday found him as funny as a clown in a circus.

Delightful Contrasts

Miss Florence Hinkle sang delightfully, with charming voice and style, Mozart's "Voi che sapete" and Bruch's "Ave Maria," and the orchestra played Wagner's "Faust" overture, which had a bizarre sound to older generations, and Haydn's "Surprise" symphony.

[illegible] ext Friday afterno [illegible] will [illegible]

BOSTON POST,

DECEMBER 19,

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE LAUGHING

Schonberg's 'Five Pieces' Inspire Smiles and Horror

BY OLIN DOWNES

Yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, at the eighth rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, a polite and well-intentioned audience laughed outright as the first of Arnold Schonberg's "Five Pieces for Orchestra" was played for the first time in this city. The other four pieces appeared to excite only wonder and bewilderment. After the last had come to an end some 10 isolated Schonbergers applauded persistently for a few minutes in one corner of the hall.

DR. MUCK BOWS TO PLAYERS

Dr. Muck's gestures had spoken for themselves. He had rapped peremptorily on his conductor's desk as he opened the score. He had raised his baton, as each piece came to an end without resting on any chord familiar to anyone in the audience, and proceeded without a pause and rather grimly to the next "piece," and at last he bowed several times to his orchestra, as to courageous, skillful colleagues, who had performed a difficult and dangerous task, and ignoring a few well-meant handclaps from the audience, marched off the stage, apparently in an unamiable frame of mind.

No one need have been surprised at this. Dr. Muck, in response to the oft-repeated persuasions of some admirers of Schonberg, one of the latest composers to make a sensation in Europe, had finally decided to play music for which, it is said, he has little admiration, for the sake of any who might wish to hear it. The strain of the rehearsals must have been considerable, since the music is not only intricate in its rhythms and its polyphony, but also, for the most part, very ugly. That it was possible to rehearse it at all with any results is at least as much of a wonder to us as rehearsals of Richard Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" must have seemed to nearly everyone back in the '70s.

Curiosity About the Music

There was much curiosity about this music, although curiosity of a rather sensational order. It was known that of all masters of discord that Europe has produced in the last 50 years, Schonberg was one of the most extreme in his tendencies. There had been reports of rioting in concert-halls of Germany, at performances of his works, before the Flonzaley Quartet performed Schonberg's string quartet, op. 7, last season in this city. The quartet was liked here. In Chicago, where the "Five Orchestral Pieces" were performed last year, there was either amusement or, as yesterday afternoon in the lobbies, outspoken irritation with such music.

This music, for the greater part, sounds very horrible. The sonorities of the orchestra are so intense in pitch and quality that it is a physically taxing experience for the ear. At a first hearing, the only pieces which conveyed any definite impression to this reviewer were the third, an impressionistic effect of pronounced individuality, and, if you can look at it that way, of a very subtle beauty; and the fourth piece, a piece which really communicates sensations of terror, or horror. The first piece appeared to ordinary ears, untuned to the intensities of Schonberg, simply laughable, and so it was received. The last piece was also very terrible, physically hurtful—and this is but sober statement of fact.

Music of Tortured Nerves

It should be added, that at first hearing much music now accepted has seem very ugly and very incomprehensible; that Schonberg's music, with all its strangeness, gives the impression of sincerity and clearly defined intention on the part of the composer. Furthermore, Schonberg has long since proven his technical acquirements as a composer. For ourselves, we can only say that at present this music is so disagreeable that, whatever its merits, we cannot find the courage to wish to hear it again. At the best, it appears as the music of raw and tortured nerves.

For us this music, however original and masterly in workmanship, is exceedingly unhealthy and disagreeable, having neither the grandeur of cleansing tragedy, nor the uplift of a great composition that makes all men akin.

Miss Hinkle's Singing

other important features of this t were the superb singing of Miss Hinkle and Dr. Muck's detailed but imaginative reading of the "Faust" overture of Wagner — it is true that the "Surprise" symphony of Haydn seemed very stupid. Miss Hinkle sang the "voi che sapete" of Mozart and the "Ave Maria" from Max Bruch's "Cross of Fire." In the first aria she showed unsurpassable purity of tone and of style, and she made the rather bombastic music of Bruch great by her splendid voice and her dramatic interpretation. On this music she conferred the grandeur to which it aspires and which it does not, in itself, achieve. No finer singing has been heard in seasons at a Symphony concert.

The use of the aerophore enabled the bass tuba player in Wagner's overture to play the opening phrase for the tuba with a real, sustaining legato—not, after all, that the phrase became particularly more eloquent by virtue of the mechanical assistance of the machine that pumped air into the big horn while the player was refilling his lungs, but it is a comfort to know that the wishes of a composer are being obeyed! The romanticism and the psychological quality of much of this music was the orchestral treat of the afternoon.

ADVERTISER,

DECEMBER 19

THE SYMPHONY THIS WEEK

AN EXCRUCIATING NOVELTY BY SCHOENBERG PLAYED

Wagner, Mozart, Bruch and Haydn Also Programmed — Miss Florence Hinkle, Soloist.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Wagner—A Faust Overture.
Mozart—Aria, "Voi che Sapete."
Soloist, Miss Florence Hinkle.
Schoenberg—Five Pieces for Orchestra.
Bruch—"Ave Maria" from "The Cross of Fire."
Haydn—Symphony in G major.

A programme which ranged from the most conservative to the most radical music. Next to "Romeo and Juliet," "Faust" has inspired the most music of any play ever written, and it has been treated in the most diverse fashions imaginable. Schumann and Boito steered pretty close to Goethe's original; Berlioz sent the hero to eternal damnation; Gounod made him simply the lover and betrayer of Gretchen and added a Liebel that the original Faust would have scorned; Liszt makes his best effects with Marguerite; and Wagner leaves her out of the picture almost altogether.

Wagner's Faust as depicted in the overture given yesterday afternoon, in Symphony Hall, is a rather discontented gentleman somewhat addicted to the deepest brass instruments. Nevertheless, the Faust Overture is a dignified work and was read in an excellent manner; it probably has never been so well given in Boston, and its dramatic power made a deep impression.

Then came a pleasing vocalist, Miss Florence Hinkle, with the suave and rather Chesterfieldian love-song ,"Voi che Sapete." Compared with the erotic songs of Wagner or Richard Strauss, this is rather sedate amativeness, it is iced passion, but it is music, pure, delightful music, and it exhibits the bel canto as none of the modern vocal composers can do.

Miss Hinkle sang this with just the smooth, tender effect that the song demanded, and made a decidedly good impression with it, although we would have preferred a deeper and broader voice in this particular song. Her second number was more of a novelty, being the "Ave Maria" by that belated Mendelssohn—Max Bruch. This is from the "Fiery Cross" by Sir Walter Scott, and reminds us that Bruch, who is the mildest mannered gentleman in the world, delights in songs of war as much as did Tyrtaeus of old, and takes to Scottish subjects as if he had been brought up on Haggis.

He is always melodic, in spite of his martial instincts, and he is utterly out of sympathy with the ultra-modern dissonances and cataclysms. Miss Hinkle sang this number with much sweetness. Perhaps it was intended to be one of the bandages to bind up the wounds of Schoenberg. Miss Hinkle's intonation was of the purest and she gives Canto Spianato in a perfect manner. She was recalled over and over again with real enthusiasm.

Yet the number itself is not one of Bruch's greatest arias. His "Penelope weaving a garment," from "Odysseus," or "Ingsborg's Klage," from "Frithjof," would have been more worth while, but since Miss Hinkle sang charmingly it seems hypercritical to object to her choice. Only we would have wished the best numbers of this intelligible school to have been placed beside the modern selections of this programme.

But now we must reluctantly speak of, as we still more reluctantly listened to, the vagaries of the musical radical, Arnold Schoenberg. His fine orchestral pieces had one only merit—brevity. Parts of them were not any more coherent than the tuning-up of the orchestra, which preceded them, that is to the average auditor. The earnest student can find coherency after studying the printed page many times, but the auditor never. It was Huxley, we believe, who once said that music was beginning to demand more of the brain than it was capable of giving, and Schoenberg's problems fearfully illustrate this fact; they depart from the true function of music.

The first and fourth of these orchestral pieces are ugly beyond anything we have yet heard even in modern music, yet they had a weird power that was undeniable. It has been said that it is difficult to score a noise well. Schoenberg has certainly succeeded in doing this. There were passages that suggested a bomb in a poultry-yard; cackles, shrieks, caterwauls, and then—crash!! That any orchestra could possibly play such a work speaks well for modern technique; but then, per contra, they might put in a few hundred false notes and nobody would be the wiser.

Yet a few, a very few, were pleased with these numbers, one musician saying that the harmonic fragments blended successfully into rhythmic life, vigor, and interesting variety, that the mosaics were woven into striking effects, and finding the presentiments of terrific evil absolutely awe-inspiring in the first movement,—the very fabric of a wild, disordered and tumultuous vision.

For ourselves, we can only say that our ears and mind and soul are sealed against any such impressions; we think this music the acme of artistic wrong-doing. We thank Dr. Muck for presenting the five numbers, and the orchestra for their great labor in studying them. It is only right that we should hear these radical phases, in order to judge for ourselves, but we are glad that the ordeal is past and the task done.

As usual, Dr. Muck swatted the ultra-modern blows with sterling, intelligible, classical music. In this concert the musical apologies for the temporary tonal dementia were Haydn, Mozart and Bruch, but even these could not quite neutralize the awful memories of Schoenberg. There are some who will accept this wild nightmare simply because they can detect a few grains of sense and logic in it; these fragments gain a fictitious value by their contrast with the irrational or fiercely ugly parts and are tremendously over-rated. We repeat our conviction that no man can invent a new religion so foolish but that he will win a few adherents, and no composer can write a work so absurd but that a few of the musical gropers or malcontents will cling to it.

A Haydn symphony closed the proceedings amicably.

HERALD. SATURDAY.

DECEMBER 19.

MISS HINKLE SHOWS SKILL AS SOLOIST

Symphony Orchestra's Playing of Schoenberg Pieces Received with Dignity.

By PHILIP HALE.

The eighth Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Miss Florence Hinkle, soprano, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

A Faust Overture .... Wagner
"Voi che Sapete" .... Mozart
Five pieces for orchestra:
Presentiments, The Past, The Changing Chord, Peripteia, The Obbligato Recitative .... Schoenberg
First time in Boston.
"Ave Maria" from "The Cross of Fire" .... Bruch
Symphony in G (The Surprise) .... Haydn

Bill Nye said, many years ago, that the music of Wagner was better than it sounded. Arnold Schoenberg says today that his own music is better than it sounds.

The pieces played yesterday are extraordinary. It is easy to say that the composer is a maniac or a poseur. Neither statement would be accurate. Those who have read his treatise on harmony know that he is a man of unusual knowledge, force, originality. Those who heard his quartet last season know that he can write music of uncommon beauty and towering imagination in a more familiar form.

It would also be easy to say that when Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel" was first performed in Boston, the majority in the audience thought the music chaotic, incomprehensible and the composer mad. Today, in comparison with Schoenberg's pieces, this symphonic poem is as clear as music by Haydn. Remember, too, that when Debussy's "Nocturnes" were played twice in succession at Chickering Hall they were thought to be incomprehensible.

These instances will not answer the objectors to Schoenberg. What is to be said of his five pieces? Personal impressions are interesting chiefly to the person impressed. No two persons hear music in the same way. I could make little out of the first and the fifth pieces. There are fine moments in "The Past" and "The Changing Chord"; beautiful suggestions of mood; strangely beautiful effects of color. Nor is the fourth piece wholly inexplicable. To argue for or against this music, which might be of another planet, after even several hearings, would be presumptuous and foolish. It took many Bostonians, well acquainted with orchestral and chamber compositions, a long time to familiarize themselves with the idiom of Cesar, Franck, and later with that of Debussy. These composers, however, are not so fundamentally radical, anarchistic, as Schoenberg.

Thomas Hardy in that noble prose epic, the description of Egdon Heath, asks if the exclusive reign of orthodox beauty is not approaching its last quarter. "The new vale of Temple may be a gaunt waste in Thule; human souls may find themselves in closer and closer harmony with external things wearing a somberness distasteful to our race when it was young. * * * The time seems near, if it has not actually arrived, when the mournful sublimity of a moor, a sea, or a mountain, will be all of nature that is absolutely consonant with the moods of the mo thinking among mankind. And ultimately, to the commonest tourist spot like Iceland may become what the vineyards and myrtle gardens of South Europe are to him now, and Heidelberg and Baden be passed unheeded as he hastens from the Alps to the sand dunes of Scheveningen."

When Schoenberg's Five Pieces were performed for the first time in London, and in Chicago, there were scenes of outspoken disapproval. Yesterday the behavior of the audience was highly creditable to Boston. There was smiling; there was giggling at times; there was applause. Nobody rose to remonstrate. Nothing was thrown at Dr. Muck and the orchestra. There was no perturbation of Nature to show that Schoenberg's pieces were playing: the sun did not hasten its descent; there was no earthquake shock. It was as it should have been in Boston.

Miss Florence Hinkle has a beautiful voice which she uses with rare skill. The Canzona of Cherubino, sensuous in its suppressed passion, should be sung by a darker voice to gain full effect. It served yesterday to display the art of Miss Hinkle in sustained and flawless song. The lyrical measures of Bruck's "Ave Maria," conventionally suave, were sung with unexaggerated emotion, and the singer gave dramatic importance to the agitated passages that in themselves are of a perfunctory and meaningless nature. It has been said by some that Miss Hinkle is a cool, impassive singer. They probably mean by this that she is not spasmodic and hysterical. Seldom at Symphony concerts of late years has there been such a delightful display of pure vocal art as that of yesterday.

Dr. Muck gave an eloquent reading of the Faust overture in which there are hints at the Wagner to come. The symphony of Haydn, admirably performed, is not among his most interesting.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Franck, Chorale in A minor for organ; Volbach, symphony in B minor (first time here); Bach, pastorale from the Christmas oratorio; Liszt, March of the Three Kings; Weber, overture to "Der Freischuetz."

BOSTON JOURNAL—

DECEMBER 19, 1914.

HISSES FOR NEW SYMPHONY MUSIC

Much Laughter and a Little Applause for Pieces by Schoenberg.

Hisses and laughter and a little applause attended the performance of Schoenberg's "Five Pieces for Orchestra," at the Symphony concert yesterday. Altogether it was an extraordinary and perhaps unprecedented demonstration; but the cause was as unusual as the effect.

These five pieces have been called Futurist music. Schoenberg himself, who is a 40-year-old Austrian, now living in Berlin, denies the soft impeachment about Futurism. He says that he writes in his own way and to please himself. Yesterday was the first time any of his music obtained a hearing at a Symphony concert, but the "Five Pieces" had previously been played in other cities, on both sides of the ocean, and here and there stood up prophets to declare Schoenberg one of the great tone painters of the times. There was a little ripple of applause yesterday for the third piece, which is entitled "The Changing Chord," and which suggested the impressionistic pastels of Debussy and Ravel. But generally this new music was not taken seriously. It will be played again tonight, and probably for the last time while Dr. Muck is conductor of the Symphony Orchestra.

Fun for the Audience

Here are the effects noted yesterday in the audience: No. 1, "Presentiments," very amusing; No. 2, "The Past," not quite so amusing, but still puzzling; No. 3, "The Changing Chord," somewhat impressive and poetical; No. 4, "Peripetaia," disgustingly maudlin, and to be hissed; No. 5, "The Obbligato Recitative," also rather impressive, and certainly not as funny or offensive as Nos. 1 and 4.

At its best or clearest the music suggested the most fantastic flights of the new French school. At its worst or wildest it evoked suggestions of Chinese burlesque. This may be the music of the future, or it may be nothing but the work of an arch-humorist who dares to perpetrate classic jokes. It raises havoc with rules and traditions. Perhaps Schoenberg is an inspired musical psychologist living ahead of his time, or perhaps he is an inspired comedian. Unquestionably most of the people at Symphony Hall yesterday found him as funny as a clown in a circus.

Delightful Contrasts

Miss Florence Hinkle sang delightfully, with charming voice and style, Mozart's "Voi che sapete" and Bruch's "Ave Maria," and the orchestra played Wagner's "Faust" overture, which had a bizarre sound to older generations, and Haydn's "Surprise" symphony.

next Friday afternoon

BOSTON POST,

DECEMBER 19.

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE LAUGHING

Schonberg's 'Five Pieces' Inspire Smiles and Horror

BY OLIN DOWNES

Yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, at the eighth rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, a polite and well-intentioned audience laughed outright as the first of Arnold Schonberg's "Five Pieces for Orchestra" was played for the first time in this city. The other four pieces appeared to excite only wonder and bewilderment. After the last had come to an end some 10 isolated Schonbergers applauded persistently for a few minutes in one corner of the hall.

DR. MUCK BOWS TO PLAYERS

Dr. Muck's gestures had spoken for themselves. He had rapped peremptorily on his conductor's desk as he opened the score. He had raised his baton, as each piece came to an end without resting on any chord familiar to anyone in the audience, and proceeded without a pause and rather grimly to the next "piece," and at last he bowed several times to his orchestra, as to courageous, skillful colleagues, who had performed a difficult and dangerous task, and ignoring a few well-meant handclaps from the audience, marched off the stage, apparently in an unamiable frame of mind.

No one need have been surprised at this. Dr. Muck, in response to the oft-repeated persuasions of some admirers of Schonberg, one of the latest composers to make a sensation in Europe, had finally decided to play music for which, it is said, he has little admiration, for the sake of any who might wish to hear it. The strain of the rehearsals must have been considerable, since the music is not only intricate in its rhythms and its polyphony, but also, for the most part, very ugly. That it was possible to rehearse it at all with any results is at least as much of a wonder to us as rehearsals of Richard Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" must have seemed to nearly everyone back in the '70s.

Curiosity About the Music

There was much curiosity about this music, although curiosity of a rather sensational order. It was known that of all masters of discord that Europe has produced in the last 50 years, Schonberg was one of the most extreme in his tendencies. There had been reports of rioting in concert-halls of Germany, at performances of his works, before the Flonzaley Quartet performed Schonberg's string quartet, op. 7, last season in this city. The quartet was liked here. In Chicago, where the "Five Orchestral Pieces" were performed last year, there was either amusement or, as yesterday afternoon in the lobbies, outspoken irritation with such music.

This music, for the greater part, sounds very horrible. The sonorities of the orchestra are so intense in pitch and quality that it is a physically taxing experience for the ear. At a first hearing, the only pieces which conveyed any definite impression to this reviewer were the third, an impressionistic effect of pronounced individuality, and, if you can look at it that way, of a very subtle beauty; and the fourth piece, a piece which really communicates sensations of terror, or horror. The first piece appeared to ordinary ears, untuned to the intensities of Schonberg, simply laughable, and so it was received. The last piece was also very terrible, physically hurtful—and this is but sober statement of fact.

Music of Tortured Nerves

It should be added, that at first hearing much music now accepted has seem very ugly and very incomprehensible; that Schonberg's music, with all its strangeness, gives the impression of sincerity and clearly defined intention on the part of the composer. Furthermore, Schonberg has long since proven his technical acquirements as a composer. For ourselves, we can only say that at present this music is so disagreeable that, whatever its merits, we cannot find the courage to wish to hear it again. At the best, it appears as the music of raw and tortured nerves.

For us this music, however original and masterly in workmanship, is exceedingly unhealthy and disagreeable, having neither the grandeur of cleansing tragedy, nor the uplift of a great composition that makes all men akin.

Miss Hinkle's Singing

[illegible] other important features of this [illegible] were the superb singing of Miss Hinkle and Dr. Muck's [illegible] but imaginative reading of the "Faust" overture of Wagner — it is true that the "Surprise" symphony of Haydn seemed very stupid. Miss Hinkle sang the "voi che sapete" of Mozart and the "Ave Maria" from Max Bruch's "Cross of Fire." In the first aria she showed unsurpassable purity of tone and of style, and she made the rather bombastic music of Bruch great by her splendid voice and her dramatic interpretation. On this music she conferred the grandeur to which it aspires and which it does not, in itself, achieve. No finer singing has been heard in seasons at a Symphony concert.

The use of the aerophore enabled the bass tuba player in Wagner's overture to play the opening phrase for the tuba with a real, sustaining legato—not, after all, that the phrase became particularly more eloquent by virtue of the mechanical assistance of the machine that pumped air into the big horn while the player was refilling his lungs, but it is a comfort to know that the wishes of a composer are being obeyed! The romanticism and the psychological quality of much of this music was the orchestral treat of the afternoon.

ADVERTISER.

DECEMBER 19

THE SYMPHONY THIS WEEK

AN EXCRUCIATING NOVELTY BY SCHOENBERG PLAYED

Wagner, Mozart, Bruch and Haydn Also Programmed — Miss Florence Hinkle, Soloist.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Wagner—A Faust Overture.
Mozart—Aria, "Voi che Sapete."
Soloist, Miss Florence Hinkle.
Schoenberg—Five Pieces for Orchestra.
Bruch—"Ave Maria" from "The Cross of Fire."
Haydn—Symphony in G major.

A programme which ranged from the most conservative to the most radical music. Next to "Romeo and Juliet," "Faust" has inspired the most music of any play ever written, and it has been treated in the most diverse fashions imaginable. Schumann and Boito steered pretty close to Goethe's original; Berlioz sent the hero to eternal damnation; Gounod made him simply the lover and betrayer of Gretchen and added a Liebel that the original Faust would have scorned; Liszt makes his best effects with Marguerite; and Wagner leaves her out of the picture almost altogether.

Wagner's Faust as depicted in the overture given yesterday afternoon, in Symphony Hall, is a rather discontented gentleman, somewhat addicted to the deepest brass instruments. Nevertheless, the Faust Overture is a dignified work and was read in an excellent manner; it probably has never been so well given in Boston, and its dramatic power made a deep impression.

Then came a pleasing vocalist, Miss Florence Hinkle, with the suave and rather Chesterfieldian love-song, "Voi che Sapete." Compared with the erotic songs of Wagner or Richard Strauss, this is rather sedate amativeness, it is iced passion, but it is music, pure, delightful music, and it exhibits the bel canto as none of the modern vocal composers can do.

Miss Hinkle sang this with just the smooth, tender effect that the song demanded, and made a decidedly good impression with it, although we would have preferred a deeper and broader voice in this particular song. Her second number was more of a novelty, being the "Ave Maria" by that belated Mendelssohn—Max Bruch. This is from the "Fiery Cross" by Sir Walter Scott, and reminds us that Bruch, who is the mildest mannered gentleman in the world, delights in songs of war as much as did Tyrtaeus of old, and takes to Scottish subjects as if he had been brought up on Haggis.

He is always melodic, in spite of his martial instincts, and he is utterly out of sympathy with the ultra-modern dissonances and cataclysms. Miss Hinkle sang this number with much sweetness. Perhaps it was intended to be one of the bandages to bind up the wounds of Schoenberg. Miss Hinkle's intonation was of the purest and she gives Canto Spianato in a perfect manner. She was recalled over and over again with real enthusiasm.

Yet the number itself is not one of Bruch's greatest arias. His "Penelope weaving a garment," from "Odysseus," or "Ingsborg's Klage," from "Frithjof," would have been more worth while, but since Miss Hinkle sang charmingly it seems hypercritical to object to her choice. Only we would have wished the best numbers of this intelligible school to have been placed beside the modern selections of this programme.

But now we must reluctantly speak of, as we still more reluctantly listened to, the vagaries of the musical radical, Arnold Schoenberg. His fine orchestral pieces had one only merit—brevity. Parts of them were not any more coherent than the tuning-up of the orchestra, which preceded them, that is to the average auditor. The earnest student can find coherency after studying the printed page many times, but the auditor never. It was Huxley, we believe, who once said that music was beginning to demand more of the brain than it was capable of giving, and Schoenberg's problems fearfully illustrate this fact; they depart from the true function of music.

The first and fourth of these orchestral pieces are ugly beyond anything we have yet heard even in modern music, yet they had a weird power that was undeniable. It has been said that it is difficult to score a noise well. Schoenberg has certainly succeeded in doing this. There were passages that suggested a bomb in a poultry-yard; cackles, shrieks, caterwauls, and then—crash!! That any orchestra could possibly play such a work speaks well for modern technique; but then, per contra, they might put in a few hundred false notes and nobody would be the wiser.

Yet a few, a very few, were pleased with these numbers, one musician saying that the harmonic fragments blended successfully into rhythmic life, vigor, and interesting variety, that the mosaics were woven into striking effects, and finding the presentiments of terrific evil absolutely awe-inspiring in the first movement,—the very fabric of a wild, disordered and tumultuous vision.

For ourselves, we can only say that our ears and mind and soul are sealed against any such impressions; we think this music the acme of artistic wrong-doing. We thank Dr. Muck for presenting the five numbers, and the orchestra for their great labor in studying them. It is only right that we should hear these radical phases, in order to judge for ourselves, but we are glad that the ordeal is past and the task done.

As usual, Dr. Muck swatted the ultra-modern blows with sterling, intelligible, classical music. In this concert the musical apologies for the temporary tonal dementia were Haydn, Mozart and Bruch, but even these could not quite neutralize the awful memories of Schoenberg. There are some who will accept this wild nightmare simply because they can detect a few grains of sense and logic in it; these fragments gain a fictitious value by their contrast with the irrational or fiercely ugly parts and are tremendously over-rated. We repeat our conviction that no man can invent a new religion so foolish but that he will win a few adherents, and no composer can write a work so absurd but that a few of the musical gropers or malcontents will cling to it.

A Haydn symphony closed the proceedings amicably.

ALD. SATURDAY.

DECEMBER 19.

MISS HINKLE SHOWS SKILL AS SOLOIST

Symphony Orchestra's Playing of Schoenberg Pieces Received with Dignity.

By PHILIP HALE.

The eighth Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Miss Florence Hinkle, soprano, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

A Faust Overture..........................Wagner
"Voi che Sapete"..........................Mozart
Five pieces for orchestra:
Presentiments, The Past, The Changing Chord, Peripteia, The Obbligato Recitative..........................Schoenberg
First time in Boston.
"Ave Maria" from "The Cross of Fire" Bruch
Symphony in G (The Surprise)..........Haydn

Bill Nye said, many years ago, that the music of Wagner was better than it sounded. Arnold Schoenberg says today that his own music is better than it sounds.

The pieces played yesterday are extraordinary. It is easy to say that the composer is a maniac or a poseur. Neither statement would be accurate. Those who have read his treatise on harmony know that he is a man of unusual knowledge, force, originality. Those who heard his quartet last season know that he can write music of uncommon beauty and towering imagination in a more familiar form.

It would also be easy to say that when Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel" was first performed in Boston, the majority in the audience thought the music chaotic, incomprehensible and the composer mad. Today, in comparison with Schoenberg's pieces, this symphonic poem is as clear as music by Haydn. Remember, too, that when Debussy's "Nocturnes" were played twice in succession at Chickering Hall they were thought to be incomprehensible.

These instances will not answer the objectors to Schoenberg. What is to be said of his five pieces? Personal impressions are interesting chiefly to the person impressed. No two persons hear music in the same way. I could make little out of the first and the fifth pieces. There are fine moments in "The Past" and "The Changing Chord"; beautiful suggestions of mood; strangely beautiful effects of color. Nor is the fourth piece wholly inexplicable. To argue for or against this music, which might be of another planet, after even several hearings, would be presumptuous and foolish. It took many Bostonians, well acquainted with orchestral and chamber compositions, a long time to familiarize themselves with the idiom of Cesar Franck, and later with that of Debussy. These composers, however, are not so fundamentally radical, anarchistic, as Schoenberg.

Thomas Hardy in that noble prose epic, the description of Egdon Heath, asks if the exclusive reign of orthodox beauty is not approaching its last quarter. "The new vale of Temple may be a gaunt waste in Thule; human souls may find themselves in closer and closer harmony with external things wearing a somberness distasteful to our race when it was young. * * * The time seems near, if it has not actually arrived, when the mournful sublimity of a moor, a sea, or a mountain, will be all of nature that is absolutely consonant with the moods of the [illegible] thinking among mankind. And ultimately, to the commonest tourist spot like Iceland may become what the vineyards and myrtle gardens of South Europe are to him now, and Heidelberg and Baden be passed unheeded as he hastens from the Alps to the sand dunes of Scheveningen."

When Schoenberg's Five Pieces were performed for the first time in London, and in Chicago, there were scenes of outspoken disapproval. Yesterday the behavior of the audience was highly creditable to Boston. There was smiling; there was giggling at times; there was applause. Nobody rose to remonstrate. Nothing was thrown at Dr. Muck and the orchestra. There was no perturbation of Nature to show that Schoenberg's pieces were playing: the sun did not hasten its descent; there was no earthquake shock. It was as it should have been in Boston.

Miss Florence Hinkle has a beautiful voice which she uses with rare skill. The Canzona of Cherubino, sensuous in its suppressed passion, should be sung by a darker voice to gain full effect. It served yesterday to display the art of Miss Hinkle in sustained and flawless song. The lyrical measures of Bruck's "Ave Maria," conventionally suave, were sung with unexaggerated emotion, and the singer gave dramatic importance to the agitated passages that in themselves are of a perfunctory and meaningless nature. It has been said by some that Miss Hinkle is a cool, impassive singer. They probably mean by this that she is not spasmodic and hysterical. Seldom at Symphony concerts of late years has there been such a delightful display of pure vocal art as that of yesterday.

Dr. Muck gave an eloquent reading of the Faust overture in which there are hints at the Wagner to come. The symphony of Haydn, admirably performed, is not among his most interesting.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Franck, Chorale in A minor for organ; Volbach, symphony in B minor (first time here); Bach, pastorale from the Christmas oratorio; Liszt, March of the Three Kings; Weber, overture to "Der Freischuetz."

BOSTON JOURNAL—

DECEMBER 19, 1914.

HISSES FOR NEW SYMPHONY MUSIC

Much Laughter and a Little Applause for Pieces by Schoenberg.

Hisses and laughter and a little applause attended the performance of Schoenberg's "Five Pieces for Orchestra," at the Symphony concert yesterday. Altogether it was an extraordinary and perhaps unprecedented demonstration; but the cause was as unusual as the effect.

These five pieces have been called Futurist music. Schoenberg himself, who is a 40-year-old Austrian, now living in Berlin, denies the soft impeachment about Futurism. He says that he writes in his own way and to please himself. Yesterday was the first time any of his music obtained a hearing at a Symphony concert, but the "Five Pieces" had previously been played in other cities, on both sides of the ocean, and here and there stood up prophets to declare Schoenberg one of the great tone painters of the times. There was a little ripple of applause yesterday for the third piece, which is entitled "The Changing Chord," and which suggested the impressionistic pastels of Debussy and Ravel. But generally this new music was not taken seriously. It will be played again tonight, and probably for the last time while Dr. Muck is conductor of the Symphony Orchestra.

Fun for the Audience

Here are the effects noted yesterday in the audience: No. 1, "Presentiments," very amusing; No. 2, "The Past," not quite so amusing, but still puzzling; No. 3, "The Changing Chord," somewhat impressive and poetical; No. 4, "Peripetaia," disgustingly maudlin, and to be hissed; No. 5, "The Obbligato Recitative," also rather impressive, and certainly not as funny or offensive as Nos. 1 and 4.

At its best or clearest the music suggested the most fantastic flights of the new French school. At its worst or wildest it evoked suggestions of Chinese burlesque. This may be the music of the future, or it may be nothing but the work of an arch-humorist who dares to perpetrate classic jokes. It raises havoc with rules and traditions. Perhaps Schoenberg is an inspired musical psychologist living ahead of his time, or perhaps he is an inspired comedian. Unquestionably most of the people at Symphony Hall yesterday found him as funny as a clown in a circus.

Delightful Contrasts

Miss Florence Hinkle sang delightfully, with charming voice and style, Mozart's "Voi che sapete" and Bruch's "Ave Maria," and the orchestra played Wagner's "Faust" overture, which had a bizarre sound to olden generations, and Haydn's "Surprise" symphony.

ext Friday afterno

[illegible] played by the or[illegible] John P. Marshall; Volbach's symphony in B minor, the pastorale from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," the "March of the Three Holy Kings," from Liszt's oratorio, "Christus," and Weber's "Der Freischuetz" overture.

Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at the New Year's concerts, with the Mendelssohn concerto as his selection. The other attractive feature will be Liszt's "Faust" symphony, with Paul Draper and the Apollo Club assisting.

BOSTON GLOBE—
DECEMBER 19.

FUTURISTIC MUSIC.

Schoenberg's Absurdities Introduced to Boston.

Miss Hinkle Displays an Art Rare Among Singers.

Until yesterday, Arnold Schoenberg had been known in this town through public performance only by his quartet in D minor, played a season ago by the Flonzaley Quartet. Although it was recognized as an extraordinary composition, those who heard were warned that this, an early work of this arch-revolutionist, was but orthodox and traditional beside the daring of his later years.

Dr Muck, who steadily has repudiated Schoenberg and all his works, suddenly reconsidered his ways. Deciding to initiate this public without more ado into the wierd mysteries of the sounds which in Berlin have precipitated riots, he brought out at yesterday's Symphony rehearsal, Schoenberg's "Five Pieces for Orchestra" of 16. They bear the subtitles, 1, Presentiments; 2, The Past; 3, The Changing Chord; 4, Peripeteia; 5, The Obligato Recitative.

It may be noted that Wagner's "Faust" overture began the program, that Haydn's Surprise symphony ended it, and that Miss Florence Hinkle, that admirable soprano, whose beauty of voice, soundness of technic, fine intelligence and musical taste make her unique among all her sisters, appeared for the first time as soloist at these concerts.

Laws Tossed Aside.

To what degree the five labels upon the Schoenberg piece aided the hearers to perceive a pressure or lack of musical structure or of emotional content, it is difficult to say. The composer has denied the stigma of "futurism," and contends that he writes "naturally," that his idiom is his individual expression of feeling, and that it is grossly misunderstood by many, chiefly by those obnoxious persons called critics.

If a man insist that the emotions of his soul clamor for perfect expression only through a chord of consecutive minor seconds, none can presume to deny his sincerity. The normal, that is to say, the usual ear, however, might decide his emotions to be fit subjects for a vacuum cleaner.

All the fundamental laws of organic unity or structure in music are tossed aside. Melody exists only in fleeting moments of figuration, and then as by apology. The harmonic scheme is not fettered by any family relationship of tonalities. Dissonance is chronic to the point of being normal. A single consonant chord would have been seizing and sensational. The sequence of thought as molded by a cadence is held in derision, and each number ends with every man choosing his note as by lottery.

This is economical music, for what is the need of rehearsal? It is a sorry bit if the wrong note will not sound better than the right one. In dynamics there are but two ways to go, and even Mr Schoenberg must submit to the gallery practice of traditional crescendo and decrescendo. It should not be forgotten that for those who clamor for "form" he has written a "fugue" in the first movement.

Caterwaulings of Woe.

The brasses as a family all wear mutes. Even the tuba player is obliged to grunt in snarls and to that end to insert a foot of stopped stovepipe in his bell. There is a climax which defies either Nature or the Hogan's Corners Cornet Band to duplicate. Mr Schoenberg has opened the book of his life to the pages of yesterday and tomorrow. While his dreams for the future are not asuring, the sins of his past must weigh heavily upon him.

Such caterwaulings of woe are more oppressive to the spirits than the fate of the Progressive party. The composer should not think so badly of this world or its cheerless treatment of him until what time he may find another whose citizens suffer from lesions in the nervous system comparable to his. Let us pity him if by chance he ever is compelled to hear Mozart.

So a Merry Christmas to Mr Schoenberg, a merrier one than he enjoyed before writing this score. In due time may he find that region of fellowship where due appreciation of his gifts will be granted him. May he revel in the shrieks of hissing firebrands shot in welcome of new inmates. May his ears dilate with the groans of the lost souls of the damned. May curling, sizzling spirals of flame enfold and caress him. May the snarling, sardonic mockeries of grimacing imps soothe his harassed nerves.

A merry Christmas to Dr Muck. May he steadfastly refuse to be converted to the Schoenbergian sounds. May he continue also to prepare all that he undertakes, whatever the school or its degree of merit, with the same unsparing zeal and exaction. May he never lose his imperious sense of rhythm, his sovereign love of clarity and precision, his patrician feeling for style, whatever the period or the idiom of what the composition. May he realize that there is less good music written now than once there was, and may he always have as obedient, as plastic, as sensitive an orchestra of virtuosi through which to express his genius.

Incomparable Singer.

A Merry Christmas to Miss Hinkle. May she keep unimpaired by excessive [illegible] or by o'er-vaulting ambition the [illegible] to give [illegible] hearers even as she did to those of yesterday by the incomparable manner in which she sang "Voi, che sapete," incomparable first in the sense of the time, spirit and import of the music, of the graceful beauty of its architecture in the delicate appreciation of its fine line and its nuances; incomparable also in the perfection of technic underneath which made this possible.

May she continue to use discretion when of necessity she sings dramatic episodes, as in the middle portion of Bruch's Ave Maria ("The Cross of Fire") and gain by her intelligence the effects some lyric singers might attempt by violence of voice.

May she live also to impart the distinction of a lofty and serene beauty to music which inherently does not possess it, such as she did to the closing bars of the aria. May she come into all the perquisites and dispensations granted the prima donna, but may she fear avoirdupois even above sin.

Finally, a Merry Christmas, or it may be a reposeful one, to the shade of Josef Haydn. May he be cheered at the special services to humanity. May he again upon occasion be an antidote to the man with the name of an ironical syllable.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
DECEMBER 19,

BOSTON HEARS SYMPHONY PLAY MODERN MUSIC

Friday Afternoon Audience Does Not Approve of Schoenberg at First Presentation Here of "Five Orchestral Pieces"

Symphony Hall—Eighth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of Dec. 18. The program: Wagner, "Faust" overture; Mozart, aria, "Voi che sapete," from "Marriage of Figaro" (Miss Florence Hinkle, soprano); Schoenberg, "Five Pieces" (first time in Boston); "Ave Maria" from "The Cross of Fire," Bruch (Miss Hinkle); Haydn, symphony in G major, No. 6, "Surprise."

The main thing to be recorded about the performance of a revolutionary piece of music is how the audience received it. Not that people who attend concerts regularly and know the orchestral repertory backward and forward need to be told. They understand how music that overthrows established rules is always received. Pages in their scrapbooks prove how inhospitable the community in general was to Wagner, when they themselves saw the good in him plainly. They remember declaring that all music after Wagner could only be more Wagner; and they recall how up to a certain uncomfortable moment, which came with the arrival of the twentieth century and Debussy, they were right.

People who have seen Wagner, Brahms, Strauss and Debussy come, do not need to be informed how an audience took its first hearing of the orchestral Schoenberg. But those who have not yet grown into the pleasures of Symphony concerts, the schoolboys and schoolgirls who will be the listeners of the next decade, they ought to be told how the "Five Pieces" fared when new. Knowing it, they may be stimulated to champion the cause of a tone hero whose loneliness today makes Wagner's loneliness a generation ago look the very picture of sociability. They will be interested to read and remember that the "Five Pieces," when produced in Boston the second year after their publication, were received in the first part with laughter and in the middle and concluding parts with cold applause.

They must be reminded that the "Five Pieces" were read by a conductor who is perhaps the greatest humorist holding the baton today—one who was never known to miss the point in a passage of orchestral satire, whether the writer of it was Haydn or Strauss, but one who never made light of a serious page in any score that lay open on the desk before him. So, if the house laughed at the playing of number one of the "Five," it is possible there was something to laugh at. Schoenberg's fugue in the first number, like Beethoven's in the scherzo of the fifth symphony, may be intended as a little piece of musical merriment; or his writing here, with the best meaning on his part, may be just silly, ludicrous and absurd.

Such an alternative, however, is probably not to be entertained. No artist of his proved tact would start in by acting the clown. And no writer of his profound knowledge and of his mastery of the technique of his art would bungle on his approach. Number one is certainly meant to be taken seriously; but so far as this performance counts, it is a failure. The matinee audience, tittering, rejected any message the composer may have meant it to convey.

The second, third, fourth and last numbers fared better. They had alert attention. But they did not win approval. At one of the pauses, the first balcony wanted to show respect with applause, but the student gallery speedily hissed down the little effort at hand-clapping. It is doubtful if Dr. Muck ever left the stage at the interm[illegible] program of a Sym[illegible]

Performances of revolutionary music are, after all, rare in musical experience. Conductors put pieces of revolutionary tendencies into the repertory, and take them out again. But tendencies are not achievements. Conductors bring on the scene composers who represent modern schools, and lead them off again. But a representative of a school is a far different thing from the originator of one. Only a few times in his career can a conductor present music that is out and out new, music that attempts a reform in melodic and harmonic method, music of such strange sound as to take listeners completely by surprise.

The occurrence is rare and always writes itself in large letters into musical annals. The absorbing chapter in the career of any master composer is the one which deals with the public reception of his most individual work. And every locality where the music is performed contributes, one early, another late, to the story. The valuation, such as it is, put by the Boston audience on the "Five Pieces" goes toward the sum of opinion about Schoenberg as a portrayer of the life of the times.

To tell how the new artist paints his picture is no difficult task. A technical analysis of the "Five Pieces" is not an essentially different undertaking from one of a Brahms symphony. The Schoenberg harmonic effects imply much that has hitherto been forbidden by the theorists, much that has been regarded as possible, but not advisable for a composer to use, and much that it was not supposed any composer would ever think of trying. The formal singing quality that has always been prescribed for melody is gone. Themes are keyless. They are like the humming improvisations of children. Even the maxim that what sounds well is right, on which composers for the last half century and more have stood, is abandoned. Schoenberg's maxim rather is: Whatever sounds, is right. Graciousness of melody and beauty of chord combination have no expressive value for him.

All the explanations are easy enough to make, both on the positive and the negative side. But they are really beside the point. The question is, does this music of the "Five Pieces" tell modern society anything about itself?

No amount of individual study and speculation will ever answer that question. It can be answered only in the reaction of the music on audiences. The music is not yet, strictly speaking, in existence. It will find itself and will command review when the public, consisting of all the musical communities of Europe, America and elsewhere, sets earnestly about hearing it and pondering its author's intentions.

EVENING RECORD.
DECEMBER 19

EXCRUCIATING SCHOENBERG NOVELTY AT SYMPHONY

PROGRAMME.

Wagner—A Faust Overture.
Mozart—Aria, "Voi che Sapete."
Soloist, Miss Florence Hinkle.
Schoenberg—Five Pieces for Orchestra.
Bruch—"Ave Maria" from "The Cross of Fire."
Haydn—Symphony in G major.

A programme which ranged from the most conservative to the most radical music. Next to "Romeo and Juliet," "Faust" has inspired the most music of any play ever written, and it has been treated in the most diverse fashions imaginable. Schumann and Boito steered pretty close to Goethe's original; Berlioz sent the hero to eternal damnation; Gounod made him simply the lover and betrayer of Gretchen and added a Liebel that the original Faust would have scorned; Liszt makes his best effects with Marguerite; and Wagner leaves her out of the picture almost altogether.

Wagner's Faust as depicted in the overture given yesterday afternoon, in Symphony Hall, is a rather discontented gentleman somewhat addicted to the deepest brass instruments. Nevertheless, the Faust Overture is a dignified work and was read in an excellent manner; it probably has never been so well given in Boston, and its dramatic power made a deep impression, says Louis C. Elson in the Advertiser.

Then came a pleasing vocalist, Miss Florence Hinkle, with the suave and rather Chesterfieldian love-song ,"Voi che Sapete." Compared with the erotic songs of Wagner or Richard Strauss, this is rather sedate amativeness, it is iced passion, but it is music, pure, delightful music, and it exhibits the bel canto as none of the modern vocal composers can do.

Miss Hinkle sang this with just the smooth, tender effect that the song demanded, and made a decidedly good impression with it, although we would have preferred a deeper and broader voice in this particular song.

But now we must reluctantly speak of, as we still more reluctantly listened to, the vagaries of the musical radical, Arnold Schoenberg. His five orchestral pieces had one only merit—brevity. Parts of them were not any more coherent than the tuning-up of the orchestra, which preceded them, that is to the average auditor. The [illegible] can find coherence after studying the printed page many times, but the auditor never. It was Huxley, we believe, who once said that music was beginning to demand more of the brain than it was capable of giving, and Schoenberg's problems fearfully illustrate this fact; they depart from the true function of music.

The first and fourth of these orchestral pieces are ugly beyond anything we have yet heard even in modern music, yet they had a weird power that was undeniable. It has been said that it is difficult to score a noise well. Schoenberg has certainly succeeded in doing this. There were passages that suggested a bomb in a poultry-yard; cackles, shrieks, caterwauls, and then—crash!! That any orchestra could possibly play such a work speaks well for modern technique; but then, per contra, they might put in a few hundred false notes and nobody would be the wiser.

Yet a few, a very few, were pleased with these numbers, one musician saying that the harmonic fragments blended successfully into rhythmic life, vigor, and interesting variety, that the mosaics were woven into striking effects, and finding the presentiments of terrific evil absolutely awe-inspiring in the first movement,—the very fabric of a wild, disordered and tumultuous vision.

For ourselves, we can only say that our ears and mind and soul are sealed against any such impressions; we think this music the acme of artistic wrong-doing. We thank Dr. Muck for presenting the five numbers, and the orchestra for their great labor in studying them. It is only right that we should hear these radical phases, in order to judge for ourselves, but we are glad that the ordeal is past and the task done.

FLORENCE HINKLE

Cesar Franck, played by the or- John P. Marshall; Volbach's symphony in B minor, the pastorale from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," the "March of the Three Holy Kings," from Liszt's oratorio, "Christus," and Weber's "Der Freischuetz" overture.

Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at the New Year's concerts, with the Mendelssohn concerto as his selection. The other attractive feature will be Liszt's "Faust" symphony, with Paul Draper and the Apollo Club assisting.

BOSTON GLOBE—
DECEMBER 19.

FUTURISTIC MUSIC.

Schoenberg's Absurdities Introduced to Boston.

Miss Hinkle Displays an Art Rare Among Singers.

Until yesterday, Arnold Schoenberg had been known in this town through public performance only by his quartet in D minor, played a season ago by the Flonzaley Quartet. Although it was recognized as an extraordinary composition, those who heard were warned that this, an early work of this arch-revolutionist, was but orthodox and traditional beside the daring of his later years.

Dr Muck, who steadily has repudiated Schoenberg and all his works, suddenly reconsidered his ways. Deciding to initiate this public without more ado into the wierd mysteries of the sounds which in Berlin have precipitated riots, he brought out at yesterday's Symphony rehearsal, Schoenberg's "Five Pieces for Orchestra" of 16. They bear the subtitles, 1, Presentiments; 2, The Past; 3, The Changing Chord; 4, Peri-Peteia; 5, The Obligato Recitative.

It may be noted that Wagner's "Faust" overture began the program, that Haydn's Surprise symphony ended it, and that Miss Florence Hinkle, that admirable soprano, whose beauty of voice, soundness of technic, fine intelligence and musical taste make her unique among all her sisters, appeared for the first time as soloist at these concerts.

Laws Tossed Aside.

To what degree the five labels upon the Schoenberg piece aided the hearers to perceive a pressure or lack of musical structure or of emotional content, it is difficult to say. The composer has denied the stigma of "futurism," and contends that he writes "naturally," that his idiom is his individual expression of feeling, and that it is grossly misunderstood by many, chiefly by those obnoxious persons called critics.

If a man insist that the emotions of his soul clamor for perfect expression only through a chord of consecutive minor seconds, none can presume to deny his sincerity. The normal, that is to say, the usual ear, however, might decide his emotions to be fit subjects for a vacuum cleaner.

All the fundamental laws of organic unity or structure in music are tossed aside. Melody exists only in fleeting moments of figuration, and then as by apology. The harmonic scheme is not fettered by any family relationship of tonalities. Dissonance is chronic to the point of being normal. A single consonant chord would have been seizing and sensational. The sequence of thought as molded by a cadence is held in derision, and each number ends with every man choosing his note as by lottery.

This is economical music, for what is the need of rehearsal? It is a sorry bit if the wrong note will not sound better than the right one. In dynamics there are but two ways to go, and even Mr Schoenberg must submit to the gallery practice of traditional crescendo and decrescendo. It should not be forgotten that for those who clamor for "form" he has written a "fugue" in the first movement.

Caterwaulings of Woe.

The brasses as a family all wear mutes. Even the tuba player is obliged to grunt in snarls and to that end to insert a foot of stopped stovepipe in his bell. There is a climax which defies either Nature or the Hogan's Corners Cornet Band to duplicate. Mr Schoenberg has opened the book of his life to the pages of yesterday and tomorrow. While his dreams for the future are not asuring, the sins of his past must weigh heavily upon him.

Such caterwaulings of woe are more oppressive to the spirits than the fate of the Progressive party. The composer should not think so badly of this world or its cheerless treatment of him until what time he may find another whose citizens suffer from lesions in the nervous system comparable to his. Let us pity him if by chance he ever is compelled to hear Mozart.

So a Merry Christmas to Mr Schoenberg, a merrier one than he enjoyed before writing this score. In due time may he find that region of fellowship where due appreciation of his gifts will be granted him. May he revel in the shrieks of hissing firebrands shot in welcome of new inmates. May his ears dilate with the groans of the lost souls of the damned. May curling, sizzling spirals of flame enfold and caress him. May the snarling, sardonic mockeries of grimacing imps soothe his harassed nerves.

A merry Christmas to Dr Muck. May he steadfastly refuse to be converted to the Schoenbergian sounds. May he continue also to prepare all that he undertakes, whatever the school or its degree of merit, with the same unsparing zeal and exaction. May he never lose his imperious sense of rhythm, his sovereign love of clarity and precision, his patrician feeling for style, whatever the period or the idiom of what the composition. May he realize that there is less good music written now than once there was, and may he always have as obedient, as plastic, as sensitive an orchestra of virtuosi through which to express his genius.

Incomparable Singer.

A Merry Christmas to Miss Hinkle. May she keep unimpaired by excessive singing or by o'er-vaulting ambition the five to give pleasure to many thousands of hearers even as she did to those of yesterday by the incomparable manner in which she sang "Voi, che sapete," incomparable first in the sense of the time, spirit and import of the music, of the graceful beauty of its arhitecture in the delicate appreciation of its fine line and its nuances; incomparable also in the perfection of technic underneath which made this possible.

May she continue to use discretion when of necessity she sings dramatic episodes, as in the middle portion of Bruch's Ave Maria ("The Cross of Fire") and gain by her intelligence the effects some lyric singers might attempt by violence of voice.

May she live also to impart the distinction of a lofty and serene beauty to music which inherently does not possess it, such as she did to the closing bars of the aria. May she come into all the perquisites and dispensations granted the prima donna, but may she fear avoirdupois even above sin.

Finally, a Merry Christmas, or it may be a reposeful one, to the shade of Josef Haydn. May he be cheered at the special services to humanity. May he again upon occasion be an antidote to the man with the name of an ironical syllable.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
DECEMBER 19,

BOSTON HEARS SYMPHONY PLAY MODERN MUSIC

Friday Afternoon Audience Does Not Approve of Schoenberg at First Presentation Here of "Five Orchestral Pieces"

Symphony Hall—Eighth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of Dec. 18. The program: Wagner, "Faust" overture; Mozart, aria, "Voi che sapete," from "Marriage of Figaro" (Miss Florence Hinkle, soprano); Schoenberg, "Five Pieces" (first time in Boston); "Ave Maria" from "The Cross of Fire," Bruch (Miss Hinkle); Haydn, symphony in G major, No. 6, "Surprise."

The main thing to be recorded about the performance of a revolutionary piece of music is how the audience received it. Not that people who attend concerts regularly and know the orchestral repertory backward and forward need to be told. They understand how music that overthrows established rules is always received. Pages in their scrapbooks prove how inhospitable the community in general was to Wagner, when they themselves saw the good in him plainly. They remember declaring that all music after Wagner could only be more Wagner; and they recall how up to a certain uncomfortable moment, which came with the arrival of the twentieth century and Debussy, they were right.

People who have seen Wagner, Brahms, Strauss and Debussy come, do not need to be informed how an audience took its first hearing of the orchestral Schoenberg. But those who have not yet grown into the pleasures of Symphony concerts, the schoolboys and schoolgirls who will be the listeners of the next decade, they ought to be told how the "Five Pieces" fared when new. Knowing it, they may be stimulated to champion the cause of a tone hero whose loneliness today makes Wagner's loneliness a generation ago look the very picture of sociability. They will be interested to read and remember that the "Five Pieces," when produced in Boston the second year after their publication, were received in the first part with laughter and in the middle and concluding parts with cold applause.

They must be reminded that the "Five Pieces" were read by a conductor who is perhaps the greatest humorist holding the baton today—one who was never known to miss the point in a passage of orchestral satire, whether the writer of it was Haydn or Strauss, but one who never made light of a serious page in any score that lay open on the desk before him. So, if the house laughed at the playing of number one of the "Five," it is possible there was something to laugh at. Schoenberg's fugue in the first number, like Beethoven's in the scherzo of the fifth symphony, may be intended as a little piece of musical merriment; or his writing here, with the best meaning on his part, may be just silly, ludicrous and absurd.

Such an alternative, however, is probably not to be entertained. No artist of his proved tact would start in by acting the clown. And no writer of his profound knowledge and of his mastery of the technique of his art would bungle on his approach. Number one is certainly meant to be taken seriously; but so far as this performance counts, it is a failure. The matinee audience, tittering, rejected any message the composer may have meant it to convey.

The second, third, fourth and last numbers fared better. They had alert attention. But they did not win approval. At one of the pauses, the first balcony wanted to show respect with applause, but the student gallery speedily hissed down the little effort at hand-clapping. It is doubtful if Dr. Muck ever left the stage at the intern program of a Symph

Performances of revolutionary music are, after all, rare in musical experience. Conductors put pieces of revolutionary tendencies into the repertory, and take them out again. But tendencies are not achievements. Conductors bring on the scene composers who represent modern schools, and lead them off again. But a representative of a school is a far different thing from the originator of one. Only a few times in his career can a conductor present music that is out and out new, music that attempts a reform in melodic and harmonic method, music of such strange sound as to take listeners completely by surprise.

The occurrence is rare and always writes itself in large letters into musical annals. The absorbing chapter in the career of any master composer is the one which deals with the public reception of his most individual work. And every locality where the music is performed contributes, one early, another late, to the story. The valuation, such as it is, put by the Boston audience on the "Five Pieces" goes toward the sum of opinion about Schoenberg as a portrayer of the life of the times.

To tell how the new artist paints his picture is no difficult task. A technical analysis of the "Five Pieces" is not an essentially different undertaking from one of a Brahms symphony. The Schoenberg harmonic effects imply much that has hitherto been forbidden by the theorists, much that has been regarded as possible, but not advisable for a composer to use, and much that it was not supposed any composer would ever think of trying. The formal singing quality that has always been prescribed for melody is gone. Themes are keyless. They are like the humming improvisations of children. Even the maxim that what sounds well is right, on which composers for the last half century and more have stood, is abandoned. Schoenberg's maxim rather is: Whatever sounds, is right. Graciousness of melody and beauty of chord combination have no expressive value for him.

All the explanations are easy enough to make, both on the positive and the negative side. But they are really beside the point. The question is, does this music of the "Five Pieces" tell modern society anything about itself?

No amount of individual study and speculation will ever answer that question. It can be answered only in the reaction of the music on audiences. The music is not yet, strictly speaking, in existence. It will find itself and will command review when the public, consisting of all the musical communities of Europe, America and elsewhere, sets earnestly about hearing it and pondering its author's intentions.

EVENING RECORD.
DECEMBER 19

EXCRUCIATING SCHOENBERG NOVELTY AT SYMPHONY

PROGRAMME.

Wagner—A Faust Overture.
Mozart—Aria, "Voi che Sapete."
Soloist, Miss Florence Hinkle.
Schoenberg—Five Pieces for Orchestra.
Bruch—"Ave Maria" from "The Cross of Fire."
Haydn—Symphony in G major.

A programme which ranged from the most conservative to the most radical music. Next to "Romeo and Juliet," "Faust" has inspired the most music of any play ever written, and it has been treated in the most diverse fashions imaginable. Schumann and Boito steered pretty close to Goethe's original; Berlioz sent the hero to eternal damnation; Gounod made him simply the lover and betrayer of Gretchen and added a Liebel that the original Faust would have scorned; Liszt makes his best effects with Marguerite; and Wagner leaves her out of the picture almost altogether.

Wagner's Faust as depicted in the overture given yesterday afternoon, in Symphony Hall, is a rather discontented gentleman somewhat addicted to the deepest brass instruments. Nevertheless, the Faust Overture is a dignified work and was read in an excellent manner; it probably has never been so well given in Boston, and its dramatic power made a deep impression, says Louis C. Elson in the Advertiser.

Then came a pleasing vocalist, Miss Florence Hinkle, with the suave and rather Chesterfieldian love-song ,"Voi che Sapete." Compared with the erotic songs of Wagner or Richard Strauss, this is rather sedate amativeness, it is iced passion, but it is music, pure, delightful music, and it exhibits the bel canto as none of the modern vocal composers can do.

Miss Hinkle sang this with just the smooth, tender effect that the song demanded, and made a decidedly good impression with it, although we would have preferred a deeper and broader voice in this particular song.

But now we must reluctantly speak of, as we still more reluctantly listened to, the vagaries of the musical radical, Arnold Schoenberg. His five orchestral pieces had one only merit—brevity. Parts of them were not any more coherent than the tuning-up of the orchestra, which preceded them, that is to the average auditor. The [illegible] can find coherency after studying the printed page many times, but the auditor never. It was Huxley, we believe, who once said that music was beginning to demand more of the brain than it was capable of giving, and Schoenberg's problems fearfully illustrate this fact; they depart from the true function of music.

The first and fourth of these orchestral pieces are ugly beyond anything we have yet heard even in modern music, yet they had a weird power that was undeniable. It has been said that it is difficult to score a noise well. Schoenberg has certainly succeeded in doing this. There were passages that suggested a bomb in a poultry-yard; cackles, shrieks, caterwauls, and then—crash!! That any orchestra could possibly play such a work speaks well for modern technique; but then, per contra, they might put in a few hundred false notes and nobody would be the wiser.

Yet a few, a very few, were pleased with these numbers, one musician saying that the harmonic fragments blended successfully into rhythmic life, vigor, and interesting variety, that the mosaics were woven into striking effects, and finding the presentiments of terrific evil absolutely awe-inspiring in the first movement,—the very fabric of a wild, disordered and tumultuous vision.

For ourselves, we can only say that our ears and mind and soul are sealed against any such impressions; we think this music the acme of artistic wrong-doing. We thank Dr. Muck for presenting the five numbers, and the orchestra for their great labor in studying them. It is only right that we should hear these radical phases, in order to judge for ourselves, but we are glad that the ordeal is past and the task done.

FLORENCE HINKLE

ON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1914

Symphony Concert

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

SCHOENBERG'S NOTORIOUS PIECES PLAYED

No "Incident" Disturbs the Performance—Music of Mood and Vision Transmitted in a New and Strange Medium — The Residue Left—Miss Hinkle's Exquisite Singing and Dr. Muck and the Orchestra Variously Eloquent

ALL things go for granted at the Symphony Concerts—even the music of Arnold Schönberg. In Vienna, Berlin and Munich, audiences have "manifested" over it so energetically that in the double din of applause and hisses it could not be heard for itself—an eminently satisfactory outcome to the unshakably prejudiced but sorely disappointing to the merely open-minded. In dull-witted but usually well-mannered London, the five pieces for orchestra that Dr. Muck and his men played yesterday afternoon, provoked boos, as though the customs of the British gallery in the theatre were passing to the floor of British concert-rooms. In Chicago a year ago some guffawed showily at these same five pieces; others stamped with disapproving feet; and many mouthed bitter adjectives in a loud and firm voice. Yet here at our Symphony Concerts nothing was likely to happen over Schönberg's music and nothing—or almost nothing—did actually happen. Few in this town take music or the performance of music, so eagerly and seriously as to show unseemly excitement over either in public; while a breach of good manners at a Symphony Concert is unthinkable, although some ears believed they heard once yesterday a modest and timid hiss.

A few tittered at the close of the first of the five pieces; many seemed to listen intently to the next two and to receive an impression not wholly disagreeable from them; the merest of minorities frankly and courageously applauded all five; the great majority simply read the programme-book as it is the custom to do when one is not interested at the Symphony Concerts. In the ensuing intermission one and another spluttered opprobrious adjectives with the intonations of those that lay down the law; many bore public witness to the fineness of their musical sensibilities by recounting the unpleasant sensations the music had stirred in them; many more asked suavely the time-honored question for such occasions: "Now what do you really think?" with the stress on "really." As usual the query encouraged candor and sincerity in the answer; and a few very young students of music at Harvard audibly approved Dr. Muck's tempi with the music—a rare condescension on their part. In a word, as such things usually go in the ironies of this perverse world, "the day" proved to be no "day" at all.

Of course, here and there, a dogmatic voice declared that Schönberg's five pieces ought never—an emphatic and somewhat over-used word—to have been played at the Symphony Concerts. Yet there seems to be no very valid reason why they should not have been heard at least once there, while more than one might be cited to justify a single performance. Schönberg shares with the other innovators in the music of the hour, the virtue of compact brevity and the whole five pieces consumed no more than twenty-five minutes out of the forty-eight hours that in a year each series of Symphony Concerts fills. They made but one out of the hundred-odd items that strew the programmes from October to May. As no one could possibly crave the music of Schönberg all day and every day, so no one, except a few reviewers, need have listened to it for even twenty-five minutes on a single occasion unless he so willed, with or without foreknowledge (which must have been widespread) of its singularities.

By those same singularities, as the truth is, the five pieces have made much stir in the world, awakened many curiosities, kindled many warm and combative debates. It is one of the clear obligations of the Symphony Orchestra and its successive conductors to keep the public of the concerts informed as to the course of music in the immediate hour. To do so, with the utmost openmindedness and catholicity, has become one of its policies, traditions and glories. If it were agreed that Schönberg's five orchestral pieces were merely freakish sensation-mongering, then Dr. Muck might reasonably and rightfully have overlooked them. But it is by no means so agreed. Whether the hearer honestly enjoys or honestly resents them or whether he follows them only with curiosity and interest, the substance, the form, the idiom, the purpose and the suggestion of the pieces are all signs of the times in music and clear evidence of new tendencies and efforts with it. The pieces disclose also a composer of highly individual mind and spirit. From Vienna to Chicago, they have stirred serious study and debate. All these seem Schönberg's valid titles to performance.

As Schönberg has his right to performance on the stage of Symphony Hall, so he has his right to open-mindedness in the auditorium. Like the music of every other composer from Mozart to Mahler, his pieces can only invite once more the old, old inquiry: what has he sought to do; by what means has he done it; and what is the sum of the achievement and the pleasure that it yields or fails to yield to those that hear it. First of all, with or without the title that Schönberg finally affixed, the five orchestral pieces are clearly suggestion and epitome of mood and vision in tones. The composer releases in music a mood or an image that has laid hold upon his mind and sensibilities that he may so communi[illegible] and the sensations awakened in him [illegible] for their æsthetic pleasure. [illegible] his first piece, "Presenti-[illegible] hearing and with all his singularities of procedure more in the way than in any of the rest, except the last, it was possible to infer that he was imparting a mood of over-wrought foreboding—tortured, fitful, fantastic, super-sensitive. The second piece is entitled "The Past" and there is no mistaking its mood of musing memories with, again, a supersensitive imagination at play upon them. The third Schönberg entitles, as though he were a Whistler in tones, "The Changing Chord." It seems in the hearing a clear suggestion in tones of the softest of visioned colors in the softest of undulations and it is relatively easy to the quickened imagination to receive its suggestion. The fourth piece—"Peripetera," or "continual goings and comings"—less clearly communicates mood and vision, but it may plausibly be of whirling, warring, wailing wraiths swept on phantasmal tempests. The fifth piece—"The Obbligato Recitative"—seemed almost wholly baffling yesterday—now wistful, now nervous and now acrid play with scraps and snatches of what, perchance, might have been a melancholy melody. The mood, the imagery, is of haunting wisps of vision.

In sum, then, Schönberg writes music of mood and vision and in at least three, and maybe four, of the five pieces, does succeed in communicating a plausible imagery to his hearer at the moment as he must do in the swift commerce of music in the concert-room. And in every sense, the imagery is very tense, nervous and concentrated. That is to say Schönberg, like many another of the innovating composers of our time, would make music yet more sensitively, intimately, and concentratedly expressive of the mood, vision and impulse behind than it has ever been before. He would have the directest, the fullest and the most minute and elastic transmission of his sensations that the hearer may feel the self-expression in them and maybe find also a persuasive beauty or a fantastic and devouring power.

Then enter the means of transmission and in more senses than one discordance. Schönberg weaves his music from little motives or scraps of motives that very rarely have any clear thematic profile; he weaves it with chords that few men, if any, have ever before fashioned or set side by side; he weaves it also in a kind of hurtling, stinging or pricking counterpoint full of strange conflicts, contacts and clangors; he weaves it as by impulse with no thought of prescription or precedent and yet with a certain formal sense as in the evolution of the motives that can be traced on the engraved page. Tonality and returns to tonality he knows not. He also weaves it and fashions it with a very acute and imaginative sensibility to instrumental timbres and to harmonic suggestion and with a very keen, diversified and imaginative sense of rhythm. His rhythms are almost the cohering element in his music; in his instrumental and harmonic color lies almost the whole of its suggestion. In a single hearing at least, very few of his motives in themselves arrest the ear or kindle answering sensation. Moreover in the use of all his strange transmitting means, Schönberg lays on and spares not. In a word, again, like most of the innovating composers of the younger generation, he would free music from almost every prescription except the directest, fullest and most sensitive expression of the thought, the impulse, the vision and the mood that they have begotten. To gain this end he would expand harmonic possibilities and tonal relations to the utmost. Music is not and cannot remain a static art; its speech changes with each generation; it has always been pushing forth into the unknown that in time becomes the actual and the accepted. Rightly or wrongly Schönberg and the rest believe they have found their paths to it, though the end of the journey be far away and its vicissitudes many.

Yet for the time being, until the average ear has rejected these new means of transmission or has accepted them as it ultimately did with Beethoven's or Wagner's, with Debussy's and d'Indy's, they stand almost fatally in the way of the composer that uses them. His music can evoke no answering and pleasurable sensations in us, no quickening of mind and stirring of emotion, because his speech conveys so little to those that hear, so revolts them or so touches their sense of the ludicrous and the incongruous. Those who have laughed at Schönberg's music have as yet their measure of justification. Those whom it revolts by its strangeness, its present ugliness, its insistent and arrogant disregard of almost every familiar procedure are in still better case. As justified and more are those that say they can make nothing of it, because its speech conveys nothing to them; because the five orchestral pieces talk no musical sense. To homines, tot sententiæ, and in this case with reason for each unless they fall away into the mere blind and bitter adjectives of dislike, prejudice and self-righteousness.

It is possible for a composer, using so strange and repellent a medium, to command a beauty or a power of idea and imagination and a passion or a felicity in expression of himself that shall reconcile his hearers to the means of transmission and persuade them that these means do but assure and heighten the end. So Beethoven and Wagner, so d'Indy and Debussy, so Strauss and Mahler conquered ears and spirits. So in turn must Schönberg and our other innovators conquer—if they are ever to conquer at all. Moreover, while the conquest is in progress or is even beginning, they must now and then suggest to our ears, struggling with these means, the sensation of the beauty, the power, the passion or the felicity, the imaginative and the emotional impulse that lies behind.

Such a sensation of beauty of mood and of corresponding utterance did come to some ears yesterday out of the motives or melodies and the exquisite harmonic and instrumental coloring of the piece called "The Past," that they perfumed with the aroma of dear memories held in gentle musing. Such a sensation rose again from the undulating rhythms, the iridescent and opalescent coloring, the whole glamor of beauty about the tone-picture called "The Changing Chord." Medium or no medium, both these pieces had their poetry of tones. Again in those whirling and warring wraiths in their fantasmal and shrieking tempest dwelt the suggestion of a wild and fantastic power; and it was present again, though not so clearly, in the piece of torturing and racing bodements. So far at least does Schönberg lead his hearers into his new paths; farther with the best will in the world, few of us may go with him; nor can so much as one of us say whether these or any other of the pathways of the innovating men be the road which the music of the next generation is to traverse. Some new course it is likely, by all the precedent of the past, to take and even the balked explorers do music their service.

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 15,

Programmes from Dr. Muck

Dr. Muck has now put together his programmes for the Symphony Concerts through Jan. 22 and 23, when half the series will be done and made a single change in the programme already announced for the concerts on Dec. 25 and 26. On those days, Mr. Noack will not play Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin as the original schedule stood. Instead, two purely orchestral numbers will replace the concerto—the "March of the Three Holy Kings" from Liszt's oratorio of "Christus" and a fragment from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio." Two pieces will divide the programme for the concerts of Jan. 1 and 2—Liszt's "Faust" symphony with the final chorus sung by the Apollo Club, and Mendelssohn's concerto for violin and orchestra with Mr. Kreisler to play the solo part. Needless, almost to say, Liszt's symphony is one of the masterpieces of delineative and characterizing music wherein the symphonic continuity and tonal suggestion of Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles go hand in hand and the composer has been vivid in visualizing themes and in animating and defining development. One movement falls to Faust; one to Gretchen; one, charged with tonal ironies, to Mephistopheles; while for ending is a setting of Goethe's chorus about the "woman-soul." The whole symphony is music in which Dr. Muck and the orchestra in their present estate should excel themselves.

There will be no Symphony Concerts on Jan. 8 and 9, when the orchestra will be in New York. At the succeeding concerts of Jan. 15 and 16, two novel pieces by Oskar Fried, the conductor and the composer of Berlin, stand on the programme—a Double Suite for string orchestra and an Adagio and Scherzo for wind choir, two harps and kettle-drums. Finally, at the concerts of Jan. 22 and 23, Dr. Muck will conduct for the first times in Boston in Strauss's tone-poem, "Zarathustra." Here in detail are the two new programmes. For Jan. 15 and 16:

Symphony No. 1, in C minor..............Brahms
Double Suite for String Orchestra—Adagio and Scherzo for Wind Choir, Two Harps and Tympani..............Fried
Overture to the Opera, "The Magic Flute" Mozart
For Jan. 21 and 22:
Symphony No. 1, in E minor..............Sibelius
Tone-Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra"...Strauss
Overture, "Leonora," No. 3............Beethoven

TRANSCRIPT. DECEMBER 23,

Dr. Muck and His New York Public

A Final Word in the Debate Over His Programmes There

A LETTER was recently published in the daily columns of The Times from a distressed subscriber to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that gives, unintentionally, no doubt, a false impression of Dr. Muck's programmes. The S O S signal sent out then was caused by the programme performed on the evening of Dec. 3, when two rather long and difficult pieces, difficult for listeners as well as for players, were presented in succession. The Times on that occasion remarked that the programme put the listeners to a severe test, as it did. It seemed that it might have been better for the audience, as well as for the new compositions themselves, if some relief or contrast had been afforded by putting them on different programmes and joining them to some work more familiar, and hence easier of access, even though in the modern style. It would have given the new pieces themselves a better chance of being appreciated by causing less strain upon the listener's receptive capacity, entirely without regard to their own intrinsic values.

But the correspondent went on to intimate that Dr. Muck's course in programme making for New York has "relegated Bach, Beethoven and Brahms to the discard." It is certain that nothing is further from the great conductor's intention than to do anything of the sort. It is certain that his own love and sympathies go out very strongly to the music of the classical masters, and the more modern who have not severed all allegiance to the past. It would doubtless not be wrong to surmise that [illegible] holds it in infinitely higher esteem th[illegible] the vast majority of the music called today "modern"—much of which will unquestionably be tomorrow dead or counted among the wreckage of a tide already receded.

There is no need of a personal inquiry to establish such a belief. The fact that Dr. Muck is a great musician, of the finest and most sensitive feeling, a conductor of enormous knowledge and experience, one who performs the music of the classical masters with a devotion so great, an instinct so unerring, with results so fruitful in beauty and so exactly filled with the spirit that imbues them, would alone be enough to suggest that he has no purpose to relegate such works to the "discard." But something more tangible establishes the fact, and that is the record of his New York programmes. This shows that Dr. Muck has been far from devoting his New York concerts to modern music. Without going back to his first term of two years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, consider the programmes he has given in New York since his return to the direction of the orchestra in the autumn of 1912. In the season of 1912-13 he put on them twelve classical pieces—from Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms, Weber, and Schumann. In the season of 1913-14 there were eleven such numbers—from Händel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and Brahms. In the four concerts of the current season there have already been five—from Beethoven, Brahms, and Weber.

Dr. Muck, like all other symphonic conductors, is confronted with difficulties and dilemmas in the planning of a large number of programmes for a season's work. No conductor in these days can stand aloof from modern music, whatever may be his personal likes or dislikes. It is indisputably his duty to give his audiences a showing of the best, the most characteristic, the most influential, of such music, or what may seem so from day to day. Stagnation, decay, dry rot, await the organization and the director that are not alive to this duty. No doubt even distressed letter writers would willingly grant this contention, which is hardly a contention in the sense of having much recognizable opposition.

Nor has New York ever been a place where there was any vociferous demand for conservatism or any potent and obstructive unwillingness to hear the new. The honorable history of the Philharmonic Society is a proof of it, and the record of its programmes, from 1842 to the present day, is a monument of the liberal minds and progressive spirits of its conductors, and its audiences as well. It need not again be recalled how much of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, was heard here for the first time in America when there was some, and even considerable, doubt about them; how Berlioz was given a full and free hearing in New York before he had it in Paris; how, when Carl Bergmann, conducting the Philharmonic, was told that his audiences didn't like the abundance of Wagner he was giving them (when Wagner was worse than strongly suspect), he answered, "Den dey must hear him till dey do"; or how Theodore Thomas used to lie in wait for the newest publications of Brahms, Dvorák, Tschaikowsky, Strauss and other living and creating spirits, or how he and Dr. Leopold Damrosch contested for the first performance of a new work by Brahms.

There is no reason to believe that the liberality supporting and approving all this has been extinguished in New York. But there are more ways of killing a cat than by smothering her in butter. Such protests as there are against Dr. Muck's "modern" performances will probably be found directed more against the methods of admixture in his programmes than against the total amounts, or proportions of modern and classical works contained in them. It is certain that the classics are not relegated to the "discard," or even to the background. [Richard Aldrich in the New York Times

---

BOSTON JOURNAL. DECEMBER 26,

SYMPHONY PLAYS FESTAL PROGRAM

Volbach Novelty Proves to Be an Antidote for Schoenberg.

Dr. Muck's Christmas program was as comforting to the Symphony audience yesterday afternoon as black coffee or chartreuse. It was melodious, conservative, free from psychological problems and the dissonance that comes with the new music and hacks the ear. A perfect symphonic after-dinner offering!

The Yuletide program, which will be performed again tonight, comprises the Cesar Franck chorale in A minor, for organ alone, played by John P. Marshall; Fritz Volbach's symphony in B minor, which has never been played here before and which will probably not evoke any urgent requests to have it played again; the shepherds' music from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," the "March of the Three Holy Kings," from Liszt's oratorio, "Christus," and Weber's sparkling "Der Freischuetz" overture.

The Volbach symphony is of a festal, conventional character. The performance of it was roundly applauded yesterday. It served as a sort of antidote for the Schoenberg cryptograms of a week ago.

Next week's program is announced as being "in many respects the most important that Dr. Muck will give this

ON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1914

Symphony Concert

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

SCHOENBERG'S NOTORIOUS PIECES PLAYED

No "Incident" Disturbs the Performance—Music of Mood and Vision Transmitted in a New and Strange Medium — The Residue Left—Miss Hinkle's Exquisite Singing and Dr. Muck and the Orchestra Variously Eloquent

ALL things go for granted at the Symphony Concerts—even the music of Arnold Schönberg. In Vienna, Berlin and Munich, audiences have "manifested" over it so energetically that in the double din of applause and hisses it could not be heard for itself—an eminently satisfactory outcome to the unshakably prejudiced but sorely disappointing to the merely open-minded. In dull-witted but usually well-mannered London, the five pieces for orchestra that Dr. Muck and his men played yesterday afternoon, provoked boos, as though the customs of the British gallery in the theatre were passing to the floor of British concert-rooms. In Chicago a year ago some guffawed showily at these same five pieces; others stamped with disapproving feet; and many mouthed bitter adjectives in a loud and firm voice. Yet here at our Symphony Concerts nothing was likely to happen over Schönberg's music and nothing—or almost nothing—did actually happen. Few in this town take music or the performance of music, so eagerly and seriously as to show unseemly excitement over either in public; while a breach of good manners at a Symphony Concert is unthinkable, although some ears believed they heard once yesterday a modest and timid hiss.

A few tittered at the close of the first of the five pieces; many seemed to listen intently to the next two and to receive an impression not wholly disagreeable from them; the merest of minorities frankly and courageously applauded all five; the great majority simply read the programme-book as it is the custom to do when one is not interested at the Symphony Concerts. In the ensuing intermission one and another spluttered opprobrious adjectives with the intonations of those that lay down the law; many bore public witness to the fineness of their musical sensibilities by recounting the unpleasant sensations the music had stirred in them; many more asked suavely the time-honored question for such occasions: "Now what do you really think?" with the stress on "really." As usual the query encouraged candor and sincerity in the answer; and a few very young students of music at Harvard audibly approved Dr. Muck's tempi with the music—a rare condescension on their part. In a word, as such things usually go in the ironies of this perverse world, "the day" proved to be no "day" at all.

Of course, here and there, a dogmatic voice declared that Schönberg's five pieces ought never—an emphatic and somewhat over-used word—to have been played at the Symphony Concerts. Yet there seems to be no very valid reason why they should not have been heard at least once there, while more than one might be cited to justify a single performance. Schönberg shares with the other innovators in the music of the hour, the virtue of compact brevity and the whole five pieces consumed no more than twenty-five minutes out of the forty-eight hours that in a year each series of Symphony Concerts fills. They made but one out of the hundred-odd items that strew the programmes from October to May. As no one could possibly crave the music of Schönberg all day and every day, so no one, except a few reviewers, need have listened to it for even twenty-five minutes on a single occasion unless he so willed, with or without foreknowledge (which must have been widespread) of its singularities.

By those same singularities, as the truth is, the five pieces have made much stir in the world, awakened many curiosities, kindled many warm and combative debates. It is one of the clear obligations of the Symphony Orchestra and its successive conductors to keep the public of the concerts informed as to the course of music in this immediate hour. To do so, with the utmost openmindedness and catholicity, has become one of its policies, traditions and glories. If it were agreed that Schönberg's five orchestral pieces were merely freakish sensation-mongering, then Dr. Muck might reasonably and rightfully have overlooked them. But it is by no means so agreed. Whether the hearer honestly enjoys or honestly resents them or whether he follows them only with curiosity and interest, the substance, the form, the idiom, the purpose and the suggestion of the pieces are all signs of the times in music and clear evidence of new tendencies and efforts with it. The pieces disclose also a composer of highly individual mind and spirit. From Vienna to Chicago, they have stirred serious study and debate. All these seem Schönberg's valid titles to performance.

As Schönberg has his right to performance on the stage of Symphony Hall, so he has his right to open-mindedness in the auditorium. Like the music of every other composer from Mozart to Mahler, his pieces can only invite once more the old, old inquiry: what has he sought to do; by what means has he done it; and what is the sum of the achievement and the pleasure that it yields or fails to yield to those that hear it. First of all, with or without the title that Schönberg finally affixed, the five orchestral pieces, are clearly suggestion and epitome of mood and vision in tones. The composer releases in music a mood or an image that has laid hold upon his mind and sensibilities that he may so communi[illegible]t and the sensations awakened in him [illegible] hearers for their æsthetic pleasure. [illegible] his first piece, "Presenti[illegible] hearing and with all his singularities of procedure more in the way than in any of the rest, except the last, it was possible to infer that he was imparting a mood of over-wrought foreboding—tortured, fitful, fantastic, super-sensitive. The second piece is entitled "The Past" and there is no mistaking its mood of musing memories with, again, a supersensitive imagination at play upon them. The third Schönberg entitles, as though he were a Whistler in tones, "The Changing Chord." It seems in the hearing a clear suggestion in tones of the softest of visioned colors in the softest of undulations and it is relatively easy to the quickened imagination to receive its suggestion. The fourth piece—"Peripetera," or "continual goings and comings"—less clearly communicates mood and vision, but it may plausibly be of whirling, warring, wailing wraiths swept on phantasmal tempests. The fifth piece—"The Obbligato Recitative"—seemed almost wholly baffling yesterday—now wistful, now nervous and now acrid play with scraps and snatches of what, perchance, might have been a melancholy melody. The mood, the imagery, is of haunting wisps of vision.

In sum, then, Schönberg writes music of mood and vision and in at least three, and maybe four, of the five pieces, does succeed in communicating a plausible imagery to his hearer at the moment as he must do in the swift commerce of music in the concert-room. And in every sense, the imagery is very tense, nervous and concentrated. That is to say Schönberg, like many another of the innovating composers of our time, would make music yet more sensitively, intimately, and concentratedly expressive of the mood, vision and impulse behind than it has ever been before. He would have the directest, the fullest and the most minute and elastic transmission of his sensations that the hearer may feel the self-expression in them and maybe find also a persuasive beauty or a fantastic and devouring power.

Then enter the means of transmission and in more senses than one discordance. Schönberg weaves his music from little motives or scraps of motives that very rarely have any clear thematic profile; he weaves it with chords that few men, if any, have ever before fashioned or set side by side; he weaves it also in a kind of hurtling, stinging or pricking counterpoint full of strange conflicts, contacts and clangors; he weaves it as by impulse with no thought of prescription or precedent and yet with a certain formal sense as in the evolution of the motives that can be traced on the engraved page. Tonality and returns to tonality he knows not. He also weaves it and fashions it with a very acute and imaginative sensibility to instrumental timbres and to harmonic suggestion and with a very keen, diversified and imaginative sense of rhythm. His rhythms are almost the cohering element in his music; in his instrumental and harmonic color lies almost the whole of its suggestion. In a single hearing at least, very few of his motives in themselves arrest the ear or kindle answering sensation. Moreover in the use of all his strange transmitting means, Schönberg lays on and spares not. In a word, again, like most of the innovating composers of the younger generation, he would free music from almost every prescription except the directest, fullest and most sensitive expression of the thought, the impulse, the vision and the mood that they have begotten. To gain this end he would expand harmonic possibilities and tonal relations to the utmost. Music is not and cannot remain a static art; its speech changes with each generation; it has always been pushing forth into the unknown that in time becomes the actual and the accepted. Rightly or wrongly Schönberg and the rest believe they have found their paths to it, though the end of the journey be far away and its vicissitudes many.

Yet for the time being, until the average ear has rejected these new means of transmission or has accepted them as it ultimately did with Beethoven's or Wagner's, with Debussy's and d'Indy's, they stand almost fatally in the way of the composer that uses them. His music can evoke no answering and pleasurable sensations in us, no quickening of mind and stirring of emotion, because his speech conveys so little to those that hear, so revolts them or so touches their sense of the ludicrous and the incongruous. Those who have laughed at Schönberg's music have as yet their measure of justification. Those whom it revolts by its strangeness, its present ugliness, its insistent and arrogant disregard of almost every familiar procedure are in still better case. As justified and more are those that say they can make nothing of it, because its speech conveys nothing to them; because the five orchestral pieces talk no musical sense. To homines, tot sententiæ, and in this case with reason for each unless they fall away into the mere blind and bitter adjectives of dislike, prejudice and self-righteousness.

It is possible for a composer, using so strange and repellent a medium, to command a beauty or a power of idea and imagination and a passion or a felicity in expression of himself that shall reconcile his hearers to the means of transmission and persuade them that these means do but assure and heighten the end. So Beethoven and Wagner, so d'Indy and Debussy, so Strauss and Mahler conquered ears and spirits. So in turn must Schönberg and our other innovators conquer—if they are ever to conquer at all. Moreover, while the conquest is in progress or is even beginning, they must now and then suggest to our ears, struggling with these means, the sensation of the beauty, the power, the passion or the felicity, the imaginative and the emotional impulse that lies behind.

Such a sensation of beauty of mood and of corresponding utterance did come to some ears yest[illegible] out of the motives or melodies and the exquisite harmonic and instrumental coloring of the piece called "The Past," that they perfumed with the aroma of dear memories held in gentle musing. Such a sensation rose again from the undulating rhythms, the iridescent and opalescent coloring, the whole glamor of beauty about the tone-picture called "The Changing Chord." Medium or no medium, both these pieces had their poetry of tones. Again in those whirling and warring wraiths in their fantasmal and shrieking tempest dwelt the suggestion of a wild and fantastic power; and it was present again, though not so clearly, in the piece of torturing and racing bodements. So far at least does Schönberg lead his hearers into his new paths; farther with the best will in the world, few of us may go with him; nor can so much as one of us say whether these or any other of the pathways of the innovating men be the road which the music of the next generation is to traverse. Some new course it is likely, by all the precedent of the past, to take and even the balked explorers do music their service.

TRANSCRIPT,
DECEMBER 15,

Programmes from Dr. Muck

Dr. Muck has now put together his programmes for the Symphony Concerts through Jan. 22 and 23, when half the series will be done and made a single change in the programme already announced for the concerts on Dec. 25 and 26. On those days, Mr. Noack will not play Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin as the original schedule stood. Instead, two purely orchestral numbers will replace the concerto—the "March of the Three Holy Kings" from Liszt's oratorio of "Christus" and a fragment from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio." Two pieces will divide the programme for the concerts of Jan. 1 and 2—Liszt's "Faust" symphony with the final chorus sung by the Apollo Club, and Mendelssohn's concerto for violin and orchestra with Mr. Kreisler to play the solo part. Needless, almost to say, Liszt's symphony is one of the masterpieces of delineative and characterizing music wherein the symphonic continuity and tonal suggestion of Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles go hand in hand and the composer has been vivid in visualizing themes and in animating and defining development. One movement falls to Faust; one to Gretchen; one, charged with tonal ironies, to Mephistopheles; while for ending is a setting of Goethe's chorus about the "woman-soul." The whole symphony is music in which Dr. Muck and the orchestra in their present estate should excel themselves.

There will be no Symphony Concerts on Jan. 8 and 9, when the orchestra will be in New York. At the succeeding concerts of Jan. 15 and 16, two novel pieces by Oskar Fried, the conductor and the composer of Berlin, stand on the programme—a Double Suite for string orchestra and an Adagio and Scherzo for wind choir, two harps and kettle-drums. Finally, at the concerts of Jan. 22 and 23, Dr. Muck will conduct for the first times in Boston in Strauss's tone-poem, "Zarathustra." Here in detail are the two new programmes. For Jan. 15 and 16:

Symphony No. 1, in C minor..............Brahms
Double Suite for String Orchestra—Adagio and Scherzo for Wind Choir, Two Harps and Tympani ....Fried
Overture to the Opera, "The Magic Flute" Mozart.

For Jan. 21 and 22:

Symphony No. 1, in E minor.............Sibelius
Tone-Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra"...Strauss
Overture, "Leonora," No. 3...........Beethoven

TRANSCRIPT,
DECEMBER 23,

Dr. Muck and His New York Public

A Final Word in the Debate Over His Programmes There

A LETTER was recently published in the daily columns of The Times from a distressed subscriber to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that gives, unintentionally, no doubt, a false impression of Dr. Muck's programmes. The S O S signal sent out then was caused by the programme performed on the evening of Dec. 3, when two rather long and difficult pieces, difficult for listeners as well as for players, were presented in succession. The Times on that occasion remarked that the programme put the listeners to a severe test, as it did. It seemed that it might have been better for the audience, as well as for the new compositions themselves, if some relief or contrast had been afforded by putting them on different programmes and joining them to some work more familiar, and hence easier of access, even though in the modern style. It would have given the new pieces themselves a better chance of being appreciated by causing less strain upon the listener's receptive capacity, entirely without regard to their own intrinsic values.

But the correspondent went on to intimate that Dr. Muck's course in programme making for New York has "relegated Bach, Beethoven and Brahms to the discard." It is certain that nothing is further from the great conductor's intention than to do anything of the sort. It is certain that his own love and sympathies go out very strongly to the music of the classical masters, and the more modern who have not severed all allegiance to the past. It would doubtless not be wrong to surmise that [illegible] holds it in infinitely higher esteem th[illegible] the vast majority of the music called today "modern"—much of which will unquestionably be tomorrow dead or counted among the wreckage of a tide already receded.

There is no need of a personal inquiry to establish such a belief. The fact that Dr. Muck is a great musician, of the finest and most sensitive feeling, a conductor of enormous knowledge and experience, one who performs the music of the classical masters with a devotion so great, an instinct so unerring, with results so fruitful in beauty and so exactly filled with the spirit that imbues them, would alone be enough to suggest that he has no purpose to relegate such works to the "discard." But something more tangible establishes the fact, and that is the record of his New York programmes. This shows that Dr. Muck has been far from devoting his New York concerts to modern music. Without going back to his first term of two years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, consider the programmes he has given in New York since his return to the direction of the orchestra in the autumn of 1912. In the season of 1912-13 he put on them twelve classical pieces—from Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms, Weber, and Schumann. In the season of 1913-14 there were eleven such numbers—from Händel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and Brahms. In the four concerts of the current season there have already been five—from Beethoven, Brahms, and Weber.

Dr. Muck, like all other symphonic conductors, is confronted with difficulties and dilemmas in the planning of a large number of programmes for a season's work. No conductor in these days can stand aloof from modern music, whatever may be his personal likes or dislikes. It is indisputably his duty to give his audiences a showing of the best, the most characteristic, the most influential, of such music, or what may seem so from day to day. Stagnation, decay, dry rot, await the organization and the director that are not alive to this duty. No doubt even distressed letter writers would willingly grant this contention, which is hardly a contention in the sense of having much recognizable opposition.

Nor has New York ever been a place where there was any vociferous demand for conservatism or any potent and obstructive unwillingness to hear the new. The honorable history of the Philharmonic Society is a proof of it, and the record of its programmes, from 1842 to the present day, is a monument of the liberal minds and progressive spirits of its conductors, and its audiences as well. It need not again be recalled how much of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, was heard here for the first time in America when there was some, and even considerable, doubt about them; how Berlioz was given a full and free hearing in New York before he had it in Paris; how, when Carl Bergmann, conducting the Philharmonic, was told that his audiences didn't like the abundance of Wagner he was giving them (when Wagner was worse than strongly suspect), he answered, "Den dey must hear him till dey do"; or how Theodore Thomas used to lie in wait for the newest publications of Brahms, Dvoràk, Tschaikowsky, Strauss and other living and creating spirits, or how he and Dr. Leopold Damrosch contested for the first performance of a new work by Brahms.

There is no reason to believe that the liberality supporting and approving all this has been extinguished in New York. But there are more ways of killing a cat than by smothering her in butter. Such protests as there are against Dr. Muck's "modern" performances will probably be found directed more against the methods of admixture in his programmes than against the total amounts, or proportions of modern and classical works contained in them. It is certain that the classics are not relegated to the "discard," or even to the background. [Richard Aldrich in the New York Times

---

BOSTON JOURNAL
DECEMBER 26,

SYMPHONY PLAYS FESTAL PROGRAM

Volbach Novelty Proves to Be an Antidote for Schoenberg.

Dr. Muck's Christmas program was as comforting to the Symphony audience yesterday afternoon as black coffee or chartreuse. It was melodious, conservative, free from psychological problems and the dissonance that comes with the new music and hacks the ear. A perfect symphonic after-dinner offering!

The Yuletide program, which will be performed again tonight, comprises the Cesar Franck chorale in A minor, for organ alone, played by John P. Marshall; Fritz Volbach's symphony in B minor, which has never been played here before and which will probably not evoke any urgent requests to have it played again; the shepherds' music from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," the "March of the Three Holy Kings," from Liszt's oratorio, "Christus," and Weber's sparkling "Der Freischuetz" overture.

The Volbach symphony is of a festal, conventional character. The performance of it was roundly applauded yesterday. It served as a sort of antidote for the Schoenberg cryptograms of a week ago.

Next week's program is announced as being "in many respects the most important that Dr. Muck will give this

ON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1914

Symphony Concert

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

SCHOENBERG'S NOTORIOUS PIECES PLAYED

No "Incident" Disturbs the Performance—Music of Mood and Vision Transmitted in a New and Strange Medium — The Residue Left—Miss Hinkle's Exquisite Singing and Dr. Muck and the Orchestra Variously Eloquent

ALL things go for granted at the Symphony Concerts—even the music of Arnold Schönberg. In Vienna, Berlin and Munich, audiences have "manifested" over it so energetically that in the double din of applause and hisses it could not be heard for itself—an eminently satisfactory outcome to the unshakably prejudiced but sorely disappointing to the merely open-minded. In dull-witted but usually well-mannered London, the five pieces for orchestra that Dr. Muck and his men played yesterday afternoon, provoked boos, as though the customs of the British gallery in the theatre were passing to the floor of British concert-rooms. In Chicago a year ago some guffawed showily at these same five pieces; others stamped with disapproving feet; and many mouthed bitter adjectives in a loud and firm voice. Yet here at our Symphony Concerts nothing was likely to happen over Schönberg's music and nothing—or almost nothing—did actually happen. Few in this town take music or the performance of music, so eagerly and seriously as to show unseemly excitement over either in public; while a breach of good manners at a Symphony Concert is unthinkable, although some ears believed they heard once yesterday a modest and timid hiss.

A few tittered at the close of the first of the five pieces; many seemed to listen intently to the next two and to receive an impression not wholly disagreeable from them; the merest of minorities frankly and courageously applauded all five; the great majority simply read the programme-book as it is the custom to do when one is not interested at the Symphony Concerts. In the ensuing intermission one and another spluttered opprobrious adjectives with the intonations of those that lay down the law; many bore public witness to the fineness of their musical sensibilities by recounting the unpleasant sensations the music had stirred in them; many more asked suavely the time-honored question for such occasions: "Now what do you really think?" with the stress on "really." As usual the query encouraged candor and sincerity in the answer; and a few very young students of music at Harvard audibly approved Dr. Muck's tempi with the music—a rare condescension on their part. In a word, as such things usually go in the ironies of this perverse world, "the day" proved to be no "day" at all.

Of course, here and there, a dogmatic voice declared that Schönberg's five pieces ought never—an emphatic and somewhat over-used word—to have been played at the Symphony Concerts. Yet there seems to be no very valid reason why they should not have been heard at least once there, while more than one might be cited to justify a single performance. Schönberg shares with the other innovators in the music of the hour, the virtue of compact brevity and the whole five pieces consumed no more than twenty-five minutes out of the forty-eight hours that in a year each series of Symphony Concerts fills. They made but one out of the hundred-odd items that strew the programmes from October to May. As no one could possibly crave the music of Schönberg all day and every day, so no one, except a few reviewers, need have listened to it for even twenty-five minutes on a single occasion unless he so willed, with or without foreknowledge (which must have been widespread) of its singularities.

By those same singularities, as the truth is, the five pieces have made much stir in the world, awakened many curiosities, kindled many warm and combative debates. It is one of the clear obligations of the Symphony Orchestra and its successive conductors to keep the public of the concerts informed as to the course of music in this immediate hour. To do so, with the utmost openmindedness and catholicity, has become one of its policies, traditions and glories. If it were agreed that Schönberg's five orchestral pieces were merely freakish sensation-mongering, then Dr. Muck might reasonably and rightfully have overlooked them. But it is by no means so agreed. Whether the hearer honestly enjoys or honestly resents them or whether he follows them only with curiosity and interest, the substance, the form, the idiom, the purpose and the suggestion of the pieces are all signs of the times in music and clear evidence of new tendencies and efforts with it. The pieces disclose also a composer of highly individual mind and spirit. From Vienna to Chicago, they have stirred serious study and debate. All these seem Schönberg's valid titles to performance.

As Schönberg has his right to performance on the stage of Symphony Hall, so he has his right to open-mindedness in the auditorium. Like the music of every other composer from Mozart to Mahler, his pieces can only invite once more the old, old inquiry: what has he sought to do; by what means has he done it; and what is the sum of the achievement and the pleasure that it yields or fails to yield to those that hear it. First of all, with or without the title that Schönberg finally affixed, the five orchestral pieces, are clearly suggestion and epitome of mood and vision in tones. The composer releases in music a mood or an image that has laid hold upon his mind and sensibilities that he may so communi- [illegible] it and the sensations awakened in him [illegible] hearers for their æsthetic pleasure. [illegible] his first piece, "Presenti- [illegible] hearing and with all his singularities of procedure more in the way than in any of the rest, except the last, it was possible to infer that he was imparting a mood of over-wrought foreboding—tortured, fitful, fantastic, super-sensitive. The second piece is entitled "The Past" and there is no mistaking its mood of musing memories with, again, a supersensitive imagination at play upon them. The third Schönberg entitles, as though he were a Whistler in tones, "The Changing Chord." It seems in the hearing a clear suggestion in tones of the softest of visioned colors in the softest of undulations and it is relatively easy to the quickened imagination to receive its suggestion. The fourth piece—"Peripetera," or "continual goings and comings"—less clearly communicates mood and vision, but it may plausibly be of whirling, warring, wailing wraiths swept on phantasmal tempests. The fifth piece—"The Obbligato Recitative"—seemed almost wholly baffling yesterday—now wistful, now nervous and now acrid play with scraps and snatches of what, perchance, might have been a melancholy melody. The mood, the imagery, is of haunting wisps of vision.

In sum, then, Schönberg writes music of mood and vision and in at least three, and maybe four, of the five pieces, does succeed in communicating a plausible imagery to his hearer at the moment as he must do in the swift commerce of music in the concert-room. And in every sense, the imagery is very tense, nervous and concentrated. That is to say Schönberg, like many another of the innovating composers of our time, would make music yet more sensitively, intimately, and concentratedly expressive of the mood, vision and impulse behind than it has ever been before. He would have the directest, the fullest and the most minute and elastic transmission of his sensations that the hearer may feel the self-expression in them and maybe find also a persuasive beauty or a fantastic and devouring power.

Then enter the means of transmission and in more senses than one discordance. Schönberg weaves his music from little motives or scraps of motives that very rarely have any clear thematic profile; he weaves it with chords that few men, if any, have ever before fashioned or set side by side; he weaves it also in a kind of hurtling, stinging or pricking counterpoint full of strange conflicts, contacts and clangors; he weaves it as by impulse with no thought of prescription or precedent and yet with a certain formal sense as in the evolution of the motives that can be traced on the engraved page. Tonality and returns to tonality he knows not. He also weaves it and fashions it with a very acute and imaginative sensibility to instrumental timbres and to harmonic suggestion and with a very keen, diversified and imaginative sense of rhythm. His rhythms are almost the cohering element in his music; in his instrumental and harmonic color lies almost the whole of its suggestion. In a single hearing at least, very few of his motives in themselves arrest the ear or kindle answering sensation. Moreover in the use of all his strange transmitting means, Schönberg lays on and spares not. In a word, again, like most of the innovating composers of the younger generation, he would free music from almost every prescription except the directest, fullest and most sensitive expression of the thought, the impulse, the vision and the mood that they have begotten. To gain this end he would expand harmonic possibilities and tonal relations to the utmost. Music is not and cannot remain a static art; its speech changes with each generation; it has always been pushing forth into the unknown that in time becomes the actual and the accepted. Rightly or wrongly Schönberg and the rest believe they have found their paths to it, though the end of the journey be far away and its vicissitudes many.

Yet for the time being, until the average ear has rejected these new means of transmission or has accepted them as it ultimately did with Beethoven's or Wagner's, with Debussy's and d'Indy's, they stand almost fatally in the way of the composer that uses them. His music can evoke no answering and pleasurable sensations in us, no quickening of mind and stirring of emotion, because his speech conveys so little to those that hear, so revolts them or so touches their sense of the ludicrous and the incongruous. Those who have laughed at Schönberg's music have as yet their measure of justification. Those whom it revolts by its strangeness, its present ugliness, its insistent and arrogant disregard of almost every familiar procedure are in still better case. As justified and more are those that say they can make nothing of it, because its speech conveys nothing to them; because the five orchestral pieces talk no musical sense. To homines, tot sententiæ, and in this case with reason for each unless they fall away into the mere blind and bitter adjectives of dislike, prejudice and self-righteousness.

It is possible for a composer, using so strange and repellent a medium, to command a beauty or a power of idea and imagination and a passion or a felicity in expression of himself that shall reconcile his hearers to the means of transmission and persuade them that these means do but assure and heighten the end. So Beethoven and Wagner, so d'Indy and Debussy, so Strauss and Mahler conquered ears and spirits. So in turn must Schönberg and our other innovators conquer—if they are ever to conquer at all. Moreover, while the conquest is in progress or is even beginning, they must now and then suggest to our ears, struggling with these means, the sensation of the beauty, the power, the passion or the felicity, the imaginative and the emotional impulse that lies behind.

Such a sensation of beauty of mood and of corresponding utterance did come to some ears [illegible] out of the motives or melodies and the exquisite harmonic and instrumental coloring of the piece called "The Past," that they perfumed with the aroma of dear memories held in gentle musing. Such a sensation rose again from the undulating rhythms, the iridescent and opalescent coloring, the whole glamor of beauty about the tone-picture called "The Changing Chord." Medium or no medium, both these pieces had their poetry of tones. Again in those whirling and warring wraiths in their fantasmal and shrieking tempest dwelt the suggestion of a wild and fantastic power; and it was present again, though not so clearly, in the piece of torturing and racing bodements. So far at least does Schönberg lead his hearers into his new paths; farther with the best will in the world, few of us may go with him; nor can so much as one of us say whether these or any other of the pathways of the innovating men be the road which the music of the next generation is to traverse. Some new course it is likely, by all the precedent of the past, to take and even the balked explorers do music their service.

TRANSCRIPT.

DECEMBER 15.

Programmes from Dr. Muck

Dr. Muck has now put together his programmes for the Symphony Concerts through Jan. 22 and 23, when half the series will be done and made a single change in the programme already announced for the concerts on Dec. 25 and 26. On those days, Mr. Noack will not play Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin as the original schedule stood. Instead, two purely orchestral numbers will replace the concerto—the "March of the Three Holy Kings" from Liszt's oratorio of "Christus" and a fragment from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio." Two pieces will divide the programme for the concerts of Jan. 1 and 2—Liszt's "Faust" symphony with the final chorus sung by the Apollo Club, and Mendelssohn's concerto for violin and orchestra with Mr. Kreisler to play the solo part. Needless, almost to say, Liszt's symphony is one of the masterpieces of delineative and characterizing music wherein the symphonic continuity and tonal suggestion of Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles go hand in hand and the composer has been vivid in visualizing themes and in animating and defining development. One movement falls to Faust; one to Gretchen; one, charged with tonal ironies, to Mephistopheles; while for ending is a setting of Goethe's chorus about the "woman-soul." The whole symphony is music in which Dr. Muck and the orchestra in their present estate should excel themselves.

There will be no Symphony Concerts on Jan. 8 and 9, when the orchestra will be in New York. At the succeeding concerts of Jan. 15 and 16, two novel pieces by Oskar Fried, the conductor and the composer of Berlin, stand on the programme—a Double Suite for string orchestra and an Adagio and Scherzo for wind choir, two harps and kettle-drums. Finally, at the concerts of Jan. 22 and 23, Dr. Muck will conduct for the first times in Boston in Strauss's tone-poem, "Zarathustra." Here in detail are the two new programmes. For Jan. 15 and 16:

Symphony No. 1, in C minor	Brahms
Double Suite for String Orchestra—Adagio and Scherzo for Wind Choir, Two Harps and Tympani	Fried
Overture to the Opera, "The Magic Flute"	Mozart
For Jan. 21 and 22:
Symphony No. 1, in E minor	Sibelius
Tone-Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra"	Strauss
Overture, "Leonora," No. 3	Beethoven

TRANSCRIPT.

DECEMBER 23.

Dr. Muck and His New York Public

A Final Word in the Debate Over His Programmes There

A LETTER was recently published in the daily columns of The Times from a distressed subscriber to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that gives, unintentionally, no doubt, a false impression of Dr. Muck's programmes. The S O S signal sent out then was caused by the programme performed on the evening of Dec. 3, when two rather long and difficult pieces, difficult for listeners as well as for players, were presented in succession. The Times on that occasion remarked that the programme put the listeners to a severe test, as it did. It seemed that it might have been better for the audience, as well as for the new compositions themselves, if some relief or contrast had been afforded by putting them on different programmes and joining them to some work more familiar, and hence easier of access, even though in the modern style. It would have given the new pieces themselves a better chance of being appreciated by causing less strain upon the listener's receptive capacity, entirely without regard to their own intrinsic values.

But the correspondent went on to intimate that Dr. Muck's course in programme making for New York has "relegated Bach, Beethoven and Brahms to the discard." It is certain that nothing is further from the great conductor's intention than to do anything of the sort. It is certain that his own love and sympathies go out very strongly to the music of the classical masters, and the more modern who have not severed all allegiance to the past. It would doubtless not be wrong to surmise that he holds it in infinitely higher esteem than the vast majority of the music called today "modern"—much of which will unquestionably be tomorrow dead or counted among the wreckage of a tide already receded.

There is no need of a personal inquiry to establish such a belief. The fact that Dr. Muck is a great musician, of the finest and most sensitive feeling, a conductor of enormous knowledge and experience, one who performs the music of the classical masters with a devotion so great, an instinct so unerring, with results so fruitful in beauty and so exactly filled with the spirit that imbues them, would alone be enough to suggest that he has no purpose to relegate such works to the "discard." But something more tangible establishes the fact, and that is the record of his New York programmes. This shows that Dr. Muck has been far from devoting his New York concerts to modern music. Without going back to his first term of two years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, consider the programmes he has given in New York since his return to the direction of the orchestra in the autumn of 1912. In the season of 1912-13 he put on them twelve classical pieces—from Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms, Weber, and Schumann. In the season of 1913-14 there were eleven such numbers—from Händel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and Brahms. In the four concerts of the current season there have already been five—from Beethoven, Brahms, and Weber.

Dr. Muck, like all other symphonic conductors, is confronted with difficulties and dilemmas in the planning of a large number of programmes for a season's work. No conductor in these days can stand aloof from modern music, whatever may be his personal likes or dislikes. It is indisputably his duty to give his audiences a showing of the best, the most characteristic, the most influential, of such music, or what may seem so from day to day. Stagnation, decay, dry rot, await the organization and the director that are not alive to this duty. No doubt even distressed letter writers would willingly grant this contention, which is hardly a contention in the sense of having much recognizable opposition.

Nor has New York ever been a place where there was any vociferous demand for conservatism or any potent and obstructive unwillingness to hear the new. The honorable history of the Philharmonic Society is a proof of it, and the record of its programmes, from 1842 to the present day, is a monument of the liberal minds and progressive spirits of its conductors, and its audiences as well. It need not again be recalled how much of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, was heard here for the first time in America when there was some, and even considerable, doubt about them; how Berlioz was given a full and free hearing in New York before he had it in Paris; how, when Carl Bergmann, conducting the Philharmonic, was told that his audiences didn't like the abundance of Wagner he was giving them (when Wagner was worse than strongly suspect), he answered, "Den dey must hear him till dey do"; or how Theodore Thomas used to lie in wait for the newest publications of Brahms, Dvoràk, Tschaikowsky, Strauss and other living and creating spirits, or how he and Dr. Leopold Damrosch contested for the first performance of a new work by Brahms.

There is no reason to believe that the liberality supporting and approving all this has been extinguished in New York. But there are more ways of killing a cat than by smothering her in butter. Such protests as there are against Dr. Muck's "modern" performances will probably be found directed more against the methods of admixture in his programmes than against the total amounts, or proportions of modern and classical works contained in them. It is certain that the classics are not relegated to the "discard," or even to the background. [Richard Aldrich in the New York Times

---

BOSTON JOURNAL—

DECEMBER 26.

SYMPHONY PLAYS FESTAL PROGRAM

Volbach Novelty Proves to Be an Antidote for Schoenberg.

Dr. Muck's Christmas program was as comforting to the Symphony audience yesterday afternoon as black coffee or chartreuse. It was melodious, conservative, free from psychological problems and the dissonance that comes with the new music and hacks the ear. A perfect symphonic after-dinner offering!

The Yuletide program, which will be performed again tonight, comprises the Cesar Franck chorale in A minor, for organ alone, played by John P. Marshall; Fritz Volbach's symphony in B minor, which has never been played here before and which will probably not evoke any urgent requests to have it played again; the shepherds' music from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," the "March of the Three Holy Kings," from Liszt's oratorio, "Christus," and Weber's sparkling "Der Freischuetz" overture.

The Volbach symphony is of a festal, conventional character. The performance of it was roundly applauded yesterday. It served as a sort of antidote for the Schoenberg cryptograms of a week ago.

Next week's program is announced as being "in many respects the most important that Dr. Muck will give this season. It is [illegible] up of Liszt's "Faust" symphony and Mendelssohn violin concerto, with Fritz Kreisler a soloist. These will be Kreisler's only appearances with the orchestra in Boston this season. In the performance of the Liszt number the Apollo Club will assist, and Paul Draper will sing the tenor solo.

Dr. Muck has come into possession of a new version of the "Faust" symphony made by Liszt while the composer was visiting the Wagners. There are only two copies of this revised score, one in Bayreuth and the other in Boston. To a considerable extent, therefore, the symphony will take on the importance of a novelty coming from the pen of one of the foremost musicians of the nineteenth century.

BOSTON GLOBE—

DECEMBER 26,

CHRISTMAS CONCERT.

Volbach Symphony Work of Pleasing Conventionality.

Yuletide Music by Bach and Liszt—Mr Marshall Organ Soloist.

Dr Muck's choice of a symphony at the Christmas concert yesterday afternoon was that of an honest, melodious work, constructed according to well tried and reputable methods; music of no startling display of originality, yet able to afford pleasure to conventional ears, to those which have not forgotten that the tonal art was reared to lusty youth upon a diatonic scale.

Fritz Volbach, who is a German, avowed and unashamed, in this B-minor symphony, now played for the first time in Boston, permits a series of augmented triads to lift their heads in the woodwind in the last movement, cautiously, it may be ironically or even with contempt. He had written music to proceed a half hour and more without allusion to the scale whose intervals are beloved by the modern Frenchmen. It is said that Mr Weingartner's new overture, lately played in Vienna, disclosed the "Marseillaise" in a distorted, caricatured manner, to the great delight of the Viennese.

Volbach's symphony might have been written by any industrious, well-schooled student of orthodox German composition. His study of church music may account for his fondness for the chorale. There is little evidence of the gifts in perception, accent and color of the man who writes as by nature for the theatre. There is little sense of absorbing or tragic conflict, psychic or physical. There is a perfunctory display of pomp with organ and brasses upon a theme of flatulent praise; there is a tendency toward obvious development in sequence, and who shall say this is not flattering to the layman, who upon hearing one phrase answer to another says within himself that he expected it would be so. There is sentiment expressed in a homely, wholesome manner, frank and unashamed, and there is the suggestion, for the greater part, of the genial thought of a man who still could find pleasure in simple things and would gladly bring the same to others.

The first movement has good material, treated in a sane manner, simply, yet without dullness. The vein is well sustained. The ideas show elasticity in substance, and in disposition. The scherzo shows something of imagination. Greater variety, a more communicating lightness of touch would overtake and capture the charm which now is seen for fleeting moments, particularly in the melodic or rhythmic profile of a phrase. The slow movement begins well. There is a remote suggestion harmonically of Charpentier in "Louise," but it vanishes. This section is too long. The contrasting portion gains little from the melody for oboe against clarinet's counterpoint, although both were played admirably by Mr Longy and Mr Sand.

The last movement is not well balanced. The opening hymn is heavy and the entrance of the fugal section seems incongruous rather than the means of contrast. Invention does not fly with an even wing throughout. The first movements are preferable. It is not music to make the jaded sit up. It says only what some already have said, and what more have said less well.

John P. Marshall, the official organist of the orchestra, played Cesar Franck's chorale in A minor for organ alone and was received cordially by the audience. Bach's "Shepherds" music from the Christmas oratorio, Liszt's march of the Three Holy Kings from "Christus" reflected the spirit of the day, particularly the tenderness, simplicity and devotion of the Bach, as Dr Muck played it. The Weber overture to "Der Freischuetz" furnished the program.

BOSTON HERALD.

DECEMBER 26,

NINTH PUBLIC SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Volbach Symphony, Played for First Time, Suited to Festival Occasion.

By PHILIP HALE.

The ninth Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon. Mr. John P. Marshall, organist of the orchestra, was the soloist. There were many vacant seats, for the [illegible] Christmas. The [illegible] was as follows:

Chorale in A minor, for organ alone.... Cesar Franck
Symphony in B minor, Op. 33......Volbach
Symphony (Shepherds' Music) from the Christmas Oratorio.............J. S. Bach
March of the Three Holy Kings, from "Christus".............................Liszt
Overture to "Der Freischuetz"......Weber

Volbach's symphony was played here for the first time. He was known here as a composer by his "Raphael," mood pictures inspired by three of the painter's Madonnas. This "Raphael," performed at a Handel and Haydn concert in 1905, made little impression. Volbach, organist, conductor, is music director of the university at Tubingen. Before going to Tubingen he exercised his profession in Berlin and Mayence. He is a philosopher, or should be, for he studied philosophy at Heidelberg and Bonn, and the latter university gave him the degree of Dr. Phil. He has written biographies of musicians, books about music and analyses of compositions.

The Symphony in B minor was performed at a music festival of German musicians at Stuttgart in 1909. The music is eminently suited to a festival occasion. It has all the requisites for immediate popularity. It is tuneful in an obvious manner. The rhythms are not complete. The harmonic scheme does not irritate or shock the conservative. There is the suggestion of a waltz in the scherzo; there is a pretty solo for the oboe and there is solo work for the first violin; the triangle, the harp, and the organ are introduced. "My darling, what would'st thou have more?"

There is a show of energy in the first movement. The scherzo easily makes friends, and the most interesting instrumentation of the work is found in this movement. The Adagio is suavely melodious with conventional climaxes, with the tune for oboe, beautifully played yesterday by Mr. Longy, and in this movement is the one imaginative harmonic stroke. The introduction to the finale, in which the organ is brought into play, begins with the "Hallelujah" intoned by the brass. The chant grows into a hymn, and the chant furnishes thematic material for the finale, which, of course, ends with the hymn and a sonorous Amen, "played by the full strength of the company."

The symphony suited the holiday perhaps better than a more modern work would have done; modern, not in the matter of chronology, but in ideas. The music is fluent, at times plausibly imposing, of respectable workmanship. It is without true vitality.

Mr. Marshall showed sure technic and excellent taste in registration by his performance of Franck's Chorale, written in the year of the composer's death. It is one of three, which are to be ranked among his noblest works. They are in the great variation form, in which Franck followed Bach and the Beethoven of the latter years. These Chorales reveal the fervor, the spiritual ecstasy, the mysticism, also the human tenderness that characterize the music of this great and humble man.

Whenever we hear the Shepherd's music of Bach, we recall with pleasure the Pastoral in "The Messiah." The latter is so simple, so direct, so appealing. And what is to be said of Liszt's March of the Three Holy Kings Gaspar, Melchior and the black bearded Balthazar? The march theme in the Berliozian manner is fascinating until the reminder of favorite figures in Liszt's Rhapsodies almost persuades the hearer that the three kings all marched to Bethlehem from Hungary, and not from Nubia, Saba, and Tarsus. The pages that picture the apparition of the star and the presentation of the gifts to the Infant Jesus are not conspicuous as pictorial or emotional.

Some have called Liszt insincere in his "religious" music. The reproach is hardly justified. It would be fairer to say that in many of his professedly sacred compositions his musical ideas are sparse and thin. Whatever his own religious fervor may be, it does not convert the unbeliever. The expression of majesty is often bombastic; the expression of adoration and awe is often only maundering and mawkishness.

The program of the concerts next week will include Liszt's "Faust" symphony and Mendelssohn's violin concerto. A chorus from the Apollo Club and Mr. Paul Draper, tenor, will assist in the performance of the symphony. Dr. Muck will use a score with emendations and additions made by Liszt shortly before his death. These changes have not been published and the version will be used for the first time. Mr. Kreisler will play the concerto.

DAILY ADVERTISER.

DECEMBER 26

THE SYMPHONY THIS WEEK

APPROPRIATE CHRISTMAS PROGRAMME FINELY PLAYED

Volbach's Symphony Heard for the First Time in Boston—The "Freischutz" Overture.

PROGRAMME.

Cesar Franck—Chorale in A minor for organ alone.
Soloist, John P. Marshall.
Fritz Volbach—Symphony in B minor.
(First time in Boston.)
J. S. Bach—Shepherds' Music from the "Christmas Oratorio."
Liszt—March of the Three Holy Kings, from "Christus."
Weber—Overture to Der Freischutz.

Through our Symphony Orchestra we have so far this season kept quite closely [illegible] with the work of living com[illegible] ies (will this [illegible] please the conservatives?) have appeared on our programmes, equaling in number the names of the masters who have gone. Schoenberg, so far has been the only incomprehensible one, his means of expression being of such a personal nature that it proved an impediment to forming a clear mental image of the man and an appreciation of his intention. Such a phenomenon is common in art. It is not so long ago that people could not appreciate Monet because of the paint! His technique was so individual, that the brusque virility of the man and his great enthusiasm for the sunny, breezy aspects of nature (which he was practically the first to depict) was not understood; the artist was enshrouded in his technique. Today there are others awaiting their meed. They are labeled with fantastic names, but to many a Futurist "by any other name would smell as sweet"—or as foul, as you view it!

Dr. Muck generously presented the "music lovers," who deserted their holiday dinners, with a Christmas gift in the form of a "Symphony in B minor," by Fritz Volbach, a novelty, as Christmas presents must be now-a-days. Volbach, a modern living today in Tubingen, presents his thought and feeling in a form free from involution or singularity. He does not distort our musical vocabulary, but neither does he add to, or clarify, it. He is up to date and can talk in sounds of clanging brass as well as another, but his musical idiom is familiar and we understand the thought and feeling of the "Symphony," the man and what he reveals, as much as one may from the limited acquaintance of a first hearing.

The Symphony is large and vigorous in its conception and is, as a whole, free from pettiness or triviality. The composer is able to sustain a mood for a long period of time without tiring his hearers—a mark of power in itself. In his orchestration the choirs are well blended in a body of tone which, while not ultra-modern in its harmonies and ensemble, shows the modern use of brass with, at times, cutting effect, though without the snarls of "stopped" instruments. He uses the solo instruments with justness and discretion; as the English horn in the first movement, but the melody is not of rare or haunting quality here, nor throughout the work.

The opening of the "Presto" is vigorous and arresting in its strongly accented drum-beats, while the "Trio" had a novel touch of color in the embroidery of triangle and flutes, though the movement proved somewhat tiresome because of its too obviously symmetrical plan. The third movement—"Adagio"—the most satisfactory as a whole—is a long sustained mood of dignified, flowing melody Handelian in character: scholarly work and marked by feeling. The theme is interrupted twice by an episode for oboe against clarinet in counterpoint—not very arresting in melody or color. The final movement is too broken in continuity of line. It has effective movements, as in the introductory powerful crescendo for orchestra and organ leading to the "Hallelujah"; this unfortunately reminds us that Handel and Beethoven also wrote a "Hallelujah" somewhat better. If longer sustained, the last fortissimo repetition of the "hymn" and "Amen" would have made a more powerful ending.

This Symphony feels like "programme music," and it may picture, as someone has said, "man's suffering and redemption." If so it hardly seems dramatic and poignant enough for such a theme. It is a serious, earnest work but it will hardly be classed among the great symphonies.

The Christmas spirit of the concert was sounded in Franck's organ "Chorale"—written during the last year of the master's life—it is suffused with devotional feeling and austere musical beauty that is only surpassed by that other great master of the organ, Bach, with whom he had something in common. Both clung tenaciously to their ideals, and had the hardihood to see something more in music than the means of earning a livelihood; both were great organists, composers for the instrument and masters of counterpoint. Mr. Marshall with skilled hand and sympathetic mind gave a reading appreciative of the grave and subjective character of the "Chorale."

Bach is more human and less mystic than Franck, who could never have written the "Shepherds' Music from the Christmas Oratorio," for he lacked appreciation of that quaint and homely quality that so naively, yet so skilfully, colors and shapes the music. Bach was a tone poet—not one of the long-haired kind of the "shock your grandmother school" of today—but one who could spread an atmospheric tone over a composition that envelops it from start to finish. His use of the English horns (substituted for the obsolete oboi d'amore), the shepherds' pipe of the orchestra, here creates the pastoral atmosphere of rustic simplicity and devoutness of the shepherds "watching their flocks by night." Later composers have followed Bach's lead—Schumann in Manfred, Wagner in the first act of Tannhauser, Rossini in the William Tell Overture, Berlioz in the Symphonie Fantastique—in using the English horn as the shepherd's pipe. And how beautifully the strings and oboes of the orchestra did their part, interchanging and singing the never ceasing melody without undue stress, or striving for effect, which would mar the cantabile flow and primitive simplicity of the music.

The whole orchestra had its opportunity in Liszt's "March of the Three Kings"; a beautiful pageant planned with skill and imagination, opening with nocturnal suggestions and mystery in the pizzicati of the contrabasses, growing in richness and color as the march theme is taken up by the different instruments (what an effective piece of color when the bassoons have the theme!) until in the finale its orchestration becomes luscious and its feeling rhapsodical. "Der Freischutz," perennially fresh and brilliant, improves with acquaintance. Once more we heard with undiminished pleasure the mellow tones of the difficult horn quartette (played without a slip) singing the poetic "hymn." The contrabasses plucked the pizzicato "A" presaging evil—a masterly touch—the drum beats sounded their ominous portent; the trombones mocked the lovely figure of Agatha's song. These gems of tone, color and melody were fused by conductor and men into a whole breathing romance.

A master of the glint and glamour of this music is Dr. Muck, who knows, in his incisive way, how to flick out the florescent [illegible] the string accompaniment to the clarinet theme of [illegible]—an eerie touch—as well as to invest the melody with a poetry enhanced by his own ideas of tempo.

Dr. Muck has not always been praised for his programmes, though the growth of appreciation in this direction has been steady, if gradual, but all must acknowledge that this for Christmas was most skillfully put together. After the devout prayer of Franck we had the earnest exhortation of Volbach; the contemplative beauty of Bach, followed by the pageantry of Liszt; closing with the fireside romance of Weber—a fascinating tale of chivalry and the supernatural, the triumph of love and virtue: a fitting and happy ending to the concert and to Christmas 1914.

F. J. F.

BOSTON POST,

DECEMBER 26,

SYMPHONY PERFORMS NEW WORK

Volbach Given Hearing—Mr. Marshall the Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Should a new symphony be played at an orchestral concert on a holiday? How many will come to the concert? And what will the critics say? These are serious questions. Who will be the best judge of the new music, the snarling, unfed gentleman in Row F or the complacent fat man, the complacent individual—"that man who has just come in, my dear"—who rolls into his seat, listens in a state of happy torpor, and thinks well of the day, the dinner, the far-off music of which an echo now and then filters through his ears?

VERY MENDELLSOHNISH

Yesterday afternoon at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Fritz Volbach's Symphony in B minor was played for the first time in Boston. This symphony in four movements, traditional in form and substance, was performed for the first time in 1909. If one had been told instead, "1840" it would not have been any harder to believe. Weber's "Freischutz," overture, composed in 1820, was after all the most modern music on the programme, music that custom never stales. Volbach, an unknown figure in this country, born in the Rhine-land in 1861, might just as well have written his work in 1840 as 1909. It is positively Mendellsohnish.

Cursed With Fluency

The composer is cursed with fluency, and an awesome respect for the word "verboten." He is, academically speaking, a master of form. There is a scherzo which suggests Schumann. There is a finale after the manner of Liszt, the ceremonial blatting forth of a chorale theme, drums booming, alarms of trumpets! There she goes. This is stale romanticism of the 50's and before. Musical archaology with a vengeance!

The first movement of the symphony is the most valuable in its material, and concise in its working out. The scherzo is not disagreeable. But enormous cuts could be made in the slow movement and in the finale without detracting from their value. Volbach appears, in this score, to have written in what now appears to be the most advanced and reckless and experimental stage in the history of modern music, as though he were a Gotz or a Gade—we had almost said, a Sterndale Bennet—but leave the gentleman in peace. The organ came in loudly in the finale of the symphony, and everyone was pleased.

Mr. Marshall Soloist

Mr. Marshall, organist of the orchestra, opened the concert by playing as a solo the organ chorale in A-minor of Cesar Franck. He could hardly have chosen a more interesting piece of music (new to the great majority of Symphony patrons) or a composition more suited to the occasion. Mr. Marshall's performance appreciated the qualities of this beautiful and mystical music. He did not distort Franck's music, but in matters of registration as well as interpretation, placed himself entirely at the service of the composer. The brilliant opening measures were intoned with authority and fire, and there were a hundred delicate values in the passages of a gentler character, but there was no affectation, precocity, no endeavor to make surprising effects at the expense of a masterly composition for the organ. It was high time that Franck's music were better known to concert audiences than it is now. The organist and others, who interest themselves in producing such music deserve especial thanks.

Compositions still more suggestive of the day were the "Symphony" from Bach's "Christmas oratorio;" the "March of the Three Holy Kings" from Liszt's oratorio "Christus;" and Weber's Freischutz" overture. Liszt's music, for the greater part, is pictur-season." It is [illegible] up of Liszt's "Faust" symphony and Mendelssohn's violin concerto, with Fritz Kreisler as soloist. These will be Kreisler's only appearances with the orchestra in Boston this season. In the performance of the Liszt number the Apollo Club will assist, and Paul Draper will sing the tenor solo.

Dr. Muck has come into possession of a new version of the "Faust" symphony made by Liszt while the composer was visiting the Wagners. There are only two copies of this revised score, one in Bayreuth and the other in Boston. To a considerable extent, therefore, the symphony will take on the importance of a novelty coming from the pen of one of the foremost musicians of the nineteenth century.

BOSTON GLOBE—

DECEMBER 26,

CHRISTMAS CONCERT.

Volbach Symphony Work of Pleasing Conventionality.

Yuletide Music by Bach and Liszt—Mr Marshall Organ Soloist.

Dr Muck's choice of a symphony at the Christmas concert yesterday afternoon was that of an honest, melodious work, constructed according to well tried and reputable methods; music of no startling display of originality, yet able to afford pleasure to conventional ears, to those which have not forgotten that the tonal art was reared to lusty youth upon a diatonic scale.

Fritz Volbach, who is a German, avowed and unashamed, in this B-minor symphony, now played for the first time in Boston, permits a series of augmented triads to lift their heads in the woodwind in the last movement, cautiously, it may be ironically of even with contempt. He had written music to proceed a half hour and more without allusion to the scale whose intervals are beloved by the modern Frenchmen. It is said that Mr Weingartner's new overture, lately played in Vienna, disclosed the "Marseillaise" in a distorted, caricatured manner, to the great delight of the Viennese.

Volbach's symphony might have been written by any industrious, well-schooled student of orthodox German composition. His study of church music may account for his fondness for the chorale. There is little evidence of the gifts in perception, accent and color of the man who writes as by nature for the theatre. There is little sense of absorbing or tragic conflict, psychic or physical. There is a perfunctory display of pomp with organ and brasses upon a theme of flatulent praise; there is a tendency toward obvious development in sequence, and who shall say this is not flattering to the layman, who upon hearing one phrase answer to another says within himself that he expected it would be so. There is sentiment expressed in a homely, wholesome manner, frank and unashamed, and there is the suggestion, for the greater part, of the genial thought of a man who still could find pleasure in simple things and would gladly bring the same to others.

The first movement has good material, treated in a sane manner, simply, yet without dullness. The vein is well sustained. The ideas show elasticity in substance, and in disposition. The scherzo shows something of imagination. Greater variety, a more communicating lightness of touch would overtake and capture the charm which now is seen for fleeting moments, particularly in the melodic or rhythmic profile of a phrase. The slow movement begins well. There is a remote suggestion harmonically of Charpentier in "Louise," but it vanishes. This section is too long. The contrasting portion gains little from the melody for oboe against clarinet's counterpoint, although both were played admirably by Mr Longy and Mr Sand.

The last movement is not well balanced. The opening hymn is heavy and the entrance of the fugal section seems incongruous rather than the means of contrast. Invention does not fly with an even wing throughout. The first movements are preferable. It is not music to make the jaded sit up. It says only what some already have said, and what more have said less well.

John P. Marshall, the official organist of the orchestra, played Cesar Franck's chorale in A minor for organ alone and was received cordially by the audience. Bach's Shepherds' music from the Christmas oratorio, Liszt's march of the Three Holy Kings from "Christus" reflected the spirit of the day, particularly the tenderness, simplicity and devotion of the Bach, as Dr Muck played it. The Weber overture to "Der Freischuetz" furnished the program.

BOSTON HERALD.

DECEMBER 26,

NINTH PUBLIC SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Volbach Symphony, Played for First Time, Suited to Festival Occasion.

By PHILIP HALE.

The ninth Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon. Mr. John P. Marshall, organist of the orchestra, was the soloist. There were many vacant seats, for the [illegible] Christmas. The [illegible]

as follows:

Chorale in A minor, for organ alone.... Cesar Franck
Symphony in B minor, Op. 33......Volbach
Symphony (Shepherds' Music) from the Christmas Oratorio............J. S. Bach
March of the Three Holy Kings, from "Christus" ....Liszt
Overture to "Der Freischuetz".......Weber

Volbach's symphony was played here for the first time. He was known here as a composer by his "Raphael," mood pictures inspired by three of the painter's Madonnas. This "Raphael," performed at a Handel and Haydn concert in 1905, made little impression. Volbach, organist, conductor, is music director of the university at Tubingen. Before going to Tubingen he exercised his profession in Berlin and Mayence. He is a philosopher, or should be, for he studied philosophy at Heidelberg and Bonn, and the latter university gave him the degree of Dr. Phil. He has written biographies of musicians, books about music and analyses of compositions.

The Symphony in B minor was performed at a music festival of German musicians at Stuttgart in 1909. The music is eminently suited to a festival occasion. It has all the requisites for immediate popularity. It is tuneful in an obvious manner. The rhythms are not complete. The harmonic scheme does not irritate or shock the conservative. There is the suggestion of a waltz in the scherzo; there is a pretty solo for the oboe and there is solo work for the first violin; the triangle, the harp, and the organ are introduced. "My darling, what would'st thou have more?"

There is a show of energy in the first movement. The scherzo easily makes friends, and the most interesting instrumentation of the work is found in this movement. The Adagio is suavely melodious with conventional climaxes, with the tune for oboe, beautifully played yesterday by Mr. Longy, and in this movement is the one imaginative harmonic stroke. The introduction to the finale, in which the organ is brought into play, begins with the "Hallelujah" intoned by the brass. The chant grows into a hymn, and the chant furnishes thematic material for the finale, which, of course, ends with the hymn and a sonorous Amen, "played by the full strength of the company."

The symphony suited the holiday perhaps better than a more modern work would have done; modern, not in the matter of chronology, but in ideas. The music is fluent, at times plausibly imposing, of respectable workmanship. It is without true vitality.

Mr. Marshall showed sure technic and excellent taste in registration by his performance of Franck's Chorale, written in the year of the composer's death. It is one of three, which are to be ranked among his noblest works. They are in the great variation form, in which Franck followed Bach and the Beethoven of the latter years. These Chorales reveal the fervor, the spiritual ecstasy, the mysticism, also the human tenderness that characterize the music of this great and humble man.

Whenever we hear the Shepherd's music of Bach, we recall with pleasure the Pastoral in "The Messiah." The latter is so simple, so direct, so appealing. And what is to be said of Liszt's March of the Three Holy Kings Gaspar, Melchior and the black bearded Balthazar? The march theme in the Berliozian manner is fascinating until the reminder of favorite figures in Liszt's Rhapsodies almost persuades the hearer that the three kings all marched to Bethlehem from Hungary, and not from Nubia, Saba, and Tarsus. The pages that picture the apparition of the star and the presentation of the gifts to the Infant Jesus are not conspicuous as pictorial or emotional.

Some have called Liszt insincere in his "religious" music. The reproach is hardly justified. It would be fairer to say that in many of his professedly sacred compositions his musical ideas are sparse and thin. Whatever his own religious fervor may be, it does not convert the unbeliever. The expression of majesty is often bombastic; the expression of adoration and awe is often only maundering and mawkishness.

The program of the concerts next week will include Liszt's "Faust" symphony and Mendelssohn's violin concerto. A chorus from the Apollo Club and Mr. Paul Draper, tenor, will assist in the performance of the symphony. Dr. Muck will use a score with emendations and additions made by Liszt shortly before his death. These changes have not been published and the version will be used for the first time. Mr. Kreisler will play the concerto.

DAILY ADVERTISER.

DECEMBER 26

THE SYMPHONY THIS WEEK

APPROPRIATE CHRISTMAS PROGRAMME FINELY PLAYED

Volbach's Symphony Heard for the First Time in Boston—The "Freischutz" Overture.

PROGRAMME.

Cesar Franck—Chorale in A minor for organ alone.
Soloist, John P. Marshall.
Fritz Volbach—Symphony in B minor.
(First time in Boston.)
J. S. Bach—Shepherds' Music from the "Christmas Oratorio."
Liszt—March of the Three Holy Kings, from "Christus."
Weber—Overture to Der Freischutz.

Through our Symphony Orchestra we have so far this season kept quite closely [illegible] with the work of living compos[illegible]

les (will the unlucky number please the conservatives?) have appeared on our programmes, equaling in number the names of the masters who have gone. Schoenberg, so far has been the only incomprehensible one, his means of expression being of such a personal nature that it proved an impediment to forming a clear mental image of the man and an appreciation of his intention. Such a phenomenon is common in art. It is not so long ago that people could not appreciate Monet because of the paint! His technique was so individual, that the brusque virility of the man and his great enthusiasm for the sunny, breezy aspects of nature (which he was practically the first to depict) was not understood; the artist was enshrouded in his technique. Today there are others awaiting their meed. They are labeled with fantastic names, but to many a Futurist "by any other name would smell as sweet"—or as foul, as you view it!

Dr. Muck generously presented the "music lovers," who deserted their holiday dinners, with a Christmas gift in the form of a "Symphony in B minor," by Fritz Volbach, a novelty, as Christmas presents must be now-a-days. Volbach, a modern living today in Tubingen, presents his thought and feeling in a form free from involution or singularity. He does not distort our musical vocabulary, but neither does he add to, or clarify, it. He is up to date and can talk in sounds of clanging brass as well as another, but his musical idiom is familiar and we understand the thought and feeling of the "Symphony," the man and what he reveals, as much as one may from the limited acquaintance of a first hearing.

The Symphony is large and vigorous in its conception and is, as a whole, free from pettiness or triviality. The composer is able to sustain a mood for a long period of time without tiring his hearers—a mark of power in itself. In his orchestration the choirs are well blended in a body of tone which, while not ultra-modern in its harmonies and ensemble, shows the modern use of brass with, at times, cutting effect, though without the snarls of "stopped" instruments. He uses the solo instruments with justness and discretion; as the English horn in the first movement, but the melody is not of rare or haunting quality here, nor throughout the work.

The opening of the "Presto" is vigorous and arresting in its strongly accented drum-beats, while the "Trio" had a novel touch of color in the embroidery of triangle and flutes, though the movement proved somewhat tiresome because of its too obviously symmetrical plan. The third movement—"Adagio"—the most satisfactory as a whole—is a long sustained mood of dignified, flowing melody Handelian in character: scholarly work and marked by feeling. The theme is interrupted twice by an episode for oboe against clarinet in counterpoint—not very arresting in melody or color. The final movement is too broken in continuity of line. It has effective movements, as in the introductory powerful crescendo for orchestra and organ leading to the "Hallelujah"; this unfortunately reminds us that Handel and Beethoven also wrote a "Hallelujah" somewhat better. If longer sustained, the last fortissimo repetition of the "hymn" and "Amen" would have made a more powerful ending.

This Symphony feels like "programme music," and it may picture, as someone has said, "man's suffering and redemption." If so it hardly seems dramatic and poignant enough for such a theme. It is a serious, earnest work but it will hardly be classed among the great symphonies.

The Christmas spirit of the concert was sounded in Franck's organ "Chorale"—written during the last year of the master's life—it is suffused with devotional feeling and austere musical beauty that is only surpassed by that other great master of the organ, Bach, with whom he had something in common. Both clung tenaciously to their ideals, and had the hardihood to see something more in music than the means of earning a livelihood; both were great organists, composers for the instrument and masters of counterpoint. Mr. Marshall with skilled hand and sympathetic mind gave a reading appreciative of the grave and subjective character of the "Chorale."

Bach is more human and less mystic than Franck, who could never have written the "Shepherds' Music from the Christmas Oratorio," for he lacked appreciation of that quaint and homely quality that so naively, yet so skilfully, colors and shapes the music. Bach was a tone poet—not one of the long-haired kind of the "shock your grandmother school" of today—but one who could spread an atmospheric tone over a composition that envelops it from start to finish. His use of the English horns (substituted for the obsolete oboi d'amore), the shepherds' pipe of the orchestra, here creates the pastoral atmosphere of rustic simplicity and devoutness of the shepherds "watching their flocks by night." Later composers have followed Bach's lead—Schumann in Manfred, Wagner in the first act of Tannhauser, Rossini in the William Tell Overture, Berlioz in the Symphonie Fantastique—in using the English horn as the shepherd's pipe. And how beautifully the strings and oboes of the orchestra did their part, interchanging and singing the never ceasing melody without undue stress, or striving for effect, which would mar the cantabile flow and primitive simplicity of the music.

The whole orchestra had its opportunity in Liszt's "March of the Three Kings"; a beautiful pageant planned with skill and imagination, opening with nocturnal suggestions and mystery in the pizzicati of the contrabasses, growing in richness and color as the march theme is taken up by the different instruments (what an effective piece of color when the bassoons have the theme!) until in the finale its orchestration becomes luscious and its feeling rhapsodical. "Der Freischutz," perennially fresh and brilliant, improves with acquaintance. Once more we heard with undiminished pleasure the mellow tones of the difficult horn quartette (played without a slip) singing the poetic "hymn." The contrabasses plucked the pizzicato "A" presaging evil—a masterly touch—the drum beats sounded their ominous portent; the trombones mocked the lovely figure of Agatha's song. These gems of tone, color and melody were fused by conductor and men into a whole breathing romance.

A master of the glint and glamour of this music is Dr. Muck, who knows, in his incisive way, how to flick out the florescent [illegible] the string accompaniment to the clarinet theme of Max—an eerie touch—as well as to invest the melody with a poetry enhanced by his own ideas of tempo.

Dr. Muck has not always been praised for his programmes, though the growth of appreciation in this direction has been steady, if gradual, but all must acknowledge that this for Christmas was most skillfully put together. After the devout prayer of Franck we had the earnest exhortation of Volbach; the contemplative beauty of Bach, followed by the pageantry of Liszt; closing with the fireside romance of Weber—a fascinating tale of chivalry and the supernatural, the triumph of love and virtue: a fitting and happy ending to the concert and to Christmas 1914.

F. J. F.

BOSTON POST,

DECEMBER 26,

SYMPHONY PERFORMS NEW WORK

Volbach Given Hearing—Mr. Marshall the Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Should a new symphony be played at an orchestral concert on a holiday? How many will come to the concert? And what will the critics say? These are serious questions Who will be the best judge of the new music, the snarling, unfed gentleman in Row F or the complacent fat man, the complacent individual—"that man who has just come in, my dear"—who rolls into his seat, listens in a state of happy torpor, and thinks well of the day, the dinner, the far-off music of which an echo now and then filters through his ears?

VERY MENDELLSOHNISH

Yesterday afternoon at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Fritz Volbach's Symphony in B minor was played for the first time in Boston. This symphony in four movements, traditional in form and substance, was performed for the first time in 1909. If one had been told instead, "1840" it would not have been any harder to believe. Weber's "Freischutz," overture, composed in 1820, was after all the most modern music on the programme, music that custom never stales. Volbach, an unknown figure in this country, born in the Rhine-land in 1861, might just as well have written his work in 1840 as 1909. It is positively Mendellsohnish.

Cursed With Fluency

The composer is cursed with fluency, and an awesome respect for the word "verboten." He is, academically speaking, a master of form. There is a scherzo which suggests Schumann. There is a finale after the manner of Liszt, the ceremonial blatting forth of a chorale theme, drums booming, alarms of trumpets! There she goes. This is stale romanticism of the 50's and before. Musical archaology with a vengeance!

The first movement of the symphony is the most valuable in its material, and concise in its working out. The scherzo is not disagreeable. But enormous cuts could be made in the slow movement and in the finale without detracting from their value. Volbach appears, in this score, to have written in what now appears to be the most advanced and reckless and experimental stage in the history of modern music, as though he were a Gotz or a Gade—we had almost said, a Sterndale Bennet—but leave the gentleman in peace. The organ came in loudly in the finale of the symphony, and everyone was pleased.

Mr. Marshall Soloist

Mr. Marshall, organist of the orchestra, opened the concert by playing as a solo the organ chorale in A-minor of Cesar Franck. He could hardly have chosen a more interesting piece of music (new to the great majority of Symphony patrons) or a composition more suited to the occasion. Mr. Marshall's performance appreciated the qualities of this beautiful and mystical music. He did not distort Franck's music, but in matters of registration as well as interpretation, placed himself entirely at the service of the composer. The brilliant opening measures were intoned with authority and fire, and there were a hundred delicate values in the passages of a gentler character, but there was no affectation, precocity, no endeavor to make surprising effects at the expense of a masterly composition for the organ. It was high time that Franck's music were better known to concert audiences than it is now. The organist and others, who interest themselves in producing such music deserve especial thanks.

Compositions still more suggestive of the day were the "Symphony" from Bach's "Christmas oratoria;" the "March of the Three Holy Kings" from Liszt's oratorio "Christus;" and Weber's Freischutz" overture. Liszt's music, for the greater part, is pictur[illegible]

TRANSCRIPT.
DECEMBER 26.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A PROGRAMME OF COMPLEMENTS AND CONTRASTS

Bach, Liszt and Music of the Nativity—Franck Beside Bach and Weber Beside Liszt in Succeeding Pieces—Incidentally a New Symphony by Volbach of Mainz and Tubingen—Indeed, an Ordinary New Symphony

PIECES suggested by legends of the Nativity that Dr. Muck would hardly have included in a Symphony Concert, had it not fallen on Christmas, were the most interesting music of yesterday afternoon—the introduction to the second part of Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" which the programme announced as "The Shepherds' Music" and which is oftener called the Pastorale; and the fragment of Liszt's oratorio, "Christus" which pictures the journey of the Magi to Bethlehem and their adoration of the child Jesus. Side by side in the course of the concert they made vivid contrast to each other. Technically and formally, Bach's "Pastorale" is the development of a single melody of the rhythm of a grave old dance, the Sicilienne. It was written 180 years ago and in the day's work of the composer for his church in Leipzig. Yet it is as atmospheric and illusory as though it had been composed the day before yesterday with thought of vivid tone-picturing in many concert-rooms with expert and imaginative orchestras and conductors for the canvas. The melody is plaintive and wistful; the course through which Bach leads, varies and amplifies it is simple and serene. Music could hardly seem more economically and more innocently fashioned —or more instantly, steadily and illusively fulfill its delineative purpose. That, too, is simple and innocent as imaginative music-making went in those days with legends of the Nativity—the night still and cold and star-lit—such nights as in this December overhang the Saxon plains—and the shepherds piping a simple melody of the folk—such a melody as the people may have sung only yesterday in the old churches of Leipzig—piping it, as the shrewd Bach wisely willed a little rudely and stiffly; but piping it also as the imaginative and the feeling Bach ordained, with an instant note of expectation. The great sweep of star-lit sky and shadowed plain; the solitary song of the herdsmen; the quiver of miraculous expectation in earth and air and in the shepherds' hearts are all in the music. The recording verses of Matthew or of Luke are not more simple, brief and graphic.

Liszt, when he wrote his music for the tale of the three Holy Kings, was otherwise minded. He had seen the pictures that the painters of Italy and of Flanders and of the Rhenish Provinces liked to make, in the opulent days of the Renaissance, of the Magi on their way to Bethlehem, halted before the inn or laying their treasure at the feet of their little lord. There they are in twenty pictures in the rich vestments of Italian or Flemish seigneurs in an ornate time; serving-men and pages, almost as richly clad, attend them; their caparisoned horses are loaded with their treasure, or lifting it from bale or chest or jewelled casket they lay it beside the manger. Sumptuously and magnificently did the Three Kings, in the pictorial imagination of the Renaissance, do their homage to Jesus and Mary. What else could they be but such rich and resplendent seigneurs as those for whom the painters worked? And sometimes, their pageant-train moved across a landscape that was much more like Umbrian hills and valleys or Rhenish cliff and Flemish lowland than it was like any known or imagined Palestine. But, almost always, above shone the star that guided them and it was more gloriously radiant than any other planet in the breadth of the heavens.

Splendors touched Liszt's imagination and Liszt's tones when that imagination kindled into music; he had romantic vision; he warmed to the opulent, the ornate, the magnificent. His three kings on their way to Bethlehem and at the manger were bound to be figures of romantic and sumptuous fashioning; but, being wrought into music when the abbé Liszt chose to believe himself a very devout man and the most Catholic of composers, they must be glamored with ecstatic melodies. The apparition of the star might invoke one; the adoration could surely summon another. As in Bach's music of the shepherds, there is no hint of place in Liszt's music of the kings. Out of the shadowy distance rises their march, grave, quiet, yet withal a little ecstatic and a little exotic. The train draws near and the music is richer in color, larger and warmer of voice, and firmer of rhythm. The star shines out of the sky in sustained and ardent orchestral song; and Liszt sounds full and clear his ecstatic note. There are modulations as of the glad expectancy and confusion of the end of the journey. The orchestra sings the grave, rich melody of the adoration and the Lisztian ecstasy expands it. The three kings depart but the star still shines over them as in the renewed march, triumphant now, they go their way.

Bach visioned his shepherds as the simplest folk of Leipzig fay have visioned them; and wrote his music full of the feeling, as direct and simple, that the sight of the vision stirred in his seeing heart. There is not a trapping or a seeming calculation in the pastorale; one man's eyes and heart, it bears his vision to the eyes and hearts of other men that they may be likewise moved. Liszt, in turn, saw his Magi as sumptuous figures of churchly legend, moving across the theatre of his imagination, while his music evoked pious ecstasies in the assembled audience. Bach's music is the ovice of simple human vision and simple human emotion. Liszt's comes out of the romantic world, wherein and with all sincerity, he added the legends of the church to those of Tesso, Mazeppa and Orpheus.

Franck's Chorale in A minor, for organ alone which began the concert and which Mr. Marshall played to the admiration of those who knew the exactions of the music and the instrument, seemed in retrospect the compliment of Bach's "Shepherds' Music"; and Beber's overture to "Der Freischütz," which ended the concert and in which the horns outdid themselves in the beauty of their sustained soft and shadowy tone, the supplement to Liszt's tonal legend of the Holy Kings. Franck, like Bach, has wrought his music out of a single melody, conducted it from period to period in variation after variation that seem but its natural upspringing, returned upon it and finally concentrated it; yet out of it exhales as directly and innocently, if not so simply, as from Bach's music, the visions of an enkindled spirit, before mysteries and dongings that to it are holy. It is Bach and Franck, a century apart, that have written the music of the Christian faith as it abides in the spirits of men; and neither had need to turn abbé ad cultivate pious practices to be stirred to the writing. . . . And Webber's overture is the romanticism flamboyant and thrilling that was romanticism subdued and touching in the music of the Maji. The philosophers of æsthetics say that the essence of romanticism is its strangeness and its ardor. And still after thousands of repetitions through a whole century, the overture to "Der Freischütz" begins in mystery and ends in passion and from the first measures to the last warms ear and fancy and emotion into its ardors and its picturings. Once and again, the orthodox necessities that Weber did not quite dare abjure state a momentary passage. It barely comes before it is gone in the beauty of tone, the impassioned song, t romantic eloquence with which Dr. Mu and the orchestra invest the music.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
DECEMBER 26,

PROGRAM MADE FOR SYMPHONY IS SEASONABLE

John P. Marshall, Soloist, Playing Franck's Chorale—Volbach Symphony Heard First Time Here

SYMPHONY HALL—Ninth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Kark Muck, conductor, afternoon of Dec. 25. The program: Casar Franck, chorale in A minor for organ alone (John P. Marshall, organist); Fritz Volbach, symphony in B minor op. 33 (first time in Boston); J. S. Bach, shepherds' music from the "Christmas" oratorio; Liszt, march of the Kings from the oratorio, "Christus"; Weber, overture to "Freischuetz."

There are days when orchestral heroes doze in their tents. They stay out of the conflict, not because they are sulky, but because they see no prize of honor worth fighting for. There is only a small and casual crowd on the plains. There are no Trojan elders on the walls. No opportunity for a champion who is looking for high acclaim shows itself.

Such a day was that of the ninth Symphony rehearsal. The leaders whom the camp usually expects to bring in the rewards of victory brought in nothing. They were not visible among those returning from the contest. Nor were they so much as standing in the door of their tents watching what came home.

Everybody knows the holiday situation at the Symphony concerts, how subscribers make a gift of their tickets to friends, how the program is made as seasonable and as pretty as possible, and how applause is more of the heart than the head. The renowned solo members of the orchestra have a smaller hope, apparently, of winning praise at the Christmas rehearsal than at any other in the whole year. If the first flute player and the first oboe player, two artists regularly counted on to give the performances distinction and style, were to choose a day to let things slide that would be the time.

And so it happened on Friday afternoon. These heroes did not even keep one eye on the field. They napped. And while they did so, a hitherto unacclaimed champion took advantage of the occasion and won all the solo honors. The first clarinet player, who hitherto has kept back and made no boasts, came forward in the Volbach symphony and distinguished himself.

The new symphony itself is not of importance as epoch marking music. It is simply a charming composition in the strict form of the old classics. It hardly affects to be modern in any way. It was an opportunity for those who are used to the praise of doing hard things to neglect. It was an opportunity for an artist who values the quality of charm in music to improve. And Mr. Sand in his solo passages in the ingratiating second movement improved it to the utmost. He played his part in the duet with the oboe with a beauty of tone and delicacy of phrasing which is altogether new in Symphony concert performances. Dr. Muck's appointment of this player to the important post he holds was justified on Friday. The clarinet playing indicated an ideal of wood-wind artistry which is of a deeper appeal and of a more refined expressiveness than the orchestra has known. It is to be hoped not that the clarinetist will reform his style to agree with that of his associates, in the wood-wind choir, but that they will reform theirs to agree with his. For of late a certain roughness of statement and coarseness of tone has been the rule in the work of this section.

On the whole the orchestra kept up to its standards. Dr. Muck read all his numbers with a clear purpose to make each composition have its value in its epoch. He honored his holiday audience with his best efforts. He knew that at such a time there is somebody present who is getting an estimate of the Symphony orchestra to take to some distant place and to make it the authentic opinion there. He seemed to take pleasure in presenting the honestly happy and simple music of the new symphony writer. He seemed glad to get hold of a composition of the day in which fresh sentiment and twentieth century outlook are expressed through Beethoven's four-movement symphonic form.

The organ with Mr. Marshall playing was effectively brought into the day's work, both in the solo number and in the final movement of the Volbach piece.

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date DEC 7 - 1914

Dr. Karl Muck, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, again, by his programme, pleased and displeased—in what proportion who shall say?—his fashionable, and intelligent and sold-out house of music lovers. The Ropartz fourth symphony in C major may not be inspired, but it contains no offensive digressions from classic forms, it invites thought and it has a majority of pleasing moments, that justify Dr. Muck in presenting it. Richard Strauss's symphonic fantasia, "From Italy," opus 16 (too long drawn out, perhaps), has charm of no mean significance, and is well worth hearing. At the end, there was balm for the most discontented in Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont." As to the playing of this best of orchestras, as one of the directors of the Metropolitan Opera Company remarked to me after the performance: "That surely is some orchestra."

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
1914
Date

TIMELY MUSICAL COM

THEY have been celebrating in Boston with great enthusiasm the 80th birthday of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and "The History of the Orchestra," by M. A. De Wolfe Howe, just brought out by the Houghton-Mifflin Company, has a photogravure of Boston's musical Maecenas for its frontispiece. It is from the bust of Bela L. Pratt, placed in Symphony Hall in 1

The orchestra, Mr. Howe tells us, formed in 1881. The growth in num has been from 72 to 100 players. Ge Henschel was the first conductor. first program under his baton presen Annie Louise Cary as soloist. She sa an air from Gluck's "Orpheus" and other from Max Bruch's "Odysseus." the program was the Rosamunde balle music of Schubert, which the Philade phia Orchestra recently played so wel and the symphony was by Haydn, in flat, No. 13 in the Breitkopf edition. I the first season Henschel was the targe of merciless criticism—he was assaile for playing Brahms, for playing fas for playing slow, and, indeed, for playing at all. In the second season a beautifully selected Wagner program commemorated the death of the master, which occurred February 13, 1883. The music was played four days later. Two of the items on the program were those of Mr. Stokowski's recent Wagner program —namely, the Siegfried Idyl and the prelude of "Parsifal." One sympathetic reviewer, whose critique was typical, wrote: "The whole concert was an elegiac nightmare. We doubt if ever Music Hall echoed to a longer stretch of cacophonous dreariness within the same length of time." Another critic said that Brahms was an "idiot."

Despite the excellence of programs, leadership and playing the orchestra has lost, we are told, $900,000—the high-water mark was reached in a deficit of $52,000.

Mr. Gericke was the second leader, and to the lasting honor of Philadelphia is his remark about the first out-of-town tour, that "the orchestra earned there its first real success." Again he speaks of "the first great success in Philadelphia." The dates of the successive conductors are: Henschel, 1881-1884; Gericke, 1884-1889; Nickisch, 1889-1893; Paur, 1893-1898; Gericke again, 1898-1906; Muck, 1906-1908; Fiedler, 1908-1912; Muck again, the present leader.

At the first Philadelphia concert of Nikisch's final season, Mr. Howe tells us, "the audience numbered 3000, of whom 700 were obliged to stand." At home, the increasing patronage outgrew the dimensions of Music Hall, and by a popular subscription of $400,000 the new Symphony Hall on the Fenway was opened October 15, 1900. Owen Wister wrot an ode for the occasion, from which th author quotes at length as expressive of "the unworded feeling" of many.

Among the Philadelphians named in the list of soloists with this great band we find David Bispham, Geraldine Farrar, Florence Hinkle, Olga Samaroff (Mrs. Stokowski), who has appeared 26 times; Abbie Whinnery, now a successful teacher here; Evan Williams (on five occa

---

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
DEC 7 - 1914
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon the second matinée performance this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given. The programme contained the infrequently played "Aus Italien" of Richard Strauss, the new symphony of Ropartz, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. The Strauss work is an early one, dating back to 1886. The composer himself says it is a transition work, between the old and new styles. It is an effective work, nevertheless, not so involved, either in content or technique, as his later works. It shows the power of pictorial inventiveness, and a certain gift of melody, like some of his songs. That the composer did not cultivate this side of his talent is his misfortune—and ours as well. There are charming moments in this symphonic fantasia—"From Italy"—and it has much more musical interest than some of his later works that are heard more frequently. The "Ropartz" symphony did not, as erroneously stated in the programme, have its first performance in New York. It is, as the first performance of the Philharmonic indicated, rather a long drawn out symphonic poem than a symphony. But the composer has given us no "programme." Nevertheless, it seems to be hardly "solid" enough for a symphony. There are beautiful themes and melodies therein, however, and needless to say, Dr. Muck and his men made the most of them. Dr. Muck differs radically from Mr. Stransky in his ideas of tempo, it may be said in passing. For example, the composer has marked the first movement "Allegro moderato." Dr. Muck emphasizes the allegro, Mr. Stransky the moderato. The latter seems to be the more logical, besides being more in keeping with the spirit of the music. The "Allegretto" in the middle of the second section was also played by Dr. Muck at a faster pace than Mr. Stransky took it. There is no question of technical perfection of the playing of the orchestra in either case; both performances seemed as near perfection as a human instrument is capable. The "Egmont" overture seemed too slow; this may be entirely a matter of taste, however. But it seems hardly fast enough for an "allegro," as Dr. Muck took it. The programme as a whole—or taken singly—was far and away more interesting than the programme of Thursday night.

TRANSCRIPT.
DECEMBER 26.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A PROGRAMME OF COMPLEMENTS AND CONTRASTS

Bach, Liszt and Music of the Nativity—Franck Beside Bach and Weber Beside Liszt in Succeeding Pieces—Incidentally a New Symphony by Volbach of Mainz and Tubingen—Indeed, an Ordinary New Symphony

PIECES suggested by legends of the Nativity that Dr. Muck would hardly have included in a Symphony Concert, had it not fallen on Christmas, were the most interesting music of yesterday afternoon—the introduction to the second part of Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" which the programme announced as "The Shepherds' Music" and which is oftener called the Pastorale; and the fragment of Liszt's oratorio, "Christus" which pictures the journey of the Magi to Bethlehem and their adoration of the child Jesus. Side by side in the course of the concert they made vivid contrast to each other. Technically and formally, Bach's "Pastorale" is the development of a single melody of the rhythm of a grave old dance, the Sicilienne. It was written 180 years ago and in the day's work of the composer for his church in Leipzig. Yet it is as atmospheric and illusory as though it had been composed the day before yesterday with thought of vivid tone-picturing in many concert-rooms with expert and imaginative orchestras and conductors for the canvas. The melody is plaintive and wistful; the course through whch Bach leads, varies and amplifies it is simple and serene. Music could hardly seem more economically and more innocently fashioned—or more instantly, steadily and illusively fulfill its delineative purpose. That, too, is simple and innocent as imaginative music-making went in those days with legends of the Nativity—the night still and cold and star-lit—such nights as in this December overhang the Saxon plains—and the shepherds piping a simple melody of the folk—such a melody as the people may have sung only yesterday in the old churches of Leipzig—piping it, as the shrewd Bach wisely willed a little rudely and stiffly; but piping it also as the imaginative and the feeling Bach ordained, with an instant note of expectation. The great sweep of star-lit sky and shadowed plain; the solitary song of the herdsmen; the quiver of miraculous expectation in earth and air and in the shepherds' hearts are all in the music. The recording verses of Matthew or of Luke are not more simple, brief and graphic.

Liszt, when he wrote his music for the tale of the three Holy Kings, was otherwise minded. He had seen the pictures that the painters of Italy and of Flanders and of the Rhenish Provinces liked to make, in the opulent days of the Renaissance, of the Magi on their way to Bethlehem, halted before the inn or laying their treasure at the feet of their little lord. There they are in twenty pictures in the rich vestments of Italian or Flemish seigneurs in an ornate time; serving-men and pages, almost as richly clad, attend them; their caparisoned horses are loaded with their treasure, or lifting it from bale or chest or jewelled casket they lay it beside the manger. Sumptuously and magnificently did the Three Kings, in the pictorial imagination of the Renaissance, do their homage to Jesus and Mary. What else could they be but such rich and resplendent seigneurs as those for whom the painters worked? And sometimes, their pageant-train moved across a landscape that was much more like Umbrian hills and valleys or Rhenish cliff and Flemish lowland than it was like any known or imagined Palestine. But, almost always, above shone the star that guided them and it was more gloriously radiant than any other planet in the breadth of the heavens.

Splendors touched Liszt's imagination and Liszt's tones when that imagination kindled into music; he had romantic vision; he warmed to the opulent, the ornate, the magnificent. His three kings on their way to Bethlehem and at the manger were bound to be figures of romantic and sumptuous fashioning; but, being wrought into music when the abbé Liszt chose to believe himself a very devout man and the most Catholic of composers, they must be glamored with ecstatic melodies. The apparition of the star might invoke one; the adoration could surely summon another. As in Bach's music of the shepherds, there is no hint of place in Liszt's music of the kings. Out of the shadowy distance rises their march, grave, quiet, yet withal a little ecstatic and a little exotic. The train draws near and the music is richer in color, larger and warmer of voice, and firmer of rhythm. The star shines out of the sky in sustained and ardent orchestral song; and Liszt sounds full and clear his ecstatic note. There are modulations as of the glad expectancy and confusion of the end of the journey. The orchestra sings the grave, rich melody of the adoration and the Lisztian ecstasy expands it. The three kings depart but the star still shines over them as in the renewed march, triumphant now, they go their way.

Bach visioned his shepherds as the simplest folk of Leipzig fay have visioned them; and wrote his music full of the feeling, as direct and simple, that the sight of the vision stirred in his seeing heart. There is not a trapping or a seeming calculation in the pastorale; one man's eyes and heart, it bears his vision to the eyes and hearts of other men that they may be likewise moved. Liszt, in turn, saw his Magi as sumptuous figures of churchly legend, moving across the theatre of his imagination, while his music evoked pious ecstasies in the assembled audience. Bach's music is the ovice of simple human vision and simple human emotion. Liszt's comes out of the romantic world, wherein and with all sincerity, he added the legends of the church to those of Tesso, Mazeppa and Orpheus.

Franck's Chorale in A minor, for organ alone which began the concert and which Mr. Marshall played to the admiration of those who knew the exactions of the music and the instrument, seemed in retrospect the compliment of Bach's "Shepherds' Music"; and Beber's overture to "Der Freischütz," which ended the concert and in which the horns outdid themselves in the beauty of their sustained soft and shadowy tone, the supplement to Liszt's tonal legend of the Holy Kings. Franck, like Bach, has wrought his music out of a single melody, conducted it from period to period in variation after variation that seem but its natural upspringing, returned upon it and finally concentrated it; yet out of it exhales as directly and innocently, if not so simply, as from Bach's music, the visions of an enkindled spirit, before mysteries and dongings that to it are holy. It is Bach and Franck, a century apart, that have written the music of the Christian faith as it abides in the spirits of men; and neither had need to turn abbé ad cultivate pious practices to be stirred to the writing. . . . And Webber's overture is the romanticism flamboyant and thrilling that was romanticism subdued and touching in the music of the Maji. The philosophers of æsthetics say that the essence of romanticism is its strangeness and its ardor. And still after thousands of repetitions through a whole century, the overture to "Der Freischütz" begins in mystery and ends in passion and from the first measures to the last warms ear and fancy and emotion into its ardors and its picturings. Once and again, the orthodox necessities that Weber did not quite dare abjure state a momentary passage. It barely comes before it is gone in the beauty of tone, the impassioned song, th romantic eloquence with which Dr. Muc and the orchestra invest the music.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
DECEMBER 26.

PROGRAM MADE FOR SYMPHONY IS SEASONABLE

John P. Marshall, Soloist, Playing Franck's Chorale—Volbach Symphony Heard First Time Here

SYMPHONY HALL—Ninth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Kark Muck, conductor, afternoon of Dec. 25. The program: Casar Franck, chorale in A minor for organ alone (John P. Marshall, organist); Fritz Volbach, symphony in B minor op. 33 (first time in Boston); J. S. Bach, shepherds' music from the "Christmas" oratorio; Liszt, march of the Kings from the oratorio, "Christus"; Weber, overture to "Freischuetz."

There are days when orchestral heroes doze in their tents. They stay out of the conflict, not because they are sulky, but because they see no prize of honor worth fighting for. There is only a small and casual crowd on the plains. There are no Trojan elders on the walls. No opportunity for a champion who is looking for high acclaim shows itself.

Such a day was that of the ninth Symphony rehearsal. The leaders whom the camp usually expects to bring in the rewards of victory brought in nothing. They were not visible among those returning from the contest. Nor were they so much as standing in the door of their tents watching what came home.

Everybody knows the holiday situation at the Symphony concerts, how subscribers make a gift of their tickets to friends, how the program is made as seasonable and as pretty as possible, and how applause is more of the heart than the head. The renowned solo members of the orchestra have a smaller hope, apparently, of winning praise at the Christmas rehearsal than at any other in the whole year. If the first flute player and the first oboe player, two artists regularly counted on to give the performances distinction and style, were to choose a day to let things slide that would be the time.

And so it happened on Friday afternoon. These heroes did not even keep one eye on the field. They napped. And while they did so, a hitherto unacclaimed champion took advantage of the occasion and won all the solo honors. The first clarinet player, who hitherto has kept back and made no boasts, came forward in the Volbach symphony and distinguished himself.

The new symphony itself is not of importance as epoch marking music. It is simply a charming composition in the strict form of the old classics. It hardly affects to be modern in any way. It was an opportunity for those who are used to the praise of doing hard things to neglect. It was an opportunity for an artist who values the quality of charm in music to improve. And Mr. Sand in his solo passages in the ingratiating second movement improved it to the utmost. He played his part in the duet with the oboe with a beauty of tone and delicacy of phrasing which is altogether new in Symphony concert performances. Dr. Muck's appointment of this player to the important post he holds was justified on Friday. The clarinet playing indicated an ideal of woodwind artistry which is of a deeper appeal and of a more refined expressiveness than the orchestra has known. It is to be hoped not that the clarinetist will reform his style to agree with that of his associates in the wood-wind choir, but that they will reform theirs to agree with his. For of late a certain roughness of statement and coarseness of tone has been the rule in the work of this section.

On the whole the orchestra kept up to its standards. Dr. Muck read all his numbers with a clear purpose to make each composition have its value in its epoch. He honored his holiday audience with his best efforts. He knew that at such a time there is somebody present who is getting an estimate of the Symphony orchestra to take to some distant place and to make it the authentic opinion there. He seemed to take pleasure in presenting the honestly happy and simple music of the new symphony writer. He seemed glad to get hold of a composition of the day in which fresh sentiment and twentieth century outlook are expressed through Beethoven's four-movement symphonic form.

The organ with Mr. Marshall playing was effectively brought into the day's work, both in the solo number and in the final movement of the Volbach piece.

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date DEC 7 - 1914

Dr. Karl Muck, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, again, by his programme, pleased and displeased—in what proportion who shall say?—his fashionable, and intelligent and sold-out house of music lovers. The Ropartz fourth symphony in C major may not be inspired, but it contains no offensive digressions from classic forms, it invites thought and it has a majority of pleasing moments, that justify Dr. Muck in presenting it. Richard Strauss's symphonic fantasia, "From Italy," opus 16 (too long drawn out, perhaps), has charm of no mean significance, and is well worth hearing. At the end, there was balm for the most discontented in Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont." As to the playing of this best of orchestras, as one of the directors of the Metropolitan Opera Company remarked to me after the performance: "That surely is some orchestra."

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

TIMELY MUSICAL COM

THEY have been celebrating in Boston with great enthusiasm the 80th birthday of Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and "The History of the Orchestra," by M. A. De Wolfe Howe, just brought out by the Houghton-Mifflin Company, has a photogravure of Boston's musical Maecenas for its frontispiece. It is from the bust of Bela L. Pratt, placed in Symphony Hall in 1911.

The orchestra, Mr. Howe tells us, was formed in 1881. The growth in numbers has been from 72 to 100 players. Georg Henschel was the first conductor. The first program under his baton presented Annie Louise Cary as soloist. She sang an air from Gluck's "Orpheus" and another from Max Bruch's "Odysseus." On the program was the Rosamunde ballet-music of Schubert, which the Philadelphia Orchestra recently played so well, and the symphony was by Haydn, in B flat, No. 12 in the Breitkopf edition. In the first season Henschel was the target of merciless criticism—he was assailed for playing Brahms, for playing fast, for playing slow, and, indeed, for playing at all. In the second season a beautifully selected Wagner program commemorated the death of the master, which occurred February 13, 1883. The music was played four days later. Two of the items on the program were those of Mr. Stokowski's recent Wagner program—namely, the Siegfried Idyl and the prelude of "Parsifal." One sympathetic reviewer, whose critique was typical, wrote: "The whole concert was an elegiac nightmare. We doubt if ever Music Hall echoed to a longer stretch of cacophonous dreariness within the same length of time." Another critic said that Brahms was an "idiot."

Despite the excellence of programs, leadership and playing the orchestra has lost, we are told, $900,000—the high-water mark was reached in a deficit of $52,000.

Mr. Gericke was the second leader, and to the lasting honor of Philadelphia is his remark about the first out-of-town tour, that "the orchestra earned there its first real success." Again he speaks of "the first great success in Philadelphia." The dates of the successive conductors are: Henschel, 1881-1884; Gericke, 1884-1889; Nickisch, 1889-1893; Paur, 1893-1896; Gericke again, 1898-1906; Muck, 1906-1908; Fiedler, 1908-1912; Muck again, the present leader.

At the first Philadelphia concert of Nikisch's final season, Mr. Howe tells us, "the audience numbered 3000, of whom 700 were obliged to stand." At home, the increasing patronage outgrew the dimensions of Music Hall, and by a popular subscription of $400,000 the new Symphony Hall on the Fenway was opened October 15, 1900. Owen Wister wrot an ode for the occasion, from which th author quotes at length as expressive o "the unworded feeling" of many.

Among the Philadelphians named in the list of soloists with this great band we find David Bispham, Geraldine Farrar, Florence Hinkle, Olga Samaroff (Mrs. Stokowski), who has appeared 26 times; Abbie Whinnery, now a successful teacher here; Evan Williams (on five

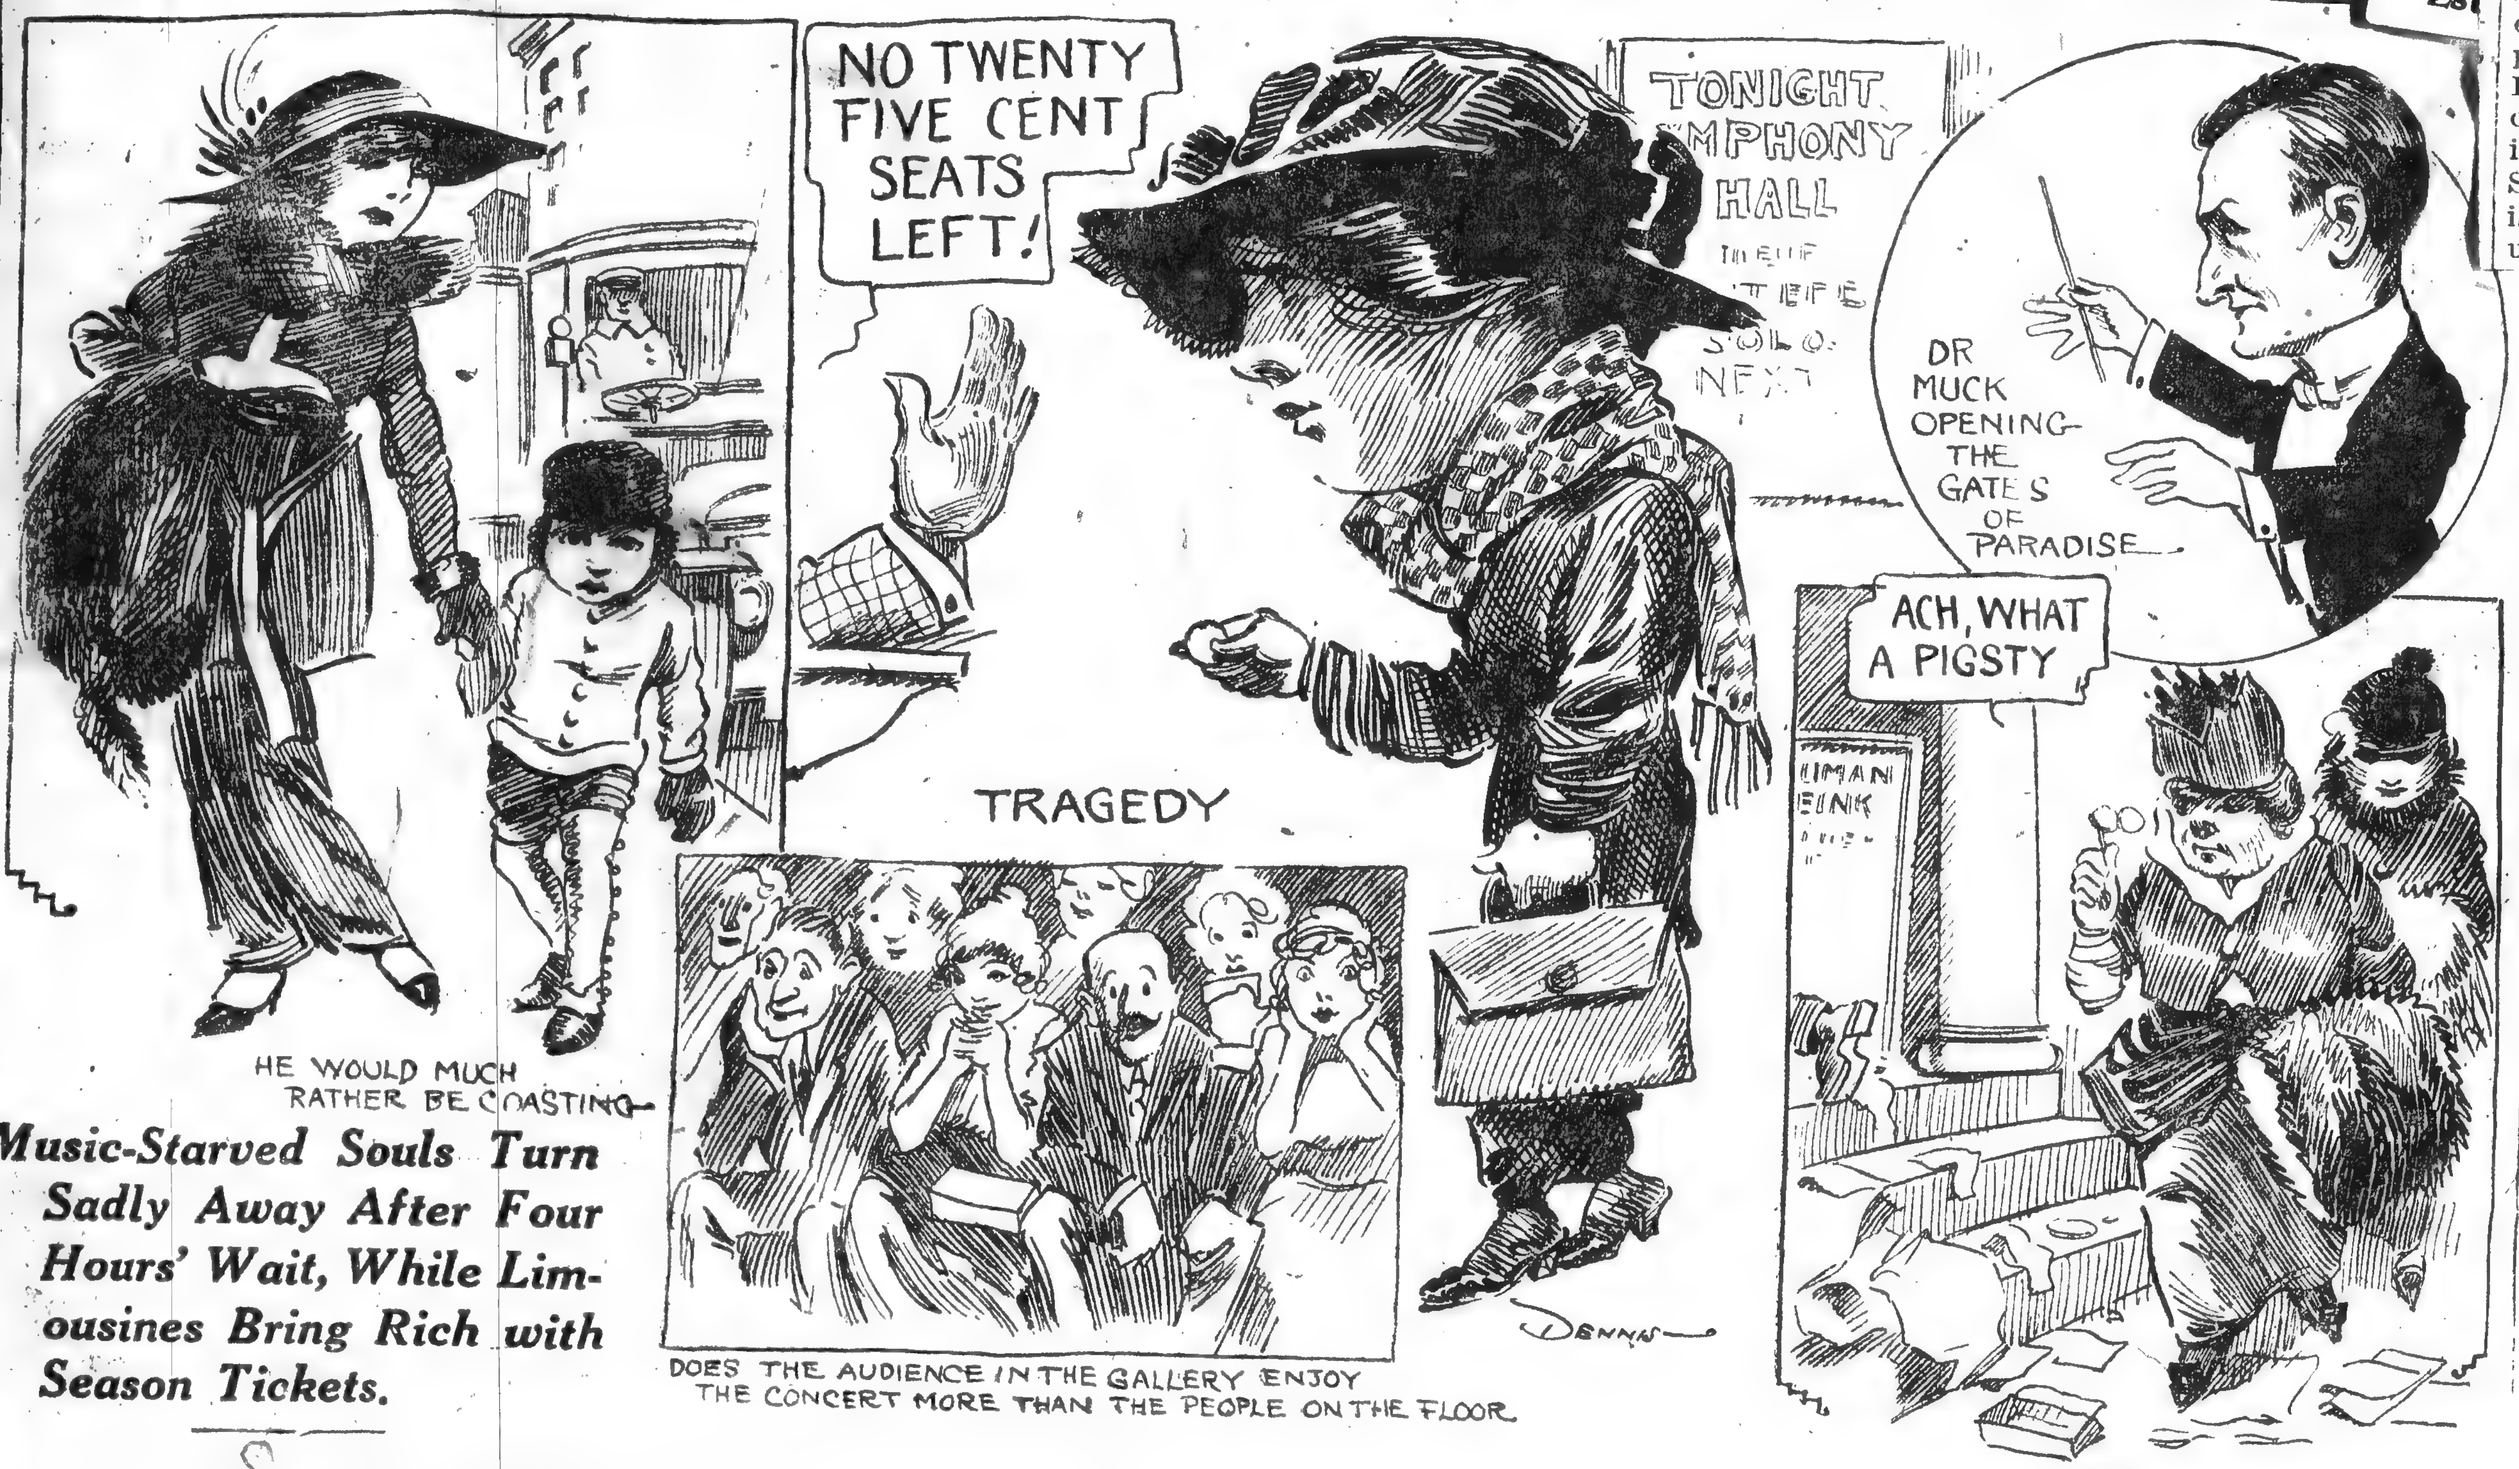
---

EVENING POST
New York City
DEC 7 - 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon the second matinée performance this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given. The programme contained the infrequently played "Aus Italien" of Richard Strauss, the new symphony of Ropartz, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. The Strauss work is an early one, dating back to 1886. The composer himself says it is a transition work, between the old and new styles. It is an effective work, nevertheless, not so involved, either in content or technique, as his later works. It shows the power of pictorial inventiveness, and a certain gift of melody, like some of his songs. That the composer did not cultivate this side of his talent is his misfortune—and ours as well. There are charming moments in this symphonic fantasia—"From Italy"—and it has much more musical interest than some of his later works that are heard more frequently. The "Ropartz" symphony did not, as erroneously stated in the programme, have its first performance in New York. It is, as the first performance of the Philharmonic indicated, rather a long drawn out symphonic poem than a symphony. But the composer has given us no "programme." Nevertheless, it seems to be hardly "solid" enough for a symphony. There are beautiful themes and melodies therein, however, and needless to say, Dr. Muck and his men made the most of them. Dr. Muck differs radically from Mr. Stransky in his ideas of tempo, it may be said in passing. For example, the composer has marked the first movement "Allegro moderato." Dr. Muck emphasizes the allegro, Mr. Stransky the moderato. The latter seems to be the more logical, besides being more in keeping with the spirit of the music. The "Allegretto" in the middle of the second section was also played by Dr. Muck at a faster pace than Mr. Stransky took it. There is no question of technical perfection of the playing of the orchestra in either case; both performances seemed as near perfection as a human instrument is capable. The "Egmont" overture seemed too slow; this may be entirely a matter of taste, however. But it seems hardly fast enough for an "allegro," as Dr. Muck took it. The programme as a whole—or taken singly—was far and away more interesting than the programme of Thursday night.

Miniature Tragedies on Steps of Symphony Hall; Bitter Disappointments as Doors to Gallery C



NO TWENTY FIVE CENT SEATS LEFT!
TONIGHT SYMPHONY HALL
DR MUCK OPENING THE GATES OF PARADISE
TRAGEDY
ACH, WHAT A PIGSTY
HE WOULD MUCH RATHER BE COASTING
DENNIS

DOES THE AUDIENCE IN THE GALLERY ENJOY THE CONCERT MORE THAN THE PEOPLE ON THE FLOOR

Music-Starved Souls Turn Sadly Away After Four Hours' Wait, While Limousines Bring Rich with Season Tickets.

By LAURIE HILLYER

HALF the joy in being poor is planning what you'd do if you were rich. Wouldn't you like to buy out the floor of Symphony Hall and give the best seats in the house to the wistful-eyed throng at the Huntington avenue entrance? By the way, have you ever noticed them on a Friday afternoon?

Two, three and even four hours before the concerts begin the steps are crowded with men and women—mostly women—and carpeted with bits of chocolate, sandwiches, waxed paper and fruit.

When the lobby opens at 1:30 the crowd, in an orderly zigzag file, begins to enter the doors. Each holds a quarter, which enables him to pass the doorkeeper, receive a program and choose a seat in the upper gallery.

The tragedy is that the doors frequently close before the entire list of those who have "stood and waited" can enter.

Among those left is a man who had given his place to a girl; he kindly brown eyes behind tortoise-shell spectacles and, in the absence gloves, keeps his long fingers in his pocketes. There's a boy with a vi case, a woman who has been studying a page of music while she wait another who has been reading French, and a girl whom nobody noti until she speaks.

"Do you believe there's a possibility of the doors opening again?" s demands of a man who has begun to sweep the steps.

He doubts it, but everybody waits. Presently the doors swing out. T girl ascends the steps as if they were air.

A Tragedy of the Quarter Seats

"No 25-cent seats left," remarks the ticket man.

"Oh," cries the girl, "to disappoint us like this!"

A pianist is the soloist, and she has been dreaming about him for mont She hesitates, evidently doing mental calculations. "Are there any 50-ce seats?" she finally questions.

"Too bad—they're selling the last seats for $2 at the entrance on Massachusetts avenue," replies the man, sympathetically.

So the girl goes away.

Meanwhile the audience arriving at the east entrance begins to congregate. Women in furs and violets descend from limousines. They come as their mothers came before them—season tickets in their daintily gloved hands.

Taxis and coupes roll past the door. The floor begins to fill as the musicians drift to the platform, from which emanates the weird moan of the "tuning-up" process.

One person to arrive by automobile is a brown-haired youngster in brown velvet leggings, coat and cap. He looks—sorry to say it—sulky. He didn't want to come. Although he is to hear the great pianist, although he studies at home with a wonderful teacher, he feels for the child in the poem:

What's the use of practising
For little boys like me?
It never does me any good
As far as I can see.
I play my scales all up and down,
I make my fingers sore,
And when I'm through I know my scales
No better than before.

One closed car stopped on Huntington avenue. A girl wearing black velvet and a long-stemmed pink rose helped an elderly woman to alight. Holding a lorgnette in her hand, the woman regarded the disorderly steps with a curious disgust.

"Ach," he said, "what a pigsty!"

The quarter-crowd has climbed to the gallery—high-hung, half way to heaven. The girls, many of them students, gaze about the white and gold hall in ecstacy. They begin a careful study of their programs, with descriptive notes by Philip Hale.

Pass Sandwiches and Chocolates

A social air prevails. People know each other. Boxes of sandwiches and chocolates are passed about. Possibilities of the concert are discussed in low tones.

At two-thirty, Dr. Muck appears, enters quietly, springs to his stand and raises his baton.

Orchestra and conductor disappear—the world is simply a place of music. Provided it is not a futurist selection—Schonberg, as a dark skinned man in the gallery excitedly declared, "is not no music, is it not?" Another suggested that cotton batting (to close ears) be passed about by the ushers.

Absolute silence prevails in the gallery. No one leans to her next neighbor and whispers in a series of penetrating hisses: "My dear, I thought I'd never get here—I have a new nurse, and she knows positively nothing. Let the baby suck a rattle without sterilizing it—I've hardly had a chance to leave the house. The baby is cutting teeth, and —"

Meanwhile a man with a broom is removing the debris from the steps on Huntington avenue—magazines, dailies, boxes, bags and wrappers are swept away.

the concert more thar od twice as long as the d—far from arriving in e raising of Dr. Muck's

From AMERICAN
Address. Baltimore, Md.
DEC 2 - 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT.

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Lyric Theater this evening at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Harold Bauer, the eminent pianist. The program comprises Brahms' Second Symphony in D major, Beethoven's Fourth Concerto for Piano in G major and Scheinpflug's Overture to a Comedy by Shakespeare. The last named work is a novelty and one of more than usual interest.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date DEC 6 - 1914

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Music by Strauss, Ropartz and Beethoven at Afternoon Concert.

Dr. Muck gave another programme chiefly of modern music at the afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday. It comprised Strauss's "symphonic fantasia," "Aus Italien"; J. Guy Ropartz's fourth symphony, and Beethoven's overture to "Egmont." By an unusual slip, the programme book announced Ropartz's symphony as played then for the first time in New York. It was first given here by the Philharmonic Society on Nov. 27.

The symphony scarcely re-enforced the effect it made on its first hearing a fortnight ago. It still seems to be written in sincerity and conviction by a man under the influence of César Franck's strong individuality. This appears not only in outward form, in the use of a "generating theme" and the manner in which it is made to contribute to the material of the work, but to some extent in harmonic scheme and in melodic line. And yet, this music shows a physiognomy of its own, though not a commanding one, nor does it seem to denote a deep and essential originality. It is admirably made, with a technical command of the orchestra that is made contributory to a true symphonic structure, not exploited in the search of new and strange effects.

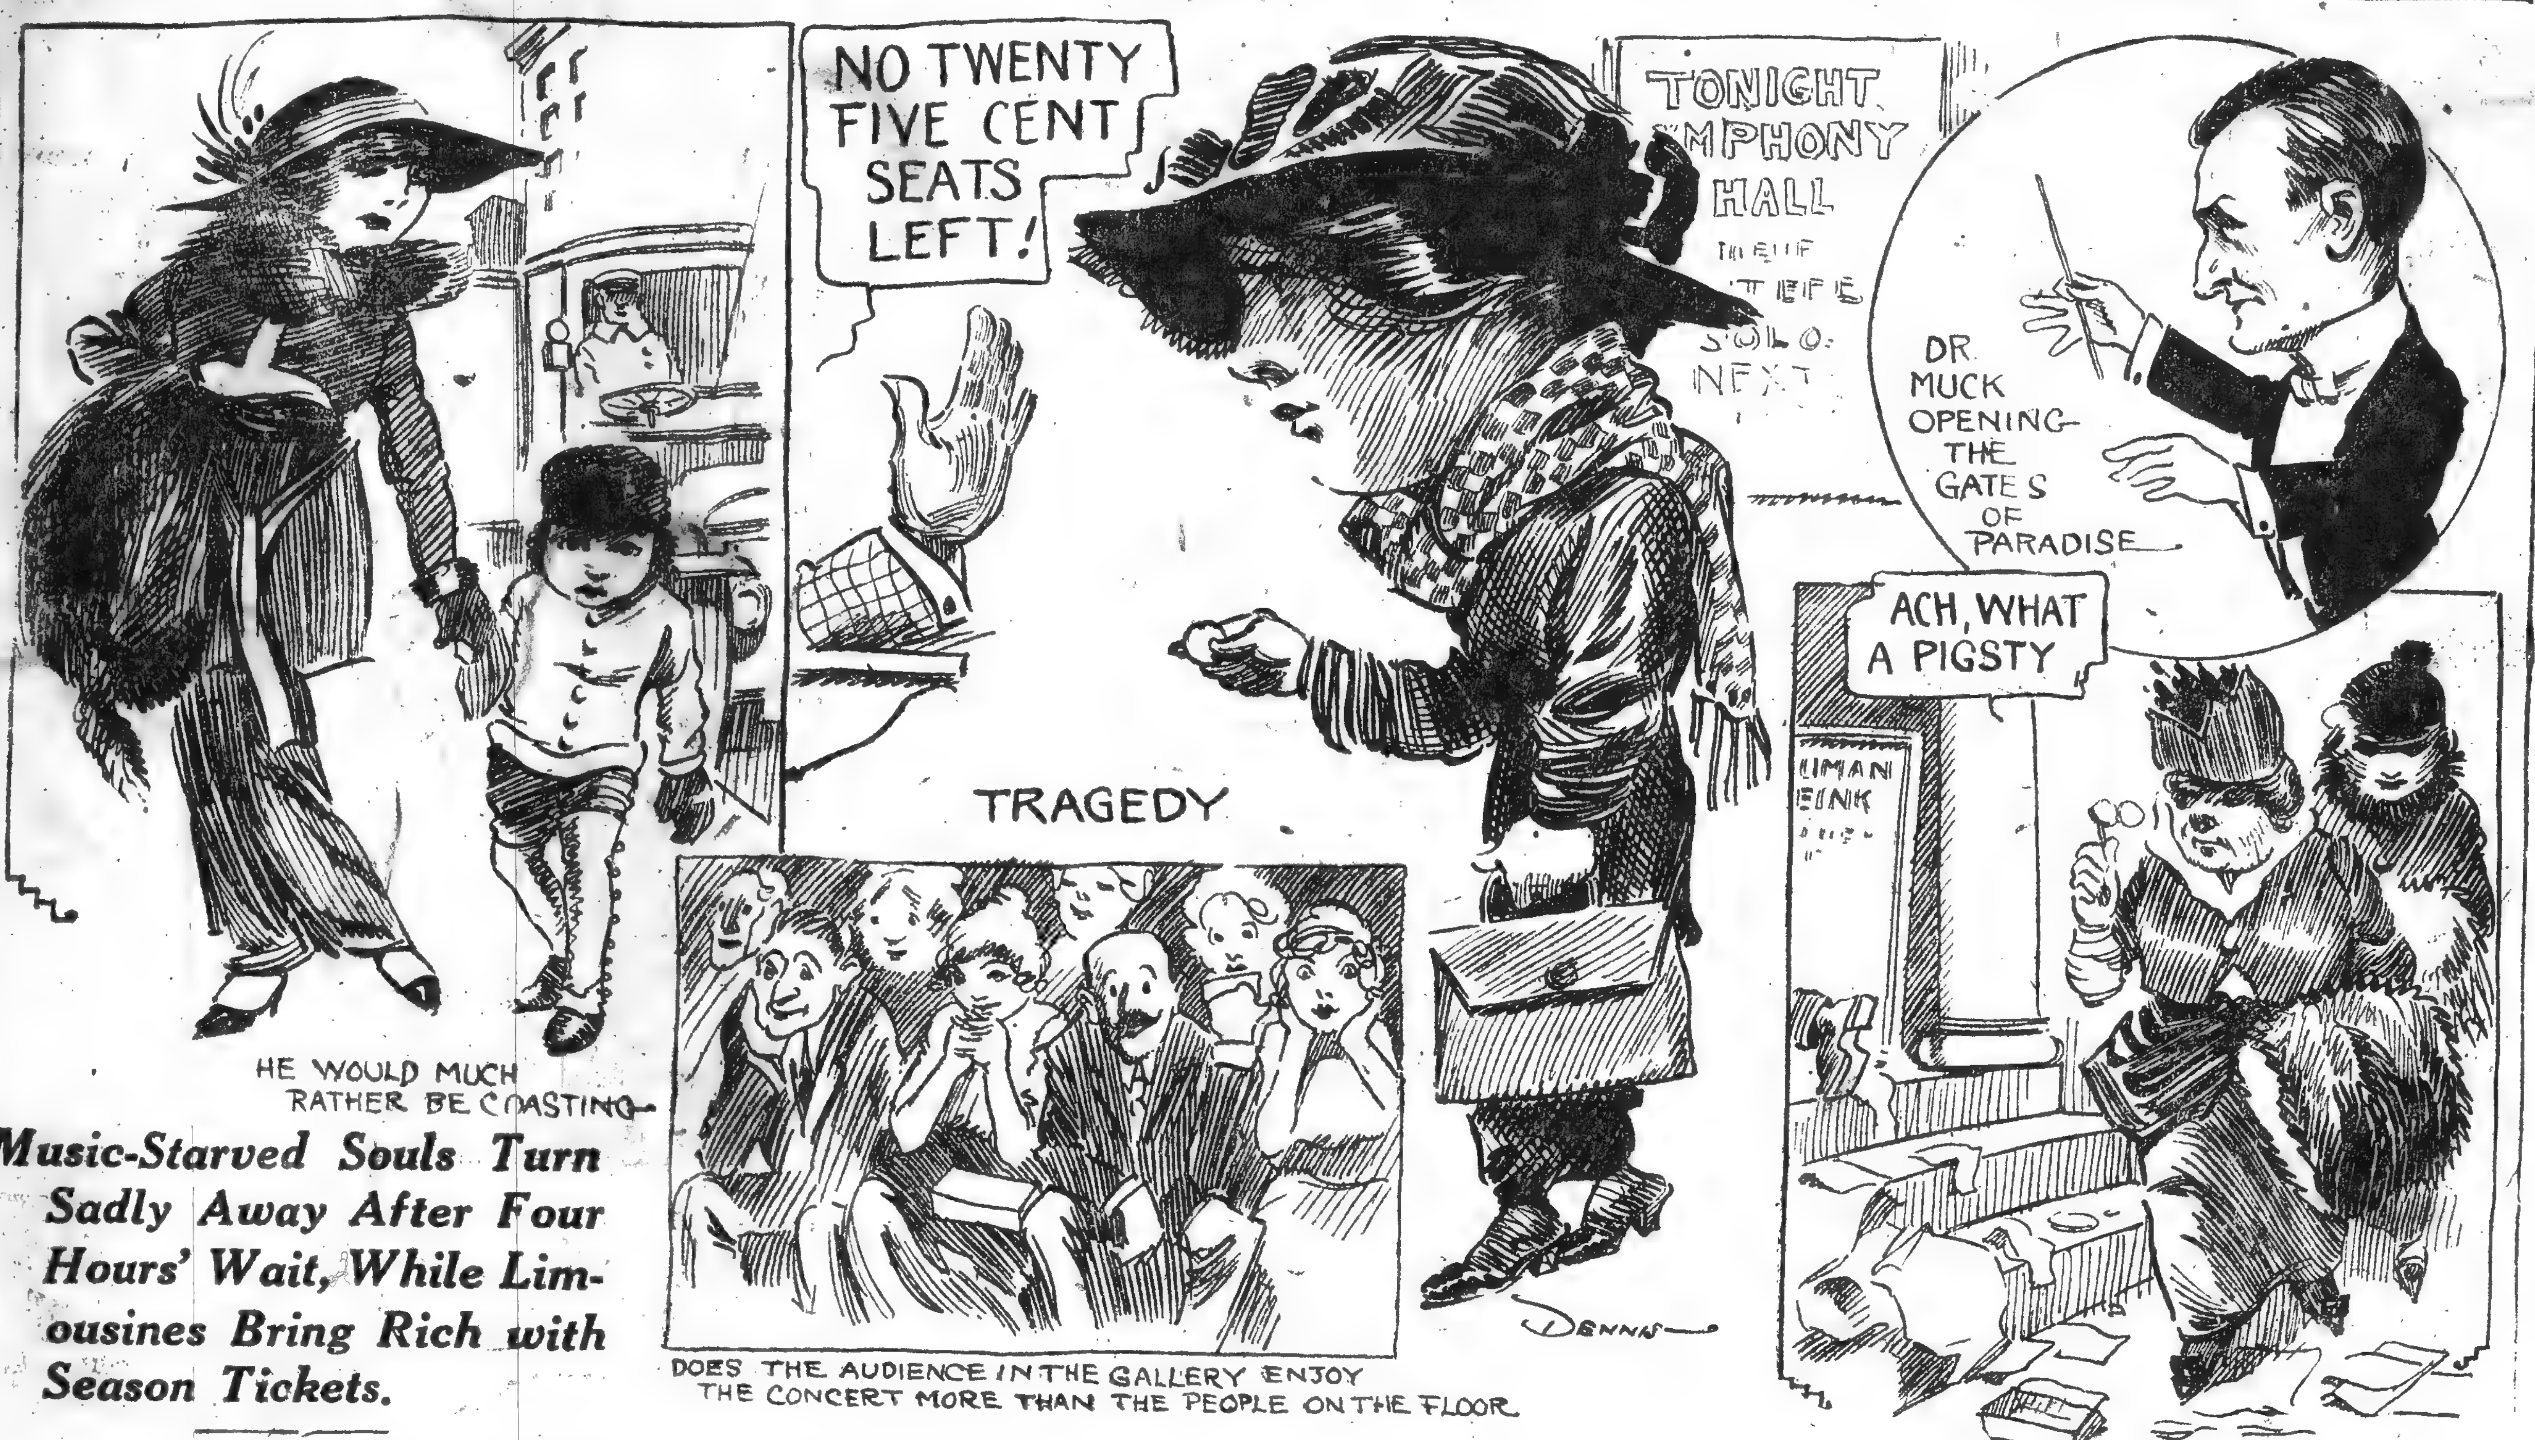
Strauss's "Aus Italien" is "early Strauss," written from a standpoint that he has long since passed by, though it denotes an abandonment of his earliest naïveté, that of writing music purely for music's sake; for it is "programme" music of the milder sort, concerned with evoking moods—"more the expression of feeling than tone picturing." Strauss had already gained a high technical mastery of the orchestra, and there are pages in this work of his twenty-third year that already show the spirit of adventure and innovation in orchestral technique. Some of these have beauty and effectiveness. But the work on the whole is sadly deficient in pregnancy and originality; in true musical creativeness. The thoughts are often deplorably commonplace; the development a long attempt to make bricks without straw. There is ingenuity in the use of the tune "Funiculli funicula," but, as is so often the case in the attempt to make such tunes into symphonic material, it is a barren ingenuity, and the tune itself is better than anything it is turned into.

The orchestra played this piece with a marvelous finish, an exquisite representation of all the color schemes and thematic elaborations imagined by the young composer. So, too, it did the symphony of Ropartz. It is hard to imagine either composition played with a nearer approach to what the composers must have conceived for their music. They were both much applauded.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THE BOSTON TRAVELER, TUESDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1914.

Miniature Tragedies on Steps of Symphony Hall; Bitter Disappointments as Doors to Gallery Close



HE WOULD MUCH RATHER BE COASTING
NO TWENTY FIVE CENT SEATS LEFT!
TRAGEDY
TONIGHT SYMPHONY HALL
DR. MUCK OPENING THE GATES OF PARADISE
ACH, WHAT A PIGSTY
DENNIS

DOES THE AUDIENCE IN THE GALLERY ENJOY THE CONCERT MORE THAN THE PEOPLE ON THE FLOOR

Music-Starved Souls Turn Sadly Away After Four Hours' Wait, While Limousines Bring Rich with Season Tickets.

By LAURIE HILLYER

HALF the joy in being poor is planning what you'd do if you were rich. Wouldn't you like to buy out the floor of Symphony Hall and give the best seats in the house to the wistful-eyed throng at the Huntington avenue entrance? By the way, have you ever noticed them on a Friday afternoon?

Two, three and even four hours before the concerts begin the steps are crowded with men and women—mostly women—and carpeted with bits of chocolate, sandwiches, waxed paper and fruit.

When the lobby opens at 1:30 the crowd, in an orderly zigzag file, begins to enter the doors. Each holds a quarter, which enables him to pass the doorkeeper, receive a program and choose a seat in the upper gallery.

The tragedy is that the doors frequently close before the entire list of those who have "stood and waited" can enter.

Among those left is a man who had given his place to a girl; he has kindly brown eyes behind tortoise-shell spectacles and, in the absence of gloves, keeps his long fingers in his pocketes. There's a boy with a violin case, a woman who has been studying a page of music while she waited, another who has been reading French, and a girl whom nobody notices until she speaks.

"Do you believe there's a possibility of the doors opening again?" she demands of a man who has begun to sweep the steps.

He doubts it, but everybody waits. Presently the doors swing out. The girl ascends the steps as if they were air.

A Tragedy of the Quarter Seats

"No 25-cent seats left," remarks the ticket man.

"Oh," cries the girl, "to disappoint us like this!"

A pianist is the soloist, and she has been dreaming about him for months. She hesitates, evidently doing mental calculations. "Are there any 50-cent seats?" she finally questions.

"Too bad—they're selling the last seats for $2 at the entrance on Massachusetts avenue," replies the man, sympathetically.

So the girl goes away.

Meanwhile the audience arriving at the east entrance begins to congregate. Women in furs and violets descend from limousines. They come as their mothers came before them—season tickets in their daintily gloved hands.

Taxis and coupes roll past the door. The floor begins to fill as the musicians drift to the platform, from which emanates the weird moan of the "tuning-up" process.

One person to arrive by automobile is a brown-haired youngster in brown velvet leggings, coat and cap. He looks—sorry to say it—sulky. He didn't want to come. Although he is to hear the great pianist, although he studies at home with a wonderful teacher, he feels for the child in the poem:

What's the use of practising
For little boys like me?
If never does me any good
As far as I can see.
I play my scales all up and down,
I make my fingers sore,
And when I'm through I know my scales
No better than before.

One closed car stopped on Huntington avenue. A girl wearing black velvet and a long-stemmed pink rose helped an elderly woman to alight. Holding a lorgnette in her hand, the woman regarded the disorderly steps with a curious disgust.

"Ach," he said, "what a pigsty!"

The quarter-crowd has climbed to the gallery—high-hung, half way to heaven. The girls, many of them students, gaze about the white and gold hall in ecstacy. They begin a careful study of their programs, with descriptive notes by Philip Hale.

Pass Sandwiches and Chocolates

A social air prevails. People know each other. Boxes of sandwiches and chocolates are passed about. Possibilities of the concert are discussed in low tones.

At two-thirty, Dr. Muck appears, enters quietly, springs to his stand and raises his baton.

Orchestra and conductor disappear—the world is simply a place of music. Provided it is not a futurist selection—Schonberg, as a dark skinned man in the gallery excitedly declared, "is not no music, is it not?" Another suggested that cotton batting (to close ears) be passed about by the ushers.

Absolute silence prevails in the gallery. No one leans to her next neighbor and whispers in a series of penetrating hisses: "My dear, I thought I'd never get here—I have a new nurse, and she knows positively nothing. Let the baby suck a rattle without sterilizing it—I've hardly had a chance to leave the house. The baby is cutting teeth, and —"

Meanwhile a man with a broom is removing the debris from the steps on Huntington avenue—magazines, dailies, boxes, bags and wrappers ar swept away.

I wonder if the audience in the gallery enjoys the concert more thai the people on the floor?

They have waited on the windy steps for a period twice as long as the cor t lasts. Some have gone without luncheon and—far from arriving in lin nes—walked miles to save carfare. With the raising of Dr. Muck's bai ey know " 's t with the world."

RICAN
e ltimore, Md. DEC 2 - 1914

MPHONY TONIGHT.

Boston Symphony conven in the Lyric Theag at 8:15 o'clock. The e Harold Bauer, the t. The program com- Second Symphony in thoven's Fourth Con- 884 in G major and Schere to a Comedy by e last named work one of more than

. PACA
d&Alm
11.

Afternoon Concert.

Muck gave another programme y of modern music at the after- rk, 1884 concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday. It comprised Strauss's "symphonic fantasia," "Aus Italien"; J. Guy Ropartz's fourth symphony, and Beethoven's overture to "Egmont." By an unusual slip, the programme book announced Ropartz's symphony as played then for the first time in New York; it was first given here by the Philharmonic Society on Nov. 27.

The symphony scarcely re-enforced the effect it made on its first hearing a fortnight ago. It still seems to be written in sincerity and conviction by a man under the influence of César Franck's strong individuality. This appears not only in outward form, in the use of a "generating theme" and the manner in which it is made to contribute to the material of the work, but to some extent in harmonic scheme and in melodic line. And yet, this music shows a physiognomy of its own, though not a commanding one, nor does it seem to denote a deep and essential originality. It is admirably made, with a technical command of the orchestra that is made contributory to a true symphonic structure, not exploited in the search of new and strange effects.

Strauss's "Aus Italien" is "early Strauss," written from a standpoint that he has long since passed by, though it denotes an abandonment of his earliest naïveté, that of writing music purely for music's sake; for it is "programme" music of the milder sort, concerned with evoking moods—"more the expression of feeling than tone picturing." Strauss had already gained a high technical mastery of the orchestra, and there are pages in this work of his twenty-third year that already show the spirit of adventure and innovation in orchestral technique. Some of these have beauty and effectiveness. But the work on the whole is sadly deficient in pregnancy and originality; in true musical creativeness. The thoughts are often deplorably commonplace; the development a long attempt to make bricks without straw. There is ingenuity in the use of the tune "Funiculli funicula," but, as is so often the case in the attempt to make such tunes into symphonic material, it is a barren ingenuity, and the tune itself is better than anything it is turned into.

The orchestra played this piece with a marvelous finish, an exquisite representation of all the color schemes and thematic elaborations imagined by the young composer. So, too, it did the symphony of Ropartz. It is hard to imagine either composition played with a nearer approach to what the composers must have conceived for their music. They were both much applauded.

[86]

From
Address: New York City
Date DEC 20 1914
Est

"Euryanthe" and Some Suggestions From Yesterday's Performance—Weber and Wagner—Dr. Muck's Programmes.

A COMPARISON was suggested in these columns recently between Beethoven's "Fidelio" and Weber's "Euryanthe," as being two acknowledged masterpieces of operatic art that have always needed a certain amount of effort and labor to keep them upon the stage. Neither has ever been what corresponds in the operatic world—if anything in the operatic world does correspond—to the literary "best sellers." Both are profoundly admired by those whose attention is turned to the deeper things in operatic art; and by such "Fidelio," at least, is passionately loved. Neither has ever been able to gain and retain the facile popularity or arouse the contagious enthusiasm that other operas have, some of these numbered among the very greatest, others among the less than great in very varying measure.

The reason for this is not altogether easy to sound. Some say it is to be sought in the libretto; but operas with poor librettos have lived to an operatic immortality. Mozart's "Magic Flute" is not usually considered to have a good libretto, yet the opera is still very much alive, and gives enormous pleasure. The libretto of "Il Trovatore" is generally given up as quite incomprehensible; but the tingling vitality of Verdi's music has never allowed it to disappear long from operatic repertoires. So, too, with the libretto of "Fidelio"; it can hardly be called in all respects a fine one, and was laboriously tailored and retailored by Beethoven's collaborators in his efforts to give it a lasting place on the stage. The music he has put into it has made it immortal, but aloof. There can be no question that the libretto of "Euryanthe" is as poor as can be found; several of the turning points of the plot, crucial scenes of the opera, are inconceivably silly and pointless, and the verse in which it is written is of the feeblest sentimentality and poverty of diction. Yet it would be rash to say that "Euryanthe" was moribund at the present time, even though it may not appeal with irresistible force to the operatic public of this day. There is that in Weber's music which the ineptitude of Frau von Chezy cannot kill.

If operas were dependent, then, on beautifully written librettos, many that have succeeded would not have done so. Weber's music has always found warm admirers. The overture is a concert piece of never-fading brilliancy and beauty. Schumann declared the music of the opera to be Weber's "heart's blood, the noblest he could give." Wagner disapproved of certain features of it; of the treatment of the recitative, of which there is much, and of the choruses. But the opera made a profound impression on him, as he has himself eagerly admitted and as his own works still more clearly show. Weber is to be heard in the earliest complete opera of Wagner we possess, "Die Feen," and in no uncertain tones; and thence onward for a long time.

Probably many were struck in yesterday's performance of "Euryanthe" by the deep indebtedness of "Tannhäuser," and to a certain degree of "Lohengrin," to "Euryanthe." The second act of "Tannhäuser" is full of it; more, perhaps, in the general dramatic situation and the dramatic and musical development than in the actual musical invention, yet here, too, there is still a great deal that may be said to root in "Euryanthe." There are resemblances that may have brought an involuntary smile to old operagoers; that caused one such to remark that "Euryanthe" seemed to be stolen from the first and second acts of "Tannhäuser," and still another to declare that if a composer of the present day were found owing so much to a predecessor as Wagner owed to Weber he would be plainly charged with plagiarism.

⁂

But this, after all, does not matter. The great genius takes his own where he finds it, like Molière, even if it be in the works of another genius; only then he is not always able to carry out Voltaire's principle, "Quand on vole, il faut tuer," as Handel did with considerable success. Wagner's glory is no less and Weber's is all the great- [illegible] The significant thing is that [illegible]the" occupies an important a place in the history of music as the chief transition point toward the newer style, the dramatic revolution in opera that Wagner seized upon and carried forward, if not completed, in his own works. In this respect "Euryanthe" differs from "Fidelio," which marked no attempt at innovation and undertook to give no new direction to the development of lyric drama, either consciously or unconsciously. "It marks no epoch; it is only eternal," as Mr. Althorp wrote of it. Beethoven took one particular operatic style as he found it, and filled its forms and outlines with the richest outpourings of his genius. Weber deliberately intended to make "Euryanthe" something different and more potent in dramatic music than what had gone before it. His remark about it quoted here a week ago will bear repetition after a rehearing of the opera: "'Euryanthe' is a purely dramatic attempt, making its effect only through the union and co-operation of all the sister arts, and certainly without effect if deprived of their aid."

Even those who could not submit wholly to the spell of the opera could not fail to feel the sincerity and intensity of the expression, the dramatic force of many of its scenes, the intention disclosed to make the music not a decoration and an adornment of the stage, but the very essence and embodiment of all that goes on there. It is written with passion, tenderness, and a really noble aspiration.

⁂

If "Euryanthe" does not hold its own now in the very admirable, spirited, and sumptuous representation that is given of it at the Metropolitan, the cause must be sought in the specific quality of the music itself. Weber, a genius, was neither a Beethoven nor a Wagner. His music will to some sound old-fashioned. There will be those to whom some of its phrases and accents, with many that are of imperishable beauty and potency, will appeared mannered and monotonous, for all the rhythmic energy that fills the work. There is such a thing as the "Weber flourish" that may pall on some. And most of all will be felt the lack of variety, freedom, and emotional power in the harmony. Weber's harmonic sense in "Euryanthe," as in his work in general, was not on a level with other elements of his inspiration. The modern listener after a time begins to long for something further afield than the tonic, dominant, sub-dominant, and diminished seventh.

⁂

A letter was recently published in the daily columns of THE TIMES from a distressed subscriber to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that gives, unintentionally, no doubt, a false impression of Dr. Muck's programmes. The S O S signal sent out then was caused by the programme performed on the evening of Dec. 3, when two rather long and difficult works—difficult for listeners as well as for players—were presented in succession. THE TIMES on that occasion remarked that the programme put the listeners to a severe test, as it did. It seemed that it might have been better for the audience, as well as for the new compositions themselves, if some relief or contrast had been afforded by putting them on different programmes and joining them to some work more familiar, and hence easier of access, even though in the modern style. It would have given the new works themselves a better chance of being appreciated by causing less strain upon the listener's receptive capacity, entirely without regard to their own intrinsic values.

But the correspondent went on to intimate that Dr. Muck's course in programme making for New York has "relegated Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms to the discard." It is certain that nothing is further from the great conductor's intention than to do anything of the sort. It is certain that his own love and sympathies go out very strongly to the music of the classical masters, and the more modern who have not severed all allegiance to the past. It would doubtless not be wrong to surmise that he holds it in infinitely higher esteem than the vast majority of the music called today "modern"—much of which will unquestionably be tomorrow dead or counted among the wreckage of a tide already receded.

There is no need of a personal inquiry to establish such a belief. The fact that Dr. Muck is a great musician, of the finest and most sensitive feeling, a conductor of enormous knowledge and experience, one who performs the music of the classical masters with a devotion so great, an instinct so unerring, with results so fruitful in beauty and so exactly filled with the spirit that imbues them, would alone be enough to suggest that he has no purpose to relegate such works to the "discard." But something more tangible establishes the fact, and that is the record of his New York programmes. This shows that Dr. Muck has been far from devoting his New York concerts to modern music. Without going back to his first term of two years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, consider the programmes he has given in New York since his return to the direction of the orchestra in the Autumn of 1912. In the season of 1912-13 the following "classical" works were performed (giving, in the spirit of this discussion, that appellation to some music formerly denied it.)

Suite in D major	Bach
Symphony in G minor	Mozart
Symphony No. 3	Beethoven
Symphony No. 8	Beethoven
Overture, "Egmont"	Beethoven
Overture, "Leonora," No. 3	Beethoven
Symphony No. 2	Brahms
Variations on a theme by Haydn	Brahms
Overture, "Academic Festival"	Brahms
Overture, "Euryanthe"	Weber
Overture, "Der Freischütz"	Weber
Overture, "Genoveva"	Schumann

In the season of 1913-14 these works of the same designation appear:

Concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra	Handel
Symphony No. 2 in D major	Haydn
Symphony No. 6 in G major	Haydn
Symphony in E flat major	Mozart
"Haffner" Serenade	Mozart
Overture, "The Magic Flute"	Mozart
Symphony No. 1	Beethoven
Symphony No. 5	Beethoven
Symphony No. 7	Beethoven
Symphony No. 4	Brahms
"Tragic" Overture	Brahms

In the four concerts already given this season the following have been played:

Symphony No. 3	Beethoven
Overture, "Egmont"	Beethoven
Symphony No. 2	Brahms
Variations on a theme by Haydn	Brahms
Overture, "Euryanthe"	Weber

These lists do not include the solo numbers drawn from the classical literature, of which there were many and which, of course, leavened the programmes as much as works for orchestra alone would do.

⁂

Dr. Muck, like all other symphonic conductors, is confronted with difficulties and dilemmas in the planning of a large number of programmes for a season's work. No such conductor in these days can stand aloof from modern music, whatever may be his personal likes or dislikes. It is indisputably his duty to give his audiences a showing of the best, the most characteristic, the most influential, of such music, or what may seem so from day to day. Stagnation, decay, dry rot, await the organization and the director that are not alive to this duty. No doubt even distressed letter writers would willingly grant this contention, which is hardly a contention in the sense of having much recognizable opposition.

Nor has New York ever been a place where there was any vociferous demand for conservatism or any potent and obstructive unwillingness to hear the new. The honorable history of the Philharmonic Society is a proof of it, and the record of its programmes from 1842 to the present day, is a monument of the liberal minds and progressive spirits of its conductors and its audiences as well. It need not again be recalled how much of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, was heard here for the first time in America when there was some, and even considerable, doubt about them; how Berlioz was given a full and free hearing in New York before he had it in Paris; how, when Carl Bergmann, conducting the Philharmonic, was told that his audiences didn't like the abundance of Wagner he was giving them, (when Wagner was worse than strongly suspect,) he answered, "Den dey must hear him till dey do"; or how Theodore Thomas used to lie in wait for the newest publications of Brahms, Dvorak, Tschaikowsky, Strauss, and other living and creating spirits, or how he and Dr. Leopold Damrosch contested for the first performance of a new work by Brahms.

There is no reason to believe that the liberality supporting and approving all this has been extinguished in New York. But there are more ways of killing a cat than by smothering her in butter. Such protests as there are against Dr. Muck's "modern" performances will probably be found directed more against the methods of admixture in his programmes than against the total amounts, or proportions, of modern and classical works contained in them. It is certain that the classics are not relegated to the "discard," or even to the background.

RICHARD ALDRICH.

From POST
Address: New York City
DEC 26
Date
Esta

German Cacophony in Boston.

DR. MUCK makes no secret of the fact that, patriot though he be, he draws the line at the works of the German cacophonist, Arnold Schönberg. Nevertheless, yielding to the wishes of certain persons, he put on his last programme that composer's "Five Pieces for Orchestra." The result was that, after the first of them, "a polite and well-intentioned audience laughed outright," while "the other four pieces excited on wonder and bewilderment," as Olin Downes wrote in the Boston Post. Speaking of the group as a whole, Mr. Downes says:

> This music, for the greater part, sounds very horrible. The sonorities of the orchestra are so intense in pitch and quality that it is a physically taxing experience for the ear. At a first hearing, the only pieces which conveyed any definite impression to this reviewer were the third, an impressionistic effect of pronounced individuality, and, if you can look at it that way, of a very subtle beauty; and the fourth piece, a piece which really communicates sensations of terror, or horror. The first piece appeared to ordinary ears, untuned to the intensities of Schönberg, simply laughable, and so it was received. The last piece was also very terrible, physically hurtful—and this is but sober statement of fact.

At the same concert the orchestra played Wagner's "Faust" overture, concerning which the same critic wrote:

> The use of the aerophore enabled the bass tuba player in Wagner's overture to play the opening phrase for the tuba with a real, sustaining legato—not, after all, that the phrase became particularly more eloquent by virtue of the mechanical assistance of the machine that pumped air into the big horn while the player was refilling his lungs, but it is a comfort to know that the wishes of a composer are being obeyed!

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has so far cost Major Higginson $900,000, and he now expends on it about $40,000 a year. Mayor Curley stated in a recent speech that Major Higginson will ultimately leave a round million to the orchestra. Eben Jordan is said to have spent $500,000 on the Boston Opera Company.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date
Est 1884

Fritz Kreisler, whose violin recital here aroused so much interest recently, will make his second appearance of the season in Philadelphia, on Monday evening, January 4, as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert. He will play the Mendelssohn Concerto. The orchestral numbers that Dr. Muck has chosen are the "Finlandia" of Sibelius, the Fourth Symphony of the French composer, Guy Ropartz and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture. It is believed that this will be the first performance in Philadelphia of the Ropartz Symphony.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date
ork, 1884

* * *

Fritz Kreisler, the supreme master of the violin, whose recital here aroused so much interest recently, will make his second appearance of the season in Philadelphia Monday evening, January 4, as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert. He will play the Mendelssohn concerto.

The orchestral numbers that Dr. Muck has chosen are the "Finlandia" of Sibelius, the fourth symphony of the French composer, Guy Ropartz, and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture. It is believed that this will be the first performance in Philadelphia of the very interesting Ropartz symphony.

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
914
Date
Est 884

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A rare treat is promised the musical public of Baltimore at the third Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening, January 6. Fritz Kreisler, who will be the soloist, will play Beethoven's great concerto in D major. A performance of this concerto by Kreisler, with an accompaniment by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, will be a memorable event. The orchestral numbers will be Wagner's A Faust Overture, Guy Ropartz's new Fourth Symphony and the Egmont overture of Beethoven.

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date DEC 27 1914

The next musical event of particular importance will be the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take place at the Lyric on the evening of January 6, when Fritz Kreisler will play Beethoven's great violin concerto in D major. This work was first played by Clement, a well-known virtuoso of that day, in 1806, while he was the principal violin of the Theatre "an der Wien," and, as was the case with the "Kreutzer Sonata," Beethoven postponed the completion of it until the very last moment because he hated so to write compositions "to order," and it was being written especially for Clement's own concert. So the unfortunate violinist was obliged to play it at sight, as much of the "Kreutzer Sonata" was played, and, as it was a great and difficult work, and inspired by a spirit that was quite new in those days and teeming with difficulties, it seems to have made but little impression on the public, whom it failed to "reach" entirely. As a result the concerto was practically never played at all until it was revived by Joachim in later years. It is said that the manuscript of this work indicates that the solo part was much altered and worked over, as if it had been elaborated and changed after the first performance.

The Beethoven "Egmont" overture will also be played at this concert, but the symphony will be a modern one, the fourth of J. Guy Ropartz, who was born at Quingamp (Cotes du Nord), in France, in 1864, and who was a pupil of Dubois and Massenet, in the Paris Conservatoire, but who afterward studied with Cesar Franck. Although Ropartz devoted most of his life to composition, he has since 1894 been the director of the conservatoire at Nancy, where he has been instrumental in arousing a great interest in symphony concerts. His "Fourth" symphony is apparently his latest work, but he has written several dramatic numbers and much incidental music to plays, orchestra suites and the like, as well as many minor compositions.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 27 1914

Boston Symphony January 5.

Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, will make his first appearance of the season in Washington as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert in the new National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 5. He will play the Scotch Fantasie of Max Bruch.

The orchestral numbers which Dr. Muck has chosen include the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and Brahm's Variations on a Theme by Haydn.

From GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date 1914

Music

Opera and Other Gossip—"La Traviata."

Three of our Metropolitan Opera House singers journeyed over to Boston to sing in an operatic concert at Symphony Hall Saturday afternoon. They were Mme Delaunois, Mr. Martinelli, and Mr. Rothier. The singer not from the Metropolitan was Mme Elisabeth van Endert of Berlin, who seems to be making her war-time headquarters in Boston. The sage Philip Hale found that Mr. Martinelli, who had hitherto sung there only in opera, was in appearance, in carriage, in his entrances and exits the traditional Italian tenor, sure of himself, and sure of the boisterous applause that inevitably follows a display of musical passion and resonant high notes. "He puccinied and leoncavalloed it in the approved manner."

Mr. Rothier had as his solo an unfamiliar air from Verdi's "Don Carlos." Mr. Hale finds that that accomplished basso sang the air "with the appropriately varied expression." Of particular interest is Mr. Hale's impression of Mme Delaunois, who had not previously sung in Boston and is not yet a known quantity to the music world of New York:

"Her voice has a rich quality, nor in the upper register do the tones become pale or shrill. It is an emotional, appealing voice that at once arrests the attention of the hearer. She sang Mignon's romance with genuine feeling, and was not too playful in the song of the recall. Let us hope that she will be heard again. Voices like hers are not common, and her ingenuous bearing is ingratiating."

No composer is more interesting to us to-day than Arnold Schoenberg, the musical Cubist, Futurist, what you will. Any intelligent criticism of his work has an actual, vital importance. Last week the Boston Symphony Orchestra played for the first time in Boston his Five Pieces for Orchestra, op. 16. Philip Hale, for whom music did not begin in Germany or end with "Parsifal," whose mind has remained eager and appreciative in regard to the latest developments of music, writes of the pieces in the Boston Herald in a vein that we cannot afford to neglect. Before quoting Mr. Hale it is well to give the names of the Five Pieces—"Presentiments," "The Past," "The Changing Chord," "Peripeteia," "The Obbligato Recitative."

Says Mr. Hale of the Five Pieces:

"Bill Nye said, many years ago, that the music of Wagner was better than it sounded. Arnold Schoenberg says to-day that his own music is better than it sounds.

"The pieces played yesterday are extraordinary. It is easy to say that the composer is a maniac or a poseur. Neither statement would be accurate. Those who have read his treatise on harmony know that he is a man of unusual knowledge, force, originality. Those who heard his quartet last season know that he can write music of uncommon beauty and towering imagination in a more familiar form.

"It would also be easy to say that when Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel' was first performed in Boston the majority in the audience thought the music chaotic, incomprehensible, and the composer mad. To-day, in comparison with Schoenberg's pieces, this symphonic poem is as clear as music by Haydn. Remember, too, that when Debussy's 'Nocturnes' was played twice in succession at Chickering Hall they were thought to be incomprehensible.

"These instances will not answer the objectors to Schoenberg. What is to be said of his five pieces? Personal impressions are interesting chiefly to the person impressed. No two persons hear music in the same way. I could make little out of the first and the fifth pieces. There are fine moments in 'The Past' and 'The Changing Chord,' beautiful suggestions of mood; strangely beautiful effects of color. Nor is the fourth piece wholly inexplicable. To argue for or against this music, which might be of another planet, after even several hearings, would be presumptuous and foolish. It took many Bostonians, well acquainted with orchestral and chamber compositions, a long time to familiarize themselves with the idiom of César Franck, and later with that of Debussy. These composers, however, are not so fundamentally radical, anarchistic, as Schoenberg."

As to the behavior of the audience Mr. Hale is irresistibly droll:

"When Schoenberg's Five Pieces were performed for the first time in London, and in Chicago, there were scenes of outspoken disapproval. Yesterday the behavior of the audience was highly creditable to Boston. There was smiling; there was giggling at times; there was applause. Nobody rose to remonstrate. Nothing was thrown at Dr. Muck and the orchestra. There was no perturbation of Nature to show that Schoenberg's pieces were playing; the sun did not hasten its descent; there was no earthquake shock. It was as it should have been in Boston."

Dr. Muck should without fail introduce these pieces to New York at one of the coming Carnegie Hall concertos of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The great Monday night audience at the Metropolitan Opera House was regaled with a performance of "La Traviata," the second in that house this season. As before, Miss Hempel, Mr. Botta and Mr. Amato appeared in the chief rôles and Mr. Polacco conducted.

MONITOR,
JANUARY 2,

FRITZ KREISLER WITH SYMPHONY AS THE SOLOIST

Orchestra With Assistance of the Apollo Club and Paul Draper Plays Liszt's "Faust" Symphony as the Other Number

SYMPHONY HALL—Tenth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of Jan. 1. The program: Liszt, "Faust" symphony (Apollo Club and Paul Draper, tenor, assisting); Mendelssohn, concerto in E minor for violin (Fritz Kreisler, soloist).

Mr. Kreisler gave a brilliant performance of the solo part of the Mendelssohn piece, as was his duty. If anybody can make acceptable a form of composition which belongs to past epochs, it is he. If the violin concerto—a type of composition which nearly all modern composers have discarded—is worth reviving, it is under the circumstances of this rehearsal. The flourish and show of a visiting artist is somewhere near justified when the work is of the extraordinary quality of the Friday soloist's.

Happily the Symphony concert public as a whole does not find its chief pleasure in exhibitions by artists who travel about the country with a gripsack full of sweet tunes. At the tenth rehearsal the intermission [illegible] to the [illegible] appreciation for orchestral music, the men's abilities in interpretation and the conductor's judgment and skill. If any visitors were present from far away, they got a better idea of musical Boston and of the Symphony orchestra than they could have got at any other concert this season.

The leading work on the program was by the composer who is being understood as the most important one of the nineteenth century, as more important than Beethoven, because he opened up possibilities for 50 years of progress, whereas Beethoven only brought to culmination the ideas of the music writers who preceded him. The version of the work presented was one which the composer sketched as an improvement over his first score and did not have time to publish. The day demanded the best of the Symphony men and it received their best.

Now as to what that best is. Let it be judged by the reading of the "Faust" symphony as a whole. Let no allowance whatever be made on the ground that the symphony is anything short of a masterpiece of composition. Let Liszt be taken for granted as doing his part thoroughly. If anything was lacking to a perfect result, let the orchestra answer for it.

It was to be expected that the orchestra would be pleasing in the second part of the work, the part which depicts the character of Marguerite. That division of the symphony, even in the days when Liszt was considered a manufacturer of noise and an advocate of structural confusion, could be made to charm an audience by the most Beethovenish of orchestras. Containing many of the traits of the slow movement of classic symphonies, it could easily be given persuasion and appeal. The third section of the work, in which the figure of Mephistopheles is projected on the scene, was a greater challenge. It could hardly have been a surprise to listeners that Dr. Muck and his men gave a triumphant reading of this portion of Liszt's composition. For in it satire has free rein. And laughter, whether of the merry or the grim kind, never fails of its value in Symphony orchestra interpretations.

But how about the first section of this piece, the one which gives the picture of the title character? Here, the general purpose from the standpoint of formal composition is clear enough. The opening "Faust" episode is an allegro movement, just as the first part of any symphony would be. It is as carefully held within allegro lines as the second and third divisions are kept within andante and scherzo lines and as is the closing choral portion within regular finale lines. The problem for the orchestra, then, was to interpret with power that portion of the symphony in which the composer expressed himself the most intellectually.

Analysts have agreed that intellectual is about as good a single word as is to be found to describe the content of an allegro, just as they have agreed on sentimental and humorous as the words that answer broadly to describe the two inside divisions of a four-movement work. Though the word intellectual comes into the case with some awkwardness of gait, it does what is wanted of it when it gets there.

Now the Symphony orchestra on Friday afternoon was conspicuously less telling in the "Faust" section than in the "Marguerite" and "Mephisto" sections and in the choral close. It failed, that is to say, to meet to the full the severest test which the composer offered. And it is right here that the Boston Symphony orchestra has fallen below again and again. Not in execution. For nothing could be asked better than the playing of the notes. But mechanism, however important and interesting in music, is not thought.

Accurate delivery of the lines by the various groups of instruments in a piece where theme counts for so much as in the opening movement of the "Faust" symphony is a delightful thing. But it does not pass for thorough reading of the music. The rendering of allegro parts of symphonies has been admirably done of late at the concerts, but it has not been done with intellectual enthusiasm on the part of the performers. Such parts of symphonies were better done five years ago. But everybody knows that it went against the grain to have things so. The members of an organization for which pretty tall assertions, like "first of its kind in the world," are made, seem to be better satisfied when they do their task competently as artisans than they used to be when they tried to do it purposefully as men.

TRANSCRIPT,
JANUARY 4,

LISZT, MUCK AND KREISLER

An Audience at the Symphony Concert of Saturday Stirred as It Has Rarely Been in Long Memories—The Bettered Violinist

MR KREISLER was more nearly himself than he had been on Friday afternoon when he repeated Mendelssohn's concerto for violin before an audience that had evidently come in high expectation of his playing of it and in as high of the performance of Liszt's "Faust Symphony" by Dr. Muck and the orchestra. For once—and yet it is no so unfamiliar a happening at Symphony Hall—the box office turned scores of purchasers away because there were no more places. For once, too—and again it was not so unusual an incident—the applause at the end of the symphony was in just measure with the performance. Not four, as on Friday, but five and six times was Dr. Muck recalled, more moved than he has ever shown himself publicly in Boston, and full of eagerness to pass over the plaudits to the men of the band and to the choristers of the Apollo Club. In long recollection, no Symphony Concert has more stirred an audience and, as some were saying as they departed, Dr. Muck's eagerly expected version of "Zarathustra" is only three weeks away. Again hearers had come to listen to symphonic music and risen from it as from music-drama. Fortunate the act of an opera that could so fill the stage and so possess the auditorium as did the "Gretchen" movement under Dr. Muck's hand. Through the lights of romance, too evasive for the machinery of opera houses to summon, they that listened not only heard voices, but saw figures and scene. It was stageless music evoking what music of the stage often fails to do. And so indeed throughout all the two-fold masterpiece of composer and conductor.

As for Mr. Kreisler he played through the first movement of the concerto with far more of the recreating fire with which he can make "passage-work" sound like improvisation and bring a melody into being as by gathering impulse of music and violin, than he could summon on Friday. Then he was content with masterful exposition; on Saturday he added the feeling that vitalizes statement with imagination. In the second movement again, he plied, as he did not on Friday, those subtleties of expression, like the adroit use of a delicately vibrant tone and an equal adroit spinning of transitions, that made Mendelssohn's sentimental song seem the expression of a beauty it had awakened in Mr. Kreisler and that was of him only.

ADVERTISER,
JANUARY 2

THE SYMPHONY OF THIS WEEK

PROGRAMME OF PLEASING CONTRAST PERFORMED

A "Revised" Faust and Mendelssohn's Concerto—The Apollo Club Chorus Sings.

PROGRAMME.
Liszt—A Faust Symphony.
Chorus from the Apollo Club.
Mr. Paul Draper, tenor.
Mendelssohn—Concerto in E minor for violin.
Mr. Fritz Kreisler, soloist.

The "Faust Symphony," heard in Boston several times—indeed, it was performed here with chorus before our orchestra was founded—underwent a change at Liszt's hands during one of his last visits to Wagner's home in Bayreuth. The composer, even as did the philosopher of the poem, poured a new elixir of life into his Faust's veins. It was this rejuvenated symphony that Dr. Muck, the orchestra and 50 members of the Apollo Club presented to a Boston audience for the first time yeste day afternoon at Symphony Hall.

The original score of the work was stolen from Liszt and there were, at that time, those who wished it had never been recovered. The "elect" here have hardly received the earlier Faust Symphony with favor—nay with even the tolerance they have graciously extended to far more mediocre work—if we are to judge from the following gentle encomiums bestowed upon it: It is a "musical nightmare"; "vulgarly blatant"; "a fantastic composition"; "a miracle of dulness"; "musical spasms"; "desperately wearisome"; "a colossal bore", and last, but not least, this gem of criticism—"It has great color, thought, imagination, but it is dull." "Dead for a ducat Horatio!" But behold, the resilient "Faust" appears once more for a hearing and will live long after our little pens have ceased to write for, or against, it.

Liszt, beginning his career with a kiss from Beethoven, acclaimed in Europe as king of pianists, a dazzling virtuoso, died without receiving the prize he most dearly desired—recognition as a great composer. With unusual fortitude a complaint rarely passed his lips though once, during a rehearsal in the Bayreuth opera house, Wagner turned to him and said: "Now, papa, comes a theme which I got from you." Liszt replied bitingly: "Then one will at least hear it"—and we have heard it, to-day, at the beginning of the Faust Symphony! The work is intensely modern in accenting color, rather than form. In its variety of poetic moods it is the forerunner of modern symphonic tendencies, stimulating later men by its original use of thematic material, orchestral color and rhythmic inventiveness, and remain-

From SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

The next musical event of particular importance will be the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take place at the Lyric on the evening of January 6, when Fritz Kreisler will play Beethoven's great violin concerto in D major. This work was first played by Clement, a well-known virtuoso of that day, in 1806, while he was the principal violin of the Theatre "an der Wien," and, as was the case with the "Kreutzer Sonata," Beethoven postponed the completion of it until the very last moment because he hated so to write compositions "to order," and it was being written especially for Clement's own concert. So the unfortunate violinist was obliged to play it at sight, as much of the "Kreutzer Sonata" was played, and, as it was a great and difficult work, and inspired by a spirit that was quite new in those days and teeming with difficulties, it seems to have made but little impression on the public, whom it failed to "reach" entirely. As a result the concerto was practically never played at all until it was revived by Joachim in later years. It is said that the manuscript of this work indicates that the solo part was much altered and worked over, as if it had been elaborated and changed after the first performance.

The Beethoven "Egmont" overture will also be played at this concert, but the symphony will be a modern one, the fourth of J. Guy Ropartz, who was born at Quingamp (Cotes du Nord), in France, in 1864, and who was a pupil of Dubois and Massenet, in the Paris Conservatoire, but who afterward studied with Cesar Franck. Although Ropartz devoted most of his life to composition, he has since 1894 been the director of the conservatoire at Nancy, where he has been instrumental in arousing a great interest in symphony concerts. His "Fourth" symphony is apparently his latest work; but he has written several dramatic numbers and much incidental music to plays, orchestra suites and the like, as well as many minor compositions.

From EVENING STAR

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date

Boston Symphony January 5.

Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, will make his first appearance of the season in Washington as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert in the new National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 5. He will play the Scotch Fantasie of Max Bruch.

The orchestral numbers which Dr. Muck has chosen include the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and Brahm's Variations on a Theme by Haydn.

From GLOBE

Address: New York City

Date

Music

Opera and Other Gossip—"La Traviata."

Three of our Metropolitan Opera House singers journeyed over to Boston to sing in an operatic concert at Symphony Hall Saturday afternoon. They were Mme Delaunois, Mr. Martinelli, and Mr. Rothier. The singer not from the Metropolitan was Mme Elisabeth van Endert of Berlin, who seems to be making her war-time headquarters in Boston. The sage Philip Hale found that Mr. Martinelli, who had hitherto sung there only in opera, was in appearance, in carriage, in his entrances and exits the traditional Italian tenor, sure of himself, and sure of the boisterous applause that inevitably follows a display of musical passion and resonant high notes. "He puccinied and leoncavalloed it in the approved manner."

Mr. Rothier had as his solo an unfamiliar air from Verdi's "Don Carlos." Mr. Hale finds that that accomplished basso sang the air "with the appropriately varied expression." Of particular interest is Mr. Hale's impression of Mme Delaunois, who had not previously sung in Boston and is not yet a known quantity to the music world of New York:

"Her voice has a rich quality, nor in the upper register do the tones become pale or shrill. It is an emotional, appealing voice that at once arrests the attention of the hearer. She sang Mignon's romance with genuine feeling, and was not too playful in the song of the recall. Let us hope that she will be heard again. Voices like hers are not common, and her ingenuous bearing is ingratiating."

No composer is more interesting to us to-day than Arnold Schoenberg, the musical Cubist, Futurist, what you will. Any intelligent criticism of his work [illegible] an actual, vital importance. Last week the Boston Symphony Orchestra played for the first time in Boston his Five Pieces for Orchestra, op. 16. Philip Hale, for whom music did not begin in Germany or end with "Parsifal," whose mind has remained eager and appreciative in regard to the latest developments of music, writes of the pieces in the Boston Herald in a vein that we cannot afford to neglect. Before quoting Mr. Hale it is well to give the names of the Five Pieces—"Presentiments," "The Past," "The Changing Chord," "Peripeteia," "The Obbligato Recitative."

Says Mr. Hale of the Five Pieces:

"Bill Nye said, many years ago, that the music of Wagner was better than it sounded. Arnold Schoenberg says to-day that his own music is better than it sounds.

"The pieces played yesterday are extraordinary. It is easy to say that the composer is a maniac or a poseur. Neither statement would be accurate. Those who have read his treatise on harmony know that he is a man of unusual knowledge, force, originality. Those who heard his quartet last season know that he can write music of uncommon beauty and towering imagination in a more familiar form.

"It would also be easy to say that when Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel' was first performed in Boston the majority in the audience thought the music chaotic, incomprehensible, and the composer mad. To-day, in comparison with Schoenberg's pieces, this symphonic poem is as clear as music by Haydn. Remember, too, that when Debussy's 'Nocturnes' was played twice in succession at Chickering Hall they were thought to be incomprehensible.

"These instances will not answer the objectors to Schoenberg. What is to be said of his five pieces? Personal impressions are interesting chiefly to the person impressed. No two persons hear music in the same way. I could make little out of the first and the fifth pieces. There are fine moments in 'The Past' and 'The Changing Chord,' beautiful suggestions of mood; strangely beautiful effects of color. Nor is the fourth piece wholly inexplicable. To argue for or against this music, which might be of another planet, after even several hearings, would be presumptuous and foolish. It took many Bostonians, well acquainted with orchestral and chamber compositions, a long time to familiarize themselves with the idiom of César Franck, and later with that of Debussy. These composers, however, are not so fundamentally radical, anarchistic, as Schoenberg."

As to the behavior of the audience Mr. Hale is irresistibly droll:

"When Schoenberg's Five Pieces were performed for the first time in London, and in Chicago, there were scenes of outspoken disapproval. Yesterday the behavior of the audience was highly creditable to Boston. There was smiling; there was giggling at times; there was applause. Nobody rose to remonstrate. Nothing was thrown at Dr. Muck and the orchestra. There was no perturbation of Nature to show that Schoenberg's pieces were playing; the sun did not hasten its descent; there was no earthquake shock. It was as it should have been in Boston."

Dr. Muck should without fail introduce these pieces to New York at one of the coming Carnegie Hall concertos of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The great Monday night audience at the Metropolitan Opera House was regaled with a performance of "La Traviata," the second in that house this season. As before, Miss Hempel, Mr. Botta, and Mr. Amato appeared in the chief rôles and Mr. Polacco conducted.

MONITOR,

JANUARY 2,

FRITZ KREISLER WITH SYMPHONY AS THE SOLOIST

Orchestra With Assistance of the Apollo Club and Paul Draper Plays Liszt's "Faust" Symphony as the Other Number

SYMPHONY HALL—Tenth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of Jan. 1. The program: Liszt, "Faust" symphony (Apollo Club and Paul Draper, tenor, assisting); Mendelssohn, concerto in E minor for violin (Fritz Kreisler, soloist).

Mr. Kreisler gave a brilliant performance of the solo part of the Mendelssohn piece, as was his duty. If anybody can make acceptable a form of composition which belongs to past epochs, it is he. If the violin concerto—a type of composition which nearly all modern composers have discarded—is worth reviving, it is under the circumstances of this rehearsal. The flourish and show of a visiting artist is somewhere near justified when the work is of the extraordinary quality of the Friday soloist's.

Happily the Symphony concert public as a whole does not find its chief pleasure in exhibitions by artists who travel about the country with a gripsack full of sweet tunes. At the tenth rehearsal the inter- [illegible] appreciation for orchestral music, the men's abilities in interpretation and the conductor's judgment and skill. If any visitors were present from far away, they got a better idea of musical Boston and of the Symphony orchestra than they could have got at any other concert this season.

The leading work on the program was by the composer who is being understood as the most important one of the nineteenth century, as more important than Beethoven, because he opened up possibilities for 50 years of progress, whereas Beethoven only brought to culmination the ideas of the music writers who preceded him. The version of the work presented was one which the composer sketched as an improvement over his first score and did not have time to publish. The day demanded the best of the Symphony men and it received their best.

Now as to what that best is. Let it be judged by the reading of the "Faust" symphony as a whole. Let no allowance whatever be made on the ground that the symphony is anything short of a masterpiece of composition. Let Liszt be taken for granted as doing his part thoroughly. If anything was lacking to a perfect result, let the orchestra answer for it.

It was to be expected that the orchestra would be pleasing in the second part of the work, the part which depicts the character of Marguerite. That division of the symphony, even in the days when Liszt was considered a manufacturer of noise and an advocate of structural confusion, could be made to charm an audience by the most Beethovenish of orchestras. Containing many of the traits of the slow movement of classic symphonies, it could easily be given persuasion and appeal. The third section of the work, in which the figure of Mephistopheles is projected on the scene, was a greater challenge. It could hardly have been a surprise to listeners that Dr. Muck and his men gave a triumphant reading of this portion of Liszt's composition. For in it satire has free rein. And laughter, whether of the merry or the grim kind, never fails of its value in Symphony orchestra interpretations.

But how about the first section of this piece, the one which gives the picture of the title character? Here, the general purpose from the standpoint of formal composition is clear enough. The opening "Faust" episode is an allegro movement, just as the first part of any symphony would be. It is as carefully held within allegro lines as the second and third divisions are kept within andante and scherzo lines and as is the closing choral portion within regular finale lines. The problem for the orchestra, then, was to interpret with power that portion of the symphony in which the composer expressed himself the most intellectually.

Analysts have agreed that intellectual is about as good a single word as is to be found to describe the content of an allegro, just as they have agreed on sentimental and humorous as the words that answer broadly to describe the two inside divisions of a four-movement work. Though the word intellectual comes into the case with some awkwardness of gait, it does what is wanted of it when it gets there.

Now the Symphony orchestra on Friday afternoon was conspicuously less telling in the "Faust" section than in the "Marguerite" and "Mephisto" sections and in the choral close. It failed, that is to say, to meet to the full the severest test which the composer offered. And it is right here that the Boston Symphony orchestra has fallen below again and again. Not in execution. For nothing could be asked better than the playing of the notes. But mechanism, however important and interesting in music, is not thought.

Accurate delivery of the lines by the various groups of instruments in a piece where theme counts for so much as in the opening movement of the "Faust" symphony is a delightful thing. But it does not pass for thorough reading of the music. The rendering of allegro parts of symphonies has been admirably done of late at the concerts, but it has not been done with intellectual enthusiasm on the part of the performers. Such parts of symphonies were better done five years ago. But everybody knows that it went against the grain to have things so. The members of an organization for which pretty tall assertions, like "first of its kind in the world," are made, seem to be better satisfied when they do their task competently as artisans than they used to be when they tried to do it purposefully as men.

[88]

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 4,

LISZT, MUCK AND KREISLER

An Audience at the Symphony Concert of Saturday Stirred as It Has Rarely Been in Long Memories—The Bettered Violinist

Mr KREISLER was more nearly himself than he had been on Friday afternoon when he repeated Mendelssohn's concerto for violin before an audience that had evidently come in high expectation of his playing of it and in as high of the performance of Liszt's "Faust Symphony" by Dr. Muck and the orchestra. For once—and yet it is no so unfamiliar a happening at Symphony Hall—the box office turned scores of purchasers away because there were no more places. For once, too—and again it was not so unusual an incident—the applause at the end of the symphony was in just measure with the performance. Not four, as on Friday, but five and six times was Dr. Muck recalled, more moved than he has ever shown himself publicly in Boston, and full of eagerness to pass over the plaudits to the men of the band and to the choristers of the Apollo Club. In long recollection, no Symphony Concert has more stirred an audience and, as some were saying as they departed, Dr. Muck's eagerly expected version of "Zarathustra" is only three weeks away. Again hearers had come to listen to symphonic music and risen from it as from music-drama. Fortunate the act of an opera that could so fill the stage and so possess the auditorium as did the "Gretchen" movement under Dr. Muck's hand. Through the lights of romance, too evasive for the machinery of opera houses to summon, they that listened not only heard voices, but saw figures and scene. It was stageless music evoking what music of the stage often fails to do. And so indeed throughout all the two-fold masterpiece of composer and conductor.

As for Mr. Kreisler he played through the first movement of the concerto with far more of the recreating fire with which he can make "passage-work" sound like improvisation and bring a melody into being as by gathering impulse of music and violin, than he could summon on Friday. Then he was content with masterful exposition; on Saturday he added the feeling that vitalizes statement with imagination. In the second movement again, he plied, as he did not on Friday, those subtleties of expression, like the adroit use of a delicately vibrant tone and an equal adroit spinning of transitions, that made Mendelssohn's sentimental song seem the expression of a beauty it had awakened in Mr. Kreisler and that was of him only.

ADVERTISER,

JANUARY 2

THE SYMPHONY OF THIS WEEK

PROGRAMME OF PLEASING CONTRAST PERFORMED

A "Revised" Faust and Mendelssohn's Concerto — The Apollo Club Chorus Sings.

PROGRAMME.

Liszt—A Faust Symphony.
Chorus from the Apollo Club.
Mr. Paul Draper, tenor.
Mendelssohn—Concerto in E minor for violin.
Mr. Fritz Kreisler, soloist.

The "Faust Symphony," heard in Boston several times—indeed, it was performed here with chorus before our orchestra was founded—underwent a change at Liszt's hands during one of his last visits to Wagner's home in Bayreuth. The composer, even as did the philosopher of the poem, poured a new elixir of life into his Faust's veins. It was this rejuvenated symphony that Dr. Muck, the orchestra and 50 members of the Apollo Club presented to a Boston audience for the first time yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

The original score of the work was stolen from Liszt and there were, at that time, those who wished it had never been recovered. The "elect" here have hardly received the earlier Faust Symphony with favor—nay with even the tolerance they have graciously extended to far more mediocre work—if we are to judge from the following gentle encomiums bestowed upon it: It is a "musical nightmare"; "vulgarly blatant"; "a fantastic composition"; "a miracle of dulness"; "musical spasms"; "desperately wearisome"; "a colossal bore", and last, but not least, this gem of criticism—"It has great color, thought, imagination, but it is dull." "Dead for a ducat Horatio!" But behold, the resilient "Faust" appears once more for a hearing and will live long after our little pens have ceased to write for, or against, it.

Liszt, beginning his career with a kiss from Beethoven, acclaimed in Europe as king of pianists, a dazzling virtuoso, died without receiving the prize he most dearly desired—recognition as a great composer. With unusual fortitude a complaint rarely passed his lips though once, during a rehearsal in the Bayreuth opera house, Wagner turned to him and said: "Now, papa, comes a theme which I got from you." Liszt replied bitingly: "Then one will at least hear it"—and we have heard it, today, at the beginning of the Faust Symphony! The work is intensely modern in accenting color, rather than form. In its variety of poetic moods it is the forerunner of modern symphonic tendencies, stimulating later men by its original use of thematic material, orchestral color and rhythmic inventiveness, and remair-

The "symphony" is not an embodiment in tone of Goethe's poem, but, rather, Liszt's own conception and characterization in the terms of another art of the three distinctive figures of Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles, with a closing apotheosis of the "woman-soul" by the "chorus Mysticus."

The first movement pictures Faust the world-weary searcher; racked by doubt; perplexed, querulous even, at the futility of his efforts to attain the goal. A masterly orchestra picture of the struggles of the unhappy philosopher. The blighting storm of pessimism is gradually dissolved; the inquiry theme loses its first strained, distorted form and soothed by the gentle influence of the presence of Gretchen "affettuoso poco andante" the music takes on hues of content, joy, pride as Faust triumphs over himself, breaking into an exultant march—full orchestra, yet the movement ends with sad inquiry.

There are some barren places in this movement.

The second movement, "Gretchen," is introduced by a musing prelude of flutes and clarinets—not especially noteworthy—leading to music pure and tender, characterizing the maiden, modestly sung by oboe to viola accompaniment and growing in loveliness until, when taken up by the clarinet, it becomes idyllic in its beauty. A repetition of the theme, glowing now and emotional, leads to the entrance of Faust with the familiar motive of the first "tone-picture," but now imbued with the contentment of his love for Marguerite. The movement ends with those entrancing harmonies of orchestration which Wagner knew how to use later in his own work!

The last movement, "Mephistopheles," unequalled of its kind, is a masterpiece of genius. Here is no lack of inspiration. The orchestra seethes and crackles with malevolent irony, turning the Faust theme into wry, distorted shapes. We know the piccolo is the instrument of Hades, but we never expected the innocent bassoon to speak in a voice raucous with sardonic irony, startling in effect, the voice of Satan himself! Sinister timbres course through the instruments; the Faust theme deformed in rhythm, intervals, orchestration, is whirled into blasphemous tumult, brought to a sudden stop by shimmerings of light in the violins and the appearance of the Gretchen motive in the oboe. The furious storm breaks out once more and is stilled forever by the reappearance of the Gretchen symbol. The majestic tones of the trombones are heard fortissimo; an expectant pause, then the solemn uplifting tones of organ and chorus singing "Alles Verganliche," slowly mounting in wonderful heavenward ascent, broken by the entrance of the tenor solo singing "the woman-soul draws us onward." The "transport" can never be sustained here without a voice of rarest musical beauty. This, with all his earnestness, Mr. Draper does not possess. The work ends in a climax, superb in its majesty and power.

The attention is kept alert, the pulses high throughout the course of this extraordinary masterpiece. It warms the blood, stirs the imagination, enwraps and whirls one along in the intensity of its mood and copious flow of changing harmonies and dissonances. We neither sit aloof in ennui nor, in mere cerebral admiration for cunningly turned phrases, or clever orchestration. Here is the complete Liszt with all his characteristics indelibly marked, to be liked or disliked, abhorred or revered. He is too strong to be ignored, or tolerated, so true lovers of music have expressed themselves in words strong either of dispraise or enthusiasm. Are there flaws in the masterpiece? No doubt, but there are spots on the sun and we do not cavil!

That "a masterpiece may need only be interpreted, to be condemned," will never be said of yesterday's performance. Dr. Muck gave a superb reading of the work, moulding its every phrase into the most expressive form; each tessera, clean cut in itself, contributory to the line, color and mass of the whole marvelous mosaic, a poetic-psychologic rhapsody. The chorus was excellent in volume and quality. Fortunate indeed is a composer to have his work given in such superb fashion. Fortunate the audience to have opportunity to hear such performance of the music. Never was a conductor more "en rapport" with a work; never an audience more appreciative!

With Kreisler we embarked on a voyage to the musical antipodes of Liszt—the Mendelssohn violin concerto. At first the image of the colossus of Weimar could not be effaced by the transparent stream of Mendelssohn's harmonies. The art of Mr. Kreisler finally triumphed, compelling with sweet insistence an attentive ear. Only a violinist of his genius could, under the circumstances, have so succeeded. Before the "andante" was reached we were completely under the spell of his magic bow evoking harmonies of sweet tranquility trembling at times to the verge of ecstasy. The tricksy, elf-like theme of the brilliant "allegro" sparkled with increased rapidity to a presto finale clear in its fingering. The violinist was most enthusiastically welcomed and applauded. He returns to us with the wizardry of old ennobled by a breadth of intuitive sympathy which adds to the personal note of the voice of humanity.

F. J. F.

BOSTON POST,

JANUARY 2,

DR. MUCK'S GREATEST TRIUMPH

Gives Masterly Reading of Liszt's "Faust" —Kreisler, Soloist

Yesterday afternoon, at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, the patrons of these concerts experienced a performance of Liszt's "Faust" symphony like no other performance of the work that had ever taken place in this city, and like very few performances of any work given in American concert halls. For the effect of this performance, upon the most indifferent hearer, one must search for a comparison among the festival plays and performances given occasionally in historic auditoriums of Europe. The nervous, prosperity-ridden American seldom knows such moments. Here we are accustomed to performances of great technical brilliancy, to a few orchestras of the very first rank, to world-famous singers and virtuosi, of whom we are hyper-critical, but it is seldom given us to attend an occasion when the most indifferent listener, as well as the most absorbed interpreter, is prostrate, for that hour at least, in the presence of art.

DR. MUCK'S ACHIEVEMENT

Interpreting this symphony, Dr. Muck stood on an incomparable height. Before such an achievement his greatest accomplishment on any previous occasion seems pale. The conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been chosen with more and more care of late years, as the orchestra took its place in the very front rank of such organizations in the world. It was desired that no effort or expense should be spared to secure leaders worthy of the band and of the ideals of its founder and maintainer. Of those who have led the Boston orchestra, Dr. Muck probably stands at the head. His sterling musicianship, his commanding personality, his superb control of the orchestra, have enforced the realization of his purposes and standards. But the spell of yesterday's performance was due to more than exceptional ability as a leader and musicianship, or the most admirable skill and co-operation on the part of the players. It was an occasion when a great musician, consecrating every energy and every perception in him to his task, recreated the music, with the composer.

Its Greatness Revealed

Under Dr. Muck's baton the symphony of Liszt made an astonishing impression. At last it stood revealed in the full measure of its greatness, a prophetic masterpiece, one of the most significant tonal creations of the late 19th century. Never before in the experience of the hearer was Liszt at once so articulate and so loftily eloquent. Without doubt some of this articulateness and this surpassing eloquence was due to the fact that for the first time anywhere the "Faust" symphony was performed in the latest version of the work, which Liszt completed, as Dr. Muck was informed, about 1883.

Dr. Muck, in 1912, discovered the corrected score of the "Faust" symphony in Wagner's library at Wahnfried. He was given permission to perform this version, and it seems that with the most gratifying forethought he reserved the first performance for Boston.

Adds the Bass Clarinet

Liszt's emendations are said to be not extensive. They consist in the addition of the bass clarinet to Liszt's table of instruments employed for the symphony, in the rescoring of some passages, and in a number of not very extensive excisions, and in the extension of a passage in the last movement. The work has, however, unless the memory of the writer is wholly at fault, been made more brilliant in its coloring, more distinct in the contrasting of voices and tone-colors, and more concise. Some passages of repetition, pure and simple, have been removed, and the most important change, perhaps, is that the Gretchen music in the finale, which has been extended somewhat and made more impressive. This much for the letter. Dr. Muck conveyed the spirit as has no conductor before him.

It has been easy for those disposed that way to murmur respectful admiration for the subtlety and modernity of many passages of the "Faust" symphony, but the admiration on the part of the average concert-goer has been rather dutiful and skin-deep than a matter of genuine and deep-seated conviction. Yesterday all of the music seemed inevitable and unalterable.

Strikingly Developed

The themes themselves, in the first movement of a Wagnerish tinge, are uncommonly expressive, but never before had their development and transformation been made so intelligible and so striking. It is such performances which explain the prevalence of Liszt on the concert platform. How he has endured, and yet how long he has had to wait for his reward! With what originality and what daring did he compose his later works. The "Faust" symphony, consisting of three character sketches, "Faust," "Gretchen," "Mephistopheles," picture these characters, associates them, with a magic that the most gifted commentator on Goethe's poem might stand confounded before. Faust, his aspirations, his passions, his doubts, his romanticism, is portrayed in every phase of his being.

The Gretchen movement is one of the moments when Liszt, for a rarity, achieves a genuine simplicity. Nothing more naive, and more subtly touched with sensuous longing than this music! Nothing could be finer in the modern musical art, or more cunningly welded together, than that portion of the Gretchen movement, which suggests the vision of Faust, and the longing for lost delights, the supreme tenderness of one who has given all. Then it is impossible to avoid superlatives in speaking of the final movement, where the influence of Berlioz is most perceptible. It might be better to say, where Liszt comes nearest to Berlioz in his subject matter and in his style. There is the masterly irony and scorn with which the motives that illustrate phases of Faust character are parodied by the orchestra. There is the rebuking music of Marguerite, and following another storm of mockery and denial, the "chorus mysticus."

Apollo Club in Chorus

This passage was sung by the Apollo Club and Mr. Paul Draper was the solo singer. Aside from the fact that a chorus of twice the number of male voices could easily be used in this conclusion against the heavy orchestration, the performance of the singers was more than creditable, and will probably be still better this evening. Mr. Draper did all that could be done with his vocal material to carry out the wishes of conductor and composer, and this was much. Dr. Muck was indeed the soul and the brains of the performance and his very back said more than the majority of the willing faces in front of him. The reception of the work told more than words. When the last chord had sounded there was a second of absolute silence, and then the conductor, stormily applauded, was recalled again and again to the stage. It is not to the detriment of the soloist of the afternoon, and it is a very good sign for the popularity and understanding of great orchestral music, that the conductor, and hence the symphony, were applauded even more than Mr. Fritz Kreisler.

Kreisler the Soloist

Mr. Kreisler played the Mendelssohn violin concerto. It was as though he had been listening back of the stage to Liszt's music, and as though he himself felt how small a violin concerto, especially of the very fine but conventional workmanship of Mendelssohn, showed by the side of the great tone poem. For Mr. Kreisler, who performed in an excellent manner, usually makes a much deeper impression than he did on this occasion, and the concerto, of which the last two movements were the most effective, has been presented here to better advantage. That is all right. Mr. Kreisler is not nearly so much in need of public appreciation as Liszt's symphony, and it is well that many who came to applaud a justly esteemed virtuoso should have stayed, figuratively speaking, to pray before a great work of art. It was a performance which will be talked of for a long time to come, a performance which must have meant the realization of many things, the reward of many labors, to Major Higginson, listening in his chair.

BOSTON HERALD,
JANUARY 2.

10TH PUBLIC SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Liszt's 'Faust' Symphony Never Heard Here Before in Full Beauty—Kreisler Plays.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 10th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. A male chorus from the Apollo Club and Mr. Paul Draper, tenor, assisted in the performance of the symphony. Mr. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, was the soloist. The program consisted of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony and Mendelssohn's concerto for the violin.

There have been performances of Liszt's symphony in Boston, with and without the final chorus, during the last 35 years, but the music was never heard here in its full beauty and dramatic power until yesterday. Nor was this due to the fact that Dr. Muck conducted from a score revised by Liszt a few years before his death, a score that hitherto had not been used in a concert hall and knows no publisher.

The glory is to Dr. Muck himself and the superb instrument on which he played, an instrument that included a chorus, which had been well prepared, and in the performance showed fine tonal quality and impressive volume. Dr. Muck was the first to make us realize and appreciate the organic whole, the imposing structure, the close relationship between the three movements, the dramatic characterization of Faust, Gretchen, Mephistopheles; and for the first time the final chorus had marked significance.

Not only was there constant evidence of the infinite pains taken in the rehearsal of the symphony; there was the poetic, the dramatic, the imaginative, ruling spirit that vivified the music and removed all thought of pedagogic drill.

The symphony is not so familiar that an audience would easily note the excisions, changes and strengthening of voices in the revision. Musicians themselves could note all the material changes only by comparison of the two scores. In the version of yesterday there is more color; voices that otherwise were obscured came to a hearing; measures of irritating repetition were omitted.

For the first time within our recollection the music itself made a deep impression on the audience. Maeterlinck in his essay on Silence remarks: "It any real communication can ever pass from one man to another." Music such as the Faust symphony fills this silence; it speaks the truth that otherwise would remain unspoken. In comparison with Liszt's characterization of Goethe's figures in the mighty drama, how paltry and contemptible appear the singing puppets of opera. It might be said that Liszt's maiden is more the ideal Gretchen than Goethe's. The themes alone evoke a vision of pure and pathetic maidenhood. The first movement portrays the inquiring, philosophic Faust, restless with the restlessness that vainly seeks satisfaction. It matters not whether Liszt borrowed the idea of Mephistopheles's bitter mockery of the Faust motives from Berlioz's "Episode in the Life of an Artist." Here he went beyond the earlier master. The metamorphoses are the expression of the Spirit that denies; they are the Fiend's arch-mock; witness the satanic irony in the transformation of Faust's triumphal motive, first given in its splendor to the brass; afterwards debased, humbled in the dust.

It would be impertinent after this amazing performance for one still obsessed by the symphony to speak of its historical importance, of its influence on Wagner in opera; of its influence on symphonic writers of modern and ultra-modern schools. There is music by Liszt that is sheer bombast; music that in sentiment is mawkish, puling; music that has the glitter and the sawdust of the circus; music that is artificially and pretentiously naive. For Liszt wrote much, and no composer has the birthright of plenary inspiration. The "Faust" symphony puts Liszt among the immortals.

Mr. Kreisler was warmly welcomed. It is to be regretted that he chose Mendelssohn's concerto. It is not one of the war-horses on which he rides securely to glory. Yesterday his performance of the first movement was rather perfunctory. In the remaining pages he showed qualities that have made him famous, and yet the music seemed as something exterior, not intimate, not convincing.

This, perhaps, was not so much the fault of the admirable violinist as it was that of the composer. The violinists say that the concerto is wonderfully made. They mean—for the violin. No doubt it is finely contrived, laboriously polished. The expression is smug. The music recalls an old portrait of Mendelssohn with his genial smile—when he was not listening to the music of another; with his voluminous shirt front and huge and glittering pin; also the picture of Mendelssohn by Aubrey Beardsley, priggish, impeccable, ready to talk affably with Queen Victoria's consort or to make a neat sketch of an admired view on the smoothest Bristol board.

There will be no concerts next week. The program of Jan. 15-16 will be as follows: Brahms, Symphony in C minor; Fried, Prelude and Double Fugue for strings; Adagio and Scherzo for wind instruments, two harps and kettle-drums; Mozart, Overture to "The Magic Flute."

BOSTON JOURNAL—
JANUARY 2,

CONCERT CROWNS MUSICAL SEASON

Conductor Muck and Fritz Kreisler Heroes of Rare Symphony Concert.

Either one of the two attractions at this week's Symphony concerts would suffice to make a phenomenal success. It is safe to say that the chief symphonic feature of the season is Liszt's "Faust Symphony," the revised version of which was played in America yesterday for the first time, and that the leading soloist of the year is Fritz Kreisler, who yesterday played the Mendelssohn concerto in E minor for the first time at the Symphony concerts. The concerto has been on a Symphony program every few years since 1882, but it has had no other such gifted interpreter as this crown prince of living violinists.

The result of this rare combination of attractions was a succession of ovations yesterday. Dr. Muck and the orchestra received one after the extraordinarily fine performance of Liszt's masterwork, which may be described as an opera without words; and Kreisler received another after his masterly performance of the capital concerto that Mendelssohn wrote for Ferdinand David seventy years ago.

On the whole, this tenth program of the season, which will be repeated to-night, has aroused more interest and more enthusiasm than Symphony Hall has witnessed since Dr. Muck came to Boston. Two absolutely sold-out houses prove the interest and the two ovations given yesterday proved the enthusiasm.

In the performance of the Liszt number, which is divided into three tone pictures, called "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles," the orchestra is assisted by Paul Draper, the tenor soloist, and the Apollo Club. These assistants won a fair share of the applause yesterday for their sympathetic and skilful singing. The symphony is filled with lyric beauties and graphic orchestral effects. The vocal part is a "Chorus mysticus," with solo, fitting into the dramatic finale. Dr. Muck's reading of the symphony was a perfect example of the conductor's art. Kreisler's beautiful performance crowned a concert of remarkable merit.

BOSTON GLOBE

JANUARY 2.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fritz Kreisler Welcomed With Enthusiasm.

Liszt's 'Faust' Symphony in Revised Form for First Time.

Although yesterday's program at the Symphony concert consisted of only two numbers, a somewhat revised form of the "Faust" symphony by Liszt and the appearance of Fritz Kreisler as a soloist made the event one of unusual interest in the series. Liszt composed the symphony about 60 years ago and three years later added a chorus to the finale. Some 30 years ago he made changes, chiefly in the orchestration, and this score Dr Muck found at Bayreuth in 1912. The work in the revised state was performed yesterday for the first time here. A male chorus from the Apollo Club, Paul Draper, tenor soloist, assisted.

Three principal characters of Goethe's "Faust" are symbolized in the music, Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles, the representative themes, as is generally the case in musical picturing, indicating prominent phases of man or woman as the case may be. And any one familiar with the Faust legend can easily conjure up personal attributes of each outlined in beautiful melodic form.

The symphony, in parts and as a whole, is well known to concert patrons, and the changes in the score heard yesterday doubtless improved the portions revised, and to musicians and students these changes were specially interesting.

The general scheme has not been altered, but the orchestration has in some cases been developed more fully, and a new instrument is introduced.

The character motifs are splendid examples of "musical visualizing," for the changes in the moods of the three personages are worked out in a score teeming with beautiful orchestral combinations.

Faust's passion, intermingled with Gretchen's pure love and mocked in the Mephisto music; her innocence, tenderness, devotion, despair and redemption, and the diabolism of the arch fiend are set forth vividly, the background of impending fate cropping out frequently in the masures allotted to the heavier instrumental choirs.

The performance deserves high praise, the orchestra conquering with its usual skill the many difficulties in the score. The club sang the chorus with good effect and Mr Draper's solo work was commendable. The audience gave more than the traditional perfunctory applause.

Judging from the applause showered upon Fritz Kreisler before and during his performance, this great artist was to many the principal attraction of the afternoon. He was heard in the lovely Mendelssohn E minor concerto for violin.

At his recent recital in this city Kreisler demonstrated that his art was as wonderfully appealing as ever; something that sways auditors at will and which fortunately for the lovers of music has met with no deterioration by reason of war's demands.

The beauty of tone, celerity of execution, breadth and authority of interpretation and ever varying shades of expression were still in evidence throughout his performance.

Of course the brilliant cadenza and dazzling arpeggios and the dashing coda of the finale aroused the greater enthusiasm; but the passionate themes of the first movement and the allegro of the last exerted an appeal almost as potent. A masterly interpretation that seemingly was without a flaw. There will be no concerts this week, the orchestra being away on tour.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date DEC 2 9 1914

Est

BOOKS AND READING.

The anomaly of the development of Puritan Boston into a home of the best music does not escape the notice of M. A. DeWolfe Howe, historian of the music- organization for which the Hub is esp cially eminent. In his book on "T Boston Symphony Orchestra" (Hough Mifflin; $2 net), he recalls that "T earlier Puritans did little or nothing cultivate music." It was just a centu ago, upon the occasion of the c bration of the end of the war betw Great Britain and the United States, t Boston had its "first considerable orga zation of music-lovers." From vari sources, including the excellent choir the Park Street Church, a chorus was sembled for the singing of portions of "Creation," the "Messiah," and ot works appropriate to a peace jubilee, from this chorus the Handel and Haydn Society was formed in 1815. The step from this chorus to the world-famous Symphony may not seem so long when we are reminded that the Handel and Haydn Society was ambitious enough to write to Beethoven in 1323 to offer him a commission to write an oratorio especially for its use. Although the commission was never executed, an entry in one of the composer's note-books shows that he intended to do something about it. How primitive, nevertheless, was the taste of the time, abroad as well as here, is suggested by an incident at a public afternoon rehearsal in Boston by a Berlin orchestra about the middle of the century. One of the numbers was the "Railway Galop," composer forgotten, "during the playing of which a little mock steam-engine kept scooting about (by clockwork?) on the floor of the hall, with black cotton-wool smoke coming out of the funnel."

But the interest of the volume lies mainly in what it has to relate of the origin and the development of the Boston Symphony. It was in the spring of 1881 that Henry L. Higginson set down his ambitions, "In Re the Boston Symphony Orchestra." In this statement he anticipated an annual deficit of $50,000, which he assumed. The average for the third of a century of the orchestra's existence has been about $80,000. The selection of the first conductor speedily followed the appearance of Georg Henschel at a concert given by the Harvard Musical Association, where he conducted a concert overture composed by himself. In conducting he did not mount the conductor's platform, but stood among the players. So great was the impression he made upon Mr. Higginson, among the rest of those who heard the performance, that his engagement for the new orchestra was announced the same month. Yet he had no bed of roses in his new work. Criticism at first was violent. The Boston correspondent of a New York musical journal wrote his paper that "there are more dissonances in Music Hall now in a week than there used to be in a year." This tone was moderated before long, however, and the orchestra rapidly established itself in both popular and critical favor. As an example of the educational spirit of the conductor may be mentioned his offering of the Vorspiel of "Parsifal" shortly after its first American production by the Philharmonic here. Mr. Henschel gave it to his audience at the beginning of the programme—and again at the end. Mr. Higginson's way with conductors comes out again when, towards the end of his first conductor's term, he went to Vienna, where he saw "a conductor with black hair, whose method of conducting pleased me much." This was Gericke. He asked a friend whether Gericke would come to conduct the Boston Symphony. The friend laughed at the idea—but before many days Gericke has signed a contract that made him the Symphony's second leader. If it was not quite just to characterize the orchestra at that time as "une agrégation fortuite d'éléments hétérogènes," nevertheless it was Gericke who earned the praise of "making" the orchestra.

There is no space here to trace further the fortunes of the organization. Mr. Howe has recorded them, not only with evident care and affection, but also with many a humorous anecdote and bit of comment.

Fritz Kreisler

© Aime Dupont

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 2 7

Establi

TRAVELTALKS AND RECITALS

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Fritz Kreisler, one of the greatest of living violinists, returned safely from the war in which he served until severely wounded, will make his first appearance of the season in Washington as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert which will be given in the National Tuesday afternoon, January 5. Kreisler will play the Scotch Fantasie of Max Bruch.

The orchestral numbers which Dr. Muck has chosen combine with the Bruch number to make a most delightful afternoon of music. The symphony will be the lovely genial Eighth Symphony of Beethoven. Schumann will be represented by his romantic "Genoveva" overture and the third orchestral number will be Brahms' impressive variations on a theme by Haydn.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

Established

FRITZ KREISLER TO BE HEARD AT INFANTRY HALL

Mme. Schumann-Heink Unable to Appear in Concert.

Owing to a sudden illness, Mme. Schuman-Heink will be unable to make her appearance at Infantry Hall with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, next Tuesday evening. Fritz Kreisler, the celebrated Austrian violinist has, been engaged as soloist and wil be heard in several numbers.

Mr. Kreisler has but recently returned to America from Europe, where he saw service in the war and received wounds which rendered him incapable of further service. Fortunately, however, his violin playing abilities were not impaired and he will be heard in concerts throughout the country. This will be his only appearance in Providence for the season. Among other numbers he will play the Mendelssohn concerto.

The orchestral programme includes Ropartz's Symphony, No. 4, in C-major, which will be rendered for the first time in Providence. The symphony is short and is one movement. Other numbers will be Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva" and Wagner's "Tannhauser"

BOSTON GLOBE
JANUARY 2,

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fritz Kreisler Welcomed With Enthusiasm.

Liszt's 'Faust' Symphony in Revised Form for First Time.

Although yesterday's program at the Symphony concert consisted of only two numbers, a somewhat revised form of the "Faust" symphony by Liszt and the appearance of Fritz Kreisler as a soloist made the event one of unusual interest in the series. Liszt composed the symphony about 60 years ago and three years later added a chorus to the finale. Some 30 years ago he made changes, chiefly in the orchestration, and this score Dr Muck found at Bayreuth in 1912. The work in the revised state was performed yesterday for the first time here. A male chorus from the Apollo Club, Paul Draper, tenor soloist, assisted.

Three principal characters of Goethe's "Faust" are symbolized in the music, Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles, the representative themes, as is generally the case in musical picturing, indicating prominent phases of man or woman as the case may be. And any one familiar with the Faust legend can easily conjure up personal attributes of each outlined in beautiful melodic form.

The symphony, in parts and as a whole, is well known to concert patrons, and the changes in the score heard yesterday doubtless improved the portions revised, and to musicians and students these changes were specially interesting.

The general scheme has not been altered, but the orchestration has in some cases been developed more fully, and a new instrument is introduced.

The character motifs are splendid examples of "musical visualizing," for the changes in the moods of the three personages are worked out in a score teeming with beautiful orchestral combinations.

Faust's passion, intermingled with Gretchen's pure love and mocked in the Mephisto music; her innocence, tenderness, devotion, despair and redemption, and the diabolism of the arch fiend are set forth vividly, the background of impending fate cropping out frequently in the masures allotted to the heavier instrumental choirs.

The performance deserves high praise, the orchestra conquering with its usual skill the many difficulties in the score. The club sang the chorus with good effect and Mr Draper's solo work was commendable. The audience gave more than the traditional perfunctory applause.

Judging from the applause showered upon Fritz Kreisler before and during his performance, this great artist was to many the principal attraction of the afternoon. He was heard in the lovely Mendelssohn E minor concerto for violin.

At his recent recital in this city Kreisler demonstrated that his art was as wonderfully appealing as ever; something that sways auditors at will and which fortunately for the lovers of music has met with no deterioration by reason of war's demands.

The beauty of tone, celerity of execution, breadth and authority of interpretation and ever varying shades of expression were still in evidence throughout his performance.

Of course the brilliant cadenza and dazzling arpeggios and the dashing coda of the finale aroused the greater enthusiasm; but the passionate themes of the first movement and the allegro of the last exerted an appeal almost as potent. A masterly interpretation that seemingly was without a flaw. There will be no concerts this week, the orchestra being away on tour.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date DEC 2 9 191

BOOKS AND READING.

The anomaly of the development of Puritan Boston into a home of the best music does not escape the notice of M. A. DeWolfe Howe, historian of the music organization for which the Hub is especially eminent. In his book on "The Boston Symphony Orchestra" (Houghton Mifflin; $2 net), he recalls that "The earlier Puritans did little or nothing to cultivate music." It was just a century ago, upon the occasion of the celebration of the end of the war between Great Britain and the United States, that Boston had its "first considerable organization of music-lovers." From various sources, including the excellent choir of the Park Street Church, a chorus was assembled for the singing of portions of "Creation," the "Messiah," and other works appropriate to a peace jubilee, and from this chorus the Handel and Haydn Society was formed in 1815. The step from this chorus to the world-famous Symphony may not seem so long when we are reminded that the Handel and Haydn Society was ambitious enough to write to Beethoven in 1823 to offer him a commission to write an oratorio especially for its use. Although the commission was never executed, an entry in one of the composer's note-books shows that he intended to do something about it. How primitive, nevertheless, was the taste of the time, abroad as well as here, is suggested by an incident at a public afternoon rehearsal in Boston by a Berlin orchestra about the middle of the century. One of the numbers was the "Railway Galop," composer forgotten, "during the playing of which a little mock steam-engine kept scooting about (by clockwork?) on the floor of the hall, with black cotton-wool smoke coming out of the funnel."

But the interest of the volume lies mainly in what it has to relate of the origin and the development of the Boston Symphony. It was in the spring of 1881 that Henry L. Higginson set down his ambitions, "In Re the Boston Symphony Orchestra." In this statement he anticipated an annual deficit of $50,000, which he assumed. The average for the third of a century of the orchestra's existence has been about $80,000. The selection of the first conductor speedily followed the appearance of Georg Henschel at a concert given by the Harvard Musical Association, where he conducted a concert overture composed by himself. In conducting he did not mount the conductor's platform, but stood among the players. So great was the impression he made upon Mr. Higginson, among the rest of those who heard the performance, that his engagement for the new orchestra was announced the same month. Yet he had no bed of roses in his new work. Criticism at first was violent. The Boston correspondent of a New York musical journal wrote his paper that "there are more dissonances in Music Hall now in a week than there used to be in a year." This tone was moderated before long, however, and the orchestra rapidly established itself in both popular and critical favor. As an example of the educational spirit of the conductor may be mentioned his offering of the Vorspiel of "Parsifal" shortly after its first American production by the Philharmonic here. Mr. Henschel gave it to his audience at the beginning of the programme—and again at the end. Mr. Higginson's way with conductors comes out again when, towards the end of his first conductor's term, he went to Vienna, where he saw "a conductor with black hair, whose method of conducting pleased me much." This was Gericke. He asked a friend whether Gericke would come to conduct the Boston Symphony. The friend laughed at the idea—but before many days Gericke has signed a contract that made him the Symphony's second leader. If it was not quite just to characterize the orchestra at that time as "une agrégation fortuite d'éléments hétérogènes," nevertheless it was Gericke who earned the praise of "making" the orchestra.

There is no space here to trace further the fortunes of the organization. Mr. Howe has recorded them, not only with evident care and affection, but also with many a humorous anecdote and bit of comment.

Fritz Kreisler

©Aimé Dupont

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 2

TRAVELTALKS AND RECITALS

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Fritz Kreisler, one of the greatest of living violinists, returned safely from the war in which he served until severely wounded, will make his first appearance of the season in Washington as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert which will be given in the National Tuesday afternoon, January 5. Kreisler will play the Scotch Fantasie of Max Bruch.

The orchestral numbers which Dr. Muck has chosen combine with the Bruch number to make a most delightful afternoon of music. The symphony will be the lovely genial Eighth Symphony of Beethoven. Schumann will be represented by his romantic "Genoveva" overture and the third orchestral number will be Brahms' impressive variations on a theme by Haydn.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date
Established

FRITZ KREISLER TO BE HEARD AT INFANTRY HALL

Mme. Schumann-Heink Unable to Appear in Concert.

Owing to a sudden illness, Mme. Schuman-Heink will be unable to make her appearance at Infantry Hall with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, next Tuesday evening. Fritz Kreisler, the celebrated Austrian violinist has been engaged as soloist and will be heard in several numbers.

Mr. Kreisler has but recently returned to America from Europe, where he saw service in the war and received wounds which rendered him incapable of further service. Fortunately, however, his violin playing abilities were not impaired and he will be heard in concerts throughout the country. This will be his only appearance in Providence for the season. Among other numbers he will play the Mendelssohn concerto.

The orchestral programme includes Ropartz's Symphony, No. 4, in C-major, which will be rendered for the first time in Providence. The symphony is short and is one movement. Other numbers will be Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva" and Wagner's "Tannhauser"

[90]

BOSTON GLOBE

JANUARY 2,

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fritz Kreisler Welcomed With Enthusiasm.

Liszt's 'Faust' Symphony in Revised Form for First Time.

Although yesterday's program at the Symphony concert consisted of only two numbers, a somewhat revised form of the "Faust" symphony by Liszt and the appearance of Fritz Kreisler as a soloist made the event one of unusual interest in the series. Liszt composed the symphony about 60 years ago and three years later added a chorus to the finale. Some 30 years ago he made changes, chiefly in the orchestration, and this score Dr Muck found at Bayreuth in 1912. The work in the revised state was performed yesterday for the first time here. A male chorus from the Apollo Club, Paul Draper, tenor soloist, assisted.

Three principal characters of Goethe's "Faust" are symbolized in the music, Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles, the representative themes, as is generally the case in musical picturing, indicating prominent phases of man or woman as the case may be. And any one familiar with the Faust legend can easily conjure up personal attributes of each outlined in beautiful melodic form.

The symphony, in parts and as a whole, is well known to concert patrons, and the changes in the score heard yesterday doubtless improved the portions revised, and to musicians and students these changes were specially interesting.

The general scheme has not been altered, but the orchestration has in some cases been developed more fully, and a new instrument is introduced.

The character motifs are splendid examples of "musical visualizing," for the changes in the moods of the three personages are worked out in a score teeming with beautiful orchestral combinations.

Faust's passion, intermingled with Gretchen's pure love and mocked in the Mephisto music; her innocence, tenderness, devotion, despair and redemption, and the diabolism of the arch fiend are set forth vividly, the background of impending fate cropping out frequently in the masures allotted to the heavier instrumental choirs.

The performance deserves high praise, the orchestra conquering with its usual skill the many difficulties in the score. The club sang the chorus with good effect and Mr Draper's solo work was commendable. The audience gave more than the traditional perfunctory applause.

Judging from the applause showered upon Fritz Kreisler before and during his performance, this great artist was to many the principal attraction of the afternoon. He was heard in the lovely Mendelssohn E minor concerto for violin.

At his recent recital in this city Kreisler demonstrated that his art was as wonderfully appealing as ever; something that sways auditors at will and which fortunately for the lovers of music has met with no deterioration by reason of war's demands.

The beauty of tone, celerity of execution, breadth and authority of interpretation and ever varying shades of expression were still in evidence throughout his performance.

Of course the brilliant cadenza and dazzling arpeggios and the dashing coda of the finale aroused the greater enthusiasm; but the passionate themes of the first movement and the allegro of the last exerted an appeal almost as potent. A masterly interpretation that seemingly was without a flaw. There will be no concerts this week, the orchestra being away on tour.

From EVENING POST

Address: New York City

Date, DEC 29 1914

BOOKS AND READING.

The anomaly of the development of Puritan Boston into a home of the best music does not escape the notice of M. A. DeWolfe Howe, historian of the musical organization for which the Hub is especially eminent. In his book on "The Boston Symphony Orchestra" (Houghton Mifflin; $2 net), he recalls that "The earlier Puritans did little or nothing to cultivate music." It was just a century ago, upon the occasion of the celebration of the end of the war between Great Britain and the United States, that Boston had its "first considerable organization of music-lovers." From various sources, including the excellent choir of the Park Street Church, a chorus was assembled for the singing of portions of the "Creation," the "Messiah," and other works appropriate to a peace jubilee, and from this chorus the Handel and Haydn Society was formed in 1815. The step from this chorus to the world-famous Symphony may not seem so long when we are reminded that the Handel and Haydn Society was ambitious enough to write to Beethoven in 1823 to offer him a commission to write an oratorio especially for its use. Although the commission was never executed, an entry in one of the composer's note-books shows that he intended to do something about it. How primitive, nevertheless, was the taste of the time, abroad as well as here, is suggested by an incident at a public afternoon rehearsal in Boston by a Berlin orchestra about the middle of the century. One of the numbers was the "Railway Galop," composer forgotten, "during the playing of which a little mock steam-engine kept scooting about (by clockwork?) on the floor of the hall, with black cotton-wool smoke coming out of the funnel."

But the interest of the volume lies mainly in what it has to relate of the origin and the development of the Boston Symphony. It was in the spring of 1881 that Henry L. Higginson set down his ambitions, "In Re the Boston Symphony Orchestra." In this statement he anticipated an annual deficit of $50,000, which he assumed. The average for the third of a century of the orchestra's existence has been about $30,000. The selection of the first conductor speedily followed the appearance of Georg Henschel at a concert given by the Harvard Musical Association, where he conducted a concert overture composed by himself. In conducting he did not mount the conductor's platform, but stood among the players. So great was the impression he made upon Mr. Higginson, among the rest of those who heard the performance, that his engagement for the new orchestra was announced the same month. Yet he had no bed of roses in his new work. Criticism at first was violent. The Boston correspondent of a New York musical journal wrote his paper that "there are more dissonances in Music Hall now in a week than there used to be in a year." This tone was moderated before long, however, and the orchestra rapidly established itself in both popular and critical favor. As an example of the educational spirit of the conductor may be mentioned his offering of the Vorspiel of "Parsifal" shortly after its first American production by the Philharmonic here. Mr. Henschel gave it to his audience at the beginning of the programme—and again at the end. Mr. Higginson's way with conductors comes out again when, towards the end of his first conductor's term, he went to Vienna, where he saw "a conductor with black hair, whose method of conducting pleased me much." This was Gericke. He asked a friend whether Gericke would come to conduct the Boston Symphony. The friend laughed at the idea—but before many days Gericke has signed a contract that made him the Symphony's second leader. If it was not quite just to characterize the orchestra at that time as "une agrégation fortuite d'éléments hétérogènes," nevertheless it was Gericke who earned the praise of "making" the orchestra.

There is no space here to trace further the fortunes of the organization. Mr. Howe has recorded them, not only with evident care and affection, but also with many a humorous anecdote and bit of comment.

Fritz Kreisler

Aimé Dupont

From POST

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date DEC 27

TRAVELTALKS AND RECITALS

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Fritz Kreisler, one of the greatest of living violinists, returned safely from the war in which he served until severely wounded, will make his first appearance of the season in Washington as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert which will be given in the National Tuesday afternoon, January 5. Kreisler will play the Scotch Fantasie of Max Bruch.

The orchestral numbers which Dr. Muck has chosen combine with the Bruch number to make a most delightful afternoon of music. The symphony will be the lovely genial Eighth Symphony of Beethoven. Schumann will be represented by his romantic "Genoveva" overture and the third orchestral number will be Brahms' impressive variations on a theme by Haydn.

JOURNAL

Providence, R. I.

FRITZ KREISLER TO BE HEARD AT INFANTRY HALL

Mme. Schumann-Heink Unable to Appear in Concert.

Owing to a sudden illness, Mme. Schuman-Heink will be unable to make her appearance at Infantry Hall with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, next Tuesday evening. Fritz Kreisler, the celebrated Austrian violinist has, been engaged as soloist and will be heard in several numbers.

Mr. Kreisler has but recently returned to America from Europe, where he saw service in the war and received wounds which rendered him incapable of further service. Fortunately, however, his violin playing abilities were not impaired and he will be heard in concerts throughout the country. This will be his only appearance in Providence for the season. Among other numbers he will play the Mendelssohn concerto.

The orchestral programme includes Ropartz's Symphony, No. 4, in C-major, which will be rendered for the first time in Providence. The symphony is short and is one movement. Other numbers will be Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva" and Wagner's "Tannhauser"

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, JANUARY 2, 1915

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

LISZT'S "FAUST SYMPHONY" IN NEW REVELATION

A Performance by Orchestra, Chorus and Conductor That Transformed It Into Veritable and Puissant Music-Drama—The Mated Glories of Piece and Playing—The Contrasts of Mendelssohn and of Kreisler Not Altogether at His Best

FOR the first time in long recollection of Mr. Kreisler's many appearances in Boston, the violinist and his concerto were measurably af-faced, yesterday afternoon at the Symphony Concert, by the music and the performance that preceded them. Never before had Liszt's "Faust Symphony" sounded upon Bostonian ears as Dr. Muck, the orchestra and the chorus of the Apollo Club made it sound. Seldom before had Mendelssohn's concerto for violin, which Mr. Kreisler elected to play, sounded so thin, colorless and outmoded, of another musical generation and speech than ours, as it did in succession to such a piece enriched by such tonal eloquence. Never before, with orchestra, had Mr. Kreisler undertaken the concerto in Boston; he has long been fond of it; he plays it con amore; yet, as it seemed yesterday, he accomplished no more with it than might any violinist of the first rank. Perhaps the nervousness that seems the inevitable portion of eminent virtuosi when they return to the Symphony Concerts beset him; perhaps he was more than usually moved by the warmth of the audience toward him, by his consciousness of its high expectations, by reaction from the emotions of the performance of the symphony which he also had just heard; perhaps the strain of his military service and his wound has for the time lessened his self-poise and mastery. Clearly, he was not altogether himself in the first movement of the concerto; and he was no more than that self through the Andante and Finale. He did spin the filigree of the last movement with that fineness and suppleness of tone that makes it as a shining web upon the air and he and Dr. Muck were at one in the light play of the rhythms and the euphonies with which they blended Mendelssohn's delicate instrumental voices. Their two artistries were as delicate and the music kept the elegance, the charm, the fancy of its shimmering surface. There was not, there never has been, much within and the deftness of it all hardly veneers its hollowness.

Mr. Kreisler played the slow song with the grace of undulating tone, with the gentle play of sentiment, with the felicities of rounded phrase and insinuating transition that were to be expected of him. Yet the music sounded faded and lukewarm, and the ear heard it as the eye glances down a page of poetry that has outlived the time for which it was written artfully and honestly enough. Of course, Mr. Kreisler was dexterous and elegant with the "passage-work" of the first movement, that is to display the virtuoso's skill, the varied voice of his instrument and the composer's feeling for them. But the violinist, for once, did not fill the listening ear with the rhapsodic suggestion of invention and creation at play with themselves with which he usually transforms such passages. They remained fioritura and cadenza. The insinuating undulation, the exquisite softness and smoothness and sensibility that Mr. Kreisler can give his tone, when he is playing the music of sentiment and elegance, did serve him well through the songful passages of that wofully miscalled "Allegro Apassionato," and Dr Muck's accompaniment was like his solo voice. Yet somehow more than one listener heard them as he might sit before one of those "reconstitutions" of old stages and ancient ceremonies that theatres now and then attempt. It was all there, in its true aspect, voice and style, but the life that made it vital to its generation had faded and withered out of it. The philosophers of æsthetics say that style is the fine and sure preservative in the arts. But there must first be something to preserve beside amiable appropriateness and neat dexterity. Is there much more left in Mendelssohn's music of this concerto—unless Mr. Kreisler, as he may be this evening, is in the transfiguring vein?

Perhaps those of the audience that had their disillusion over Mendelssohn's concerto and their mild disappointments over Mr. Kreisler's playing of it, had expected the impossible after the possible—but long unaccomplished—had been at last achieved. Liszt's "Faust Symphony," by the testimony of almost every one of its pages to the eye that scans them with imagination and to the ear that hears them with feeling—even though they sound not— has long been a masterpiece in tones, a manifold and marvelous music-drama, the one transmutation of the first part of Goethe's poem into another medium that is wholly justified by the outcome. Liszt did better his music by his revision of it in his old age in the manuscript by which the scores and parts of yesterday had been altered. The bass-clarinet does make the motive of Faust more grave and sombre of voice than did the original bassoon; the vision of Gretchen does rise more luminously and poignantly out of the distraught and dissonant music of Mephistopheles's world for the clarification that Liszt effected in it; here and there he has heightened his harmonic and instrumental color; again he has cut away one and another of the prolixities to which he was prone in the heat of composition and repentant in the cooler mood of revisions. The changes do better the symphony; but it was not they that made it sound yesterday as it never had before.

To Dr. Muck and the orchestra, severa collectively, go the glory of the d were individual distinctions enc in the playing—for Mr. Maquarre with the part of the first flute; for Mr. Longy with the music of the oboe; for Mr. Witek and Mr. Férir when violin and viola became nearly solo instruments; for the whole group of horns; for the whole choir of the brass. Yet it was less of them with all their command of technique and tone, imagination and feeling that the listener thought than of the orchestra as a whole. When a band plays this "Faust Symphony," each and every man in it must become as an actor in tones—impersonating Faust through the first movement; Gretchen through the second; Mephistopheles through the third; and a spiritualized and acclaiming host through the measures of the finale. Nay, the whole orchestra became actors escaped from many a limitation that besets the actual player in music-drama on the stage. They have not to think of physical semblance or necessity; there are no requirements of the working theatre for them to meet; they act with their disembodied tones. Out of them rise the image of Faust and the stress of his spiritual struggles; they call Gretchen to life and to her love and her disillusion; they set Mephistopheles to his mockeries, whirl his train through its tumults and catch Faust within them; and they summon, as no stage might do, the vision of the end. Theirs is the disembodied, the sublimated essence of acting, the ideal representation of music-drama, wherein the spiritual substance escapes all material clog and cloud, wherein the means are fused—ever-present but ever-invisible—into the end that they achieve. The players of the Symphony Orchestra became such actors with Liszt's "Faust Symphony." They were masters of the technique and tone, that served them at every turn and obtruded not one of its perfections; they did little miracles of detail as though they were second and impulsive nature to them; they glowed with imagination and fire, with poetry and power and controlled them to do their communicating office; and above all, they were the voice of Dr. Muck as he was the voice of Liszt.

For the conductor was on his native and stimulating heath again, as he had never been before in such length and degree since he first came to the Symphony Concerts. He was leading again in music-drama; Liszt's symphony was the piece; the orchestra were the actors, and he was setting them both on what often seems the most thrilling stage of all—the stage of the imagination. There unrolls, as from the voices of such spirits of the air as Hardy imagined around his "Dynasts," the mysterious evocations with which Liszt summons his music-drama into being and his audience into stirred and responsive temper. The bass clarinet sounds the motive of Faust and he is alive upon the stage. Not a theme of Strauss has more vitalizing and graphic power. The drama as a music-drama at its fullest and finest should be, is a drama of spiritual passion and conflict. Its essential action is almost all within, and so may music, beyond any other expressive means, vision and speak it. The first movement of the symphony is the first act of the drama—the stress and the strivings within Faust's soul; his questionings and his longings; his vacillations and his self-tortures; his resolutions and his despair; the sensuous and romantic image—Gretchen—that begins to haunt him; the sweeps of passion, of the spirit and of the senses, through him; the exhaustion at the end that is sensuous yielding.

Similarly the second movement of the symphony is the second and contrasting act of the music-drama—the act of Gretchen. There is similar evocation, but of another voice and mood; there is a similar vitalizing motive for the girl; there are other themes that are the voice of her dreams and longings. Out of the first movement comes Faust; out of it comes the music of the haunting image, made now the music of gently ardent passion. It is as though the motives of the girl flowered under its fertilizing. . . . And Faust is gone, and Gretchen, forsaken, broods wistfully over the memories that are the pale and insistent phantoms of love forsworn. So softened and so ghost-like became her motive, and the motives of amorous ardors and the whole music. A whole opera may not so vividly and truly evoke Gretchen, or so distill into mind and heart the spiritual essence of her loving and losing. It is unhampered.

The third movement of the symphony, again, is the third act of the music-drama—the act of its hitherto invisible and puissant protagonest. Liszt has no need to evoke him gradually; he flings his Mephistopheles on his imaginary stage, chirtling and clattering out his ironies and denials, now almost jaunty in his intonations with them, now snapping them into biting rhythm and incisive phrase. It was a master-stroke—and a stroke hardly to be dared in the actual theatre—to make him the diabolical negation of all that had gone before and that he had prompted, to set him to the derision and the distortion of the music of the struggling and yielding Faust. A Mephistopheles worthy of his name and not unworthy of Goethe so treads the imaginary stage. He is in the full zest of his triumph; he seems almost to snap Faust into his music; he whirls him away, jeering still, into the revels of the friends that are now his true companions, into the play with the courtesans that are now his becoming lover. The tumult outstrips Berlioz's pandemonium, biter as only Wagner's in the Venusberg was to bite, in the music of that day, with the tang of sensual frenzy. The music seems to hesitate as though it were at the climax to its drama; it quivers with the vision of Gretchen; it grins radiant with it. The shadows close in; the tumult dies; the mists of the Brocke left on the suffused chords; and out of the clear glow around as though it were the song of invisible voices, begins Liszt's mystical pæan to the saving woman-soul that he is fair to imagine—being a romantic—beck down evil under its white feet and sends us men who have done it heavenward and our prompting devils down to their underworld. More than once in the past, this music has not seemed to make climax to the symphony and the drama. Yesterday it seemed as magnificent peroration to it, as apocalyptic voices—though they were the natural voices of the Apollo Club and Mr. Draper singing as they have seldom sung before—in these hymns of an open heaven to a listening earth. The end of the "Faust Symphony" stood at last beside the close of "Götterdämmerung" or of d'Indy's "Fervaal" and was coequal with them.

(From a Photograph Hitherto Unpublished)

Kreisler as His Military Service Has Changed Him

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date JAN 3 - 1915

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Der Soliſt der beiden kommenden Konzerte der Boſtoner am kommenden Donnerstag Abend, reſp. Samstag Nachmittag iſt Fritz Kreisler, der am Donnerstag das Mendelsſohn'ſche Violinkonzert und am Sonntag die „Schottiſche Phantaſie" von Bruch zum Vortrag bringen wird. Dr. Muck hat, ſeinem Prinzip getreu, ſeinen Programmen Varietät zu verleihen, dieſe beiden Konzerte gänzlich den Klaſſikern gewidmet. Er dirigirt am Donnerstag Abend die Mozart'ſche „Jupiter"-Symphonie, Wagner's „Fauſt"-Ouverture und das „Siegfrieds-Idyll", und am Samstag Nachmittag Beethoven's Achte Symphonie, Schumann's „Genoveva"-Ouverture, die Bach'ſche Hirtenmuſik aus dem Weihnachts-Oratorium und Liszt's „Marſch der heiligen drei Könige" aus „Chriſtus".

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 6.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

A CHORUS FOR THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Clear Need of Such an Addition to Its Forces and the Advantages It Would Bring—Forthcoming Concerts—Mr. Caruso's Visit to Monte Carlo—The Kaiser as Composer—Items and Opinions

UNTIL the Symphony Orchestra has a chorus actually attached to it or in its service at need, above any other obligation, it will not be the well-rounded concert-giving body, in the largest sense of the word, that it should be. In either alternative and whether the chorus be amateur, semi-professional, professional, or a just mixture of all three elements, it must be a chorus trained by the methods that have made the band what it is, amenable to its standards and subject to the strict control of the conductor or, in early rehearsals, his deputy. How much such a chorus, employed at intervals during the season, would add to the pleasures of the Symphony Concerts was plain in the performances last week of Liszt's "Faust Symphony," with the assisting choir of the Apollo Club. The audience rose to the chorus, as one of the essential elements in the performance only a little less than it rose to the predominating orchestra and the masterful conductor. What zest and pride of accomplishment the choir brought to its work under Dr. Muck was plain in its singing. What the conductor could accomplish with a chorus, had he one regularly at his disposal and under his training, set imagination and expectation tingling. And Liszt's "Faust Symphony" is only one of twenty pieces and more, classic, modern or contemporary, that can be performed only seldom or not at all at the Symphony Concerts for lack of a readily available and thoroughly practised chorus. They range from the Choral Symphony of Beethoven to the symphonies of Mahler; from Liszt's "Dante" to Delius's "Appalachia" and Debussy's "Sirens."

In the memorandum that Mr. Higginson drafted thirty years ago about his purposes with the Symphony Orchestra, he seems to anticipate that it shall bear some share in the performance of choral music in Boston. As the event has proved, the orchestra has been able to do no more than till its own field and experiments in cooperation, like that under Mr. Fiedler with The Cecilia, have miscarried in method and result. The ways of our choral societies are not the ways of the orchestra and therein may lie one reason for the present indifference to choral music in this town and its generally low estate among us. But a chorus attached to the orchestra, directly dependent upon it, and keeping its ways and standards, would be only another and wiser fulfilment of Mr. Higginson's original plan. Perhaps it is too much to ask him to add such a chorus to the orchestra, but his ambition with it, like his benefactions to it, are inexhaustible. The expert and tireless management of the Symphony Concerts would find its way to organize such a chorus and Dr. Muck, engrossed in his work above all else and as inexhaustible in his ambition, would not hesitate long over the opportunity such an addition to his forces would afford him. Imagine two or three concerts a year of choral music with such an orchestra, chorus or conductor, or imagine such a chorus bringing Beethoven's ninth symphony or Mahler's second and twenty other pieces besides within the range of the regular Symphony Concerts. Then in Boston choral music would be alive again.

H. T. P.

MONITOR,

JANUARY 11, 1915

A condition of things is developing in the vestibule of Symphony hall, resulting from the popularity of the Sunday afternoon concerts, that in all likelihood will not be allowed to continue. It is something that a law projected by a former city administration, but never urged on the state Legislature, would reach, had it been put through. The proper place for everybody to buy tickets for the concerts is at the box-office window, or other places authorized under the approval of both the public and the managers. A week ago there was some hawking of tickets in the vestibule by persons who had secured them beforehand at the window, evidently with the purpose to sell them at an advance in price. Yesterday there was a great deal of it.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

FRITZ KREISLER, the Austrian violinist, will make his appearance as soloist at the third concert of the Boston Symphony in the Academy on Monday evening. He will play the Mendelssohn concerto in E minor. It is interesting to know that Mr. Kreisler regards this concerto of Mendelssohn as the most grateful work in the literature of the violin. Certain it is that it is one of the most melodious and one of the great public favorites. The orchestral numbers will be Sibelius' tone poem, "Finlandia," the Fourth Symphony in C major of Guy Ropartz and Schumann's overture, "Genoveva." Ropartz's Symphony will be heard here for the first time. It had its first performance in this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck in Boston last October and has been played by him with much success in several cities. Ropartz, who is the director of the Conservatory of Music of Nancy, is a man now nearly middle age and belongs to that group of French composers who got not only their instruction but their absolute inspiration from the great Belgian, Cesar Franck. Perhaps of all the men who studied with Franck and have since gained fame, Ropartz stands nearest his master. The symphony is played without pause and lasts about a half-hour.

1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City
Date

Est 1884

KREISLER IS SOLOIST WITH BOSTON BAND

From the fury of the latter-day Rezniceks and Scheinpflugs, Dr. Karl Muck last night delivered us. The passing onslaught of his programme of a month since gave way to the more untroubled peace of less strifesome matters. For this first of the latest pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, Dr. Muck set his programmatic pendulum back to the Mozart of the great C major symphony, the Wagner of the "Faust" overture and the "Siegfried Idyll" and, with Fritz Kreisler as the solo performer, to the Mendelssohn violin concerto.

Nevertheless, in spite of the salt sea change that came over the spirit of Dr. Muck's programme, it can hardly be said that the evening held the true Boston Symphony thrill—for even Mr. Kreisler cannot impart excitement to Mendelssohn, and his playing of the concerto was as nearly perfect as things mortal are wont to be.

This was the great violinist's first appearance here this season with orchestra, and this particular orchestra audience, which achieves some manner of distinction, gave him a most warmly cordial greeting.

The Mendelssohn concerto can be treated with either a provocative nausea of sentimentality or with the empty superficiality of cocksure flippancy. There is also, quite naturally some measure of sincerity that falls between these two extremes. But it needs the towering talent of a true interpretative musician aptly to sound the exact shallows of the Mendelssohnian depths, or, more accurately stated, the exact depths of the Mendelssohnian shallows. This was Mr. Kreisler's accomplishment, with the most insinuatingly ingratiating violin tone that is to be heard to-day.

Dr. Muck, it seemed, did not appear to be enthuisastically enamored of his half-set Mozartean task. It was a severely chastened Mozart that he presented, most noticeably so in the first two movements of the symphony. It cannot be that Dr. Muck draws a line above the "Eroica" of Beethoven, setting all before within the "classic" rubric of musical sound for its own sake. Mozart's C major symphony is the humanity of Mozart, even if it be in the musical terms of his day. The thrill of Mozart's most human humanity, here no longer naive, was lacking in this interpretative outgiving.

Conductors toy industriously now and again with the Wagnerian "Eine Fause Ouvertuere," but the work can be made only mildly interesting. The fire of the "Tristan" period sought to warm over its ante-"Fliegende Hollaender" spirit and failed. Wagner (to use his own words) found "instrumental music" only a "mist" from which he escaped into the clearness of the drama." The mist is here still quite plainly perceptible, and even Dr. Muck's carefully considered reading did not dispel it.

OTHER CONC

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date JAN 8 - 1915

Established 1884

Fritz Kreisler Plays With the Boston Orchestr

By Sylvester Rawling.

DR. KARL MUCK'S program for the Boston Symphony chestra's third Thursday c cert at Carnegie Hall last night m have pleased alike the devout cla cist and the lover of popular m among the subscribers. There been some grumbling over the c tents and arrangements of the p vious programmes this season. T time Dr. Muck presented Moza "Jupiter" symphony, Wagner's Faust Overture" and "A Siegfried Idyl" and Mendelssohn's concerto in E minor for violin with Fritz Kreisler as soloist. The performance was one of rare beauty even by this premier.

---

and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date JAN 8 1915

k, 1884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mozart and Wagner at the Third Concert—Fritz Kreisler the Soloist.

Dr. Muck made the programme of the third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening entirely of music well known, probably to everybody in the audience—Mozart's symphony in C, called the "Jupiter," and "Eine Faust Ouvertüre" and the "Siegfried Idyll," by Wagner. Fritz Kreisler was the soloist, and he played Mendelssohn's violin concerto.

The playing of the orchestra was an unalloyed delight. It is not often that Mozart's music is heard so exactly in the spirit and intention of the composer, so overflowing in euphony, so perfect in the turn of every phrase, so exquisitely proportioned as a whole. Dr. Muck has in nothing else, perhaps, shown himself so consummate a master of the indefinable thing called "style" as in his reading of this symphony.

He sought for no effects other than those obviously inherent in the music itself; for no pathos, no exaggeration of contrast, no dramatic forcing of any note or any phrase; but he fathomed the subtle simplicity of Mozart by his refinement and complete clarification of all that is contained in the score. Every voice was exquisitely clear, and the polyphonic structure of the last movement was absolutely transparent; and yet this perfection of detail was made only to contribute to the beauty of the whole.

Equally remarkable in their different views was the performance of "A Faust Overture" in its dramatic and occasionally melodramatic spirit, and the "Siegfried Idyll" in its musing tenderness. The "Siegfried Idyll" sometimes seems long, but it hardly seems so when so intensive and vital a spirit is infused into it as was the case on this occasion.

Mr. Kreisler was in superb form, and played the concerto with refreshing vigor and energy, which detracted nothing from the suave and mellifluous style of the music, with warm and searching tone with plastic beauty of phrase, and all technical finish. Needless to say the audience was joyfully enthusiastic over the performance of both the orchestra and the soloists. Dr. Muck twice made the orchestra rise to accept the applause for itself, as he himself discreetly turned away.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date JAN 8 - 1915

1884

Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter.

Dr. Muck bot geſtern Abend in Carnegie Hall ein Programm, mit dem man wohl zufrieden ſein konnte. Der gelungene Abend begann mit Mozart's ewig junger „Jupiter"-Symphonie, brachte ſodann in den prächtig kontraſtirenden Wagner'ſchen Kompoſitionen, der „Fauſt"-Ouverture und dem „Siegfried-Idyll" wundervolle Leiſtungen und erreichte den Höhepunkt in dem von Kreiſler unnachahmlich geſpielten Mendelsſohn'ſchen Violin-Konzert.

Die „Jupiter"-Symphonie fand ſeitens Muck's und des Orcheſters eine Ausführung, von deren ſchönheitsgetränkten Linien man nur in Superlativen ſprechen kann. Ich möchte aus dem Herrlichen das unvergleichlich fein gebrachte Menuetto und den letzten Satz mit ſeinem meiſterhaft beherrſchten kontrapunktiſchen Gewebe herausgreifen. Wie in einem einzigen Strom brauſte dieſe kriſtallklare, hoch ragende Kompoſition vor uns vorbei, und wenn Dr. Muck auf den begeiſterten Beifall hin das Orcheſter aufſtehen ließ, ſo war es nur der ſchuldige Tribut des ſiegreichen Heerführers für ſeine tapfere und leiſtungsfähige Armee.

Mächtig, in ihren grübleriſchen Zweifeln und der düſteren Grundſtimmung baute Muck die „Fauſt"-Ouverture vor uns auf, und den lieblichſten Kontraſt fand er in dem entzückend waldwebenartig vorgeführten „Siegfried-Idyll", das die zarteſten Stimmungen und Laute brachte. Auch da war der Beifall ſtürmiſch. Was aber wollte [illegible] Erfolg Kreiſler's ſagen, der ſchon mit einer imponirenden Ovation empfangen wurde! Seine Interpretation des Mendelsſohn'ſchen Konzerts war ein Genuß ſondergleichen. Einen ſolchen Ton voll Süßigkeit und männlicher Kraft, eine ſo lückenloſe Kantilene, eine ſolch reſtloſe Meiſterſchaft des Techniſchen, das Ganze mit dem feinſten Duft der Romantik umwoben, — das kann uns nur Kreiſler ſchenken!

H.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date

Establi

FINE CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck's Orchestra and Fritz Kreisler Delight Audience at Carnegie Hall—Mozart, Wagner, Mendelssohn Programme

WITH Dr. Muck leading his men through a musical maze of Mozart and Wagner and Fritz Kreisler intoning Mendelssohn's strains, it was predestined that the large audience which greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall would have a pleasurable evening.

Kreisler was placed at the end of the programme and his marvelous and scholarly reading of Mendelssohn's E minor concerto was applauded loud and long.

The concerto is a grateful composition for the solo violinist, and combines the qualities of brilliancy, expressiveness and tender emotion.

Kreisler's interpretation revealed each charm and signification of the work. His art was disclosed with incisiveness, magnificent breadth of phrase, deep feeling and tonal quality that was a model of accuracy and richness.

The concert began with Mozart's C major (Jupiter) symphony, a work rarely heard and, as it was presented last evening, deserving more frequent performances. It contains much that is delightful and pleasing; much that is noble and dignified.

The musicians illustrated their finest skill in the progress of the four movements. Dr. Muck succeeded in securing a reading that was evenly balanced, eloquent and compelling.

There was especial interest in the performance of the last movement, which contains for its basic idea an old church tune that the composer tossed about among the various choirs until, enlarged and developed, it is taken up by the entire orchestra and overwhelms in its glorification. The Bostonians rose to the occasion and played impressively and artistically.

Wagner's "Faust" overture and "A Siegfried Idyl" were the other numbers, each of which was played in a manner that reflected credit of composer, musicians and conductor.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date DEC 31 1914

k, 1884

By way of explaining some of the most curious programmes heard this year in New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes official announcement that its two concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of next week will be "devoted largely to the classics," thus following out the general scheme of its conductor in "alternating the character of his programmes." The apology is good for this time at least. At both concerts Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist, making his first appearances with any orchestra save that of the Metropolitan Opera House, with which he played two weeks since. The violinist gave his second solo recital at Carnegie Hall yesterday to another great crowd.

Kreisler's audiences continue to be the sensation of the season. Yesterday a local charity bought up the floor and boxes, reselling them at grand opera rates. The net profit to the Tuberculosis Clinic was nearly $6,000.

The Boston band, by the way, is playing at its home concert on New Year's Day the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt, using a new version, revised and changed by the composer in his last year. When the present conductor was in Bayreuth in 1912 he found in the library of Wahnfried, the home of Liszt's daughter, Cosimo Wagner, a score of the "Faust" with additions pencilled in the handwriting of Liszt.

Siegfried Wagner said his grandfather made these revisions about 188 and they had never been published. Many changes affect the orchestration, as where an "arioso" for bassoon is given to bass clarionet, which was not among Liszt's earlier instruments. The greatest change in the episode, "Mephistopheles," giving more promin

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 6,

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

A CHORUS FOR THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Clear Need of Such an Addition to Its Forces and the Advantages It Would Bring—Forthcoming Concerts—Mr. Caruso's Visit to Monte Carlo—The Kaiser as Composer—Items and Opinions

UNTIL the Symphony Orchestra has a chorus actually attached to it or in its service at need, above any other obligation, it will not be the well-founded concert-giving body, in the largest sense of the word, that it should be. In either alternative and whether the chorus be amateur, semi-professional, professional, or a just mixture of all three elements, it must be a chorus trained by the methods that have made the band what it is, amenable to its standards and subject to the strict control of the conductor or, in early rehearsals, his deputy. How much such a chorus, employed at intervals during the season, would add to the pleasures of the Symphony Concerts was plain in the performances last week of Liszt's "Faust Symphony," with the assisting choir of the Apollo Club. The audience rose to the chorus, as one of the essential elements in the performance only a little less than it rose to the predominating orchestra and the masterful conductor. What zest and pride of accomplishment the choir brought to its work under Dr. Muck was plain in its singing. What the conductor could accomplish with a chorus, had he one regularly at his disposal and under his training, set imagination and expectation tingling. And Liszt's "Faust Symphony" is only one of twenty pieces and more, classic, modern or contemporary, that can be performed only seldom or not at all at the Symphony Concerts for lack of a readily available and thoroughly practised chorus. They range from the Choral Symphony of Beethoven to the symphonies of Mahler; from Liszt's "Dante" to Delius's "Appalachia" and Debussy's "Sirens."

In the memorandum that Mr. Higginson drafted thirty years ago about his purposes with the Symphony Orchestra, he seems to anticipate that it shall bear some share in the performance of choral music in Boston. As the event has proved, the orchestra has been able to do no more than till its own field and experiments in coöperation, like that under Mr. Fiedler with The Cecilia, have miscarried in method and result. The ways of our choral societies are not the ways of the orchestra and therein may lie one reason for the present indifference to choral music in this town and its generally low estate among us. But a chorus attached to the orchestra, directly dependent upon it, and keeping its ways and standards, would be only another and wiser fulfilment of Mr. Higginson's original plan. Perhaps it is too much to ask him to add such a chorus to the orchestra, but his ambition with it, like his benefactions to it, are inexhaustible. The expert and tireless management of the Symphony Concerts would find its way to organize such a chorus and Dr. Muck, engrossed in his work above all else and as inexhaustible in his ambition, would not hesitate long over the opportunity such an addition to his forces would afford him. Imagine two or three concerts a year of choral music with such an orchestra, chorus or conductor or imagine such a chorus bringing Beethoven's ninth symphony or Mahler's second and twenty other pieces besides within the range of the regular Symphony Concerts. Then in Boston choral music would be alive again.

H. T. P.

MONITOR,

JANUARY 11, 1915

A condition of things is developing in the vestibule of Symphony hall, resulting from the popularity of the Sunday afternoon concerts, that in all likelihood will not be allowed to continue. It is something that a law projected by a former city administration, but never urged on the state Legislature, would reach, had it been put through. The proper place for everybody to buy tickets for the concerts is at the box-office window, or other places authorized under the approval of both the public and the managers. A week ago there was some hawking of tickets in the vestibule by persons who had secured them beforehand at the window, evidently with the purpose to sell them at an advance in price. Yesterday there was a great deal of it.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

FRITZ KREISLER, the Austrian viol ist, will make his appearance as solo at the third concert of the Boston Sy phony in the Academy on Monday eve ing. He will play the Mendelssohn co certo in E minor. It is interesting know that Mr. Kreisler regards this co certo of Mendelssohn as the most grateful work in the literature of the violin. Certain it is that it is one of the most melodious and one of the great public favorites. The orchestral numbers will be Sibelius' tone poem, "Finlandia," the Fourth Symphony in C major of Guy Ropartz and Schumann's overture, "Genoveva." Ropartz's Symphony will be heard here for the first time. It had its first performance in this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck in Boston last October and has been played by him with much success in several cities. Ropartz, who is the director of the Conservatory of Music of Nancy, is a man now nearly middle age and belongs to that group of French composers who got not only their instruction but their absolute inspiration from the great Belgian, Cesar Franck. Perhaps of all the men who studied with Franck and have since gained fame, Ropartz stands nearest his master. The symphony is played without pause and lasts about a half-hour.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City
Date

Est 188

KREISLER IS SOLOIST WITH BOSTON BAND

From the fury of the latter-day Reznickeks and Scheinpflugs, Dr. Karl Muck last night delivered us. The passing onslaught of his programme of a month since gave way to the more untroubled peace of less strifesome matters. For this first of the latest pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, Dr. Muck set his programmatic pendulum back to the Mozart of the great C major symphony, the Wagner of the "Faust" overture and the "Siegfried Idyll" and, with Fritz Kreisler as the solo performer, to the Mendelssohn violin concerto.

Nevertheless, in spite of the salt sea change that came over the spirit of Dr. Muck's programme, it can hardly be said that the evening held the true Boston Symphony thrill—for even Mr. Kreisler cannot impart excitement to Mendelssohn, and his playing of the concerto was as nearly perfect as things mortal are wont to be.

This was the great violinist's first appearance here this season with orchestra, and this particular orchestra audience, which achieves some manner of distinction, gave him a most warmly cordial greeting.

The Mendelssohn concerto can be treated with either a provocative nausea of sentimentality or with the empty superficiality of cocksure flippancy. There is also, quite naturally some measure of sincerity that falls between these two extremes. But it needs the towering talent of a true interpretative musician aptly to sound the exact shallows of the Mendelssohnian depths, or, more accurately stated, the exact depths of the Mendelssohnian shallows. This was Mr. Kreisler's accomplishment, with the most insinuatingly ingratiating violin tone that is to be heard to-day.

Dr. Muck, it seemed, did not appear to be enthuisastically enamored of his half-set Mozartean task. It was a severely chastened Mozart that he presented, most noticeably so in the first two movements of the symphony. It cannot be that Dr. Muck draws a line above the "Eroica" of Beethoven, setting all before within the "classic" rubric of musical sound for its own sake. Mozart's C major symphony is the humanity of Mozart, even if it be in the musical terms of his day. The thrill of Mozart's most human humanity, here no longer naive, was lacking in this interpretative outgiving.

Conductors toy industriously now and again with the Wagnerian "Eine Fause Ouvertuere," but the work can be made only mildly interesting. The fire of the "Tristan" period sought to warm over its ante-"Fliegende Hollaender" spirit and failed. Wagner (to use his own words) found "instrumental music" only a "mist" from which he escaped into the clearness of the drama." The mist is here still quite plainly perceptible, and even Dr. Muck's carefully considered reading did not dispel it.

OTHER CON

The First Established

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date JAN 8 - 1915

Established: 1884

Fritz Kreisler Plays With the Boston Orchestr

By Sylvester Rawling.

DR. KARL MUCK'S program for the Boston Symphony chestra's third Thursday c cert at Carnegie Hall last night m have pleased alike the devout cla cist and the lover of popular m among the subscribers. There been some grumbling over the c tents and arrangements of the p vious programmes this season. T time Dr. Muck presented Moza "Jupiter" symphony, Wagner's Faust Overture" and "A Siegfried Idyl" and Mendelssohn's concerto in E minor for violin with Fritz Kreisler as soloist. The performance was one of rare beauty even by this premier.

The First Established and Most Complete

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address: New York City
JAN 8 1915

k, 1884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mozart and Wagner at the Third Concert—Fritz Kreisler the Soloist.

Dr. Muck made the programme of the third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening entirely of music well known, probably to everybody in the audience—Mozart's symphony in C, called the "Jupiter," and "Eine Faust Ouvertüre" and the "Siegfried Idyll," by Wagner. Fritz Kreisler was the soloist, and he played Mendelssohn's violin concerto.

The playing of the orchestra was an unalloyed delight. It is not often that Mozart's music is heard so exactly in the spirit and intention of the composer, so overflowing in euphony, so perfect in the turn of every phrase, so exquisitely proportioned as a whole. Dr. Muck has in nothing else, perhaps, shown himself so consummate a master of the indefinable thing called "style" as in his reading of this symphony.

He sought for no effects other than those obviously inherent in the music itself; for no pathos, no exaggeration of contrast, no dramatic forcing of any note or any phrase; but he fathomed the subtle simplicity of Mozart by his refinement and complete clarification of all that is contained in the score. Every voice was exquisitely clear, and the polyphonic structure of the last movement was absolutely transparent; and yet this perfection of detail was made only to contribute to the beauty of the whole.

Equally remarkable in their different views was the performance of "A Faust Overture" in its dramatic and occasionally melodramatic spirit, and the "Siegfried Idyll" in its musing tenderness. The "Siegfried Idyll" sometimes seems long, but it hardly seems so when so intensive and vital a spirit is infused into it as was the case on this occasion.

Mr. Kreisler was in superb form, and played the concerto with refreshing vigor and energy, which detracted nothing from the suave and mellifluous style of the music, with warm and searching tone with plastic beauty of phrase, and all technical finish. Needless to say the audience was joyfully enthusiastic over the performance of both the orchestra and the soloists. Dr. Muck twice made the orchestra rise to accept the applause for itself, as he himself discreetly turned away.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAATS=ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date JAN 8 - 1915

1884

Boſtoner Symphonie=Orcheſter.

Dr. Muck bot geſtern Abend in Carnegie Hall ein Programm, mit dem man wohl zufrieden ſein konnte. Der gelungene Abend begann mit Mozart's ewig junger „Jupiter"=Symphonie, brachte ſodann in den prächtig kontraſtirenden Wagner'ſchen Kompoſitionen, der „Fauſt"=Ouverture und dem „Siegfried=Idyll" wundervolle Leiſtungen und erreichte den Höhepunkt in dem von Kreisler unnachahmlich geſpielten Mendelsſohn'ſchen Violin=Konzert.

Die „Jupiter"=Symphonie fand ſeitens Muck's und des Orcheſters eine Ausführung, von deren ſchönheitsgetränkten Linien man nur in Superlativen ſprechen kann. Ich möchte aus dem Herrlichen das unvergleichlich fein gebrachte Menuetto und den letzten Satz mit ſeinem meiſterhaft beherrſchten kontrapunktiſchen Gewebe herausgreifen. Wie in einem einzigen Strom brauſte dieſe kriſtallklare, hoch ragende Kompoſition vor uns vorbei, und wenn Dr. Muck auf den begeiſterten Beifall hin das Orcheſter aufſtehen ließ, ſo war es nur der ſchuldige Tribut des ſiegreichen Heerführers für ſeine tapfere und leiſtungsfähige Armee.

Mächtig, in ihren grübleriſchen Zweifeln und der düſteren Grundſtimmung baute Muck die „Fauſt"=Ouverture vor uns auf, und den lieblichſten Kontraſt fand er in dem entzückend waldwebenartig vorgeführten „Siegfried=Idyll", das die zarteſten Stimmungen und Laute brachte. Auch da war der Beifall ſtürmiſch. Was aber wollte das gegen den triumphalen Erfolg Kreisler's ſagen, der ſchon mit einer imponirenden Ovation empfangen wurde! Seine Interpretation des Mendelsſohn'ſchen Konzerts war ein Genuß ſondergleichen. Einen ſolchen Ton voll Süßigkeit und männlicher Kraft, eine ſo lückenloſe Kantilene, eine ſolch reſtloſe Meiſterſchaft des Techniſchen, das Ganze mit dem feinſten Duft der Romantik umwoben, — das kann uns nur Kreisler ſchenken!

H.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date

Establi

FINE CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck's Orchestra and Fritz Kreisler Delight Audience at Carnegie Hall—Mozart, Wagner, Mendelssohn Programme

WITH Dr. Muck leading his men through a musical maze of Mozart and Wagner and Fritz Kreisler intoning Mendelssohn's strains, it was predestined that the large audience which greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall would have a pleasurable evening.

Kreisler was placed at the end of the programme and his marvelous and scholarly reading of Mendelssohn's E minor concerto was applauded loud and long.

The concerto is a grateful composition for the solo violinist, and combines the qualities of brilliancy, expressiveness and tender emotion.

Kreisler's interpretation revealed each charm and signification of the work. His art was disclosed with incisiveness, magnificent breadth of phrase, deep feeling and tonal quality that was a model of accuracy and richness.

The concert began with Mozart's C major (Jupiter) symphony, a work rarely heard and, as it was presented last evening, deserving more frequent performances. It contains much that is delightful and pleasing; much that is noble and dignified.

The musicians illustrated their finest skill in the progress of the four movements. Dr. Muck succeeded in securing a reading that was evenly balanced, eloquent and compelling.

There was especial interest in the performance of the last movement, which contains for its basic idea an old church tune that the composer tossed about among the various choirs until, enlarged and developed, it is taken up by the entire orchestra and overwhelms in its glorification. The Bostonians rose to the occasion and played impressively and artistically.

Wagner's "Faust" overture and "A Siegfried Idyl" were the other numbers, each of which was played in a manner that reflected credit of composer, musicians and conductor.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date [illegible]

k, 1884

By way of explaining some of the most curious programmes heard this year in New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes official announcement that its two concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of next week will be "devoted largely to the classics," thus following out the general scheme of its conductor in "alternating the character of his programmes." The apology is good for this time at least. At both concerts Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist, making his first appearances with any orchestra save that of the Metropolitan Opera House, with which he played two weeks since. The violinist gave his second solo recital at Carnegie Hall yesterday to another great crowd.

Kreisler's audiences continue to be the sensation of the season. Yesterday a local charity bought up the floor and boxes, reselling them at grand opera rates. The net profit to the Tuberculosis Clinic was nearly $6,000.

The Boston band, by the way, is playing at its home concert on New Year's Day the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt, using a new version, revised and changed by the composer in his last year. When the present conductor was in Bayreuth in 1912 he found in the library of Wahnfried, the home of Liszt's daughter, Cosimo Wagner, a score of the "Faust" with additions pencilled in the handwriting of Liszt.

Siegfried Wagner said his grandfather made these revisions about 1882 and they had never been published. Many changes affect the orchestration, as where an "arioso" for bassoon is given to bass clarionet, which was not among Liszt's earlier instruments. The greatest change in the episode, "Mephistopheles," giving more prominen

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 6,

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

A CHORUS FOR THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Clear Need of Such an Addition to Its Forces and the Advantages It Would Bring—Forthcoming Concerts—Mr. Caruso's Visit to Monte Carlo—The Kaiser as Composer—Items and Opinions

UNTIL the Symphony Orchestra has a chorus actually attached to it or in its service at need, above any other obligation, it will not be the well-rounded concert-giving body, in the largest sense of the word, that it should be. In either alternative and whether the chorus be amateur, semi-professional, professional, or a just mixture of all three elements, it must be a chorus trained by the methods that have made the band what it is, amenable to its standards and subject to the strict control of the conductor or, in early rehearsals, his deputy. How much such a chorus, employed at intervals during the season, would add to the pleasures of the Symphony Concerts was plain in the performances last week of Liszt's "Faust Symphony," with the assisting choir of the Apollo Club. The audience rose to the chorus, as one of the essential elements in the performance only a little less than it rose to the predominating orchestra and the masterful conductor. What zest and pride of accomplishment the choir brought to its work under Dr. Muck was plain in its singing. What the conductor could accomplish with a chorus, had he one regularly at his disposal and under his training, set imagination and expectation tingling. And Liszt's "Faust Symphony" is only one of twenty pieces and more, classic, modern or contemporary, that can be performed only seldom or not at all at the Symphony Concerts for lack of a readily available and thoroughly practised chorus. They range from the Choral Symphony of Beethoven to the symphonies of Mahler; from Liszt's "Dante" to Delius's "Appalachia" and Debussy's "Sirens."

In the memorandum that Mr. Higginson drafted thirty years ago about his purposes with the Symphony Orchestra, he seems to anticipate that it shall bear some share in the performance of choral music in Boston. As the event has proved, the orchestra has been able to do no more than till its own field and experiments in coöperation, like that under Mr. Fiedler with The Cecilia, have miscarried in method and result. The ways of our choral societies are not the ways of the orchestra and therein may lie one reason for the present indifference to choral music in this town and its generally low estate among us. But a chorus attached to the orchestra, directly dependent upon it, and keeping its ways and standards, would be only another and wiser fulfilment of Mr. Higginson's original plan. Perhaps it is too much to ask him to add such a chorus to the orchestra, but his ambition with it, like his benefactions to it, are inexhaustible. The expert and tireless management of the Symphony Concerts would find its way to organize such a chorus and Dr. Muck, engrossed in his work above all else and as inexhaustible in his ambition, would not hesitate long over the opportunity such an addition to his forces would afford him. Imagine two or three concerts a year of choral music with such an orchestra, chorus or conductor or imagine such a chorus bringing Beethoven's ninth symphony or Mahler's second and twenty other pieces besides within the range of the regular Symphony Concerts. Then in Boston choral music would be alive again.

H. T. P.

MONITOR,

JANUARY 11, 1915

A condition of things is developing in the vestibule of Symphony hall, resulting from the popularity of the Sunday afternoon concerts, that in all likelihood will not be allowed to continue. It is something that a law projected by a former city administration, but never urged on the state Legislature, would reach, had it been put through. The proper place for everybody to buy tickets for the concerts is at the box-office window, or other places authorized under the approval of both the public and the managers. A week ago there was some hawking of tickets in the vestibule by persons who had secured them beforehand at the window, evidently with the purpose to sell them at an advance in price. Yesterday there was a great deal of it.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

1884

FRITZ KREISLER, the Austrian violinist, will make his appearance as soloist at the third concert of the Boston Symphony in the Academy on Monday evening. He will play the Mendelssohn concerto in E minor. It is interesting to know that Mr. Kreisler regards this concerto of Mendelssohn as the most grateful work in the literature of the violin. Certain it is that it is one of the most melodious and one of the great public favorites. The orchestral numbers will be Sibelius' tone poem, "Finlandia," the Fourth Symphony in C major of Guy Ropartz and Schumann's overture, "Genoveva." Ropartz's Symphony will be heard here for the first time. It had its first performance in this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck in Boston last October and has been played by him with much success in several cities. Ropartz, who is the director of the Conservatory of Music of Nancy, is a man now nearly middle age and belongs to that group of French composers who got not only their instruction but their absolute inspiration from the great Belgian, Cesar Franck. Perhaps of all the men who studied with Franck and have since gained fame, Ropartz stands nearest his master. The symphony is played without pause and lasts about a half-hour.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City
Date

Est 1884

KREISLER IS SOLOIST WITH BOSTON BAND

From the fury of the latter-day Reznriceks and Scheinpflugs, Dr. Karl Muck last night delivered us. The passing onslaught of his programme of a month since gave way to the more untroubled peace of less strifesome matters. For this first of the latest pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, Dr. Muck set his programmatic pendulum back to the Mozart of the great C major symphony, the Wagner of the "Faust" overture and the "Siegfried Idyll" and, with Fritz Kreisler as the solo performer, to the Mendelssohn violin concerto.

Nevertheless, in spite of the salt sea change that came over the spirit of Dr. Muck's programme, it can hardly be said that the evening held the true Boston Symphony thrill—for even Mr. Kreisler cannot impart excitement to Mendelssohn, and his playing of the concerto was as nearly perfect as things mortal are wont to be.

This was the great violinist's first appearance here this season with orchestra, and this particular orchestra audience, which achieves some manner of distinction, gave him a most warmly cordial greeting.

The Mendelssohn concerto can be treated with either a provocative nausea of sentimentality or with the empty superficiality of cocksure flippancy. There is also, quite naturally some measure of sincerity that falls between these two extremes. But it needs the towering talent of a true interpretative musician aptly to sound the exact shallows of the Mendelssohnian depths, or, more accurately stated, the exact depths of the Mendelssohnian shallows. This was Mr. Kreisler's accomplishment, with the most insinuatingly ingratiating violin tone that is to be heard to-day.

Dr. Muck, it seemed, did not appear to be enthuisastically enamored of his half-set Mozartean task. It was a severely chastened Mozart that he presented, most noticeably so in the first two movements of the symphony. It cannot be that Dr. Muck draws a line above the "Eroica" of Beethoven, setting all before within the "classic" rubric of musical sound for its own sake. Mozart's C major symphony is the humanity of Mozart, even if it be in the musical terms of his day. The thrill of Mozart's most human humanity, here no longer naive, was lacking in this interpretative outgiving.

Conductors toy industriously now and again with the Wagnerian "Eine Fause Ouvertuere," but the work can be made only mildly interesting. The fire of the "Tristan" period sought to warm over its ante-"Fliegende Hollaender" spirit and failed. Wagner (to use his own words) found "instrumental music" only a "mist" from which he escaped into the clearness of the drama." The mist is here still quite plainly perceptible, and even Dr. Muck's carefully considered reading did not dispel it.

First Established
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

EVENING WORLD
New York City
JAN 8 - 1915

Fritz Kreisler Plays With the Boston Orchestra

By Sylvester Rawling.

DR. KARL MUCK'S programme for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third Thursday concert at Carnegie Hall last night must have pleased alike the devout classicist and the lover of popular music among the subscribers. There had been some grumbling over the contents and arrangements of the previous programmes this season. This time Dr. Muck presented Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Wagner's "A Faust Overture" and "A Siegfried Idyl" and Mendelssohn's concerto in E minor for violin with Fritz Kreisler as soloist. The performance was one of rare beauty even by this premier.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address: New York City
JAN 8 1915

k, 1884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mozart and Wagner at the Third Concert—Fritz Kreisler the Soloist.

Dr. Muck made the programme of the third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening entirely of music well known, probably to everybody in the audience—Mozart's symphony in C, called the "Jupiter," and "Eine Faust Ouvertüre" and the "Siegfried Idyll," by Wagner. Fritz Kreisler was the soloist, and he played Mendelssohn's violin concerto.

The playing of the orchestra was an unalloyed delight. It is not often that Mozart's music is heard so exactly in the spirit and intention of the composer, so overflowing in euphony, so perfect in the turn of every phrase, so exquisitely proportioned as a whole. Dr. Muck has in nothing else, perhaps, shown himself so consummate a master of the indefinable thing called "style" as in his reading of this symphony.

He sought for no effects other than those obviously inherent in the music itself; for no pathos, no exaggeration of contrast, no dramatic forcing of any note or any phrase; but he fathomed the subtle simplicity of Mozart by his refinement and complete clarification of all that is contained in the score. Every voice was exquisitely clear, and the polyphonic structure of the last movement was absolutely transparent; and yet this perfection of detail was made only to contribute to the beauty of the whole.

Equally remarkable in their different views was the performance of "A Faust Overture" in its dramatic and occasionally melodramatic spirit, and the "Siegfried Idyll" in its musing tenderness. The "Siegfried Idyll" sometimes seems long, but it hardly seems so when so intensive and vital a spirit is infused into it as was the case on this occasion.

Mr. Kreisler was in superb form, and played the concerto with refreshing vigor and energy, which detracted nothing from the suave and mellifluous style of the music, with warm and searching tone with plastic beauty of phrase, and all technical finish. Needless to say the audience was joyfully enthusiastic over the performance of both the orchestra and the soloists. Dr. Muck twice made the orchestra rise to accept the applause for itself, as he himself discreetly turned away.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date JAN 8 - 1915

1884

Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter.

Dr. Muck bot geſtern Abend in Carnegie Hall ein Programm, mit dem man wohl zufrieden ſein konnte. Der gelungene Abend begann mit Mozart's ewig junger „Jupiter"-Symphonie, brachte ſodann in den prächtig kontraſtirenden Wagner'ſchen Kompoſitionen, der „Fauſt"-Ouverture und dem „Siegfried-Idyll" wundervolle Leiſtungen und erreichte den Höhepunkt in dem von Kreisler unnachahmlich geſpielten Mendelsſohn'ſchen Violin-Konzert.

Die „Jupiter"-Symphonie fand ſeitens Muck's und des Orcheſters eine Ausführung, von deren ſchönheitsgetränkten Linien man nur in Superlativen ſprechen kann. Ich möchte aus dem Herrlichen das unvergleichlich fein gebrachte Menuetto und den letzten Satz mit ſeinem meiſterhaft beherrſchten kontrapunktiſchen Gewebe herausgreifen. Wie in einem einzigen Strom brauſte dieſe kriſtallklare, hoch ragende Kompoſition vor uns vorbei, und wenn Dr. Muck auf den begeiſterten Beifall hin das Orcheſter aufſtehen ließ, ſo war es nur der ſchuldige Tribut des ſiegreichen Heerführers für ſeine tapfere und leiſtungsfähige Armee.

Mächtig, in ihren grübleriſchen Zweifeln und der düſteren Grundſtimmung baute Muck die „Fauſt"-Ouverture vor uns auf, und den lieblichſten Kontraſt fand er in dem entzückend waldwebenartig vorgeführten „Siegfried-Idyll", das die zarteſten Stimmungen und Laute brachte. Auch da war der Beifall ſtürmiſch. Was aber wollte das gegen den triumphalen Erfolg Kreisler's ſagen, der ſchon mit einer imponirenden Ovation empfangen wurde! Seine Interpretation des Mendelsſohn'ſchen Konzerts war ein Genuß ſondergleichen. Einen ſolchen Ton voll Süßigkeit und männlicher Kraft, eine ſo lückenloſe Kantilene, eine ſolch reſtloſe Meiſterſchaft des Techniſchen, das Ganze mit dem feinſten Duft der Romantik umwoben, — das kann uns nur Kreisler ſchenken!

H.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City

FINE CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck's Orchestra and Fritz Kreisler Delight Audience at Carnegie Hall—Mozart, Wagner, Mendelssohn Programme

WITH Dr. Muck leading his men through a musical maze of Mozart and Wagner and Fritz Kreisler intoning Mendelssohn's strains, it was predestined that the large audience which greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall would have a pleasurable evening.

Kreisler was placed at the end of the programme and his marvelous and scholarly reading of Mendelssohn's E minor concerto was applauded loud and long.

The concerto is a grateful composition for the solo violinist, and combines the qualities of brilliancy, expressiveness and tender emotion.

Kreisler's interpretation revealed each charm and signification of the work. His art was disclosed with incisiveness, magnificent breadth of phrase, deep feeling and tonal quality that was a model of accuracy and richness.

The concert began with Mozart's C major (Jupiter) symphony, a work rarely heard and, as it was presented last evening, deserving more frequent performances. It contains much that is delightful and pleasing; much that is noble and dignified.

The musicians illustrated their finest skill in the progress of the four movements. Dr. Muck succeeded in securing a reading that was evenly balanced, eloquent and compelling.

There was especial interest in the performance of the last movement, which contains for its basic idea an old church tune that the composer tossed about among the various choirs until, enlarged and developed, it is taken up by the entire orchestra and overwhelms in its glorification. The Bostonians rose to the occasion and played impressively and artistically.

Wagner's "Faust" overture and "A Siegfried Idyl" were the other numbers, each of which was played in a manner that reflected credit of composer, musicians and conductor.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date

k, 1884

By way of explaining some of the most curious programmes heard this year in New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes official announcement that its two concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of next week will be "devoted largely to the classics," thus following out the general scheme of its conductor in "alternating the character of his programmes." The apology is good for this time at least. At both concerts Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist, making his first appearances with any orchestra save that of the Metropolitan Opera House, with which he played two weeks since. The violinist gave his second solo recital at Carnegie Hall yesterday to another great crowd.

Kreisler's audiences continue to be the sensation of the season. Yesterday a local charity bought up the floor and boxes, reselling them at grand opera rates. The net profit to the Tuberculosis Clinic was nearly $6,000.

The Boston band, by the way, is playing at its home concert on New Year's Day the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt, using a new version, revised and changed by the composer in his last year. When the present conductor was in Bayreuth in 1912 he found in the library of Wahnfried, the home of Liszt's daughter, Cosimo Wagner, a score of the "Faust" with additions pencilled in the handwriting of Liszt.

Siegfried Wagner said his grandfather made these revisions about 1882 and they had never been published. Many changes affect the orchestration, as where an "arioso" for bassoon is given to bass clarionet, which was not among Liszt's earlier instruments. The greatest change in the episode, "Mephistopheles," giving more prominen

Newspaper Cutting

From WORLD
Address: New York City
JAN 8 -
Date

KREISLER THE SOLOIST AT BOSTON SYMPHONY

Est

1884

Violinist Plays Mendelssohn Concerto Superbly—Orchestra Plays Finely.

Last evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert will linger long in the memories of the three thousand people who were in Carnegie Hall to hear it. There was first of all a fine programme, and next an equally fine interpretation of it. Finally came Fritz Kreisler, playing the violin with all the superlative skill which he has displayed this season.

Dr. Karl Muck began the performance with Mozart's majestic symphony in C major, the "Jupiter." He and his musicians presented this classically beautiful work with a breadth possible only in such an orchestra as the one from Boston. Each of the four movements was given with every characteristic revealed, and seldom has the tone of these instrumentalists been more plastic in combination or of greater purity.

Wagner's "Faust" overture and the same composer's "Siegfried Idyll," played one after the other, served in an interesting way to show the difference of methods this master employed at periods in his life widely remote. Both works were read with keen sympathy by Dr. Muck, but especial emphasis deserves to be placed upon the clear exposition of the poetic qualities of the "Idyll."

In the Mendelssohn E minor concerto for violin and orchestra Mr. Kreisler properly took his pre-eminent position. The Austrian has played the solo portion of this romantic and popular composition on other occasions in this city, though never with so marked a degree of finish or beauty and intensity of tone. From the opening movement, brilliantly given, to the last, Mr. Kreisler was at his best.

---

m PRESS
ress: New York City
JAN 8 - 1915
e stablished

KREISLER PLAYS WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Performance Puts New Life Into Dr. Muck and His Players.

When Fritz Kreisler made his appearance last night in Carnegie Hall to play as the final contribution of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third Thursday evening concert Mendelssohn's hackneyed Concerto in E minor he brought with him into the big auditorium an electrifying energy that until then had been conspicuously absent in the conducting of Dr. Karl Muck and the playing of his musicians.

It was not for the first time Dr. Muck performed in New York Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, Wagner's "Eine Faust Overtuere" and the "Siegfried Idyll." All the more evident, therefore, was it to those who could recall vividly his earlier achievements in the same music that the distinguished conductor brought far less vigor and vitality to his work than usual last night and failed to inspire his men to give of their best.

In the "Siegfried Idyll" he produced more satisfying results than in the two earlier selections, which suffered distinctly from lack of animation and emotional force. But one missed even in that beautifully inspired composition, which few can interpret as poetically as Dr. Muck does when he is in good spirits, the perfect precision, euphony and exquisite refinement characteristic of the Boston orchestra.

However, musicians are human beings, and it is hardly surprising that a man so thoroughly, so genuinely German as Dr. Muck, should have occasional spells of depression in these troublous times, even though he lives in the neutral atmosphere of the Hub.

Needless to say, Fritz Kreisler gave a masterly performance of the Mendelssohn concerto. It was a performance that infused new life and new interest into music that for many of us has become pallid and anaemic with age.

MAX SMITH.

Address: New York City
Date JAN [illegible] 1915

Establi

1884

Orchestra concerts begin again in earnest this week. There will be no less than eight. For its third pair of concerts here the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, in Carnegie Hall, on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon will present Mr. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as soloist at both concerts. On Thursday night he will play the Mendelssohn Concerto, and the orchestral numbers will be Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and Wagner's "Faust" overture and the "Siegfried Idyl." On Saturday the selections will be Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, Schumann's overture, "Genoveva;" the shepherds' music from Bach's Christmas Oratorio, Liszt's "March of the Three Holy Kings" from "Christus," and Bruch's Scotch fantaisie for violin and orchestra.

* * *

Address: New York City
JAN [illegible] - 1915
Date

Boston Symphony.

The two concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week will be devoted largely to the classics, thus following out Dr. Muck's scheme of alternating the character of his programmes. At both concerts Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist, making his first appearances in New York this season with orchestra. The programme for Thursday night is as follows:

Est

1884

Symphony in G major, "Jupiter"	Mozart
A Faust Overture	Wagner
A Siegfried Idyl	Wagner
Violin Concerto in E minor	Mendelssohn

The programme for Saturday afternoon will be as follows:

Symphony No. 8	Beethoven
Overature, "Genoveva"	Schumann
Shepherds' Music from the Christmas Oratorio	Bach
March of the Three Holy Kings from "Christus"	Liszt
"Scotch" Fantasia for violin and orchestra,	Bruch

A Revised Faust Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played at its concerts in Boston last week the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt, and is using for the first time a verison of the work which was revised and changed by Liszt in his last years. When Dr. Muck was in Beyreuth in the summer of 1912 he found in looking through the library of Wahnfried, the home of the Wagners, a score of the "Faust" Symphony which bore many changes and additions penciled in the handwriting of the composer. Siegfried Wagner told him that Liszt had made these revisions about 1883 and that they had never been published. The score was given to Dr. Muck, with permission to perform the revised symphony if he should see fit, and this week in Boston is the first time he has used it.

In no way has Liszt changed the thematic contour, nor has he made serious changes in the development or the episodes. The changes, for the most part, affect the orchestration. Thus, early in "Faust" an arioso written originally for a bassoon is given to the bass clarinet, which was not at first in Liszt's table of instruments to be employed. Here and there wind instruments are introduced or reinforced for the sake of greater brilliance. Most of the changes are to be found in "Mephistopheles," where the "Vision of Gretchen" is made much more effective. There are excisions throughout the symphony; sometimes only a measure, sometimes more. Dr. Muck is of the opinion that the changes greatly benefit the work.

From POST
Address: New York City
DEC 30 1914
Date

Ests

Liszt's "Faust," with Revisions.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is playing at its concerts in Boston this week the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt, and is using, for the first time, a version of the work which was revised and changed by Liszt in his last year. When Dr. Muck was in Bayreuth in the summer of 1912 he found, in looking over the library of Wahnfried, the home of the Wagners, a score of the "Faust" Symphony which bore many changes and additions pencilled in the handwriting of the composer. Siegfried Wagner told him that Liszt had made these revisions about 1883, and they had never been published. The score was given to Dr. Muck, with permission to perform the revised symphony, if he should see fit, and this week in Boston is the first time he has used it. In no way has Liszt changed the thematic contour, nor has he made serious changes in the development of the episodes. The changes, for the most part, affect the orchestration. Thus, early in "Faust," an arioso written originally for a bassoon is given to the bass clarinet, which was not at first in Liszt's table of instruments to be employed. Here and there wind instruments are introduced, reinforced, or for the sake of greater brilliance. The greatest part of the changes is in "Mephistopheles," where the "Vision of Gretchen" is made much more effective. There are excisions through the symphony, sometimes only a measure, sometimes more. Dr. Muck is of the opinion that the changes greatly benefit the work. Can't we hear it in New York, too?

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 8 1915

Est

The Boston orchestra gave the first of its third pair of concerts last evening in Carnegie Hall, with Fritz Kreisler playing Mendelssohn's violin concerto. Dr. Muck very wisely placed the concerto at the end of the programme, permitting the great audience to indulge in an unlimited number of recalls for Mr. Kreisler. The superlative qualities of this artist's work again gave delight, while such a wonderfully sympathetic accompaniment as Dr. Muck gives the soloist—when there is one—is rarely heard anywhere.

The programme began with Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony. The vigor and brilliance of the opening and closing movements, the lovely, flowing melody of the slow movement, the majestic rhythm of the minuetto—these were all delivered by the orchestra with superb precision and élan, and Dr. Muck bade his men rise to share the tremendous applause at the conclusion.

The remaining orchestral numbers were Wagner's "Faust" overture and his "Siegfried" idyl, this latter a marvel of tender, human lyrism that few besides this composer could have attained, and its full beauty was brought out in the conductor's reading.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date JAN 8 1915

Est

84

That the Boston Symphony never does things by halves was shown at Carnegie Hall last night, when the orchestra "came back" in a classic Sabbath-calm after the storm of December novelties, and played not a note that hasn't been dry these thirty, sixty, ninety years. Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony earned gratitude at sight. It was divinely short, and the vivid finale was worth while. The band stood up after that, and stood again after Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," which with his less popular "Faust" overture was the nearest approach to modernism. Then the premier orchestra put itself in the background and proceeded to stage the prettiest Kreisler riot in four appearances of "unser Fritz" since he came from the wars.

Kreisler limped out on the stage to a tumult of applause. He chose to play the old Mendelssohn concerto, a thing of beauty so fragile, it seemed as if the artist were holding in his powerful hands a delicate rose, turning its gossamer petals to catch each glint of light. Again there was a runaway finish, for Kreisler took the last phrases at a dash that made the virtuoso wind choir turn somersaults to keep up. The house called him out more times than anybody cared to count.

Groups of people flocked toward the footlights, remembering last year's Paderewski encores. But Kreisler bowed and bowed, and fled away. He plays with the Bostonians in Brooklyn tonight, and at Carnegie Hall once more to-morrow.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 8 1915

BOSTON ORCHESTRA DELIGHTS HEARERS

k, 1884

Dr. Muck, as Usual, Conducts with Rare Skill — Kreisler's Playing Warmly Applauded.

The Boston Orchestra came to us again last night, and another audience that permitted of no vacant seats thronged Carnegie Hall.

Dr. Muck, as if in reply to the criticisms levelled at him for the boredom of his last two programmes, gave an evening devoted to works which all have been heard and enjoyed a hundred times. The "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart scarcely calls for extended comment in this day and generation. It suffices to say that it is one of the great symphonies of the world, and that in Dr. Muck it found a loving and admiring worshipper.

In the music of the classic the Boston Orchestra's leader is always at his best. He understands and possesses himself those qualities essential to the classic style—poise, balance, restraint, elegance of finish—no leader in the world is a greater master of these virtues than is Dr. Muck. He and his magnificent band gave ample evidence of that mastery in last night's symphony.

After the Mozart number came Wagner's "A Faust Overture" and the same composer's "A Siegfried Idyl."

The concluding number was the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto in E minor played by Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler was never in better form than last night, and when this is said what, indeed, remains? To assert that he played with technical mastery, that he uplifted his hearers by his lofty imagination, that he thrilled them with tones of ravishing beauty, may all be said by simply stating that Fritz Kreisler played.

And, what was more, he played last night to an audience which had not come to see an Austrian officer with a limp, but which had come to hear one of the two foremost living violinists. Eugene Ysaye is a Belgian, Fritz Kreisler an Austrian; but in art there are no boundaries of race or creed.

From
Address: New York City
JAN 8 191
Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN GREAT CONCERT

k, 1884

Fritz Kreisler Plays Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto With Unusual Beauty and Power.

MOZART'S 'JUPITER' HEARD

The third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Wagner's "Eine Faust" overture and "Siegfried Idyl" and Mendelssohn's violin concerto. The solo violinist was Fritz Kreisler. It was a concert to be cherished in the memory not only because of the beauty of the music but for the spirit of devotion which dwelt in it.

That Dr. Muck is not in ebullient humor in these troubled times must be manifest to the most superficial observer. It is surmised that he deeply feels the trend of popular opinion in this country on the subject of the European war. It is a pity, if this be true, that he cannot keep in mind the incontestable fact that Americans are enthusiastically pro-Bach, pro-Mozart, pro-Haydn, pro-Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Wagner, and that New Yorkers are and will probably continue to be pro-Muck.

The distinguished conductor did his duty last evening, but he showed no cordiality in his demeanor toward his audience. Nevertheless the splendid instrument upon which he plays was heard with delight in the Mozart symphony, and with thrills in the overture, in which the conductor's artistic affections were wakened into quickness and communicative power.

The "Jupiter" symphony stays young and filled with vigor. Lacking all the imposing apparatus of the latest orchestral productions and moving along the thin lines of the early symphonic form, it none the less makes clear its proclamation of genius; and the massive strength of the fugue which amazed Mozart's contemporaries as an item of symphonic composition still demands applause.

Perhaps there may be a special and poignant significance in the "Siegfried Idyl" in these days when the brilliant and somewhat eccentric Cosima Liszt von Bülow Wagner is sinking into the final scenes of her life romance and the burden of Bayreuth has fallen upon the shoulders of the young Siegfried who was a babe in the time of the Franco-Prussian war. Certainly the music sounded intensely warm and personal last night and it was played with extreme beauty of tone and technic.

The placing of the solo number last on the programme was of course designed to keep the audience in the house till the last moment. Those who were for one reason or another compelled to leave before the performance was finished must have regretted it deeply. Mendelssohn's concerto is often performed, frequently played, and rarely enough interpreted; but Mr. Kreisler's delivery of the first movement (all that THE SUN recorder heard) was a masterpiece of eloquence. The violinist has never played this particular music with greater splendor of technical art, with a finer insight, nor with a more irresistible personal utterance. It was a great performance, and worthy of both the player and the composition.

Newspaper Cutting

From WORLD
Address: New York City

Date

Est 1884

KREISLER THE SOLOIST AT BOSTON SYMPHONY

Violinist Plays Mendelssohn Concerto Superbly—Orchestra Plays Finely.

Last evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert will linger long in the memories of the three thousand people who were in Carnegie Hall to hear it. There was first of all a fine programme, and next an equally fine interpretation of it. Finally came Fritz Kreisler, playing the violin with all the superlative skill which he has displayed this season.

Dr. Karl Muck began the performance with Mozart's majestic symphony in C major, the "Jupiter." He and his musicians presented this classically beautiful work with a breadth possible only in such an orchestra as the one from Boston. Each of the four movements was given with every characteristic revealed, and seldom has the tone of these instrumentalists been more plastic in combination or of greater purity.

Wagner's "Faust" overture and the same composer's "Siegfried Idyll," played one after the other, served in an interesting way to show the difference of methods this master employed at periods in his life widely remote. Both works were read with keen sympathy by Dr. Muck, but especial emphasis deserves to be placed upon the clear exposition of the poetic qualities of the "Idyll."

In the Mendelssohn E minor concerto for violin and orchestra Mr. Kreisler properly took his pre-eminent position. The Austrian has played the solo portion of this romantic and popular composition on other occasions in this city, though never with so marked a degree of finish or beauty and intensity of tone. From the opening movement, brilliantly given, to the last, Mr. Kreisler was at his best.

---

m PRESS
lress: New York City

e

stablished

KREISLER PLAYS WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Performance Puts New Life Into Dr. Muck and His Players.

When Fritz Kreisler made his appearance last night in Carnegie Hall to play as the final contribution of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third Thursday evening concert Mendelssohn's hackneyed Concerto in E minor he brought with him into the big auditorium an electrifying energy that until then had been conspicuously absent in the conducting of Dr. Karl Muck and the playing of his musicians.

It was not for the first time Dr. Muck performed in New York Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, Wagner's "Eine Faust Overtuere" and the "Siegfried Idyll." All the more evident, therefore, was it to those who could recall vividly his earlier achievements in the same music that the distinguished conductor brought far less vigor and vitality to his work than usual last night and failed to inspire his men to give of their best.

In the "Siegfried Idyll" he produced more satisfying results than in the two earlier selections, which suffered distinctly from lack of animation and emotional force. But one missed even in that beautifully inspired composition, which few can interpret as poetically as Dr. Muck does when he is in good spirits, the perfect precision, euphony and exquisite refinement characteristic of the Boston orchestra.

However, musicians are human beings, and it is hardly surprising that a man so thoroughly, so genuinely German as Dr. Muck, should have occasional spells of depression in these troublous times, even though he lives in the neutral atmosphere of the Hub.

Needless to say, Fritz Kreisler gave a masterly performance of the Mandelssohn concerto. It was a performance that infused new life and new interest into music that for many of us has become pallid and anaemic with age.

MAX SMITH.

Address: New York City

Date JAN 1915

Establi

Orchestra concerts begin again in earnest this week. There will be no less than eight. For its third pair of concerts here the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, in Carnegie Hall, on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon will present Mr. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as soloist at both concerts. On Thursday night he will play the Mendelssohn Concerto, and the orchestral numbers will be Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and Wagner's "Faust" overture and the "Siegfried Idyl." On Saturday the selections will be Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, Schumann's overture, "Genoveva;" the shepherds' music from Bach's Christmas Oratorio, Liszt's "March of the Three Holy Kings" from "Christus," and Bruch's Scotch fantaisie for violin and orchestra.

* * *

Address: New York City

Date

Est 1884

Boston Symphony.

The two concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week will be devoted largely to the classics, thus following out Dr. Muck's scheme of alternating the character of his programmes. At both concerts Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist, making his first appearances in New York this season with orchestra. The programme for Thursday night is as follows:

Symphony in G major, "Jupiter"	Mozart
A Faust Overture	Wagner
A Siegfried Idyl	Wagner
Violin Concerto in E minor	Mendelssohn

The programme for Saturday afternoon will be as follows:

Symphony No. 8	Beethoven
Overature, "Genoveva"	Schumann
Shepherds' Music from the Christmas Oratorio	Bach
March of the Three Holy Kings from "Christus"	Liszt
"Scotch" Fantasia for violin and orchestra,	Bruch

A Revised Faust Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played at its concerts in Boston last week the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt, and is using for the first time a verison of the work which was revised and changed by Liszt in his last years. When Dr. Muck was in Beyreuth in the summer of 1912 he found in looking through the library of Wahnfried, the home of the Wagners, a score of the "Faust" Symphony which bore many changes and additions penciled in the handwriting of the composer. Siegfried Wagner told him that Liszt had made these revisions about 1883 and that they had never been published. The score was given to Dr. Muck, with permission to perform the revised symphony if he should see fit, and this week in Boston is the first time he has used it.

In no way has Liszt changed the thematic contour, nor has he made serious changes in the development or the episodes. The changes, for the most part, affect the orchestration. Thus, early in "Faust" an arioso written originally for a bassoon is given to the bass clarinet, which was not at first in Liszt's table of instruments to be employed. Here and there wind instruments are introduced or reinforced for the sake of greater brilliance. Most of the changes are to be found in "Mephistopheles," where the "Vision of Gretchen" is made much more effective. There are excisions throughout the symphony; sometimes only a measure, sometimes more. Dr. Muck is of the opinion that the changes greatly benefit the work.

From POST
Address: New York City

Date DEC 30 1914

Ests 84

Liszt's "Faust," with Revisions.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is playing at its concerts in Boston this week the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt, and is using, for the first time, a version of the work which was revised and changed by Liszt in his last year. When Dr. Muck was in Bayreuth in the summer of 1912 he found, in looking over the library of Wahnfried, the home of the Wagners, a score of the "Faust" Symphony which bore many changes and additions pencilled in the handwriting of the composer. Siegfried Wagner told him that Liszt had made these revisions about 1883, and they had never been published. The score was given to Dr. Muck, with permission to perform the revised symphony, if he should see fit, and this week in Boston is the first time he has used it. In no way has Liszt changed the thematic contour, nor has he made serious changes in the development of the episodes. The changes, for the most part, affect the orchestration. Thus, early in "Faust," an arioso written originally for a bassoon is given to the bass clarinet which was not at first in Liszt's table of instruments to be employed. Here and there wind instruments are introduced, reinforced, or for the sake of greater brilliance. The greatest part of the changes is in "Mephistopheles," where the "Vision of Gretchen" is made much more effective. There are excisions through the symphony, sometimes only a measure, sometimes more. Dr. Muck is of the opinion that the changes greatly benefit the work. Can't we hear it in New York, too?

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City.

Date JAN 8 1915

Esta

The Boston orchestra gave the first of its third pair of concerts last evening in Carnegie Hall, with Fritz Kreisler playing Mendelssohn's violin concerto. Dr. Muck very wisely placed the concerto at the end of the programme, permitting the great audience to indulge in an unlimited number of recalls for Mr. Kreisler. The superlative qualities of this artist's work again gave delight, while such a wonderfully sympathetic accompaniment as Dr. Muck gives the soloist—when there is one—is rarely heard anywhere.

The programme began with Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony. The vigor and brilliance of the opening and closing movements, the lovely, flowing melody of the slow movement, the majestic rhythm of the minuetto—these were all delivered by the orchestra with superb precision and élan, and Dr. Muck bade his men rise to share the tremendous applause at the conclusion.

The remaining orchestral numbers were Wagner's "Faust" overture and his "Siegfried" idyl, this latter a marvel of tender, human lyrism that few besides this composer could have attained, and its full beauty was brought out in the conductor's reading.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City

Date JAN 8 1915

Esta 84

That the Boston Symphony never does things by halves was shown at Carnegie Hall last night, when the orchestra "came back" in a classic Sabbath-calm after the storm of December novelties, and played not a note that hasn't been dry these thirty, sixty, ninety years. Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony earned gratitude at sight. It was divinely short, and the vivid finale was worth while. The band stood up after that, and stood again after Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," which with his less popular "Faust" overture was the nearest approach to modernism. Then the premier orchestra put itself in the background and proceeded to stage the prettiest Kreisler riot in four appearances of "unser Fritz" since he came from the wars.

Kreisler limped out on the stage to a tumult of applause. He chose to play the old Mendelssohn concerto, a thing of beauty so fragile, it seemed as if the artist were holding in his powerful hands a delicate rose, turning its gossamer petals to catch each glint of light. Again there was a runaway finish, for Kreisler took the last phrases at a dash that made the virtuoso wind choir turn somersaults to keep up. The house called him out more times than anybody cared to count.

Groups of people flocked toward the footlights, remembering last year's Paderewski encores. But Kreisler bowed and bowed, and fled away. He plays with the Bostonians in Brooklyn tonight, and at Carnegie Hall once more to-morrow.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City.

Date JAN 8

BOSTON ORCHESTRA DELIGHTS HEARERS

E k, 1884

Dr. Muck, as Usual, Conducts with Rare Skill — Kreisler's Playing Warmly Applauded.

The Boston Orchestra came to us again last night, and another audience that permitted of no vacant seats thronged Carnegie Hall.

Dr. Muck, as if in reply to the criticisms levelled at him for the boredom of his last two programmes, gave an evening devoted to works which all have been heard and enjoyed a hundred times. The "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart scarcely calls for extended comment in this day and generation. It suffices to say that it is one of the great symphonies of the world, and that in Dr. Muck it found a loving and admiring worshipper.

In the music of the classic the Boston Orchestra's leader is always at his best. He understands and possesses himself those qualities essential to the classic style—poise, balance, restraint, elegance of finish—no leader in the world is a greater master of these virtues than is Dr. Muck. He and his magnificent band gave ample evidence of that mastery in last night's symphony.

After the Mozart number came Wagner's "A Faust Overture" and the same composer's "A Siegfried Idyl."

The concluding number was the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto in E minor, played by Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler was never in better form than last night, and when this is said what, indeed, remains? To assert that he played with technical mastery, that he uplifted his hearers by his lofty imagination, that he thrilled them with tones of ravishing beauty, may all be said by simply stating that Fritz Kreisler played.

And, what was more, he played last night to an audience which had not come to see an Austrian officer with a limp, but which had come to hear one of the two foremost living violinists. Eugene Ysaye is a Belgian, Fritz Kreisler an Austrian; but in art there are no boundaries of race or creed.

From
Address: New York City

Date JAN

k, 1884

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN GREAT CONCERT

Fritz Kreisler Plays Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto With Unusual Beauty and Power.

MOZART'S 'JUPITER' HEARD

The third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Wagner's "Eine Faust" overture and "Siegfried Idyl" and Mendelssohn's violin concerto. The solo violinist was Fritz Kreisler. It was a concert to be cherished in the memory not only because of the beauty of the music but for the spirit of devotion which dwelt in it.

That Dr. Muck is not in ebullient humor in these troubled times must be manifest to the most superficial observer. It is surmised that he deeply reels the trend of popular opinion in this country on the subject of the European war. It is a pity, if this be true, that he cannot keep in mind the incontestable fact that Americans are enthusiastically pro-Bach, pro-Mozart, pro-Haydn, pro-Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Wagner, and that New Yorkers are and will probably continue to be pro-Muck.

The distinguished conductor did his duty last evening, but he showed no cordiality in his demeanor toward his audience. Nevertheless the splendid instrument upon which he plays was heard with delight in the Mozart symphony, and with thrills in the overture, in which the conductor's artistic affections were wakened into quickness and communicative power.

The "Jupiter" symphony stays young and filled with vigor. Lacking all the imposing apparatus of the latest orchestral productions and moving along the thin lines of the early symphonic form, it none the less makes clear its proclamation of genius; and the massive strength of the fugue which amazed Mozart's contemporaries as an item of symphonic composition still demands applause.

Perhaps there may be a special and poignant significance in the "Siegfried Idyl" in these days when the brilliant and somewhat eccentric Cosima Liszt von Bülow Wagner is sinking into the final scenes of her life romance and the burden of Bayreuth has fallen upon the shoulders of the young Siegfried who was a babe in the time of the Franco-Prussian war. Certainly the music sounded intensely warm and personal last night and it was played with extreme beauty of tone and technic.

The placing of the solo number last on the programme was of course designed to keep the audience in the house till the last moment. Those who were for one reason or another compelled to leave before the performance was finished must have regretted it deeply. Mendelssohn's concerto is often performed, frequently played, and rarely enough interpreted; but Mr. Kreisler's delivery of the first movement (all that THE SUN recorder heard) was a masterpiece of eloquence. The violinist has never played this particular music with greater splendor of technical art, with a finer insight, nor with a more irresistible personal utterance. It was a great performance, and worthy of both the player and the composition.

Newspaper Cutting

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date JAN 8 - 1915

Dr. Muck's Men Play Old Music as Well as New

Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony Elicits Much Applause at Boston Orchestra Concert.

Going from one extreme to another, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which at its last concerts here played music so modern that even the men of the orchestra admitted they did not know what it was all about, at its concert last night in Carnegie Hall gave as its principal number one of the oldest symphonies which find a place in modern programmes, the so-called "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart.

That the change in programme making was much to the taste of the audience was shown by the fact that the applause was so great that Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, called upon the players to rise in acknowledgment, an unusual thing for the Boston Symphony.

Needless to say, the playing of the orchestra was all that could be asked. An old work, although thin in its orchestration, if played superlatively well can give more real enjoyment than a dozen from the modern school, as it is represented in the programmes of our orchestras.

The second work to be heard was Wagner's "Faust" overture, and the last the "Siegfried Idyl," after which the conductor again called on his men to rise to share the applause.

The soloist was Mr. Fritz Kreisler. His contribution was the familiar Mendelssohn violin concerto. His playing, as in his recitals, was much to the liking of the audience. He is known in his recitals as a player of small pieces, but he excels to the same degree in the big concertos.

Mr. Albert Chevrot, twenty-five years old, one of the flutists in the orchestra, was taken to Bellevue Hospital at midnight last night by Mr. Charles A. Ellis, business manager of the orchestra. Mr. Ellis said Mr. Chevrot had been acting strangely all day.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date JAN 7 - 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S GOOD PROGRAMME

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Metropolitan Opera House with "Lohengrin" provided those persons known as music-lovers, yesterday evening, with plenty of wholesome entertainment.

The programme submitted to New York by Dr. Carl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra the last Thursday on which they visited us aroused a storm of unfavorable comment and in some cases of irritated protest. But the selections put forward last night could not occasion any bitterness. Dr. Muck and his instrumentalists gave us Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, the Siegfried Idyll of Wagner, the same composer's far less attractive "Faust" overture and Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto in E minor, with Fritz Kreisler as violinist.

The rendering of the "Jupiter" Symphony left nothing to be desired in the matter of majesty or beauty of outline and the practical value of the interpretation of the Siegfried "Idyll" was cordially recognized by the auditors. Mr. Kreisler's playing was greeted with the usual enthusiasm.

"Lohengrin," at the Metropolitan, presented no strikingly novel features. Mme. Destinn appeared as the heroine. Because of the indisposition of Carl Braun Basil Ruysdael took the part of Henry the Fowler. Jacques Urlus sang Lohengrin and Alfred Hertz conducted.

From
Address
Date 31 JAN

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Work by Ropartz—Ovation Given to Fritz Kreisler.

The novelty offered by Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, at the Boston Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music last night was a symphony by Ropartz, a disciple of Cesar Franck, the great Belgian composer. Like all modern orchestral writers, Ropartz has succeeded in conveying a vast and at times almost bewildering color and variety to his work without being at any time moving or impressive. His writings are said to be largely reflective of his master. If last night's example can be accepted as exhibiting Ropartz's usual style it might more truthfully be affirmed that his work reflects an assimilation of all the modernists, with sufficient originality to create a passing, if not deep, interest.

His manipulation of the orchestral body is at all times absorbing and never fails to entertain, even when the musical content seems barren and uninspired.

The remarkable performances of Sibelius' symphonic poem, "Finlandia," which preceded the symphony, presented a much-discussed work in so concise and intelligent a light that the impression usually given of incoherence and lack of form entirely disappeared, leaving the work revealed as of great beauty and clarity, and made on pronounced and very original lines.

The Schumann overture to "Genoveva," while well played, was, after all, only a means of entertaining the audience until the time for the real event of the evening, the appearance of Fritz Kreisler should arrive. The ovation given Kreisler was remarkable, even for this city, where he never lacks acclaim. Without any detraction from the well-known and universally recognized merits of the Mendelssohn E-minor concerto, it must be said that many would have preferred one of the other concertos. This feeling, however, on hearing Kreisler do the Mendelssohn, was replaced with thankfulness that he had chosen this especial work, for surely it was never played as he played it last night. One of the most musical and technically exacting things in violin literature, it has become slightly unpopular because it has been the showpiece of many an ambitious but deficient amateur. Kreisler was evidently bent on presenting the work in all its melodious and sparkling beauty. He more than accomplished this task. He left his audience dazzled by a display of technical skill and speed, and enraptured with a musicianship that was unfailing in its appeal. The audience fairly clamored for an encore, recalling this genius many times and showering him with plaudits and bravos until no question of his popularity and power could be raised. The orchestra was in its usual superb form, playing with that beautiful, easy tone and fluency of execution which it alone seems able to accomplish.

FLAG CAN'T SAVE HIS

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Enjoyed by Large Audience at Academy of Music Last Evening

The most salient and notable feature of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra before a large audience at the Academy of Music under the direction of Mr. Karl Muck last evening was the appearance of Mr. Fritz Kreisler as the assisting artist of the occasion. He had elected to be heard in the Mendelssohn concerto, and never surely has this ingratiating music been more beautifully or brilliantly or eloquently rendered. It is music which has somewhat fallen out of favor these latter days, not so much with audiences as with artists, owing to the frequency of its performance and to the circumstance that it belongs to a school which is now regarded as old-fashioned, but it is no exaggeration to say that no more grateful or effective composition of its kind was ever written. It admirably exhibits all the best and most characteristic qualities of the instrument. Its capabilities in the way of brilliant execution are effectively tested and exposed in the two allegro movements, while the lovely, long drawn-out andante finely exemplifies what can be done with it in the way of legato and cantabile.

Of these various and varied opportunities the famous Austrian violinist, who was honored with a great reception when he stepped upon the stage, made the very most that was possible. His tone was as ample and as pure as ever. There was no impairment in his unsurpassed technique and his performance in its entirety was a masterpiece of emotional and intellectual interpretation which it was at once a delight and a privilege to hear. It made a profound impression upon the audience, which recalled the artist several times and would have insisted on an encore had it been permissible. For the rest the program was not one of the most interesting of the season. Its most important number was a novelty in the form of a symphony in one movement by the young French composer, Ropartz, which is written in the modern manner and which one would need to hear more than once before undertaking to appreciate.

Apparently the audience was pleased with it, but there were doubtless many present who would have preferred something less original and more familiar. Needless to say it was admirably played. Other things on the list were the "Finlandia" rhapsody of Jean Sibelius and Schumann's "Geneveva" overture.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN

Orchestra's Pension Fund

When a man has devoted the best years of his life and endeavors to a public service, he is surely entitled to some recognition from those he has benefited when years have curtailed his usefulness in his chosen field.

It is assuredly this feeling that has led to the establishment of a pension fund for members of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Those only who follow music as a profession know how much of skill and knowledge and singleness of purpose go to make a player fit to take his place in a great symphony orchestra. They know also that the financial rewards are not great, certainly not great enough to permit a player to secure financial independence in old age, from his salary, with-

---

Practically all the great orchestras of the world have such funds. They are almost universal in Europe and in the United States the Boston Symphony, the Chicago Symphony and the New York Symphony have all felt the necessity of establishing them. It has been calculated that the average time for which musicians are available as members of an orchestra of the first quality is about fifteen years, especially in the case of men who play brasses and woodwinds, and these years are necessarily the best of their lives.

The local fund has been but recently established and its necessity and purpose are not yet too well known. Graceful tribute and substantial assistance will be paid to it within the week. Olga Samaroff, who as the wife of Leopold Stokowski, the conductor, knows the situation intimately, is to devote the proceeds of her piano recital to the fund. Such timely and appropriate assistance may well in-

---

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 5

ROPARTZ'S SYMPHONY GIVEN HERE BY MUCK

Modern French Work Is Piquant Novelty on Boston Orchestra Program

KREISLER THE SOLOIST

ESSENTIALLY of the modern French school is the fourth symphony in C major of Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz, director of the Nancy Conservatory of Music, which formed a piquant novelty on the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third program of the season at the Academy of Music last evening.

The composer has had a fecund career. He has been a pupil of Massenet and Franck, the tendencies of the latter tinging most of the texture of the work played by Dr. Karl Muck and his men here. But the score rises frequently to more masculine heights than any achieved by the writer of "The Mad Huntsman," this quality being especially noticeable in the use of the violins as a melodie background. The cycle, which is given without pause, evinces sometimes the influence of Wagner. Heroic, ascending inflections alternate with amusing wistfulness, decidedly a la Franck.

A dissonant dance measure and glittering harp accompaniments are two striking features of the latter movements. Despite its modernity, the symphony was well worth presenting. A second hearing would be welcomed.

For the second time this season, Fritz Kreisler appeared in the Academy last night. The great Austrian artist ended the program with a characteristically discerning and poetic reading of Mendelssohn's melodious concerto in E minor. He looked better than he did at his recital some weeks ago, and his playing of the three varied movements was a fresh revelation of his delicious tone, unapproachable technical accomplishments and complete lack of mannerism. Even after the orchestra had left the stage, the soloist was recalled by volleys of applause. The only other numbers on the short program were Sibelius' "Finlandia," in which the Boston organization's golden-throated brass choir spoke with orotund beauty, and the overture to Schumann's opera, "Genoveva," which was "killed," as a lyric drama, by its inane and tedious libretto.

Newspaper Cutting

From Address
Date

MUSIC

The Ropartz symphony in C major, which will be played tonight by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was first played in this country by that organization at one of its regular concerts in Boston. It was later played in New York. It would seem that the Boston audience heard it with reserved gratification; it is plain that the New York critics heard it without any great degree of pleasure. In the orchestral score the critic of the Boston Tanscript found the influence of Cesar Franck in imagination, with the added resources and technical devices of later French music. The symphony is played without stop, but it is not overlong. Its mand solutions in [illegible] the composer himself is so little known that a few things may be said of him without prejudice to the freshness of tonight's performance.

---

Philip Greeley Clapp, writing in the Boston Transcript, sketches the life of Guy Ropartz thus: He was born in Brittany in 1864, studied at various Catholic institutions and at the law school of Rennes. He then entered the Paris Conservatory as a pupil of Dubois and Massenet, but left there to study with Cesar Franck. Since 1894 he has been director of the Conservatory of Nancy. He is said to be fond of tennis and photography.

The insistence upon Ropartz as the nearest and greatest disciple of Franck—a position generally given to the director of the Schola Cantorum—is enough to make one suspicious. When Roman Rolland says that, except Bach, no composer has seen Christ so clearly as Cesar Franck, he says nothing about the Franckians. Ropartz himself has written with more sanity and less gush of Franck than most of the other disciples; he has not forgotten that the sweetness of Franck's religion was vigorous and worldly as well. In Ropartz the religion is not so evident; the sweetness occasionally is. Mr. Clapp writes: "Ropartz's feeling for beauty and atmosphere, his love of melody, his masterly instrumentation, his smooth workmanship, his artistic earnestness and sincerity are qualities too valuable to be underestimated." But he adds that they are qualities which may become monotonous after many hearings. Whether tonight's symphony partakes of these qualities, and in what degree, will be for the individual hearer to determine. There is more than one beauty in this world, and it is not to belittle Ropartz that one speaks of Franck. His is one absolute perfection; another method, another man with the same impassioned sincerity, may yield another perfection quite as absolute.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN NEW SYMPHONY

Ropartz Composition an Interesting Novelty—Ovation to Fritz Kreisler.

PROGRAM.

Sibelius.........."Finlandia," symphonic poem for orchestra. Op. 26. No. 7
Ropartz ....Symphony No. 4, C major (played without pause) First time in Philadelphia.
Schumann. Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81
Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. Concerto in E minor for Violin, Op. 64.
Conductor ....Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist ....Fritz Kreisler

Many were turned away from the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Academy of Music last evening, the third of the season, and they missed a rare treat. It is always an exceptional privilege to hear Dr. Muck and his Boston musicians, but on this occasion, it was especially so. A most admirable program had been arranged in which Dr. Muck presented a novelty which was well worth hearing, and which was in strong contrast to the works usually given here.

Kreisler Given an Ovation.

Kreisler was the soloist and charmed as only he can, and with one of the most delightful of all concertos, Mendelssohn's E Minor. If any composer had in view the effect of a thrilling climax upon an audience, Mendelssohn must have had that in mind when he wrote the third movement, for in it he not only gives the player a chance to show the breadth of his art, but in an enticing melody that goes dancing along in wonderfully marked chords and in tantalizing harmony that simply holds the hearers spellbound. At the conclusion Kreisler was given a tremendous ovation, such an one that must have even surprised this master of the violin.

The New Symphony.

The new symphony was composed by Ropartz, a Frenchman, and it is peculiar in that it is played without pause. In fact there is no part of it that would permit of its being disconnected. It is a modern work, only a little more than three years old. It could hardly be considered ultra-modern, for from first to last it contains a combination of themes, or brief arias, which are worked into wonderful harmony. At times it might become a little tedious on account of its length, but it was kept from ever becoming mediocre last evening, by the spirited handling by Dr. Muck. All the choirs are utilized with almost equal prominence, and, as a whole, it was well worth a first hearing, but hardly of such intrinsic musical merit as to hold a firm place in the repertoire of an orchestra, even one so great as the Boston Symphony.

The first number on the program was Sibelius' colorful symphonic poem "Finlandia," and between the symphony and the soloist the Orchestra played Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva." Both of them were given with the usual care that are all compositions by the Boston Orchestra. The next concert will take place on Monday evening, February 15.

PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA

Newspaper Cutting ...

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date JAN 8 - 1915

Est... 884

Dr. Muck's Men Play Old Music as Well as New

Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony Elicits Much Applause at Boston Orchestra Concert.

Going from one extreme to another, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which at its last concerts here played music so modern that even the men of the orchestra admitted they did not know what it was all about, at its concert last night in Carnegie Hall gave as its principal number one of the oldest symphonies which find a place in modern programmes, the so-called "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart.

That the change in programme making was much to the taste of the audience was shown by the fact that the applause was so great that Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, called upon the players to rise in acknowledgment, an unusual thing for the Boston Symphony.

Needless to say, the playing of the orchestra was all that could be asked. An old work, although thin in its orchestration, if played superlatively well can give more real enjoyment than a dozen from the modern school, as it is represented in the programmes of our orchestras.

The second work to be heard was Wagner's "Faust" overture, and the last the "Siegfried Idyl," after which the conductor again called on his men to rise to share the applause.

The soloist was Mr. Fritz Kreisler. His contribution was the familiar Mendelssohn violin concerto. His playing, as in his recitals, was much to the liking of the audience. He is known in his recitals as a player of small pieces, but he excels to the same degree in the big concertos.

Mr. Albert Chevrot, twenty-five years old, one of the flutists in the orchestra, was taken to Bellevue Hospital at midnight last night by Mr. Charles A. Ellis, business manager of the orchestra. Mr. Ellis said Mr. Chevrot had been acting strangely all day.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date ... 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S GOOD PROGRAMME

E... 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Metropolitan Opera House with "Lohengrin" provided those persons known as music-lovers, yesterday evening, with plenty of wholesome entertainment.

The programme submitted to New York by Dr. Carl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra the last Thursday on which they visited us aroused a storm of unfavorable comment and in some cases of irritated protest. But the selections put forward last night could not occasion any bitterness. Dr. Muck and his instrumentalists gave us Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, the Siegfried Idyll of Wagner, the same composer's far less attractive "Faust" overture and Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto in E minor, with Fritz Kreisler as violinist.

The rendering of the "Jupiter" Symphony left nothing to be desired in the matter of majesty or beauty of outline, and the practical value of the interpretation of the Siegfried "Idyll" was cordially recognized by the auditors. Mr. Kreisler's playing was greeted with the usual enthusiasm.

"Lohengrin," at the Metropolitan, presented no strikingly novel features. Mme. Destinn appeared as the heroine. Because of the indisposition of Carl Braun Basil Ruysdael took the part of Henry the Fowler. Jacques Urlus sang Lohengrin and Alfred Hertz conducted.

From Address
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Work by Ropartz—Ovation Given to Fritz Kreisler.

...k, 1884

The novelty offered by Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, at the Boston Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music last night was a symphony by Ropartz, a disciple of Cesar Franck, the great Belgian composer. Like all modern orchestral writers, Ropartz has succeeded in conveying a vast and at times almost bewildering color and variety to his work without being at any time moving or impressive. His writings are said to be largely reflective of his master. If last night's example can be accepted as exhibiting Ropartz's usual style it might more truthfully be affirmed that his work reflects an assimilation of all the modernists, with sufficient originality to create a passing, if not deep, interest.

His manipulation of the orchestral body is at all times absorbing and never fails to entertain, even when the musical content seems barren and uninspired.

The remarkable performances of Sibelius' symphonic poem, "Finlandia," which preceded the symphony, presented a much-discussed work in so concise and intelligent a light that the impression usually given of incoherence and lack of form entirely disappeared, leaving the work revealed as of great beauty and clarity, and made on pronounced and very original lines.

The Schumann overture to "Genoveva," while well played, was, after all, only a means of entertaining the audience until the time for the real event of the evening, the appearance of Fritz Kreisler should arrive. The ovation given Kreisler was remarkable, even for this city, where he never lacks acclaim. Without any detraction from the well-known and universally recognized merits of the Mendelssohn E-minor concerto, it must be said that many would have preferred one of the other concertos. This feeling, however, on hearing Kreisler do the Mendelssohn, was replaced with thankfulness that he had chosen this especial work, for surely it was never played as he played it last night. One of the most musical and technically exacting things in violin literature, it has become slightly unpopular because it has been the show-piece of many an ambitious but deficient amateur. Kreisler was evidently bent on presenting the work in all its melodious and sparkling beauty. He more than accomplished this task. He left his audience dazzled by a display of technical skill and speed, and enraptured with a musicianship that was unfailing in its appeal. The audience fairly clamored for an encore, recalling this genius many times and showering him with plaudits and bravos until no question of his popularity and power could be raised. The orchestra was in its usual superb form, playing with that beautiful, easy tone and fluency of execution which it alone seems able to accomplish.

...LAG CAN'T SAVE HIS HERO...

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date ...

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Enjoyed by Large Audience at Academy of Music Last Evening

Establ... 884

The most salient and notable feature of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra before a large audience at the Academy of Music under the direction of Mr. Karl Muck last evening was the appearance of Mr. Fritz Kreisler as the assisting artist of the oocasion. He had elected to be heard in the Mendelssohn concerto, and never surely has this ingratiating music been more beautifully or brilliantly or eloquently rendered. It is music which has somewhat fallen out of favor these latter days, not so much with audiences as with artists, owing to the frequency of its performance and to the circumstance that it belongs to a school which is now regarded as old-fashioned, but it is no exaggeration to say that no more grateful or effective composition of its kind was ever written. It admirably exhibits all the best and most characteristic qualities of the instrument. Its capabilities in the way of brilliant execution are effectively tested and exposed in the two allegro movements, while the lovely, long drawn-out andante finely exemplifies what can be done with it in the way of legato and cantabile.

Of these various and varied opportunities the famous Austrian violinist, who was honored with a great reception when he stepped upon the stage, made the very most that was possible. His tone was as ample and as pure as ever. There was no impairment in his unsurpassed technique and his performance in its entirety was a masterpiece of emotional and intellectual interpretation which it was at once a delight and a privilege to hear. It made a profound impression upon the audience, which recalled the artist several times and would have insisted on an encore had it been permissible. For the rest the program was not one of the most interesting of the season. Its most important number was a novelty in the form of a symphony in one movement by the young French composer, Ropartz, which is written in the modern manner and which one would need to hear more than once before undertaking to appreciate.

Apparently the audience was pleased with it, but there were doubtless many present who would have preferred something less original and more familiar. Needless to say it was admirably played. Other things on the list were the "Finlandia" rhapsody of Jean Sibelius and Schumann's "Geneveva" overture.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Orchestra's Pension Fund.

18

When a man has devoted the best years of his life and endeavors to a public service, he is surely entitled to some recognition from those he has benefited when years have curtailed his usefulness in his chosen field.

It is assuredly this feeling that has led to the establishment of a pension fund for members of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Those only who follow music as a profession know how much of skill and knowledge and singleness of purpose go to make a player fit to take his place in a great symphony orchestra. They know also that the financial rewards are not great, certainly not great enough to permit a player to secure financial independence in old age, from his salary with...

GLOBE

Practically all the principal orchestras of the world have such funds. They are almost universal in Europe and in the United States the Boston Symphony, the Chicago Symphony and the New York Symphony have all felt the necessity of establishing them. It has been calculated that the average time for which musicians are available as members of an orchestra of the first quality is about fifteen years, especially in the case of men who play brasses and woodwinds, and these years are necessarily the best of their lives.

The local fund has been but recently established and its necessity and purpose are not yet too well known. Graceful tribute and substantial assistance will be paid to it within the week. Olga Samaroff, who as the wife of Leopold Stokowski, the conductor, knows the situation intimately, is to devote the proceeds of her piano recital to the fund. Such timely and appropriate assistance may well in...

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Dat...

ROPARTZ'S SYMPHONY GIVEN HERE BY MUCK

Es... 884

Modern French Work Is Piquant Novelty on Boston Orchestra Program

KREISLER THE SOLOIST

ESSENTIALLY of the modern French school is the fourth symphony in C major of Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz, director of the Nancy Conservatory of Music, which formed a piquant novelty on the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third program of the season at the Academy of Music last evening.

The composer has had a fecund career. He has been a pupil of Massenet and Franck, the tendencies of the latter tinging most of the texture of the work played by Dr. Karl Muck and his men here. But the score rises frequently to more masculine heights than any achieved by the writer of "The Mad Huntsman," this quality being especially noticeable in the use of the violins as a melodie background. The cycle, which is given without pause, evinces sometimes the influence of Wagner. Heroic, ascending inflections alternate with amusing wistfulness, decidedly a la Franck.

A dissonant dance measure and glittering harp accompaniments are two striking features of the latter movements. Despite its modernity, the symphony was well worth presenting. A second hearing would be welcomed.

For the second time this season, Fritz Kreisler appeared in the Academy last night. The great Austrian artist ended the program with a characteristically discerning and poetic reading of Mendelssohn's melodious concerto in E minor. He looked better than he did at his recital some weeks ago, and his playing of the three varied movements was a fresh revelation of his delicious tone, unapproachable technical accomplishments and complete lack of mannerism. Even after the orchestra had left the stage, the soloist was recalled by volleys of applause. The only other numbers on the short program were Sibelius' "Finlandia," in which the Boston organization's golden-throated brass choir spoke with orotund beauty, and the overture to Schumann's opera, "Genoveva," which was "killed," as a lyric drama, by its in... and tedious libretto.

Newspaper Cutting ...

From Address
Date

MUSIC

E... 884

The Ropartz symphony in C major, which will be played tonight by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was first played in this country by that organization at one of its regular concerts in Boston. It was later played in New York. It would seem that the Boston audience heard it with reserved gratification; it is plain that the New York critics heard it without any great degree of pleasure. In the orchestral score the critic of the Boston Tanscript found the influence of Cesar Franck in imagination, with the added resources and technical devices of later French music. The symphony is played without stop, but it is not overlong. Its many solutions in advance, but the composer himself is so little known that a few things may be said of him without prejudice to the freshness of tonight's performance.

---

Philip Greeley Clapp, writing in the Boston Transcript, sketches the life of Guy Ropartz thus: He was born in Brittany in 1864, studied at various Catholic institutions and at the law school of Rennes. He then entered the Paris Conservatory as a pupil of Dubois and Massenet, but left there to study with Cesar Franck. Since 1894 he has been director of the Conservatory of Nancy. He is said to be fond of tennis and photography.

The insistence upon Ropartz ... nearest and greatest disciple of Franck—a position generally given to the director of the Schola Cantorum—is enough to make one suspicious. When Roman Rolland says that, except Bach, no composer has seen Christ so clearly as Cesar Franck, he says nothing about the Franckians. Ropartz himself has written with more sanity and less gush of Franck than most of the other disciples; he has not forgotten that the sweetness of Franck's religion was vigorous and worldly as well. In Ropartz the religion is not so evident; the sweetness occasionally is. Mr. Clapp writes: "Ropartz's feeling for beauty and atmosphere, his love of melody, his masterly instrumentation, his smooth workmanship, his artistic earnestness and sincerity are qualities too valuable to be underestimated." But he adds that they are qualities which may become monotonous after many hearings. Whether tonight's symphony partakes of these qualities, and in what degree, will be for the individual hearer to determine. There is more than one beauty in this world, and it is not to belittle Ropartz that one speaks of Franck. His is one absolute perfection; another method, another man with the same impassioned sincerity, may yield another perfection quite as absolute.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN NEW SYMPHONY

884

Ropartz Composition an Interesting Novelty—Ovation to Fritz Kreisler.

PROGRAM.

Sibelius..........."Finlandia," symphonic poem for orchestra. Op. 26. No. 7
Ropartz ....Symphony No. 4. C major (played without pause) First time in Philadelphia.
Schumann.Overture to "Genoveva." Op. 81
Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. Concerto in E minor for Violin. Op. 64.
Conductor ....Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist ....Fritz Kreisler

Many were turned away from the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Academy of Music last evening, the third of the season, and they missed a rare treat. It is always an exceptional privilege to hear Dr. Muck and his Boston musicians, but on this occasion, it was especially so. A most admirable program had been arranged in which Dr. Muck presented a novelty which was well worth hearing, and which was in strong contrast to the works usually given here.

Kreisler Given an Ovation.

Kreisler was the soloist and charmed as only he can, and with one of the most delightful of all concertos, Mendelssohn's E Minor. If any composer had in view the effect of a thrilling climax upon an audience, Mendelssohn must have had that in mind when he wrote the third movement, for in it he not only gives the player a chance to show the breadth of his art, but in an enticing melody that goes dancing along in wonderfully marked chords and in tantalizing harmony that simply holds the hearers spellbound. At the conclusion Kreisler was given a tremendous ovation, such an one that must have even surprised this master of the violin.

The New Symphony.

The new symphony was composed by Ropartz, a Frenchman, and it is peculiar in that it is played without pause. In fact there is no part of it that would permit of its being disconnected. It is a modern work, only a little more than three years old. It could hardly be considered ultra-modern, for from first to last it contains a combination of themes, or brief arias, which are worked into wonderful harmony. At times it might become a little tedious on account of its length, but it was kept from ever becoming mediocre last evening, by the spirited handling by Dr. Muck. All the choirs are utilized with almost equal prominence, and, as a whole, it was well worth a first hearing, but hardly of such intrinsic musical merit as to hold a firm place in the repertoire of an orchestra, even one so great as the Boston Symphony.

The first number on the program was Sibelius' colorful symphonic poem "Finlandia," and between the symphony and the soloist the Orchestra played Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva." Bo... of them were given with the usual ca... that are all compositions by the Boston Orchestra. The next concert will take place on Monday evening, February 15.

PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA

Newspaper Cutting

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date JAN 8 - 1915

Dr. Muck's Men Play Old Music as Well as New

Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony Elicits Much Applause at Boston Orchestra Concert.

Going from one extreme to another, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which at its last concerts here played music so modern that even the men of the orchestra admitted they did not know what it was all about, at its concert last night in Carnegie Hall gave as its principal number one of the oldest symphonies which find a place in modern programmes, the so-called "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart.

That the change in programme making was much to the taste of the audience was shown by the fact that the applause was so great that Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, called upon the players to rise in acknowledgment, an unusual thing for the Boston Symphony.

Needless to say, the playing of the orchestra was all that could be asked. An old work, although thin in its orchestration, if played superlatively well can give more real enjoyment than a dozen from the modern school, as it is represented in the programmes of our orchestras.

The second work to be heard was Wagner's "Faust" overture, and the last the "Siegfried Idyl," after which the conductor again called on his men to rise to share the applause.

The soloist was Mr. Fritz Kreisler. His contribution was the familiar Mendelssohn violin concerto. His playing, as in his recitals, was much to the liking of the audience. He is known in his recitals as a player of small pieces, but he excels to the same degree in the big concertos.

Mr. Albert Chevrot, twenty-five years old, one of the flutists in the orchestra, was taken to Bellevue Hospital at midnight last night by Mr. Charles A. Ellis, business manager of the orchestra. Mr. Ellis said Mr. Chevrot had been acting strangely all day.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S GOOD PROGRAMME

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Metropolitan Opera House with "Lohengrin" provided those persons known as music-lovers, yesterday evening, with plenty of wholesome entertainment.

The programme submitted to New York by Dr. Carl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra the last Thursday on which they visited us aroused a storm of unfavorable comment and in some cases of irritated protest. But the selections put forward last night could not occasion any bitterness. Dr. Muck and his instrumentalists gave us Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, the Siegfried Idyll of Wagner, the same composer's far less attractive "Faust" overture and Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto in E minor, with Fritz Kreisler as violinist.

The rendering of the "Jupiter" Symphony left nothing to be desired in the matter of majesty or beauty of outline, and the practical value of the interpretation of the Siegfried "Idyll" was cordially recognized by the auditors. Mr. Kreisler's playing was greeted with the usual enthusiasm.

"Lohengrin," at the Metropolitan, presented no strikingly novel features. Mme. Destinn appeared as the heroine. Because of the indisposition of Carl Braun Basil Ruysdael took the part of Henry the Fowler. Jacques Urlus sang Lohengrin and Alfred Hertz conducted.

From Address
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Work by Ropartz—Ovation Given to Fritz Kreisler.

The novelty offered by Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, at the Boston Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music last night was a symphony by Ropartz, a disciple of Cesar Franck, the great Belgian composer. Like all modern orchestral writers, Ropartz has succeeded in conveying a vast and at times almost bewildering color and variety to his work without being at any time moving or impressive. His writings are said to be largely reflective of his master. If last night's example can be accepted as exhibiting Ropartz's usual style it might more truthfully be affirmed that his work reflects an assimilation of all the modernists, with sufficient originality to create a passing, if not deep, interest.

His manipulation of the orchestral body is at all times absorbing and never fails to entertain, even when the musical content seems barren and uninspired.

The remarkable performances of Sibelius' symphonic poem, "Finlandia," which preceded the symphony, presented a much-discussed work in so concise and intelligent a light that the impression usually given of incoherence and lack of form entirely disappeared, leaving the work revealed as of great beauty and clarity, and made on pronounced and very original lines.

The Schumann overture to "Genoveva," while well played, was, after all, only a means of entertaining the audience until the time for the real event of the evening, the appearance of Fritz Kreisler should arrive. The ovation given Kreisler was remarkable, even for this city, where he never lacks acclaim. Without any detraction from the well-known and universally recognized merits of the Mendelssohn E-minor concerto, it must be said that many would have preferred one of the other concertos. This feeling, however, on hearing Kreisler do the Mendelssohn, was replaced with thankfulness that he had chosen this especial work, for surely it was never played as he played it last night. One of the most musical and technically exacting things in violin literature, it has become slightly unpopular because it has been the showpiece of many an ambitious but deficient amateur. Kreisler was evidently bent on presenting the work in all its melodious and sparkling beauty. He more than accomplished this task. He left his audience dazzled by a display of technical skill and speed, and enraptured with a musicianship that was unfailing in its appeal. The audience fairly clamored for an encore, recalling this genius many times and showering him with plaudits and bravos until no question of his popularity and power could be raised. The orchestra was in its usual superb form, playing with that beautiful, easy tone and fluency of execution which it alone seems able to accomplish.

FLAG CAN'T SAVE HIS

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Enjoyed by Large Audience at Academy of Music Last Evening

The most salient and notable feature of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra before a large audience at the Academy of Music under the direction of Mr. Karl Muck last evening was the appearance of Mr. Fritz Kreisler as the assisting artist of the occasion. He had elected to be heard in the Mendelssohn concerto, and never surely has this ingratiating music been more beautifully or brilliantly or eloquently rendered. It is music which has somewhat fallen out of favor these latter days, not so much with audiences as with artists, owing to the frequency of its performance and to the circumstance that it belongs to a school which is now regarded as old-fashioned, but it is no exaggeration to say that no more grateful or effective composition of its kind was ever written. It admirably exhibits all the best and most characteristic qualities of the instrument. Its capabilities in the way of brilliant execution are effectively tested and exposed in the two allegro movements, while the lovely, long drawn-out andante finely exemplifies what can be done with it in the way of legato and cantabile.

Of these various and varied opportunities the famous Austrian violinist, who was honored with a great reception when he stepped upon the stage, made the very most that was possible. His tone was as ample and as pure as ever. There was no impairment in his unsurpassed technique and his performance in its entirety was a masterpiece of emotional and intellectual interpretation which it was at once a delight and a privilege to hear. It made a profound impression upon the audience, which recalled the artist several times and would have insisted on an encore had it been permissible. For the rest the program was not one of the most interesting of the season. Its most important number was a novelty in the form of a symphony in one movement by the young French composer, Ropartz, which is written in the modern manner and which one would need to hear more than once before undertaking to appreciate.

Apparently the audience was pleased with it, but there were doubtless many present who would have preferred something less original and more familiar. Needless to say it was admirably played. Other things on the list were the "Finlandia" rhapsody of Jean Sibelius and Schumann's "Geneveva" overture.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Orchestra's Pension Fund

When a man has devoted the best years of his life and endeavors to a public service, he is surely entitled to some recognition from those he has benefited when years have curtailed his usefulness in his chosen field.

It is assuredly this feeling that has led to the establishment of a pension fund for members of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Those only who follow music as a profession know how much of skill and knowledge and singleness of purpose go to make a player fit to take his place in a great symphony orchestra. They know also that the financial rewards are not great, certainly not great enough to permit a player to secure financial independence in old age, from his salary, with

---

GLOBE

Practically all the principal orchestras of the world have such funds. They are almost universal in Europe and in the United States the Boston Symphony, the Chicago Symphony and the New York Symphony have all felt the necessity of establishing them. It has been calculated that the average time for which musicians are available as members of an orchestra of the first quality is about fifteen years, especially in the case of men who play brasses and woodwinds, and these years are necessarily the best of their lives.

The local fund has been but recently established and its necessity and purpose are not yet too well known. Graceful tribute and substantial assistance will be paid to it within the week. Olga Samaroff, who as the wife of Leopold Stokowski, the conductor, knows the situation intimately, is to devote the proceeds of her piano recital to the fund. Such timely and appropriate assistance may well inspire others to contribute

---

AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

ROPARTZ'S SYMPHONY GIVEN HERE BY MUCK

Modern French Work Is Piquant Novelty on Boston Orchestra Program

KREISLER THE SOLOIST

ESSENTIALLY of the modern French school is the fourth symphony in C major of Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz, director of the Nancy Conservatory of Music, which formed a piquant novelty on the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third program of the season at the Academy of Music last evening.

The composer has had a fecund career. He has been a pupil of Massenet and Franck, the tendencies of the latter tinging most of the texture of the work played by Dr. Karl Muck and his men here. But the score rises frequently to more masculine heights than any achieved by the writer of "The Mad Huntsman," this quality being especially noticeable in the use of the violins as a melodie background. The cycle, which is given without pause, evinces sometimes the influence of Wagner. Heroic, ascending inflections alternate with amusing wistfulness, decidedly a la Franck.

A dissonant dance measure and glittering harp accompaniments are two striking features of the latter movements. Despite its modernity, the symphony was well worth presenting. A second hearing would be welcomed.

For the second time this season, Fritz Kreisler appeared in the Academy last night. The great Austrian artist ended the program with a characteristically discerning and poetic reading of Mendelssohn's melodious concerto in E minor. He looked better than he did at his recital some weeks ago, and his playing of the three varied movements was a fresh revelation of his delicious tone, unapproachable technical accomplishments and complete lack of mannerism. Even after the orchestra had left the stage, the soloist was recalled by volleys of applause. The only other numbers on the short program were Sibelius' "Finlandia," in which the Boston organization's golden-throated brass choir spoke with orotund beauty, and the overture to Schumann's opera, "Genoveva," which was "killed," as a lyric drama, by its insane and tedious libretto.

MUSIC

The Ropartz symphony in C major, which will be played tonight by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was first played in this country by that organization at one of its regular concerts in Boston. It was later played in New York. It would seem that the Boston audience heard it with reserved gratification; it is plain that the New York critics heard it without any great degree of pleasure. In the orchestral score the critic of the Boston Tanscript found the influence of Cesar Franck in imagination, with the added resources and technical devices of later French music. The symphony is played without stop, but it is not overlong. Its many solutions in advance, but the composer himself is so little known that a few things may be said of him without prejudice to the freshness of tonight's performance.

Philip Greeley Clapp, writing in the Boston Transcript, sketches the life of Guy Ropartz thus: He was born in Brittany in 1864, studied at various Catholic institutions and at the law school of Rennes. He then entered the Paris Conservatory as a pupil of Dubois and Massenet, but left there to study with Cesar Franck. Since 1894 he has been director of the Conservatory of Nancy. He is said to be fond of tennis and photography.

The insistence upon Ropartz as the nearest and greatest disciple of Franck—a position generally given to the director of the Schola Cantorum—is enough to make one suspicious. When Roman Rolland says that, except Bach, no composer has seen Christ so clearly as Cesar Franck, he says nothing about the Franckians. Ropartz himself has written with more sanity and less gush of Franck than most of the other disciples; he has not forgotten that the sweetness of Franck's religion was vigorous and worldly as well. In Ropartz the religion is not so evident; the sweetness occasionally is. Mr. Clapp writes: "Ropartz's feeling for beauty and atmosphere, his love of melody, his masterly instrumentation, his smooth workmanship, his artistic earnestness and sincerity are qualities too valuable to be underestimated." But he adds that they are qualities which may become monotonous after many hearings. Whether tonight's symphony partakes of these qualities, and in what degree, will be for the individual hearer to determine. There is more than one beauty in this world, and it is not to belittle Ropartz that one speaks of Franck. His is one absolute perfection; another method, another man with the same impassioned sincerity, may yield another perfection quite as absolute.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN NEW SYMPHONY

Ropartz Composition an Interesting Novelty—Ovation to Fritz Kreisler.

PROGRAM.

Sibelius........."Finlandia," symphonic poem for orchestra. Op. 26, No. 7
Ropartz ....Symphony No. 4, C major (played without pause)
* First time in Philadelphia.
Schumann.Overture to "Genoveva." Op. 81
Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. Concerto in E minor for Violin. Op. 64.
Conductor ....Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist ....Fritz Kreisler

Many were turned away from the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Academy of Music last evening, the third of the season, and they missed a rare treat. It is always an exceptional privilege to hear Dr. Muck and his Boston musicians, but on this occasion, it was especially so. A most admirable program had been arranged in which Dr. Muck presented a novelty which was well worth hearing, and which was in strong contrast to the works usually given here.

Kreisler Given an Ovation.

Kreisler was the soloist and charmed as only he can, and with one of the most delightful of all concertos, Mendelssohn's E Minor. If any composer had in view the effect of a thrilling climax upon an audience, Mendelssohn must have had that in mind when he wrote the third movement, for in it he not only gives the player a chance to show the breadth of his art, but in an enticing melody that goes dancing along in wonderfully marked chords and in tantalizing harmony that simply holds the hearers spellbound. At the conclusion Kreisler was given a tremendous ovation, such an one that must have even surprised this master of the violin.

The New Symphony.

The new symphony was composed by Ropartz, a Frenchman, and it is peculiar in that it is played without pause. In fact there is no part of it that would permit of its being disconnected. It is a modern work, only a little more than three years old. It could hardly be considered ultra-modern, for from first to last it contains a combination of themes, or brief arias, which are worked into wonderful harmony. At times it might become a little tedious on account of its length, but it was kept from ever becoming mediocre last evening, by the spirited handling by Dr. Muck. All the choirs are utilized with almost equal prominence, and, as a whole, it was well worth a first hearing, but hardly of such intrinsic musical merit as to hold a firm place in the repertoire of an orchestra, even one so great as the Boston Symphony.

The first number on the program was Sibelius' colorful symphonic poem "Finlandia," and between the symphony and the soloist the Orchestra played Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva." Both of them were given with the usual ca that are all compositions by the Boston Orchestra. The next concert will take place on Monday evening, February 15.

◆

PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Bray, have returned to their home at Hatboro.

BOSTON SYMPHONY WITH FRITZ KREISLER

Great Violinist Heard in Mendelssohn Concerto, and Ropartz's Fourth Symphony Is Played.

PROGRAM

"Finlandia," symphonic poem	Sibelius
Fourth Symphony in C	Ropartz
"Genoveva," overture	Schumann
Concerto for violin	Mendelssohn

Whether expectancy of the soloist overhung the mood of the auditors or not, the forepart of the Boston Symphony concert at the Academy last evening felt lethargic and lacking in atmospheric electricity. The "Finlandia," with its splendid sweeping hymn, as of the mute anguish of an undertrodden people finding voice at last, gave the brasses an imperious heraldry, with resolute support from the double basses. The "Genoveva" overture, not Schumann in his highest estate, holds much of lyric picturesqueness and romantic feeling, and it received a painstaking, if not quite an enamored, reading at the hands of Doctor Muck and his men.

Heard for the first time in Philadelphia, the Ropartz symphony, in a single unpausing movement of half an hour's duration, was a little disappointing. It has plenty of movement; there is graceful and ingenious modulation; there is almost an embarrassment of riches in the way of thematic material and episode; but only at rare moments does it lay hold of the spirit with compelling emotional power. One of these movements comes with the song of the English horn in the slow portion. There is never a dissonant welter of sound; even at the storm-tossed climaxes the passion is "curbed and bitted with gentility"; but with all the manifest elegance and polished urbanity of the craftsmanship, one, somehow, misses the divine fire, and in the playing last night there seemed wanting a certain madness in the blood, a devil-may-care impetuousness, to give the spice of acridity, the stress of graphic accent to the meandering refinement of it all.

The real lift and inspiration of the concert came with Kreisler's still perceptibly limping and war-worn entrance upon the scene. His violin sang with the voice of an angel—and sometimes, in the double stops, it was as a celestial choir.

The soloist seemed to carry the orchestra along with him; one beautiful tune outflowed into another against a background of evident and unusual sympathy and marvelous precision under Doctor Muck's baton. "Allegro molto" was strictly interpreted to give a spirited pace to the opening movement. The cadenza quoted at one point the Bach chaconne, and was informed throughout by much of its spirit. The andante rose to a superb height with those upsoaring octaves of warm and luscious tone. It was as nobly inspired playing as one may expect to hear in this generation.

Many of the hearers, even after the orchestra had quitted their seats, were loath to leave, and applauded the players to the echo in the vain hope of an en re. The performance was a stirring and de ed rebuke to those who think Mendelssohn outworn. The very simplicity of the cen al melodious outline betrays the executant. It is a work that demands a flawless setting fo th, and pitilessly discloses every shortcoming It seemed last night to have been written long ago for Mr. Kreisler, and to have been waiting for him ever since.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: iadelphia, Pa.

1884

ROPARTZ'S SYMPHONY GIVEN HERE BY MUCK

Modern French Work Is Piquant Novelty on Boston Orchestra Program

KREISLER THE SOLOIST

ESSENTIALLY of the modern French school is the fourth symphony in C major of Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz, director of the Nancy Conservatory of Music, which formed a piquant novelty on the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third program of the season at the Academy of Music last evening.

The composer has had a fecund career. He has been a pupil of Massenet and Franck, the tendencies of the latter work played by Dr. Karl Muck and his men here. But the score rises frequently to more masculine heights than any achieved by the writer of "The Mad Huntsman," this quality being especially noticeable in the use of the violins as a melodie background. The cycle, which is given without pause, evinces sometimes the influence of Wagner. Heroic, ascending inflections alternate with amusing wistfulness, decidedly a la Franck.

---

A dissonant dance measure and glittering harp accompaniments are two striking features of the latter movements. Despite its modernity, the symphony was well worth presenting. A second hearing would be welcomed.

For the second time this season, Fritz Kreisler appeared in the Academy last night. The great Austrian artist ended the program with a characteristically discerning and poetic reading of Mendelssohn's melodious concerto in E minor. He looked better than he did at his recital some weeks ago, and his playing of the three varied movements was a fresh revelation of his delicious tone, unapproachable technical accomplishments and complete lack of mannerism. Even after the orchestra had left the stage, the soloist was recalled by volleys of applause. The only other numbers on the short program were Sibelius' "Finlandia," in which the Boston organization's golden-throated brass choir spoke with orotund beauty, and the overture to Schumann's opera, "Genoveva," which was "killed," as a lyric drama, by its insane and tedious libretto.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Est 84

RITZ KREISLER WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Violinist Creates Unusual Enthusiasm at Concert of Organization at the Academy.

Fritz Kreisler, war veteran and wizard of the violin, served not only to draw more than a capacity house to the Academy last night, but to stir his audience to such a pitch of enthusiasm as is seldom seen over an orchestral soloist. In the terms of the track, the Boston Symphony Orchestra "also ran"—that is, it was their concert, but Kreisler's house.

The soloist limped from his service-wound more than he did at his recent recital. He seemed, during the pauses, to be in physical pain and looked drawn and unwell, but the moment he raised his violin all impression of weakness or nervousness vanished, and he was once more the virile, fiery, capable Kreisler of old. In the strength and certainty of his left hand his instrument became a toy that he could play with at will, its difficulties mere child's play and its intricacies only a part of the game to make it interesting. His frictionless bow seemed to caress resonance from the strings without touching them, and one could almost swear that the sound continued to come after the bow had stopped. His tone seemed smaller than usual, but it was perfection in its smoothness and clarity.

Hackneyed as is the Mendelssohn E minor concerto, it is so only because so many people play at it. Kreisler plays it. He does not take it as an exercise for an advanced pupil nor as something with which to show the cleverness of his technic. He becomes a part of it, throws his whole self into it, and the technic becomes lost in the amazing temperament of the artist. He took the first and last movements at tremendous tempos, quite at variance with anything that the average violinist dares, yet they lost none of their dignity thereby; it seemed, on the contrary, to be quite in keeping with the rushing mood of the player and swept his hearers along to a whirlwind climax that left them almost breathless at the end.

The orchestral part of the program was less interesting than those usually offered by Dr. Muck. Sibelius' splendid "Finlandia" poem was interpreted with all of the organization's accustomed mastery of tonal effects and proved a stirring performance, but the "Genoveva" overture of Schumann is by no means the most interesting of that composer's works, and the symphony, performed for the first time in this city, was too puzzling to be satisfying. It was by Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz, a living composer and former pupil of Cesar Franck. It is always unfair to judge of a symphony from a first hearing, but this one appeared to hold little promise of desire for closer acquaintance. It was fragile and "sketchy," suggesting many ambitious beginnings with no power to develop to adequate conclusions, the thematic episodes being at times naively attractive, but strung together with no cohesion and without clear progression toward an ultimate effect.

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

The Boston Orchestra

New Symphony by Ropartz and Fritz Kreisler as Soloist Are Features

FRITZ KREISLER as soloist and a new symphony by Guy Ropartz were the outstanding features of interest at the third concert of the local season by the Boston Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening. An audience that strained the capacity of the house found little over which to vent its obvious desire to enthuse until the appearance in the closing number of the distinguished Viennese virtuoso, who, however, was greeted with a warmth of cordiality that became intensified into prolonged and tumultuous applause when he had finished playing Mendelssohn's famous concerto.

Kreisler's recent experiences with his regiment of Austrian Uhlans on the firing line, where he was wounded, are still plainly written on his countenance. He walks with a barely perceptible limp that betrays the tenderness of his injury, but there are lines in his face and certain nervous mannerisms while he is playing that are unfamiliar to his stalwart, almost heroic, stature. Whereas his bowing was once wont to be easy and gracefully swinging, almost seemingly nonchalant, it is now tense and meticulous. His gaze that used to roam over the auditorium, is now fixed upon his finger-board; his jaw is set with a contracted determination and occasionally there are convulsive jerkings of the head and neck during or following some particularly difficult passage.

---

But there is no diminution of the marvelous proficiency of the left hand, and the golden tone that sonorously pours from his instrument is greater, richer, more beautiful than ever. It is not given often to local audiences to hear such violin playing. Seemingly there are no depths, no shadows or high lights, no kind or quality of violin color that he is not master of.

Kreisler comes by his love of this concerto naturally. One might almost say that it is his especial heritage, having passed in a direct line from David, Mendelssohn's concertmeister at Leipsic, for whom it was written and by whom its technical difficulties were developed, to Joachim, his pupil, and then to Hellmesberger, early tutor of the present artist. It has suffered frequently at the hands of ambitious youth and so appears somewhat hackneyed to modern audiences, but, invested with the imagination and fire of Kreisler it takes on fresh inspiration.

Ropartz's symphony, No. 4, in C Major, is a work that will probably not live long in the memory of those who heard it. It was composed in 1910 and was played for the first time at a Lamoureux Concert in Paris in October, 1911. It served to introduce a composer who is little known on this side of the Atlantic, although he has some fame in France, being the director of the Conservatory at Nancy and, next to Vincent D'Indy, one of the most prominent disciples of Cesar Franck, whose style and peculiarities the symphony not only suggests, but clearly seems to imitate.

Played without a pause, and lasting for half an hour, the work displays the qualities of musicianship that appeal to the students of form and development rather than to the emotions of the auditor. There is a wealth of thematic invention and many lovely little melodies pursuing each other in refined abandon through the choirs, but none of the fire and vigor that catch the casual listener. The characteristic avoidance of certain tones in the scale in a manner that is almost pedantic; the employment of readily identifiable twists and figures in the phrasing; the allotment of the various voices, speak with the nomenclature of Franck so palpably that the nidividuality of the composer is virtually lost. It is Franck without Franck's coherence, and the audience seemed puzzled most of the time.

By far the most enjoyable purely orchestral number was Sibelius's tone poem, "Finlandia," which has been heard here before, but gains in interest with rehearing. Dr. Muck infused this eloquent outpouring of Finland's national spirit with fine feeling. The quaintly plaintive folk-song that is the chief theme was beautifully played by the woodwinds and the brasses, in the martial song at the opening and close, blended with a pureness of tone that is always notable in this organization.

The other number of the evening was Schumann's well-known overture to his operatic failure, "Genoveva." While mewhat old-fashioned and mawkishly still a work worth hearing, warmth

---

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fritz Kreisler, Violinist, Will Appear with Boston Orchestra To-night.

Fritz Kreisler, the great Austrian violinist, will make his only appearance of the season in this city this evening as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert in Infantry Hall at 8:15. Mr. Kreisler kindly consented on short notice to take the place of Madame Schumann-Heink, who had been announced as soloist. Madame Schumann-Heink is seriously ill in Chicago and it was impossible for her to come East.

The programme is as follows: Overture to "Genoveva," Schumann; symphony No. 4 C-major (played with pause; first time in Providence), Ropartz; variations on a theme by Joseph Haydn, Brahms; concerto for violin in E minor, Mendelssohn-Bartholdy; Overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Es 1884

MUSIC

It is not hard to disengage from the wealth of goodness brought by the Boston Symphony last night. Those particular blessings which made the evening glorious. They were the orchestra, its leader and its soloist. Beside these three the playing of a new symphony was almost an inconsidered trifle.

Not that the fourth symphony of Guy Ropartz is light as air. There are moments in it when one wishes it were; wishes that it possessed the tonic vigor of air instead of provoking murk in which it is produced. (Were the composer a Debussy-ite instead of a Franckian, one should call the latter atmosphere diatonic. The instant enthusiasm in which the symphony produced was al most negligible; in the course of its uninterrupted 30 minutes the program notes were almost as keenly followed by a goodly part of the audience as was the music.

---

Yet there is in this Ropartz composition a certain degree of beauty; there are appealing themes, generally unachieved or frustrated; there is an interesting, but not terrifying complexity of orchestration. The inevitable ascending question of the pseudo-Franckians is heard, but (unlike Franck's famous question in his symphony) the query is more importunate than dignified, more a complaint than a mediation. It is asked in the woodwind, to which the tragic composers are partial, but before it assumes any authority, it is elaborated almost out of existence in orchestration.

Deep feeling and high thinking seem equally absent in the symphony—sheer tonal beauty there is, but it is subordinated to the unsatisfactory emotion and the flaccid intellect which the symphony must express. And the fact that it was superbly played, the string and wind choirs being both at their best in it, makes one wonder whether even its obvious beauties do not owe their inspiration more to Boston than to Nancy.

Doctor Muck could not have expected that after the "Finlandia," as he led it, and the orchestra played, one could listen with patience and responsiveness to Ropartz. To Franck, yes eternally. To the Franckians, no. Because Doctor Muck's "Finlandia" had a wealth of human riches, had his own understanding, his thought and his inspiration. Conducting, as he does always, with seeming indifference, he evoked the music's own passion. His hand was not raised against, but with the music.

Let it be said with some finality that there is more than one greatness, more than one perfection in conducting music, and that Doctor Muck has come closer to one of these perfections than any other conductor whose measure we may now take. If that perfection is said to be cold, it will be remembered that such warmth as he brings from his orchestra is not often felt, if it be called unimaginative it will be remembered that such imaginings as he stirs are the guerdon of but two or three other conductors in our time. These things it has been called. But if you call it inhuman, you err. It is merely superhuman, at times, and splendidly human for the most. But to be truly human is a pleasure reserved, also for the few.

Among them is Mr. Kreisler, who played last night for the second time this season in Philadelphia. His is the art which leaves nothing to be said, yet it seems to demand that everything be said again. As to the conducting of Doctor Muck, it is the negation of everything weak, of everything febrile and excessive—of everything romantic, in fact. Yet neither is classical; the just term is humanistic. Because in them there is all passion, with a splendid dignity and discipline. Nothing is barred out; the world is accepted and ordered and made beautiful.

Mr. Kreisler played last night a concerto of Mendelssohn. Its allegro is of an extraordinary virtuosity; the impeccable technique of the artist took the cadenzas with a noble facility. But its second movement, tender and sentimental and moving, was played with such justness of feeling as to be heartbreaking. "There is a high breathlessness about auty which cancels lust and superstion," a poet and philosopher of our time s said. That beauty is Mr. Kreisler's.

---

om BULLETIN
dress: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

1884

FRITZ KREISLER, the great Austrian violinist, will be the soloist at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Monday evening. He will play the Mendelssohn Concerto in E Minor, one of the great public favorites of the master.

The orchestral numbers will be Sibelius's tone poem, "Finlandia," the Fourth Symphony in C Major of Guy Ropartz and Schumann's Overture, "Genoveva." Ropratz's Symphony will be heard here for the first time. It had its first performance in this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Doctor Muck, in Boston, last October, and has been played by him with much success in several cities. Ropartz, who is the director of the Conservatory of Music of Nancy, is a man now nearly middle age and belongs to that group of French composers who got not only their instruction but their absolute inspiration from the great Belgian, Cesar Franck. The Symphony is played without pause and lasts about half hour.

---

rom
ddress te

1884

• • •

Fritz Kreisler is the soloist for the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. He will play the Mendelssohn concerto in E Minor. It is interesting to know that Mr. Kreisler regards this concerto of Mendelssohn as the most grateful work in the literature of the violin.

The orchestral numbers will be Sibelius's tone poem, "Finlandia," the Fourth Symphony in C Major of Guy Ropartz and Schumann's Overture, "Genoveva." Ropartz's Symphony will be heard here for the first time. It had its first performance in this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Doctor Muck in Boston last October. Ropartz director of the Conservatory of

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Bray, have returned to their home at Hatboro.

BOSTON SYMPHONY WITH FRITZ KREISLER

Great Violinist Heard in Mendelssohn Concerto, and Ropartz's Fourth Symphony Is Played.

PROGRAM

"Finlandia," symphonic poem..........Sibelius
Fourth Symphony in C...............Ropartz
"Genoveva," overture...............Schumann
Concerto for violin ....Mendelssohn

Whether expectancy of the soloist overhung the mood of the auditors or not, the forepart of the Boston Symphony concert at the Academy last evening felt lethargic and lacking in atmospheric electricity. The "Finlandia," with its splendid sweeping hymn, as of the mute anguish of an undertrodden people finding voice at last, gave the brasses an imperious heraldry, with resolute support from the double basses. The "Genoveva" overture, not Schumann in his highest estate, holds much of lyric picturesqueness and romantic feeling, and it received a painstaking, if not quite an enamored, reading at the hands of Doctor Muck and his men.

Heard for the first time in Philadelphia, the Ropartz symphony, in a single unpausing movement of half an hour's duration, was a little disappointing. It has plenty of movement; there is graceful and ingenious modulation; there is almost an embarrassment of riches in the way of thematic material and episode; but only at rare moments does it lay hold of the spirit with compelling emotional power. One of these movements comes with the song of the English horn in the slow portion. There is never a dissonant welter of sound; even at the storm-tossed climaxes the passion is "curbed and bitted with gentility"; but with all the manifest elegance and polished urbanity of the craftsmanship, one, somehow, misses the divine fire and in the playing last night there seemed wanting a certain madness in the blood, a devil-may-care impetuousness, to give the spice of acridity, the stress of graphic accent to the meandering refinement of it all.

The real lift and inspiration of the concert came with Kreisler's still perceptibly limping and war-worn entrance upon the scene. His violin sang with the voice of an angel—and sometimes, in the double stops, it was as a celestial choir.

The soloist seemed to carry the orchestra along with him; one beautiful tune outflowed into another against a background of evident and unusual sympathy and marvelous precision under Doctor Muck's baton. "Allegro molto" was strictly interpreted to give a spirited pace to the opening movement. The cadenza quoted at one point the Bach chaconne, and was informed throughout by much of its spirit. The andante rose to a superb height with those upsoaring octaves of warm and luscious tone. It was as nobly inspired playing as one may expect to hear in this generation.

Many of the hearers, even after the orchestra had quitted their seats, were loath to leave, and applauded the players to the echo in the vain hope of an encore. The performance was a stirring and deserved rebuke to those who think Mendelssohn outworn. The very simplicity of the central melodious outline betrays the executant. It is a work that demands a flawless setting forth, and pitilessly discloses every shortcoming It seemed last night to have been written long ago for Mr. Kreisler, and to have been waiting for him ever since.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: iadelphia, Pa.

ROPARTZ'S SYMPHONY GIVEN HERE BY MUCK

Modern French Work Is Piquant Novelty on Boston Orchestra Program

KREISLER THE SOLOIST

ESSENTIALLY of the modern French school is the fourth symphony in C major of Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz, director of the Nancy Conservatory of Music, which formed a piquant novelty on the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third program of the season at the Academy of Music last evening.

The composer has had a fecund career. He has been a pupil of Massenet and Franck, the tendencies of the latter [illegible] of the work played by Dr. Karl Muck and his men here. But the score rises frequently to more masculine heights than any achieved by the writer of "The Mad Huntsman," this quality being especially noticeable in the use of the violins as a melodie background. The cycle, which is given without pause, evinces sometimes the influence of Wagner. Heroic, ascending inflections alternate with amusing wistfulness, decidedly a la Franck.

A dissonant dance measure and glittering harp accompaniments are two striking features of the latter movements. Despite its modernity, the symphony was well worth presenting. A second hearing would be welcomed.

For the second time this season, Fritz Kreisler appeared in the Academy last night. The great Austrian artist ended the program with a characteristically discerning and poetic reading of Mendelssohn's melodious concerto in E minor. He looked better than he did at his recital some weeks ago, and his playing of the three varied movements was a fresh revelation of his delicious tone, unapproachable technical accomplishments and complete lack of mannerism. Even after the orchestra had left the stage, the soloist was recalled by volleys of applause. The only other numbers on the short program were Sibelius' "Finlandia," in which the Boston organization's golden-throated brass choir spoke with orotund beauty, and the overture to Schumann's opera, "Genoveva," which was "killed," as a lyric drama, by its insane and tedious libretto.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

RITZ KREISLER WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Violinist Creates Unusual Enthusiasm at Concert of Organization at the Academy.

Fritz Kreisler, war veteran and wizard of the violin, served not only to draw more than a capacity house to the Academy last night, but to stir his audience to such a pitch of enthusiasm as is seldom seen over an orchestral soloist. In the terms of the track, the Boston Symphony Orchestra "also ran"—that is, it was their concert, but Kreisler's house.

The soloist limped from his service-wound more than he did at his recent recital. He seemed, during the pauses, to be in physical pain and looked drawn and unwell, but the moment he raised his violin all impression of weakness or nervousness vanished, and he was once more the virile, fiery, capable Kreisler of old. In the strength and certainty of his left hand his instrument became a toy that he could play with at will, its difficulties mere child's play and its intricacies only a part of the game to make it interesting. His frictionless bow seemed to caress resonance from the strings without touching them, and one could almost swear that the sound continued to come after the bow had stopped. His tone seemed smaller than usual, but it was perfection in its smoothness and clarity.

Hackneyed as is the Mendelssohn E minor concerto, it is so only because so many people play at it. Kreisler plays it. He does not take it as an exercise for an advanced pupil nor as something with which to show the cleverness of his technic. He becomes a part of it, throws his whole self into it, and the technic becomes lost in the amazing temperament of the artist. He took the first and last movements at tremendous tempos, quite at variance with anything that the average violinist dares, yet they lost none of their dignity thereby; it seemed, on the contrary, to be quite in keeping with the rushing mood of the player and swept his hearers along to a whirlwind climax that left them almost breathless at the end.

The orchestral part of the program was less interesting than those usually offered by Dr. Muck. Sibelius' splendid "Finlandia" poem was interpreted with all of the organization's accustomed mastery of tonal effects and proved a stirring performance, but the "Genoveva" overture of Schumann is by no means the most interesting of that composer's works, and the symphony, performed for the first time in this city, was too puzzling to be satisfying. It was by Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz, a living composer and former pupil of Cesar Franck. It is always unfair to judge of a symphony from a first hearing, but this one appeared to hold little promise of desire for closer acquaintance. It was fragile and "sketchy," suggesting many ambitious beginnings with no power to develop to adequate conclusions, the thematic episodes being at times naively attractive, but strung together with no cohesion and without clear progression toward an ultimate effect.

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

The Boston Orchestra

New Symphony by Ropartz and Fritz Kreisler as Soloist Are Features

FRITZ KREISLER as soloist and a new symphony by Guy Ropartz were the outstanding features of interest at the third concert of the local season by the Boston Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening. An audience that strained the capacity of the house found little over which to vent its obvious desire to enthuse until the appearance in the closing number of the distinguished Viennese virtuoso, who, however, was greeted with a warmth of cordiality that became intensified into prolonged and tumultuous applause when he had finished playing Mendelssohn's famous concerto.

Kreisler's recent experiences with his regiment of Austrian Uhlans on the firing line, where he was wounded, are still plainly written on his countenance. He walks with a barely perceptible limp that betrays the tenderness of his injury, but there are lines in his face and certain nervous mannerisms while he is playing that are unfamiliar to his stalwart, almost heroic, stature. Whereas his bowing was once wont to be easy and gracefully swinging, almost seemingly nonchalant, it is now tense and meticulous. His gaze that used to roam over the auditorium, is now fixed upon his finger-board; his jaw is set with a contracted determination and occasionally there are convulsive jerkings of the head and neck during or following some particularly difficult passage.

But there is no diminution of the marvelous proficiency of the left hand, and the golden tone that sonorously pours from his instrument is greater, richer, more beautiful than ever. It is not given often to local audiences to hear such violin playing. Seemingly there are no depths, no shadows or high lights, no kind or quality of violin color that he is not master of.

Kreisler comes by his love of this concerto naturally. One might almost say that it is his especial heritage, having passed in a direct line from David, Mendelssohn's concertmeister at Leipsic, for whom it was written and by whom its technical difficulties were developed, to Joachim, his pupil, and then to Hellmesberger, early tutor of the present artist. It has suffered frequently at the hands of ambitious youth and so appears somewhat hackneyed to modern audiences, but, invested with the imagination and fire of Kreisler it takes on fresh inspiration.

Ropartz's symphony, No. 4, in C Major, is a work that will probably not live long in the memory of those who heard it. It was composed in 1910 and was played for the first time at a Lamoureux Concert in Paris in October, 1911. It served to introduce a composer who is little known on this side of the Atlantic, although he has some fame in France, being the director of the Conservatory at Nancy and, next to Vincent D'Indy, one of the most prominent disciples of Cesar Franck, whose style and peculiarities the symphony not only suggests, but clearly seems to imitate.

Played without a pause, and lasting for half an hour, the work displays the qualities of musicianship that appeal to the students of form and development rather than to the emotions of the auditor. There is a wealth of thematic invention and many lovely little melodies pursuing each other in refined abandon through the choirs, but none of the fire and vigor that catch the casual listener. The characteristic avoidance of certain tones in the scale in a manner that is almost pedantic; the employment of readily identifiable twists and figures in the phrasing; the allotment of the various voices, speak with the nomenclature of Franck so palpably that the nidividuality of the composer is virtually lost. It is Franck without Franck's coherence, and the audience seemed puzzled most of the time.

By far the most enjoyable purely orchestral number was Sibelius's tone poem, "Finlandia," which has been heard here before, but gains in interest with rehearing. Dr. Muck infused this eloquent outpouring of Finland's national spirit with fine feeling. The quaintly plaintive folk-song that is the chief theme was beautifully played by the woodwinds and the brasses, in the martial song at the opening and close, blended with a pureness of tone that is always notable in this organization.

The other number of the evening was Schumann's well-known overture to his operatic failure, "Genoveva." While somewhat old-fashioned and mawkishly romantic, it is still a work worth hearing, but only when played with more warmth than the orchestra gave it on this occasion.

---

soloist with the chestra at its third concert in Hall at 8:15. Mr. Kreisler kind consented on short notice to take the place of Madame Schumann-Heink, who had been announced as soloist. Madame Schumann-Heink is seriously ill in Chicago and it was impossible for her to come East.

The programme is as follows: Overture to "Genoveva," Schumann; symphony No. 4 C-major (played with pause; first time in Providence), Ropartz; variations on a theme by Joseph Haydn, Brahms; concerto for violin in E minor, Mendelssohn-Bartholdy; Overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

MUSIC

It is not hard to disengage fr wealth of goodness brought by the Symphony last night. Those pa blessings which made the evenin ious. They were the orchestra, its leader and its soloist. Beside these three the playing of a new symphony was almost an inconsidered trifle.

Not that the fourth symphony of Guy Ropartz is light as air. There are moments in it when one wishes it were; wishes that it possessed the tonic vigor of air instead of provoking murk in which it is produced. (Were the composer a Debussy-ite instead of a Franckian, one should call the latter atmosphere diatonic. The instant enthusiasm in which the symphony produced was almost negligible; in the course of its uninterrupted 30 minutes the program notes were almost as keenly followed by a goodly part of the audience as was the music.

Yet there is in this Ropartz composition a certain degree of beauty; there are appealing themes, generally unachieved or frustrated; there is an interesting, but not terrifying complexity of orchestration. The inevitable ascending question of the pseudo-Franckians is heard, but (unlike Franck's famous question in his symphony) the query is more importunate than dignified, more a complaint than a mediation. It is asked in the woodwind, to which the tragic composers are partial, but before it assumes any authority, it is elaborated almost out of existence in orchestration.

Deep feeling and high thinking seem equally absent in the symphony—sheer tonal beauty there is, but it is subordinated to the unsatisfactory emotion and the flaccid intellect which the symphony must express. And the fact that it was superbly played, the string and wind choirs being both at their best in it, makes one wonder whether even its obvious beauties do not owe their inspiration more to Boston than to Nancy.

Doctor Muck could not have expected that after the "Finlandia," as he led it, and the orchestra played, one could listen with patience and responsiveness to Ropartz. To Franck, yes eternally. To the Franckians, no. Because Doctor Muck's "Finlandia" had a wealth of human riches, had his own understanding, his thought and his inspiration. Conducting, as he does always, with seeming indifference, he evoked the music's own passion. His hand was not raised against, but with the music.

Let it be said with some finality that there is more than one greatness, more than one perfection in conducting music, and that Doctor Muck has come closer to one of these perfections than any other conductor whose measure we may now take. If that perfection is said to be cold, it will be remembered that such warmth as he brings from his orchestra is not often felt, if it be called unimaginative it will be remembered that such imaginings as he stirs are the guerdon of but two or three other conductors in our time. These things it has been called. But if you call it inhuman, you err. It is merely superhuman, at times, and splendidly human for the most. But to be truly human is a pleasure reserved, also for the few.

Among them is Mr. Kreisler, who played last night for the second time this season in Philadelphia. His is the art which leaves nothing to be said, yet it seems to demand that everything be said again. As to the conducting of Doctor Muck, it is the negation of everything weak, of everything febrile and excessive—of everything romantic, in fact. Yet neither is classical; the just term is humanistic. Because in them there is all passion, with a splendid dignity and discipline. Nothing is barred out; the world is accepted and ordered and made beautiful.

Mr. Kreisler played last night a concerto of Mendelssohn. Its allegro is of an extraordinary virtuosity; the impeccable technique of the artist took the cadenzas with a noble facility. But its second movement, tender and sentimental and moving, was played with such justness of feeling as to be heartbreaking. "There is a high breathlessness about beauty which cancels lust and superstition," a poet and philosopher of our time has said. That beauty is Mr. Kreisler's.

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

FRITZ KREISLER, the great Austrian violinist, will be the soloist at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Monday evening. He will play the Mendelssohn Concerto in E Minor, one of the great public favorites of the master.

The orchestral numbers will be Sibelius's tone poem, "Finlandia," the Fourth Symphony in C Major of Guy Ropartz and Schumann's Overture, "Genoveva." Ropratz's Symphony will be heard here for the first time. It had its first performance in this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Doctor Muck, in Boston, last October, and has been played by him with much success in several cities. Ropartz, who is the director of the Conservatory of Music of Nancy, is a man now nearly middle age and belongs to that group of French composers who got not only their instruction but their absolute inspiration from the great Belgian, Cesar Franck. The Symphony is played without pause and lasts about a half hour.

From Address
Date

• • •

Fritz Kreisler is the soloist for the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. He will play the Mendelssohn concerto in E Minor. It is interesting to know that Mr. Kreisler regards this concerto of Mendelssohn as the most grateful work in the literature of the violin.

The orchestral numbers will be Sibelius's tone poem, "Finlandia," the Fourth Symphony in C Major of Guy Ropartz and Schumann's Overture, "Genoveva." Ropartz's Symphony will be heard here for the first time. It had its first performance in this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Doctor Muck in Boston last October. Ropartz director of Conservatory of 95

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS KREISLER TO PLAY

Stokowski Will Offer Beethoven Works and Elena Gerhardt Will Sing.

PEOPLE'S CHORAL UNION

Matinee Musical Club's Concert—Charles Anthony Here. Samaroff Recital.

Fritz Kreisler, the great Austrian violinist, will make his first appearance of the season with orchestra at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. He will play the Mendelssohn Concerto in E Minor. It is interesting to know that Kreisler regards this concerto of Mendelssohn as the most grateful work in the literature of the violin. Certain it is that it is one of the most melodious and one of the great public favorites.

The orchestral selections will be Sibelius' tone poem, "Finlandia," the Fourth Symphony in C major of Guy Ropartz and Schumann's overture. "Genoveva." Ropartz's Symphony will be heard here for the first time. It had its first performance in this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, in Boston last October, and has been played with much success in several cities. Ropartz, who is the director of the Conservatory of Music of Nancy, is a man now nearly middle age and belongs to that group of French composers who got not only their instruction, but their absolute inspiration from the great Belgian, Cesar Franck. Perhaps of all the men who studied with Franck and have since gained fame, Ropartz stands nearest his master. The symphony is played without pause and lasts about a half-hour.

* * *

---

wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

POST

Washington, D. C.

The Boston Symphony concert, Fritz Kreisler as the soloist, attr an euthusiastic and fashionable audience which filled the National Theater yesterday afternoon. Mrs. James McMillan entertained a box party, her guests including Mrs. Philip Sheridan, Miss Patten, and Mrs. Preston Gibson. In Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's box were Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe, Mrs. Adolph Caspar Miller, Miss Rosalie Stang, Miss Patterson, and Miss Hegeman. Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh had with her in her box Mrs. Burton Harrison, Mrs. David Jayne Hill, and her daughter, Miss Katherine Hill, and Miss Mott. Prince and Princess Hatzfeldt entertained a party in the German Ambassador's box. Gen. and Mrs. Crozier, Mr. and Mrs. Lisner, and Mrs. I. T. Mann also entertained box parties.. Among others in the audience were Mrs. Franklin K. Lane, Mr. and Mrs. Henry White, Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Miss Yvonne Townsend, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. A. W. Greely, Miss Josephine Patten, Mrs. Joseph E. Kuhn, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. George E. Wilder, Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clover, Mrs. S. B. Williamson, Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. William A. Slater, Mrs. Mahlon Pitney, Mr. Arnold Hague, Mrs. Willis Van Devanter, Mrs. William L. Marshall, Miss Hagner, Mrs. William A. Hammond, Dr. and Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Miss Lee, Miss Virginia Miller, Mrs. Nelson Read Johnson, Miss Marian Van Buren, Mrs. David Kindleberger, Miss Pauline Kindleberger, Miss Frances Noyes, Mrs. Henry Cabot Lodge, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Kirke Porter, Mrs. Frederick De Courcy Faust, Mrs. Monroe Eyre Pinckard, Mrs. Archibald, Mrs. William Kearney Carr, Mr. and Mrs. George Eustis, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mrs. James Harlan, Miss Laura Harlan, Mrs. John Crayke Simpson, Miss Fogg, Mrs. Christian Heurich, Miss Keyser, Mrs. Wallace Radcliffe, Mrs. Randolph McKim, Mrs. George Becker, Mrs. John Culp, Mrs. Percy Quin, Mrs. John W. Davidge, Mr. and Mrs. Peyton Russell, Mrs. Israel Putman, Mrs. Edward Douglas White, Mrs. Hugh Wallace, Miss Schroeder, Mrs. John W. Weeks, the Swedish Minister and Mme. Ekengren, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, Mrs. James Parmelee, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Atherton, and Dr. and Mrs. W. H. Wilmer.

TIMES

Washington, D. C.

N 6 19

brilliant audience gathered yester afternoon for the Boston Symph Orchestra concert, at which Fri reisler was the soloist. Prince an rincess Hatzfeldt entertained a part the German ambassador's box; Mr homas F. Walsh had with her Mr urton Harrison, Mrs. David Jayne H and her daughter, Miss Katherin Hi and Miss Mott. Mrs. James McMilla was hostess at a box party, her guest including Mrs. Preston Gibson, Mrs. Philip Sheridan and Miss Patten. In Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's box were Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe, Mrs. Adolph Caspar Miller, Miss Rosalie Stang, Miss Patterson, and Miss Hegeman. Gen. and Mrs. Crozier, and Mr. and Mrs. Lisner also entertained box parties. Mrs. I. T. Mann had with her Mrs. John B. Henderson, Miss Baugher, Miss Henley and Miss Elizabeth Henry. Among others in the audience were Mrs. Franklin K. Lane, Mr. and Mrs. Henry White, Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Miss Yvonne Townsend, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. A. W. Greely, Miss Josephine Patten, Mrs. Joseph E. Kuhn, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. George E. Wilder, Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clover, Mrs. S. B. Williamson, Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. William A. Slater, Mrs. Mahlon Pitney, Mr. Arnold Hague, Mrs. Willis Van Devanter, Mrs. William L. Marshall, Miss Hagner, Mrs. William A. Hammond, Dr. and Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Miss Lee, Miss Virginia Miller, Mrs. Nelson Read Johnson, Miss Marian Van Buren, Mrs. David Kindleberger, Miss Pauline Kindleberger, Miss Frances Noyes, Mrs. Henry Cabot Lodge, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Kirke Porter, Mrs. Frederick De Courcy Faust, Mrs. Monroe Eyre Pinckard, Mrs. Archibald, Mrs. William Kearney Carr, Mr. and Mrs. George Eustis, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mrs. James Harlan, Miss Laura Harlan, Mrs. John Crayke Simpson, Miss Fogg, Mrs. Christian Hemmick, Miss Keyser, Mrs. Wallace Radcliffe, Mrs. Randolph McKim, Mrs. George Becker, Mrs. John Culp, Mrs. Percy Quin, Mrs. John W. Davidge, Mr. and Mrs. Peyton Russell, Mrs. Israel Putman, Mrs. Edward Douglas White, Mrs. Hugh Wallace, Miss Schroeder, Mrs. John W. Weeks, the Swedish Minister and Mme. Ekengren, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, Mrs. James Parmlee, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Atherton, and Dr. and Mrs. W. H. Wilmer.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date AN 6 1915

KREISLER AUDIENCE FORGETS ITS DINNER

Boston Symphony Concert Is Productive of Unusual Tribute to Violinist.

Fritz Kreisler, soloist at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert, although he may not know it, received a higher compliment yesterday afternoon at the National Theater than is often accorded by Washington music lovers.

To understand the compliment one must know that the Boston Symphony never allows encores. Therefore, the house could hope to attain nothing in the way of music by a continued applause. Also, let it be understood, that Washington people, although firm upholders of the Boston Symphony, so much so that the concerts have become red-letter days in the social and musical calendar, are not so esthetic, but what they want their dinners when 6 o'clock comes.

As the hour hand creeps toward six a curious restlessness seizes the audience, and all over the theater hungry folk, or perhaps those to whom 6 o'clock is a call to duty, rise from their seats and make their way out with backward looks of regret.

The restlessness begins at 5:45, and continuous until 6. But yeserday al of the dinner engagements in the world and the thought of hungry children at home could not have called that audience away.

As a matter of fact, they calmly remained in the theater and applauded long after 6 o'clock! For at the fateful moment, 5:45, Fritz Kreisler was on the stage, and playing with even more beauty of tone and poise than ever before.

That he was glad to be in America, glad to have his violin under his chin, and to feel the unseen bond between himself and an audience eager for every note, was shown in every move.

The audience did not applaud so vociferously, they did not "make the house ring," but they gave a wonderfully impressive tribute, standing in their places, and applauding gently in a vain effort to show their appreciation of this return. All of this after 6 o'clock!

The symphony was Beethoven's Eighth, followed by the overture to "Genoveva," Schumann, opus 81. The numbers played by Kreisler were rich in material for the exploitation of tone and technique, Brahm's variations of a theme of Josef Hayln, opus 56a, and the Fantasia of Scottish Airs, for violin and orchestra, by Burch.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony will be given on the afternoon of Tuesday, February 16. Kreisler will be heard in concert at the same theater on the afternoon of January 26.

F. Y.

From TIMES

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date JAN 3 - 915

KREISLER COMES AS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Austrian Violinist Will Play Here Tuesday With the Boston Orchestra.

Fritz Kreisler, the Austrian violinist, will make his first appearance of the season in this city as solosist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday afternoon at 4:30, in the National Theater. Mr Kreisler returned to the United states in the latter part of November, having been rischarged from the Austrian army after a short term of service.

During the past week he made his initial appearance in New York before a capacity audience that overflowed to the platform and scarcely allowed space for the piano and the violinist, himself. He will play Bruch's "Scotch Fantasy," arranged for violin and orchestra at the Tuesday concert.

phony will be the Eighth in

From EVENING SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

The holidays being over, the musical life of Baltimore will now be resumed and the next few weeks promise to be weeks of no little activity in the realm of harmony.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will take place on Wednesday evening at the Lyric, when we will once more have the pleasure of hearing Fritz Kreisler, the great genius of the violin, who will paly the Beethoven violin concerto in D major. As he does not seem to be playing this work anywhere else this season one reads with interest that he is giving it here "at the request of the Baltimore musicians." As a result we are to have a program that opens with a Wagner overture and a modern French symphony and then harks back to the classics, an arrangement that is always more or less disconcerting.

The "Faust" overture by Wagner is particularly interesting, because of its scoring. You will recall, perhaps, that it begins with a long and difficult phrase played by the bass tuba and double basses. This is the famous phrase that no tuba player was ever able to play as it was written until the invention, a few years ago, of the aerophor, an artificial means of blowing wind instruments. Mr. Mattersteig, the tuba player of the Boston Orchestra, uses the aerophor continually, so that now the opening measures of the overture are played as they never could have been in Wagner's own time.

The Ropartz symphony in C major, which will be heard in Baltimore for the first time, is a work that Dr. Muck introduced to this country last October. It is very short, lasting but half an hour, and is played without pause, so it behooves the tardy to be in their places before it begins, else they will miss it entirely.

As I told you last week its composer is the head of the Conservatoire at Nancy. He is, however, a pupil of Cesar Frank and belongs to the little coterie of French composers who got so much inspiration from the great Belgian.

The violin concerto will be the last number on the program. It will be preceded, however, by the Beethoven "Egmont" overture.

From

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

Symphony Orchestra To Be At Lyric January 6

It is a program of extraordinary interest that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at its third concert in this city in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, January 6. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who a few weeks ago aroused such enthusiasm here by his recital, and he will play the Beethoven Concerto. This will be his only performance of the Beethoven Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year.

The orchestral numbers will be Wagner's "A Faust Overture", Ropartz's Symphony in C major, No. 4, a novelty, and Beethoven's "Egmont Overture."

Ropartz's Symphony in C major, which will be heard in Baltimore for the first time, is a work which Dr. Muck introduced to this country last October. It is short, lasting but 30 minutes and is played without pause.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

SYMPHONY CONCERT AIDED BY KREISLER

Noted Violinist Added Greatly to Enjoyment Given by Boston Orchestra.

Despite the handicap of extremely bad weather there was a large audience at Infantry Hall last night for the third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and all who attended were fully repaid for braving the rain and the icy sidewalks. As usual there was a warm welcome for the orchestra and an equally hearty greeting for Fritz Kreisler, the noted Austrian violinist, who was the soloist of the evening.

There was naturally much disappointment at the inability through illness of Mme. Schumann-Heink to fill her engagement to assist at this concert, for she is a favorite here and never fails to receive a flattering ovation when she comes. That disappointment, however, could hardly have been assuaged more completely than by the substitution of the great violinist. Mr. Kreisler is also no stranger to Providence music lovers and is always sure of an enthusiastic welcome when he plays in this city. That welcome was made the more hearty and cordial on this visit because of his recent serious service on the battlefield in the ranks of the army of his native land and the knowledge that he narrowly escaped death and still bears the wound of a bullet. The world loves a hero and there was consequently in the reception that was accorded the violinist last night not only recognition of his ability as a musician but also of his bravery as a soldier.

For the orchestra Dr. Muck, the director, had arranged a programme of great charm, the special feature of interest being the rendition for the first time in this city of the Fourth Symphony of Guy Ropartz. The composer is a Frenchman at the head of the Conservatoire of Nancy and a pupil of the noted Cesar Franck. He is generally regarded as the worthy successor of his teacher who left a deep impress on him by his teaching and influence. This symphony is much shorter than those usually played by the orchestra, being in one movement, and shows many characteristicts of the great teacher of the composer. It is smooth and melodious and decidedly pleasing in its composition and admirable in its execution at the hands of this orchestra. It has not the robust and sonorous quality that pertains to most other symphonies, but is in a lighter vein and its beauties are hidden and mo subtle.

In addition to the symphony, the orchestral numbers included Schuman's overture to "Genoveva," Brahm's; variations on a theme by Josef Haydn and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser." These formed a marked contrast to the symphony and were listened to with tense interest and keen enjoyment. They gave variety to the programme and were fully appreciated by the audience.

Mr. Kreisler as his selection played Mendelssohn's Concerto for violin and orchestra in E-minor and his rendition showed that he has lost none of his cunning and skill with the violin. There was the same brilliant technique, sympathy of expression, keenness of perception and interpretation and richness of tone that always mark his work. The concerto, though not new to those who love the best in music, is always enjoyable and was received with hearty expressions of approval that brought the artist back to the stage four times before the audience was satisfied.

The programme in its proper order was as follows:

Schumann ..Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81.
Ropartz ..Symphony No. 4, C-major (played without pause.)
First time in Providence.
Brahms ..Variations on Theme of Josef Raydn, Op, 56a.
Mendelssohn-Bartholdy..Concerto in E-minor, for Violin, Op. 64.
  I. Allegro molto appassionato.
  II. Andante.
  III. Allegretto non troppo, Allegro molto vivace.
Wagner ....Overture, "Tannhauser"

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS KREISLER TO PLAY

Stokowski Will Offer Beethoven Works and Elena Gerhardt Will Sing.

PEOPLE'S CHORAL UNION

Matinee Musical Club's Concert—Charles Anthony Here. Samaroff Recital.

Fritz Kreisler, the great Austrian violinist, will make his first appearance of the season with orchestra at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. He will play the Mendelssohn Concerto in E Minor. It is interesting to know that Kreisler regards this concerto of Mendelssohn as the most grateful work in the literature of the violin. Certain it is that it is one of the most melodious and one of the great public favorites.

The orchestral selections will be Sibelius' tone poem, "Finlandia," the Fourth Symphony in C major of Guy Ropartz and Schumann's overture. "Genoveva." Ropartz's Symphony will be heard here for the first time. It had its first performance in this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, in Boston last October, and has been played with much success in several cities. Ropartz, who is the director of the Conservatory of Music of Nancy, is a man now nearly middle age and belongs to that group of French composers who got not only their instruction, but their absolute inspiration from the great Belgian, Cesar Franck. Perhaps of all the men who studied with Franck and have since gained fame, Ropartz stands nearest his master. The symphony is played without pause and lasts about a half-hour.

* * *

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From POST

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date

Establis

The Boston Symphony concert, with Fritz Kreisler as the soloist, attracted an euthusiastic and fashionable audience which filled the National Theater yesterday afternoon. Mrs. James McMillan entertained a box party, her guests including Mrs. Philip Sheridan, Miss Patten, and Mrs. Preston Gibson. In Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's box were Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe, Mrs. Adolph Caspar Miller, Miss Rosalie Stang, Miss Patterson, and Miss Hegeman. Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh had with her in her box Mrs. Burton Harrison, Mrs. David Jayne Hill, and her daughter, Miss Katherine Hill, and Miss Mott. Prince and Princess Hatzfeldt entertained a party in the German Ambassador's box. Gen. and Mrs. Crozier, Mr. and Mrs. Lisner, and Mrs. I. T. Mann also entertained box parties.. Among others in the audience were Mrs. Franklin K. Lane, Mr. and Mrs. Henry White, Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Miss Yvonne Townsend, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. A. W. Greely, Miss Josephine Patten, Mrs. Joseph E. Kuhn, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. George E. Wilder, Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clover, Mrs. S. B. Williamson, Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. William A. Slater, Mrs. Mahlon Pitney, Mr. Arnold Hague, Mrs. Willis Van Devanter, Mrs. William L. Marshall, Miss Hagner, Mrs. William A. Hammond, Dr. and Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Miss Lee, Miss Virginia Miller, Mrs. Nelson Read Johnson, Miss Marian Van Buren, Mrs. David Kindleberger, Miss Pauline Kindleberger, Miss Frances Noyes, Mrs. Henry Cabot Lodge, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Kirke Porter, Mrs. Frederick De Courcy Faust, Mrs. Monroe Eyre Pinckard, Mrs. Archibald, Mrs. William Kearney Carr, Mr. and Mrs. George Eustis, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mrs. James Harlan, Miss Laura Harlan, Mrs. John Crayke Simpson, Miss Fogg, Mrs. Christian Heurich, Miss Keyser, Mrs. Wallace Radcliffe, Mrs. Randolph McKim, Mrs. George Becker, Mrs. John Culp, Mrs. Percy Quin, Mrs. John W. Davidge, Mr. and Mrs. Peyton Russell, Mrs. Israel Putman, Mrs. Edward Douglas White, Mrs. Hugh Wallace, Miss Schroeder, Mrs. John W. Weeks, the Swedish Minister and Mme. Ekengren, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, Mrs. James Parmelee, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Atherton, and Dr. and Mrs. W. H. Wilmer.

ES

Washington, D. C.

N 6 1915

884

…ant audience gathered yester… …rnoon for the Boston Symph… …hestra concert, at which Fritz … was the soloist. Prince and … Hatzfeldt entertained a party … German ambassador's box; Mrs. … F. Walsh had with her Mrs. … Harrison, Mrs. David Jayne Hill …er daughter, Miss Katherin Hill, …Miss Mott. Mrs. James McMillan was hostess at a box party, her guests including Mrs. Preston Gibson, Mrs. Philip Sheridan and Miss Patten. In Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's box were Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe, Mrs. Adolph Caspar Miller, Miss Rosalie Stang, Miss Patterson, and Miss Hegeman. Gen. and Mrs. Crozier, and Mr. and Mrs. Lisner also entertained box parties. Mrs. I. T. Mann had with her Mrs. John B. Henderson, Miss Baugher, Miss Henley and Miss Elizabeth Henry. Among others in the audience were Mrs. Franklin K. Lane, Mr. and Mrs. Henry White, Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Miss Yvonne Townsend, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. A. W. Greely, Miss Josephine Patten, Mrs. Joseph E. Kuhn, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. George E. Wilder, Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clover, Mrs. S. B. Williamson, Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. William A. Slater, Mrs. Mahlon Pitney, Mr. Arnold Hague, Mrs. Willis Van Devanter, Mrs. William L. Marshall, Miss Hagner, Mrs. William A. Hammond, Dr. and Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Miss Lee, Miss Virginia Miller, Mrs. Nelson Read Johnson, Miss Marian Van Buren, Mrs. David Kindleberger, Miss Pauline Kindleberger, Miss Frances Noyes, Mrs. Henry Cabot Lodge, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Kirke Porter, Mrs. Frederick De Courcy Faust, Mrs. Monroe Eyre Pinckard, Mrs. Archibald, Mrs. William Kearney Carr, Mr. and Mrs. George Eustis, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mrs. James Harlan, Miss Laura Harlan, Mrs. John Crayke Simpson, Miss Fogg, Mrs. Christian Hemmick, Miss Keyser, Mrs. Wallace Radcliffe, Mrs. Randolph McKim, Mrs. George Becker, Mrs. John Culp, Mrs. Percy Quin, Mrs. John W. Davidge, Mr. and Mrs. Peyton Russell, Mrs. Israel Putman, Mrs. Edward Douglas White, Mrs. Hugh Wallace, Miss Schroeder, Mrs. John W. Weeks, the Swedish Minister and Mme. Ekengren, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, Mrs. James Parmlee, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Atherton, and Dr. and Mrs. W. H. Wilmer.

Cutting Bureau in the World

MES

Washington, D. C.

AN 6 191

REISLER AUDIENCE FORGETS ITS DINNER

884

Boston Symphony Concert Is Productive of Unusual Tribute to Violinist.

Fritz Kreisler, soloist at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert, although he may not know it, received a higher compliment yesterday afternoon at the National Theater than is often accorded by Washington music lovers.

To understand the compliment one must know that the Boston Symphony never allows encores. Therefore, the house could hope to attain nothing in the way of music by a continued applause. Also, let it be understood, that Washington people, although firm upholders of the Boston Symphony, so much so that the concerts have become red-letter days in the social and musical calendar, are not so esthetic, but what they want their dinners when 6 o'clock comes.

As the hour hand creeps toward six a curious restlessness seizes the audience, and all over the theater hungry folk, or perhaps those to whom 6 o'clock is a call to duty, rise from their seats and make their way out with backward looks of regret.

The restlessness begins at 5:45, and continues until 6. But yeserday al of the dinner engagements in the world and the thought of hungry children at home could not have called that audience away.

As a matter of fact, they calmly remained in the theater and applauded long after 6 o'clock! For at the fateful moment, 5:45, Fritz Kreisler was on the stage, and playing with even more beauty of tone and poise than ever before.

That he was glad to be in America, glad to have his violin under his chin, and to feel the unseen bond between himself and an audience eager for every note, was shown in every move.

The audience did not applaud so vociferously, they did not "make the house ring," but they gave a wonderfully impressive tribute, standing in their places, and applauding gently in a vain effort to show their appreciation of this return. All of this after 6 o'clock!

The symphony was Beethoven's Eighth, followed by the overture to "Genoveva," Schumann, opus 81. The numbers played by Kreisler were rich in material for the exploitation of tone and technique, Brahm's variations of a theme of Josef Haydn, opus 56a, and the Fantasia of Scottish Airs, for violin and orchestra, by Burch.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony will be given on the afternoon of Tuesday, February 16. Kreisler will be heard in concert at the same theater on the afternoon of January 26.

F. Y.

GLOBE

Bureau in the World

gton, D. C.

JAN 8 . 91

R COMES AS PHONY SOLOIST

Austrian Violinist Will Play Here Tuesday With the Boston Orchestra.

Fritz Kreisler, the Austrian violinist, will make his first appearance of the season in this city as solosist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday afternoon at 4:30, in the National Theater. Mr Kreisler returned to the United states in the latter part of November, having been rischarged from the Austrian army after a short term of service.

During the past week he made his initial appearance in New York before a capacity audience that overflowed to the platform and scarcely allowed space for the piano and the violinist, himself. He will play Bruch's "Scotch Fantasy," arranged for violin and orchestra at the Tuesday concert.

The symphony will be the Eighth in F major, by Beethoven, and the other numbers are Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," and Brrams' variations on Haydn's "Chorale of St. Anthony.

Establi

The holidays being over, the musical life of Baltimore will now be resumed and the next few weeks promise to be weeks of no little activity in the realm of harmony.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will take place on Wednesday evening at the Lyric, when we will once more have the pleasure of hearing Fritz Kreisler, the great genius of the violin, who will paly the Beethoven violin concerto in D major. As he does not seem to be playing this work anywhere else this season one reads with interest that he is giving it here "at the request of the Baltimore musicians." As a result we are to have a program that opens with a Wagner overture and a modern French symphony and then harks back to the classics, an arrangement that is always more or less disconcerting.

The "Faust" overture by Wagner is particularly interesting, because of its scoring. You will recall, perhaps, that it begins with a long and difficult phrase played by the bass tuba and double basses. This is the famous phrase that no tuba player was ever able to play as it was written until the invention, a few years ago, of the aerophor, an artificial means of blowing wind instruments. Mr. Mattersteig, the tuba player of the Boston Orchestra, uses the aerophor continually, so that now the opening measures of the overture are played as they never could have been in Wagner's own time.

The Ropartz symphony in C major, which will be heard in Baltimore for the first time, is a work that Dr. Muck introduced to this country last October. It is very short, lasting but half an hour, and is played without pause, so it behooves the tardy to be in their places before it begins, else they will miss it entirely.

As I told you last week its composer is the head of the Conservatoire at Nancy. He is, however, a pupil of Cesar Frank and belongs to the little coterie of French composers who got so much inspiration from the great Belgian.

The violin concerto will be the last number on the program. It will be preceded, however, by the Beethoven "Egmont" overture.

From

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

Symphony Orchestra To Be At Lyric January 6

Estal

884

It is a program of extraordinary interest that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at its third concert in this city in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, January 6. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who a few weeks ago aroused such enthusiasm here by his recital, and he will play the Beethoven Concerto. This will be his only performance of the Beethoven Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year.

The orchestral numbers will be Wagner's "A Faust Overture", Ropartz's Symphony in C major, No. 4, a novelty, and Beethoven's "Egmont Overture."

Ropartz's Symphony in C major, which will be heard in Baltimore for the first time, is a work which Dr. Muck introduced to this country last October. It is short, lasting but 30 minutes and is played without pause.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

SYMPHONY CONCERT AIDED BY KREISLER

ork, 1884

Noted Violinist Added Greatly to Enjoyment Given by Boston Orchestra.

Despite the handicap of extremely bad weather there was a large audience at Infantry Hall last night for the third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and all who attended were fully repaid for braving the rain and the icy sidewalks. As usual there was a warm welcome for the orchestra and an equally hearty greeting for Fritz Kreisler, the noted Austrian violinist, who was the soloist of the evening.

There was naturally much disappointment at the inability through illness of Mme. Schumann-Heink to fill her engagement to assist at this concert, for she is a favorite here and never fails to receive a flattering ovation when she comes. That disappointment, however, could hardly have been assuaged more completely than by the substitution of the great violinist. Mr. Kreisler is also no stranger to Providence music lovers and is always sure of an enthusiastic welcome when he plays in this city. That welcome was made the more hearty and cordial on this visit because of his recent serious service on the battlefield in the ranks of the army of his native land and the knowledge that he narrowly escaped death and still bears the wound of a bullet. The world loves a hero and there was consequently in the reception that was accorded the violinist last night not only recognition of his ability as a musician but also of his bravery as a soldier.

For the orchestra Dr. Muck, the director, had arranged a programme of great charm, the special feature of interest being the rendition for the first time in this city of the Fourth Symphony of Guy Ropartz. The composer is a Frenchman at the head of the Conservatoire of Nancy and a pupil of the noted Cesar Franck. He is generally regarded as the worthy successor of his teacher who left a deep impress on him by his teaching and influence. This symphony is much shorter than those usually played by the orchestra, being in one movement, and shows many characteristicts of the great teacher of the composer. It is smooth and melodious and decidedly pleasing in its composition and admirable in its execution at the hands of this orchestra. It has not the robust and sonorous quality that pertains to most other symphonies, but is in a lighter vein and its beauties are hidden and mo… subtle.

In addition to the symphony, the orchestral numbers included Schuman's overture to "Genoveva," Brahm's; variations on a theme by Josef Haydn and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser." These formed a marked contrast to the symphony and were listened to with tense interest and keen enjoyment. They gave variety to the programme and were fully appreciated by the audience.

Mr. Kreisler as his selection played Mendelssohn's Concerto for violin and orchestra in E-minor and his rendition showed that he has lost none of his cunning and skill with the violin. There was the same brilliant technique, sympathy of expression, keenness of perception and interpretation and richness of tone that always mark his work. The concerto, though not new to those who love the best in music, is always enjoyable and was received with hearty expressions of approval that brought the artist back to the stage four times before the audience was satisfied.

The programme in its proper order was as follows:

Schumann ..Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81.
Ropartz ..Symphony No. 4, C-major (played without pause.)
First time in Providence.
Brahms ..Variations on Theme of Josef Raydn, Op, 56a.
Mendelssohn-Bartholdy..Concerto in E-minor, for Violin, Op. 64.
I. Allegro molto appassionato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegretto non troppo, Allegro molto vivace.
Wagner ....Overture, "Tannhauser"

1884

884

The First Established and Most Comp
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

It is always the policy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to have at least one very distinguished singer as soloist in its season in Providence. The inability of Mme. Schumann-Heink to appear here last Tuesday night undoubtedly caused disappointment to many lovers of good singing, but Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, has made arrangements for the next concert which will more than repay the disappointment of the last. He has been able to secure the services for the concert which will be given Feb. 2 of Mme. Frieda Hempel, the prima donna coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Mme. Hempel, now that Sembrich has retired from opera, is the leading lyric soprano of the operatic stage to-day. She has had a career of extraordinary success in Berlin, London and New York. Her appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be an event of unusual importance.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

FINE CONCERTS TO END YEAR

Third in the Series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Scheduled for Tuesday.

FRITZ KREISLER TO PLAY.

The Next Concert of the Steinert Series Will Be Given in Infantry Hall Dec. 31.

In local musical circles the announcement of the third in the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring visions of a rare musical treat to a host of musical people of this city and its environs. The concert is to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday night, but contrary to expectations and announcement Mme. Schumann-Heinck, the famous contralto, will not be the soloist.

The reason for this is the sudden illness of Mme Schumann-Heinck.

Fritz Kreisler, the celebrated Austrian violinist, famous as the leading violinist of the world, however, has been engaged as the soloist, and will be heard in several numbers.

Fritz Kreisler's return to the concert stage from Europe, where he saw service and was wounded in the war—has stimulated interest in his work as never before, if this indeed, were possible.

As is well known this prince of violinists was miraculously saved from death on the battlefield of Lemberg and thrice happily recovered from a serious wound. At a recent concert in New York a vast throng, in Carnegie Hall, cheered him to the echo, as he limped upon the stage, and at the close of his performance, there was pandemonium.

For the orchestra on Tuesday night Dr. Muck has arranged a programme of great charm, the salient feature of which will be the first performance in Providence of the Fourth Symphony of Guy Ropartz, a Frenchman, and a pupil of the great Cesar Franck. The symphony is short and is in one movement. It is melodious in the best manner of French music and has no relationship to the dissonances of Debussy and his school.

The other numbers will be the "Genoveva," overture of Schumann, the "Tannhauser" overture of Wagner, and Brahm's great variations on a theme by Josef Haydn.

The programme in its proper order is as follows: Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81, Schumann; Symphony, No. 4, C major (played without pause), Ropartz, first time in Providence; variations on a theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56a, Brahms; overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

After a considerable period without any concerts of note, the coming week will be marked by two important musical events, in the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening and the third concert in the Steinert series on Thursday evening, which will end the year with more than the usual brilliancy from a musical standpoint.

* * *

As was announced yesterday, a sudden illness will prevent the appearance of Mme. Schumann-Heink at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall. Her place will be filled by Fritz Kreisler, the celebrated Austrian violinist, to whose narrow escape from death in the European war is due his appearance in America. Fortunately, the wound which has incapacitated Mr. Kreisler for military service, has not impaired his ability as a violinist, and at this, his only appearance in this city this season, he will play the Mendelssohn Concerto for violin and orchestra in E-minor. This is expected to be Mr. Kreisler's only Providence appearance this season.

Notable in the interesting orchestral part of the programme will be the first performance in this city of the Fourth Symphony of Guy Ropartz. The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave this work its first performance in America at its second concert in Boston this season and has since played it with much success in other cities.

Ropartz is a Frenchman now approaching middle age, the head of the Conservatoire of Nancy. Like all the leading composers of France of his generation, he is a pupil of the great Cesar Franck, and is generally regarded as the true successor of that remarkable man. At any rate, Franck's teaching and influence have left a deeper impress on Ropartz than on any other of his school. His Fourth Symphony, which is short and is played without pause, has many of the characteristics of the composer's teacher. The curves of its melodies and the general orchestral treatment follow well along the lines laid out by the Belgian genius, and are decidedly pleasing to the ear.

The orchestral part of the programme is as follows: Schumann, Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81; Ropartz, Symphony No. 4, C Major (played without pause), first time in Providence; Brahms, Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn, op. 56a; Wagner, Overture, "Tannhauser."

* * *

From BULLETIN
Address Providence, R. I.
Date DEC 30 1914

FRITZ KREISLER IS FEATURE OF THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT

Noted Soldier-Violinist Wins Plaudits at Infantry Hall. New Composition by Ropartz, French Master, Given Here for First Time.

Seldom is it possible for a management to substitute one popular idol for another at short notice, but the announcement that Mme. Schumann-Heink was ill in Chicago and unable to fill her engagement to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert in Infantry Hall last evening, contained also the news that in her place Fritz Kreisler, the eminent Austrian violinist, would play.

Probably no other soloist would have been able to compensate for the immeasurable regret felt for the absence of the beloved contralto; certainly no instrumentalist other than Mr. Kreisler could have won so spontaneous a welcome.

Added to the recognition always accorded to the favorite violinist was the warmth of greeting to one returned from the jaws of death, and as Mr. Kreisler stood waiting for the rolling waves of applause to subside, he must have been assured of his firm hold on the affection of music lovers in this city.

Of his performance of Mendelssohn's Concerto in E-minor, it seems futile to attempt to speak adequately. All the beauty of tone, brilliancy of technique and humanity of expression with which the public has become familiar in his playing, was evident, for which the sentiment brought about by the thought of what might have been gave an additional capacity for appreciation.

The concerto is a familiar one to concertgoers here, but every one knows the hold that old melodies have upon the heart, and the symmetrical structure and exquisite orchestration of the composition were never more beautifully demonstrated than in the performance last evening.

Mr. Kreisler in faultless tones expressed the individuality of thought and style in every phrase of the composer, perfectly supported by the orchestra under Dr. Muck in the passionate strains of the first movement, through the beautiful andante to the rippling vivacity of the finale.

The large audience gave expression to its undeniable satisfaction by applause so sustained that it kept Mr. Kreisler bowing his acknowledgment for a considerable space of time. Four times he was recalled after he had left the stage, before the resumption of the programme which in its proper sequence was as follows:

Schumann.....Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81
Ropartz......Symphony No. 4, C-major (played without pause).
First time in Providence.
Brahms......Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56a.
Mendelssohn-Bartholdy..Concerto in E-minor, for Violin, Op. 64.
I. Allegro molto appassionato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegretto non troppo,
Allegro molto vivace.
Wagner..............Overture, "Tannhauser"

If the public has clamored for novelty as well as for variety, both were accorded last evening, in the foregoing programme,; each of the composers represented, standing for a distinct form of musical utterance in the last century or more.

The overtures with which the programme began and ended were as different as the men by whom they were written, but were equally well played, the Tannhauser overture in its grandeur, offering a fitting anti-climax.

Of the Ropartz symphony it is difficult to speak with authority since eminent critics disagreed at its earliest productions. The composer, Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz, born in France in 1864, was, at the age of 30, nominated director of the Conservatory of Music at Nancy, France, a position he still holds.

The symphony, composed in 1910, was played for the first time from manuscript in Paris, Oct. 15, 1911. Boston heard it first played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in October of this year, and in November, the Philharmonic Society, under Josef Stransky, played it in New York.

Ropartz, called by Vincent d'Indy, "a born symphonic writer," is one of the true pupils of Cesar Franck, under whom he studied after 1872.

He has shown himself faithful to his master, although critics, as has been said, disagree as to his inspiration and individuality. The symphony in three movements, connected without obvious breaks, was played without pause, and differs from the classical model in the manner of its development and thematic treatment.

To one who looked seriously for beauty, there was much to be found in the underlying themes suggestive of French folk-song, though often overborne by the overwhelming dissonances. Its conviction and sincerity lead one to believe that the composer was influenced by some underlying poetic idea. But if so he kept it to himself and gave no suggestion of it in the title. It quite vividly conveyed to the imaginative a sense of an outdoor concourse, with little threads of melody heard at intervals, and then lost in an overpowering clamor of various moods.

The "cyclic" formula was followed with contrasts and interplay, through the ascents and descents of musical measures and delicately incisive melodies, but in less systematic manner than employed by Cesar Franck.

In the hands of Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra its interpretation was what it should be, and as the seeker finds what he looks for, those who looked for beauty did not go unsatisfied, although its rhythms and harmonies were not for those who had been conventionally brought up.

To them there could have been no greater contrast than was afforded in the opening measures of the "chorale" theme by Josef Haydn, which followed the symphony. Its simple dignity was impressively set forth before it was intricately embroidered and ingeniuosly interwoven with the individuality of Brahms in his "Variations."

The composer had a fondness for variations on the themes of other composers, as if he recognized the unused possibilities in them and desired to give them new life by his ingenuity in presenting the material in new aspects, and the eight variations on Haydn's theme with finale afforded an appreciable addition to last evening's programme, which was of somewhat unusual length.

The fourth concert, for which the soloist has not yet been announced, will be given on Tuesday evening, Feb. 2.

A. W. C.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

sale by all markets and groceries.

MME. SCHUMAN-HINK ILL.

Fritz Kreisler, Violinist, to Take Her Place at Symphony Concert.

Mme. Schaumann-Heink will be unable to appear as soloist at the third Boston Sympohny Concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening and her place will be taken by Fritz Kreisler, the great Austrian violinist. C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra received word yesterday from the great contralto that she is ill in Chicago and can neither sing at her recital to-morrow in Sympthony Hall, Boston, nor with the Symphony Orchestra here. Mr. Ellis immediately gotinto communication with Mr. Kreisler in New York and secured his consent to act as substitute.

Naturally the illnes of Mme. Schaumann-Heink will cause some idisappointment. On the other hand it will give Providence an unexpected chance to hear the great Kreisler, who otherwise would not have played here this year. He will play the Mendelssohn Concerto. The orchestral numbers remain unchanged.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date JAN 10 1915

Dr. Muck and Fritz Kreisler in Concert

Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Fritz Kreisler, violinist, joined hands yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, to the delight and delectation of an enormous audience.

The famous conductor led his musicians in Beethoven's exquisite Eighth Symphony, the overture to Schumann's opera, "Genoveva," and Christmas music by Bach and Liszt.

The great Kreisler, looking ruddier and stronger than at his earlier appearances this year, played Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish airs.

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date JAN 10 19

UNUSUAL PROGRAMME BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony Given—Kreisler as Soloist.

It was a programme in distinct contrast to those presented during his last appearance in New York which Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony, played before the usual crowded house in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Fritz Kreisler, as soloist, presented Bruch's Fantasie on Scottish Airs, for violin and orchestra, op. 46. It was a piece of comparative unimportance, although it was invested with much charm under Kreisler's vigorous bow.

Beethoven's Eighth symphony was the opening number and if the superlative Boston organization can be said to play one Beethoven symphony better than another, it must certainly be the eighth. Although this work is not Beethoven at his best, it nevertheless assumes a new dignity when Dr. Muck takes it in hand.

Entirely different in character were the following numbers: Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, the "Shepherd's Music" from Bach's Christmas oratorio and the "March of the Three Holy Kings" from the Liszt oratorio, "Christus."

Needless to say, whatever of beauty and power and eloquence is inherent in these works was brought out under Dr. Muck's baton.

After the Bruch Fantasie, Kreisler had to limp out on the platform many times to satisfy the enthusiastic crowd, who lingered in the hope of an encore

---

Most Comp
Newspaper Cutting Bu

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date JAN 10 1915

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Mr. Kreisler Again Soloist at Second Concert.

The matinée concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday had a reminder of the recent Christmas season in two numbers of the programme—the Pastoral Symphony from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" and "The March of the Three Holy Kings," from Liszt's oratorio of "Christus." Bach's music was exquisitely played in a spirit of lovely tenderness and introspection. Liszt's march is not a very significant piece; the invention had something of Liszt's characteristic mediocrity, and there is repetition in it that makes wearisome what would otherwise be a tolerable fragment.

Besides these there was Schumann's nobly beautiful overture to his own opera of "Genoveva," and the symphony was Beethoven's eighth. Mr. Kreisler was again the soloist. He played Bruch's Fantasie on Scottish Airs, Op. 46, with robust spirit and tender feeling, with much tonal beauty and vigorous rhythm. The audience was again enormous, as large as the hall could accommodate, and there was deep appreciation and understanding of the orchestra's fine achievements and Dr. Muck's masterly conducting, as well as for Mr. Kreisler.

The First Established and Most Comp
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

, 1884

It is always the policy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to have at least one very distinguished singer as soloist in its season in Providence. The inability of Mme. Schumann-Heink to appear here last Tuesday night undoubtedly caused disappointment to many lovers of good singing, but Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, has made arrangements for the next concert which will more than repay the disappointment of the last. He has been able to secure the services for the concert which will be given Feb. 2 of Mme. Frieda Hempel, the prima donna coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Mme. Hempel, now that Sembrich has retired from opera, is the leading lyric soprano of the operatic stage to-day. She has had a career of extraordinary success in Berlin, London and New York. Her appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be an event of unusual importance.

---

rom TRIBUNE
ddress: Providence, R. I.
Date
Established:

FINE CONCERTS TO END YEAR

Third in the Series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Scheduled for Tuesday.

FRITZ KREISLER TO PLAY.

The Next Concert of the Steinert Series Will Be Given in Infantry Hall Dec. 31.

In local musical circles the announcement of the third in the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring visions of a rare musical treat to a host of musical people of this city and its environs. The concert is to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday night, but contrary to expectations and announcement Mme. Schumann-Heinck, the famous contralto, will not be the soloist.

The reason for this is the sudden illness of Mme Schumann-Heinck.

Fritz Kreisler, the celebrated Austrian violinist, famous as the leading violinist of the world, however, has been engaged as the soloist, and will be heard in several numbers.

Fritz Kreisler's return to the concert stage from Europe, where he saw service and was wounded in the war—has stimulated interest in his work as never before, if this indeed, were possible.

As is well known this prince of violinists was miraculously saved from death on the battlefield of Lemberg and thrice happily recovered from a serious wound. At a recent concert in New York a vast throng, in Carnegie Hall, cheered him to the echo, as he limped upon the stage, and at the close of his performance, there was pandemonium.

For the orchestra on Tuesday night Dr. Muck has arranged a programme of great charm, the salient feature of which will be the first performance in Providence of the Fourth Symphony of Guy Ropartz, a Frenchman, and a pupil of the great Cesar Franck. The symphony is short and is in one movement. It is melodious in the best manner of French music and has no relationship to the dissonances of Debussy and his school.

The other numbers will be the "Genoveva," overture of Schumann, the "Tannhauser" overture of Wagner, and Brahm's great variations on a theme by Josef Haydn.

The programme in its proper order is as follows: Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81, Schumann; Symphony, No. 4, C major (played without pause), Ropartz, first time in Providence; variations on a theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56a, Brahms; overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

ork, 18

AFTER a considerable period without any concerts of note, the coming week will be marked by two important musical events, in the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening and the third concert in the Steinert series on Thursday evening, which will end the year with more than the usual brilliancy from a musical standpoint.

* * *

As was announced yesterday, a sudden illness will prevent the appearance of Mme. Schumann-Heink at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall. Her place will be filled by Fritz Kreisler, the celebrated Austrian violinist, to whose narrow escape from death in the European war is due his appearance in America. Fortunately, the wound which has incapacitated Mr. Kreisler for military service, has not impaired his ability as a violinist, and at this, his only appearance in this city this season, he will play the Mendelssohn Concerto for violin and orchestra in E-minor. This is expected to be Mr. Kreisler's only Providence appearance this season.

Notable in the interesting orchestral part of the programme will be the first performance in this city of the Fourth Symphony of Guy Ropartz. The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave this work its first performance in America at its second concert in Boston this season and has since played it with much success in other cities.

Ropartz is a Frenchman now approaching middle age, the head of the Conservatoire of Nancy. Like all the leading composers of France of his generation, he is a pupil of the great Cesar Franck, and is generally regarded as the true successor of that remarkable man. At any rate, Franck's teaching and influence have left a deeper impress on Ropartz than on any other of his school. His Fourth Symphony, which is short and is played without pause, has many of the characteristics of the composer's teacher. The curves of its melodies and the general orchestral treatment follow well along the lines laid out by the Belgian genius, and are decidedly pleasing to the ear.

The orchestral part of the programme is as follows: Schumann, Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81; Ropartz, Symphony No. 4, C Major (played without pause), first time in Providence; Brahms, Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn, op. 56a; Wagner, Overture, "Tannhauser."

From BULLETIN
Address Providence, R. I.
Date DEC

Est 34

FRITZ KREISLER IS FEATURE OF THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT

Noted Soldier-Violinist Wins Plaudits at Infantry Hall. New Composition by Ropartz, French Master, Given Here for First Time.

Seldom is it possible for a management to substitute one popular idol for another at short notice, but the announcement that Mme. Schumann-Heink was ill in Chicago and unable to fill her engagement to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert in Infantry Hall last evening, contained also the news that in her place Fritz Kreisler, the eminent Austrian violinist, would play.

Probably no other soloist would have been able to compensate for the immeasurable regret felt for the absence of the beloved contralto; certainly no instrumentalist other than Mr. Kreisler could have won so spontaneous a welcome.

Added to the recognition always accorded to the favorite violinist was the warmth of greeting to one returned from the jaws of death, and as Mr. Kreisler stood waiting for the rolling waves of applause to subside, he must have been assured of his firm hold on the affection of music lovers in this city.

Of his performance of Mendelssohn's Concerto in E-minor, it seems futile to attempt to speak adequately. All the beauty of tone, brilliancy of technique and humanity of expression with which the public has become familiar in his playing, was evident, for which the sentiment brought about by the thought of what might have been gave an additional capacity for appreciation.

The concerto is a familiar one to concertgoers here, but every one knows the hold that old melodies have upon the heart, and the symmetrical structure and exquisite orchestration of the composition were never more beautifully demonstrated than in the performance last evening.

Mr. Kreisler in faultless tones expressed the individuality of thought and style in every phrase of the composer, perfectly supported by the orchestra under Dr. Muck in the passionate strains of the first movement, through the beautiful andante to the rippling vivacity of the finale.

The large audience gave expression to its undeniable satisfaction by applause so sustained that it kept Mr. Kreisler bowing his acknowledgment for a considerable space of time. Four times he was recalled after he had left the stage, before the resumption of the programme which in its proper sequence was as follows:

Schumann.....Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81
Ropartz......Symphony No. 4, C-major (played without pause).
First time in Providence.
Brahms......Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56a.
Mendelssohn-Bartholdy..Concerto in E-minor, for Violin, Op. 64.
I. Allegro molto appassionato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegretto non troppo, Allegro molto vivace.
Wagner................Overture, "Tannhauser"

If the public has clamored for novelty as well as for variety, both were accorded last evening, in the foregoing programme,; each of the composers represented, standing for a distinct form of musical utterance in the last century or more.

The overtures with which the programme began and ended were as different as the men by whom they were written, but were equally well played, the Tannhauser overture in its grandeur, offering a fitting anti-climax.

Of the Ropartz symphony it is difficult to speak with authority since eminent critics disagreed at its earliest productions. The composer, Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz, born in France in 1864, was, at the age of 30, nominated director of the Conservatory of Music at Nancy, France, a position he still holds.

The symphony, composed in 1910, was played for the first time from manuscript in Paris, Oct. 15, 1911. Boston heard it first played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in October of this year, and in November, the Philharmonic Society, under Josef Stransky, played it in New York.

Ropartz, called by Vincent d'Indy, "a born symphonic writer," is one of the true pupils of Cesar Franck, under whom he studied after 1872.

He has shown himself faithful to his master, although critics, as has been said, disagree as to his inspiration and individuality. The symphony in three movements, connected without obvious breaks, was played without pause, and differs from the classical model in the manner of its development and thematic treatment.

To one who looked seriously for beauty, there was much to be found in the underlying themes suggestive of French folk-song, though often overborne by the overwhelming dissonances. Its conviction and sincerity lead one to believe that the composer was influenced by some underlying poetic idea. But if so he kept it to himself and gave no suggestion of it in the title. It quite vividly conveyed to the imaginative a sense of an outdoor concourse, with little threads of melody heard at intervals, and then lost in an overpowering clamor of various moods.

The "cyclic" formula was followed with contrasts and interplay, through the ascents and descents of musical measures and delicately incisive melodies, but in less systematic manner than employed by Cesar Franck.

In the hands of Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra its interpretation was what it should be, and as the seeker finds what he looks for, those who looked for beauty did not go unsatisfied, although its rhythms and harmonies were not for those who had been conventionally brought up.

To them there could have been no greater contrast than was afforded in the opening measures of the "chorale" theme by Josef Haydn, which followed the symphony. Its simple dignity was impressively set forth before it was intricately embroidered and ingeniuously interwoven with the individuality of Brahms in his "Variations."

The composer had a fondness for variations on the themes of other composers, as it he recognized the unused possibilities in them and desired to give them new life by his ingenuity in presenting the material in new aspects, and the eight variations on Haydn's theme with finale afforded an appreciable addition to last evening's programme, which was of somewhat unusual length.

The fourth concert, for which the soloist has not yet been announced, will be given on Tuesday evening, Feb. 2.

A. W. C.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date
Estab

sale by all markets and groceries.

MME. SCHUMAN-HINK ILL.

Fritz Kreisler, Violinist, to Take Her Place at Symphony Concert.

Mme. Schaumann-Heink will be unable to appear as soloist at the third Boston Sympohny Concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening and her place will be taken by Fritz Kreisler, the great Austrian violinist. C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra received word yesterday from the great contralto that she is ill in Chicago and can neither sing at her recital to-morrow in Sympthony Hall, Boston, nor with the Symphony Orchestra here. Mr. Ellis immediately gotinto communication with Mr. Kreisler in New York and secured his consent to act as substitute.

Naturally the illnes of Mme. Schaumann-Heink will cause some idisappointment. On the other hand it will give Providence an unexpected chance to hear the great Kreisler, who otherwise would not have played here this year. He will play the Mendelssohn Concerto. The orchestral numbers remain unchanged.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
JAN 1
Date
Estab 84

Dr. Muck and Fritz Kreisler in Concert

Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Fritz Kreisler, violinist, joined hands yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, to the delight and delectation of an enormous audience.

The famous conductor led his musicians in Beethoven's exquisite Eighth Symphony, the overture to Schumann's opera, "Genoveva," and Christmas music by Bach and Liszt.

The great Kreisler, looking ruddier and stronger than at his earlier appearances this year, played Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish airs.

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date JAN 1
Es 1884

UNUSUAL PROGRAMME BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony Given—Kreisler as Soloist.

It was a programme in distinct contrast to those presented during his last appearance in New York which Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony, played before the usual crowded house in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Fritz Kreisler, as soloist, presented Bruch's Fantasie on Scottish Airs, for violin and orchestra, op. 46. It was a piece of comparative unimportance, although it was invested with much charm under Kreisler's vigorous bow.

Beethoven's Eighth symphony was the opening number and if the superlative Boston organization can be said to play one Beethoven symphony better than another, it must certainly be the eighth. Although this work is not Beethoven at his best, it nevertheless assumes a new dignity when Dr. Muck takes it in hand.

Entirely different in character were the following numbers: Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, the "Shepherd's Music" from Bach's Christmas oratorio and the "March of the Three Holy Kings" from the Liszt oratorio, "Christus."

Needless to say, whatever of beauty and power and eloquence is inherent in these works was brought out under Dr. Muck's baton.

After the Bruch Fantasie, Kreisler had to limp out on the platform many times to satisfy the enthusiastic crowd, who lingered in the hope of an encore

---

Most Comp
Newspaper Cutting Bu W
TIMES

From
Address: New York City
Date JAN 1
Esta 1884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Mr. Kreisler Again Soloist at Second Concert.

The matinée concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday had a reminder of the recent Christmas season in two numbers of the programme—the Pastoral Symphony from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" and "The March of the Three Holy Kings," from Liszt's oratorio of "Christus." Bach's music was exquisitely played in a spirit of lovely tenderness and introspection. Liszt's march is not a very significant piece; the invention had something of Liszt's characteristic mediocrity, and there is repetition in it that makes wearisome what would otherwise be a tolerable fragment.

Besides these there was Schumann's nobly beautiful overture to his own opera of "Genoveva," and the symphony was Beethoven's eighth. Mr. Kreisler was again the soloist. He played Bruch's Fantasie on Scottish Airs, Op. 46, with robust spirit and tender feeling, with much tonal beauty and vigorous rhythm. The audience was again enormous, as large as the hall could accommodate, and there was deep appreciation and understanding of the orchestra's fine achievements and Dr. Muck's masterly conducting, as well as for Mr. Kreisler.

The First Established and Most Comp
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

, 1884

It is always the policy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to have at least one very distinguished singer as soloist in its season in Providence. The inability of Mme. Schumann-Heink to appear here last Tuesday night undoubtedly caused disappointment to many lovers of good singing, but Mr. [illegible] the manager of the orchestra, has made arrangements for the next concert which will more than repay the disappointment of the last. He has been able to secure the services for the concert which will be given Feb. 2 of Mme. Frieda Hempel, the prima donna coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Mme. Hempel, now that Sembrich has retired from opera, is the leading lyric soprano of the operatic stage to-day. She has had a career of extraordinary success in Berlin, London and New York. Her appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be an event of unusual importance.

---

rom TRIBUNE
ddress: Providence, R. I.
Date

Established:

FINE CONCERTS TO END YEAR

Third in the Series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Scheduled for Tuesday.

FRITZ KREISLER TO PLAY.

The Next Concert of the Steinert Series Will Be Given in Infantry Hall Dec. 31.

In local musical circles the announcement of the third in the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring visions of a rare musical treat to a host of musical people of this city and its environs. The concert is to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday night, but contrary to expectations and announcement Mme. Schumann-Heinck, the famous contralto, will not be the soloist.

The reason for this is the sudden illness of Mme Schumann-Heinck.

Fritz Kreisler, the celebrated Austrian violinist, famous as the leading violinist of the world, however, has been engaged as the soloist, and will be heard in several numbers.

Fritz Kreisler's return to the concert stage from Europe, where he saw service and was wounded in the war—has stimulated interest in his work as never before, if this indeed, were possible.

As is well known this prince of violinists was miraculously saved from death on the battlefield of Lemberg and thrice happily recovered from a serious wound. At a recent concert in New York a vast throng, in Carnegie Hall, cheered him to the echo, as he limped upon the stage, and at the close of his performance, there was pandemonium.

For the orchestra on Tuesday night Dr. Muck has arranged a programme of great charm, the salient feature of which will be the first performance in Providence of the Fourth Symphony of Guy Ropartz, a Frenchman, and a pupil of the great Cesar Franck. The symphony is short and is in one movement. It is melodious in the best manner of French music and has no relationship to the dissonances of Debussy and his school.

The other numbers will be the "Genoveva," overture of Schumann, the "Tannhauser" overture of Wagner, and Brahm's great variations on a theme by Josef Haydn.

The programme in its proper order is as follows: Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81, Schumann; Symphony, No. 4, C major (played without pause), Ropartz, first time in Providence; variations on a theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56a, Brahms; overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

AFTER a considerable period without any concerts of note, the coming week will be marked by two important musical events, in the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening and the third concert in the Steinert series on Thursday evening, which will end the year with more than the usual brilliancy from a musical standpoint.

* * *

As was announced yesterday, a sudden illness will prevent the appearance of Mme. Schumann-Heink at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall. Her place will be filled by Fritz Kreisler, the celebrated Austrian violinist, to whose narrow escape from death in the European war is due his appearance in America. Fortunately, the wound which has incapacitated Mr. Kreisler for military service, has not impaired his ability as a violinist, and at this, his only appearance in this city this season, he will play the Mendelssohn Concerto for violin and orchestra in E-minor. This is expected to be Mr. Kreisler's only Providence appearance this season.

Notable in the interesting orchestral part of the programme will be the first performance in this city of the Fourth Symphony of Guy Ropartz. The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave this work its first performance in America at its second concert in Boston this season and has since played it with much success in other cities.

Ropartz is a Frenchman now approaching middle age, the head of the Conservatoire of Nancy. Like all the leading composers of France of his generation, he is a pupil of the great Cesar Franck, and is generally regarded as the true successor of that remarkable man. At any rate, Franck's teaching and influence have left a deeper impress on Ropartz than on any other of his school. His Fourth Symphony, which is short and is played without pause, has many of the characteristics of the composer's teacher. The curves of its melodies and the general orchestral treatment follow well along the lines laid out by the Belgian genius, and are decidedly pleasing to the ear.

The orchestral part of the programme is as follows: Schumann, Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81; Ropartz, Symphony No. 4, C Major (played without pause), first time in Providence; Brahms, Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn, op. 56a; Wagner, Overture, "Tannhauser."

From BULLETIN, R. I.
Address Providence, R. I.
Date

Est

FRITZ KREISLER IS FEATURE OF THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT

Noted Soldier-Violinist Wins Plaudits at Infantry Hall. New Composition by Ropartz, French Master, Given Here for First Time.

Seldom is it possible for a management to substitute one popular idol for another at short notice, but the announcement that Mme. Schumann-Heink was ill in Chicago and unable to fill her engagement to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert in Infantry Hall last evening, contained also the news that in her place Fritz Kreisler, the eminent Austrian violinist, would play.

Probably no other soloist would have been able to compensate for the immeasurable regret felt for the absence of the beloved contralto; certainly no instrumentalist other than Mr. Kreisler could have won so spontaneous a welcome.

Added to the recognition always accorded to the favorite violinist was the warmth of greeting to one returned from the jaws of death, and as Mr. Kreisler stood waiting for the rolling waves of applause to subside, he must have been assured of his firm hold on the affection of music lovers in this city.

Of his performance of Mendelssohn's Concerto in E-minor, it seems futile to attempt to speak adequately. All the beauty of tone, brilliancy of technique and humanity of expression with which the public has become familiar in his playing, was evident, for which the sentiment brought about by the thought of what might have been gave an additional capacity for appreciation.

The concerto is a familiar one to concertgoers here, but every one knows the hold that old melodies have upon the heart, and the symmetrical structure and exquisite orchestration of the composition were never more beautifully demonstrated than in the performance last evening.

Mr. Kreisler in faultless tones expressed the individuality of thought and style in every phrase of the composer, perfectly supported by the orchestra under Dr. Muck in the passionate strains of the first movement, through the beautiful andante to the rippling vivacity of the finale.

The large audience gave expression to its undeniable satisfaction by applause so sustained that it kept Mr. Kreisler bowing his acknowledgment for a considerable space of time. Four times he was recalled after he had left the stage, before the resumption of the programme which in its proper sequence was as follows:

Schumann.....Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81
Ropartz......Symphony No. 4, C-major (played without pause).
First time in Providence.
Brahms......Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56a.
Mendelssohn-Bartholdy..Concerto in E-minor, for Violin, Op. 64.
I. Allegro molto appassionato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegretto non troppo, Allegro molto vivace.
Wagner...............Overture, "Tannhauser"

If the public has clamored for novelty as well as for variety, both were accorded last evening, in the foregoing programme,; each of the composers represented, standing for a distinct form of musical utterance in the last century or more.

The overtures with which the programme began and ended were as different as the men by whom they were written, but were equally well played, the Tannhauser overture in its grandeur, offering a fitting anti-climax.

Of the Ropartz symphony it is difficult to speak with authority since eminent critics disagreed at its earliest productions. The composer, Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz, born in France in 1864, was, at the age of 30, nominated director of the Conservatory of Music at Nancy, France, a position he still holds.

The symphony, composed in 1910, was played for the first time from manuscript in Paris, Oct. 15, 1911. Boston heard it first played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in October of this year, and in November, the Philharmonic Society, under Josef Stransky, played it in New York.

Ropartz, called by Vincent d'Indy, "a born symphonic writer," is one of the true pupils of Cesar Franck, under whom he studied after 1872.

He has shown himself faithful to his master, although critics, as has been said, disagree as to his inspiration and individuality. The symphony in three movements, connected without obvious breaks, was played without pause, and differs from the classical model in the manner of its development and thematic treatment.

To one who looked seriously for beauty, there was much to be found in the underlying themes suggestive of French folk-song, though often overborne by the overwhelming dissonances. Its conviction and sincerity lead one to believe that the composer was influenced by some underlying poetic idea. But if so he kept it to himself and gave no suggestion of it in the title. It quite vividly conveyed to the imaginative a sense of an outdoor concourse, with little threads of melody heard at intervals, and then lost in an overpowering clamor of various moods.

The "cyclic" formula was followed with contrasts and interplay, through the ascents and descents of musical measures and delicately incisive melodies, but in less systematic manner than employed by Cesar Franck.

In the hands of Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra its interpretation was what it should be, and as the seeker finds what he looks for, those who looked for beauty did not go unsatisfied, although its rhythms and harmonies were not for those who had been conventionally brought up.

To them there could have been no greater contrast than was afforded in the opening measures of the "chorale" theme by Josef Haydn, which followed the symphony. Its simple dignity was impressively set forth before it was intricately embroidered and ingeniuously interwoven with the individuality of Brahms in his "Variations."

The composer had a fondness for variations on the themes of other composers, as it he recognized the unused possibilities in them and desired to give them new life by his ingenuity in presenting the material in new aspects, and the eight variations on Haydn's theme with finale afforded an appreciable addition to last evening's programme, which was of somewhat unusual length.

The fourth concert, for which the soloist has not yet been announced, will be given on Tuesday evening, Feb. 2.

A. W. C.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

Estab

sale by all markets and groceries.

MME. SCHUMAN-HINK ILL.

Fritz Kreisler, Violinist, to Take Her Place at Symphony Concert.

Mme. Schaumann-Heink will be unable to appear as soloist at the third Boston Sympohny Concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening and her place will be taken by Fritz Kreisler, the great Austrian violinist. C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra received word yesterday from the great contralto that she is ill in Chicago and can neither sing at her recital to-morrow in Sympthony Hall, Boston, nor with the Symphony Orchestra here. Mr. Ellis immediately gotinto communication with Mr. Kreisler in New York and secured his consent to act as substitute.

Naturally the illnes of Mme. Schaumann-Heink will cause some ldisappointment. On the other hand it will give Providence an unexpected chance to hear the great Kreisler, who otherwise would not have played here this year. He will play the Mendelssohn Concerto. The orchestral numbers remain unchanged.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date JAN 1

Estab

Dr. Muck and Fritz Kreisler in Concert

Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Fritz Kreisler, violinist, joined hands yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, to the delight and delectation of an enormous audience.

The famous conductor led his musicians in Beethoven's exquisite Eighth Symphony, the overture to Schumann's opera, "Genoveva," and Christmas music by Bach and Liszt.

The great Kreisler, looking ruddier and stronger than at his earlier appearances this year, played Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish airs.

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date JAN 1

Es

1884

UNUSUAL PROGRAMME BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony Given—Kreisler as Soloist.

It was a programme in distinct contrast to those presented during his last appearance in New York which Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony, played before the usual crowded house in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Fritz Kreisler, as soloist, presented Bruch's Fantasie on Scottish Airs, for violin and orchestra, op. 46. It was a piece of comparative unimportance, although it was invested with much charm under Kreisler's vigorous bow.

Beethoven's Eighth symphony was the opening number and if the superlative Boston organization can be said to play one Beethoven symphony better than another, it must certainly be the eighth. Although this work is not Beethoven at his best, it nevertheless assumes a new dignity when Dr. Muck takes it in hand.

Entirely different in character were the following numbers: Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, the "Shepherd's Music" from Bach's Christmas oratorio and the "March of the Three Holy Kings" from the Liszt oratorio, "Christus."

Needless to say, whatever of beauty and power and eloquence is inherent in these works was brought out under Dr. Muck's baton.

After the Bruch Fantasie, Kreisler had to limp out on the platform many times to satisfy the enthusiastic crowd, who lingered in the hope of an encore

---

Most Comp
ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the W
TIMES

Address: New York City
Date JAN 1

Esta

1884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Mr. Kreisler Again Soloist at the Second Concert.

The matinée concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday had a reminder of the recent Christmas season in two numbers of the programme—the Pastoral Symphony from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" and "The March of the Three Holy Kings," from Liszt's oratorio of "Christus." Bach's music was exquisitely played in a spirit of lovely tenderness and introspection. Liszt's march is not a very significant piece; the invention had something of Liszt's characteristic mediocrity, and there is repetition in it that makes wearisome what would otherwise be a tolerable fragment.

Besides these there was Schumann's nobly beautiful overture to his own opera of "Genoveva," and the symphony was Beethoven's eighth. Mr. Kreisler was again the soloist. He played Bruch's Fantasie on Scottish Airs, Op. 46, with robust spirit and tender feeling, with much tonal beauty and vigorous rhythm. The audience was again enormous, as large as the hall could accommodate, and there was deep appreciation and understanding of the orchestra's fine achievements and Dr. Muck's masterly conducting, as well as for Mr. Kreisler.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 6 - 1915

Boston Symphony Yesterday.

Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, was given an ovation upon his appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon. His number was Max Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Airs." The orchestral numbers, rendered under, the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, were "Beethoven's Eigth Symphony," the Schumann overture to "Genoveva" and Brahms' "Variations on a Theme of Haydn." A large audience was present, with many standing.

, 1884

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 9 - 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY, WITH KREISLER AS SOLOIST

rk, 1884

Back from the war, pale and nervous, but an even greater master of his instrument than before, Fritz Kreisler acknowledged an ovation at the Academy of Music last night when he raised his bow to play Mendelssohn's Concerto for Violin in E minor, with Dr. Karl Muck's Boston Symphony accompanying. The work has been heard here so often, and by so many interpreters, that comparisons become permissible. There is not another of the violin's great who possesses the supreme ability to endow the concerto's mellow Andante with the spark of virility. We have heard the Allegro molte appassionata with as much emotional expression and the Allegretto non troppo and its mate, the Allegro molto vivace, with as much verve and technique. But it was the Andante that stood out as the evening's masterpiece; as a separate creation, as it were, that changed musical sentimentality into powerful appeal and mere melody into a message. Kreisler, still young and evidently still rising, has even now mastered all the specialties which, singly only, belong to one or another of his rivals. Perfect bowing, the tone absolute, unfailing directness in expression and nuancing—they are all his. What will be his next achievement?

The dignified Dr. Muck was in his own element with the two preceding orchestral numbers. Beethoven's "Eroica," over a hundred years old, and still the subject of discussion and analysis, began the concert. That it is not as dramatic as some of his other great symphonies, despite its Napoleonic theme, gave Dr. Muck the opportunity to remain faithful to traditional interpretation and refrain from the search after special effects, which is rather the rule in latter-day readings. The perfection of his strings came to full demonstration in the Allegro molto (Finale), while his chorus of sonorous wood-winds spelled impressive tragedy in the second movement's Funeral March. It would probably be unfair to say that, individually, the artists of the Boston stand on a higher plane than those of other orchestras. But in their ensemble work, in the absolute unity of their purpose and unfailing devotion to the spirit of their leader's conceptions, they stand alone.

Brahms' difficult and highly artistic variations on a theme by Haydn, formed the central portion of the programme. Taken from an unpublished collection of divertimenti for wind instruments by Haydn—to quote the annotator—the original score is entitled "Chorale St. Antoni." Haydn wrote the theme about 1782, and Brahms wrote the variations almost a century later. There are eight of them and a finale, divided by pauses of less than a minute each. There is not one but abounds in phrases of beauty and distinction and not one that does not impose some special Brahmsian difficulty upon the players. The rendition throughout was scholarly.

Last night's audience filled the house—a rare testimonial to the Bostonians in these times of musical hardship, and the musicians behind the banks of palms and flowers must have felt a gratifying sense of security from the storms of the present season.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date JAN 11 1915

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Kreisler with Boston Orchestra.

1884

At the Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday afternoon, Fritz Kreisler played Max Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Airs," in which four melodies are introduced: "Auld Robert Morris," "There Was a Lad," "Who'll Buy My Caller Herrin'," and "Scots wha hae." It does not necessarily follow that a violinist who plays old Italian airs, or modern Viennese and Bohemian melodies entrancingly, will be equally happy with these Gaelic ditties, but Mr. Kreisler brought out their peculiar charms as eloquently as if he had worn kilts and played a bagpipe all his life. The orchestral programme included Beethoven's eighth—the "little" symphony, as he called it, in which Dr. Muck does not seem to be very much interested. At any rate, the first three movements were played in a rather perfunctory manner. The final allegro vivace, however, made amends, and the orchestra and its conductor were at their best in the remaining numbers: Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, the Shepherd's music from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," and the March of the Three Holy Kings from Liszt's oratorio,

---

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date JAN 8 - 1915

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Kreisler and the Boston Orchestra.

When Mendelssohn's violin concerto had its first performance (Leipzig, March 13, 1845), Schumann is said to have remarked to Ferdinand David, the famous violinist who played it (and who also had added several to the list of concertos): "There, my dear David, we have at last the concerto you have so long been trying to compose!"

Seventy years is a long time for a concerto to live, but Mendelssohn's has stood the test of time well. Some of its ornamental trimmings may be antiquated (David had a hand in those), but its abundance of lovely melody makes the work of perennial interest. It seems hackneyed, of course, to regular concert-goers, but when it is played by Fritz Kreisler, as it was at Carnegie Hall last night, even that reproach is taken from it. He could make the C major scale sound poetic; he even succeeded in taking out of the final movement the taint of triviality which often mars Mendelssohn's rondos. He gave the andante the charm of real bel canto, and made of the first movement a genuine "allegro molto appassionato," as prescribed by the composer. His number came at the end, and the tumultuous applause lasted long after the orchestra had left the stage. Although there was no piano, the audience hoped to hear him play more—perhaps his new "Introduction and Scherzo" for violin alone; but in vain.

In the last movement of the concerto the orchestral accompaniment lacked precision, but everything else was done admirably, not only in the concerto, but in the numbers for orchestra alone, which were Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and Wagner's "Faust Overture" and "Siegfried Idyl." The contrast between the sombre "Faust in Solitude," as Wagner called his overture, and the sunny "Idyl," which so exquisitely uses the most gloriously melody in the last act of the "Siegfried" drama, was well brought out by Dr. Muck, for he has entered deeply into the spirit of Wagner's creations, having long been one of the chosen ones at Bayreuth.

A German lexicographer a century ago wrote of Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony as "overpoweringly great, fiery, perfect, pathetic, sublime." To us, who know our Beethoven, Tchaikovsky, and other masters of the nineteenth century, the words "fiery," "pathetic," and "sublime" seem ludicrously inapplicable to Mozart's merry work; but that it is "perfect" in its own way is undeniable. Sir Hubert Parry has succeeded in finding in the slow movement (slow for Mozart) "in parts, a considerable degree of passion, which brings it nearer to human sympathy than the other movements"; for, as he justly remarks, a "shade of sadness . . . is an element almost indispensable to strong human sympathy." The orchestra, under Dr. Muck's guidance, played this symphony so admirably that the players were applauded till they got up to bow, as also after the "Siegfried Idyl."

GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date JAN 8

Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

What an extraordinary maker of programmes is Dr. Muck! One week we are treated to so heavy a dose of so-called new music that subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York write letters of expostulation and exhortation, making heavy the mail of the writers on musical subjects for the daily journals, and on the next visit of the orchestra dolls and hobby-horses are trotted out, petted toys of the musical nursery. We should, of course, be grateful for more novelties. Why not an interesting one, like the pieces of Arnold Schoenberg recently played in Boston? It becomes more and more evident that Schoenberg will not be heard in New York until he is as old-fashioned as Richard Strauss. In time he will probably be praised as the last of the great melodists. Meanwhile there is Mendelssohn-Bartholdy.

This composer, save for the violin concerto, and an oratorio or two, belongs as much to the cafés now as, say, Irving Berlin. To make up for the neglect of the symphonies and piano pieces, the concerto is played somewhere or other in New York probably on an average of once a week. However, it is pretty music, and there is an excuse for a perfect performance of it. Herr Kreisler had élan in his bow last night, and he almost put soul and brain into the work, just as Sarah Bernhardt has often fashioned a tragedy out of a threadbare melodrama. And of course it would seem that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only band in America which ever takes the trouble to rehearse the "accompaniment" to a concerto. It may seem ridiculous to put it down in black and white that Dr. Muck found new beauties in the score, but the facts were there. Cunning counter-themes were mercilessly exposed.

The programme began with an enchanting performance of Mozart's Jupiter symphony, which, of course, is noble music, in the sense that the Parthenon is noble architecture. Dr. Muck and his men consecrated the composer's intention in noble sound. In the middle of the evening two pieces by Wagner were played, the "Siegfried Idyl," which was first performed, we believe, under the window of Richard Wagner's Cosima shortly after her hero-named son was born, and the "Faust" overture, which is so seldom played that it would seem almost a novelty were it not for the fact that Wagner freely repeated himself as well as other composers.

And this is a reminder that Dr. Muck has recently given Boston a revised version of Liszt's "Faust" symphony. The revisions were made by the composer himself, but we believe that the music has not been vouchsafed to New York in this edition. Composers sometimes do better when they rewrite their works (witness the several overtures which Beethoven composed for "Fidelio").

Carnegie Hall, of course, was packed last evening, and the applause was frequent and hearty. Herr Kreisler's entrance was the occasion for an especial greeting.

From HERALD
Address: New York City JAN 9 - 1915
Date

BOSTON MUSICIANS HEAR PHILHARMONIC

k, 1884

Members of Symphony Orchestra Attend Concert Given by Rival Organization.

It is seldom that the Philharmonic Society gives a concert while the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in New York and, taking advantage of a chance to hear a rival organization, many members of the Boston orchestra were seen at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, where the Philharmonic orchestra played a programme from Beethoven and Schumann. The only thing that approached novelty was Beethoven's Triple Concerto, opus 56, for piano, violin, 'cello and orchestra. Miss Germaine Schnitzer played the piano part and the other performers were from the orchestra, Mr. Maximilian Pilzer, violinist, and Mr. Leo Schultz, 'cellist. While the ensemble playing was not always smooth and the work itself is not one of the best of Beethoven—even a great composer sometimes falls below his high average—it did give much enjoyment.

The Beethoven overtures, "Coriolanus" and "Leonore" No. 3, were heard and the symphony was the first of Schumann, called often the "Spring Symphony." It is a beautiful work and it is one well suited tot the temperament of its conductor, Mr. Josef Stransky.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. JAN 1915
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMME RECITAL

, 1884

The programme to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the opera house of the Academy of Music, this evening, was considered in detail by Daniel Gregory Mason in an explanatory recital given in lecture hall last night under Brooklyn Institute auspices. Mr. Mason took up first the symphony, Beethoven's famous "Eroica" symphony, and devoted the first part of his programme to the first movement, the allegro con brio, analyzing each theme and pointing out characteristic rythms. This movement shows particularly the great pains and conscientiousness with which Beethoven always worked, he said, and he illustrated how the themes reveal Beethoven's power of evolving something exquisitely beautiful out of what at first appears commonplace. Beethoven unified all materials that came to him in a wonderful way.

Mr. Mason played the first movement throughout, but for the remainder of the symphony played only the themes of the second or funeral march, the scherzo, and the finale. The finale Mr. Mason described as a set of variations applied in a peculiar way, and he showed how in this Beethoven has taken the bass rather than the melody as the [illegible] for his variations, producing [illegible] elevated

---

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 7 1915

KREISLER WARMLY RECEIVED AT LYRIC

rk, 1884

Enthusiastic Reception Given Violinist at Boston Symphony Concert.

With Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as special soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave the third of its local concerts of the season at the Lyric last night. The attendance was quite good in spite of the rain. Kreisler's reception was enthusiastic.

Ropartz' symphony No. 4, in C major, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in Baltimore, is a most interesting work—interesting of itself, outside of the fact that its composer was a pupil of the wonderful Cesar Franck, who was born in Belgium and lived and worked so long in France. It was by far the most enjoyable music of the concert. At first hearing, no part of it is as striking as the opening. Later parts, indeed, drag somewhat—due in some measure, perhaps, to the continuous construction of the work. Nevertheless, the music—generally speaking—is so rich, so sweet and pleasant, so satisfying, as to produce an effect of comfort from which one parts with reluctance.

Compared with Richard Wagner's mature works, his Faust Overture, which opened the concert last night, contains little which would suggest him as its author. It is rather wan music. In consideration of what he did for music afterward, it is amusing that he intended in this early composition to portray a soul weary of life.

A long Beethoven concerto at the end of the concert was quite enough of Beethoven for one concert without prefacing it with his Egmont overture. This overture is heard more than often enough in Baltimore, anyhow, considering all the good orchestral literature which never is heard here—and some of which other cities do hear. The overture at this time served admirably to tax the attention one wished to give the concerto. It is hard enough to awaken real general interest in a single antique without increasing the number at the same time.

Kreisler played the concerto well, and seemed to endure the long strain succssfully. He showed his remarkable capabilities in many ways, especially in the unaccompanied double-note passages. His tone was firm and prompt. He earned the prolonged applause he received.

I. N. H.

[98]

Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

Boston Symphony Yesterday.

Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, was given an ovation upon his appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon. His number was Max Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Airs." The orchestral numbers, rendered under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, were "Beethoven's Eigth Symphony," the Schumann overture to "Genoveva" and Brahms' "Variations on a Theme of Haydn." A large audience was present, with many standing.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN [illegible] - 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY, WITH KREISLER AS SOLOIST

Back from the war, pale and nervous, but an even greater master of his instrument than before, Fritz Kreisler acknowledged an ovation at the Academy of Music last night when he raised his bow to play Mendelssohn's Concerto for Violin in E minor, with Dr. Karl Muck's Boston Symphony accompanying. The work has been heard here so often, and by so many interpreters, that comparisons become permissible. There is not another of the violin's great who possesses the supreme ability to endow the concerto's mellow Andante with the spark of virility. We have heard the Allegro molte appassionata with as much emotional expression and the Allegretto non troppo and its mate, the Allegro molto vivace, with as much verve and technique. But it was the Andante that stood out as the evening's masterpiece; as a separate creation, as it were, that changed musical sentimentality into powerful appeal and mere melody into a message. Kreisler, still young and evidently still rising, has even now mastered all the specialties which, singly only, belong to one or another of his rivals. Perfect bowing, the tone absolute, unfailing directness in expression and nuancing—they are all his. What will be his next achievement?

The dignified Dr. Muck was in his own element with the two preceding orchestral numbers. Beethoven's "Eroica," over a hundred years old, and still the subject of discussion and analysis, began the concert. That it is not as dramatic as some of his other great symphonies, despite its Napoleonic theme, gave Dr. Muck the opportunity to remain faithful to traditional interpretation and refrain from the search after special effects, which is rather the rule in latter-day readings. The perfection of his strings came to full demonstration in the Allegro molto (Finale), while his chorus of sonorous wood-winds spelled impressive tragedy in the second movement's Funeral March. It would probably be unfair to say that, individually, the artists of the Boston stand on a higher plane than those of other orchestras. But in their ensemble work, in the absolute unity of their purpose and unfailing devotion to the spirit of their leader's conceptions, they stand alone.

Brahms' difficult and highly artistic variations on a theme by Haydn, formed the central portion of the programme. Taken from an unpublished collection of divertimenti for wind instruments by Haydn—to quote the annotator—the original score is entitled "Chorale St. Antoni." Haydn wrote the theme about 1782, and Brahms wrote the variations almost a century later. There are eight of them and a finale, divided by pauses of less than a minute each. There is not one but abounds in phrases of beauty and distinction and not one that does not impose some special Brahmsian difficulty upon the players. The rendition throughout was scholarly.

Last night's audience filled the house—a rare testimonial to the Bostonians in these times of musical hardship, and the musicians behind the banks of palms and flowers must have felt a gratifying sense of security from the storms of the present season.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City JAN 11 1915
Date

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Kreisler with Boston Orchestra.

At the Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday afternoon, Fritz Kreisler played Max Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Airs," in which four melodies are introduced: "Auld Robert Morris," "There Was a Lad," "Who'll Buy My Caller Herrin'," and "Scots wha hae." It does not necessarily follow that a violinist who plays old Italian airs, or modern Viennese and Bohemian melodies entrancingly, will be equally happy with these Gaelic ditties, but Mr. Kreisler brought out their peculiar charms as eloquently as if he had worn kilts and played a bagpipe all his life. The orchestral programme included Beethoven's eighth—the "little" symphony, as he called it, in which Dr. Muck does not seem to be very much interested. At any rate, the first three movements were played in a rather perfunctory manner. The final allegro vivace, however, made amends, and the orchestra and its conductor were at their best in the remaining numbers: Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, the Shepherd's music from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," and the March of the Three Holy Kings from Liszt's oratorio, [illegible]

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date JAN 8 - 1915

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Kreisler and the Boston Orchestra.

When Mendelssohn's violin concerto had its first performance (Leipzig, March 13, 1845), Schumann is said to have remarked to Ferdinand David, the famous violinist who played it (and who also had added several to the list of concertos): "There, my dear David, we have at last the concerto you have so long been trying to compose!"

Seventy years is a long time for a concerto to live, but Mendelssohn's has stood the test of time well. Some of its ornamental trimmings may be antiquated (David had a hand in those), but its abundance of lovely melody makes the work of perennial interest. It seems hackneyed, of course, to regular concert-goers, but when it is played by Fritz Kreisler, as it was at Carnegie Hall last night, even that reproach is taken from it. He could make the C major scale sound poetic; he even succeeded in taking out of the final movement the taint of triviality which often mars Mendelssohn's rondos. He gave the andante the charm of real bel canto, and made of the first movement a genuine "allegro molto appassionato," as prescribed by the composer. His number came at the end, and the tumultuous applause lasted long after the orchestra had left the stage. Although there was no piano, the audience hoped to hear him play more—perhaps his new "Introduction and Scherzo" for violin alone; but in vain.

In the last movement of the concerto the orchestral accompaniment lacked precision, but everything else was done admirably, not only in the concerto, but in the numbers for orchestra alone, which were Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and Wagner's "Faust Overture" and "Siegfried Idyl." The contrast between the sombre "Faust in Solitude," as Wagner called his overture, and the sunny "Idyl," which so exquisitely uses the most gloriously melody in the last act of the "Siegfried" drama, was well brought out by Dr. Muck, for he has entered deeply into the spirit of Wagner's creations, having long been one of the chosen ones at Bayreuth.

A German lexicographer a century ago wrote of Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony as "overpoweringly great, fiery, perfect, pathetic, sublime." To us, who know our Beethoven, Tchaikovsky, and other masters of the nineteenth century, the words "fiery," "pathetic," and "sublime" seem ludicrously inapplicable to Mozart's merry work; but that it is "perfect" in its own way is undeniable. Sir Hubert Parry has succeeded in finding in the slow movement (slow for Mozart) "in parts, a considerable degree of passion, which brings it nearer to human sympathy than the other movements"; for, as he justly remarks, a "shade of sadness . . . is an element almost indispensable to strong human sympathy." The orchestra, under Dr. Muck's guidance, played this symphony so admirably that the players were applauded till they got up to bow, as also after the "Siegfried Idyl."

GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date

Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

What an extraordinary maker of programmes is Dr. Muck! One week we are treated to so heavy a dose of so-called new music that subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York write letters of expostulation and exhortation, making heavy the mail of the writers on musical subjects for the daily journals, and on the next visit of the orchestra dolls and hobby-horses are trotted out, petted toys of the musical nursery. We should, of course, be grateful for more novelties. Why not an interesting one, like the pieces of Arnold Schoenberg recently played in Boston? It becomes more and more evident that Schoenberg will not be heard in New York until he is as old-fashioned as Richard Strauss. In time he will probably be praised as the last of the great melodists. Meanwhile there is Mendelssohn-Bartholdy.

This composer, save for the violin concerto, and an oratorio or two, belongs as much to the cafés now as, say, Irving Berlin. To make up for the neglect of the symphonies and piano pieces, the concerto is played somewhere or other in New York probably on an average of once a week. However, it is pretty music, and there is an excuse for a perfect performance of it. Herr Kreisler had élan in his bow last night, and he almost put soul and brain into the work, just as Sarah Bernhardt has often fashioned a tragedy out of a threadbare melodrama. And of course it would seem that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only band in America which ever takes the trouble to rehearse the "accompaniment" to a concerto. It may seem ridiculous to put it down in black and white that Dr. Muck found new beauties in the score, but the facts were there. Cunning counter-themes were mercilessly exposed.

The programme began with an enchanting performance of Mozart's Jupiter symphony, which, of course, is noble music, in the sense that the Parthenon is noble architecture. Dr. Muck and his men consecrated the composer's intention in noble sound. In the middle of the evening two pieces by Wagner were played, the "Siegfried Idyl," which was first performed, we believe, under the window of Richard Wagner's Cosima shortly after her hero-named son was born, and the "Faust" overture, which is so seldom played that it would seem almost a novelty were it not for the fact that Wagner freely repeated himself as well as other composers.

And this is a reminder that Dr. Muck has recently given Boston a revised version of Liszt's "Faust" symphony. The revisions were made by the composer himself, but we believe that the music has not been vouchsafed to New York in this edition. Composers sometimes do better when they rewrite their works (witness the several overtures which Beethoven composed for "Fidelio").

Carnegie Hall, of course, was packed last evening, and the applause was frequent and hearty. Herr Kreisler's entrance was the occasion [illegible] an especial greeting.

From HERALD
Address: New York City JAN 9 - 1915
Date

BOSTON MUSICIANS HEAR PHILHARMONIC

Members of Symphony Orchestra Attend Concert Given by Rival Organization.

It is seldom that the Philharmonic Society gives a concert while the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in New York and, taking advantage of a chance to hear a rival organization, many members of the Boston orchestra were seen at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, where the Philharmonic orchestra played a programme from Beethoven and Schumann. The only thing that approached novelty was Beethoven's Triple Concerto, opus 56, for piano, violin, 'cello and orchestra. Miss Germaine Schnitzer played the piano part and the other performers were from the orchestra, Mr. Maximilian Pilzer, violinist, and Mr. Leo Schultz, 'cellist. While the ensemble playing was not always smooth and the work itself is not one of the best of Beethoven—even a great composer sometimes falls below his high average—it did give much enjoyment.

The Beethoven overtures, "Coriolanus" and "Leonore" No. 3, were heard and the symphony was the first of Schumann, called often the "Spring Symphony." It is a beautiful work and it is one well suited tot the temperament of its conductor, Mr. Josef Stransky.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMME RECITAL

The programme to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the opera house of the Academy of Music, this evening, was considered in detail by Daniel Gregory Mason in an explanatory recital given in lecture hall last night under Brooklyn Institute auspices. Mr. Mason took up first the symphony, Beethoven's famous "Eroica" symphony, and devoted the first part of his programme to the first movement, the allegro con brio, analyzing each theme and pointing out characteristic rythms. This movement shows particularly the great pains and conscientiousness with which Beethoven always worked, he said, and he illustrated how the themes reveal Beethoven's power of evolving something exquisitely beautiful out of what at first appears commonplace. Beethoven unified all materials that came to him in a wonderful way.

Mr. Mason played the first movement throughout, but for the remainder of the symphony played only the themes of the second or funeral march, the scherzo, and the finale. The finale Mr. Mason described as a set of variations applied in a peculiar way, and he showed how in this Beethoven has taken the bass rather than the melody as the [illegible] for his variations, producing [illegible] and elevated

---

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date [illegible] 1915

KREISLER WARMLY RECEIVED AT LYRIC

Enthusiastic Reception Given Violinist at Boston Symphony Concert.

With Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as special soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave the third of its local concerts of the season at the Lyric last night. The attendance was quite good in spite of the rain. Kreisler's reception was enthusiastic.

Ropartz' symphony No. 4, in C major, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in Baltimore, is a most interesting work—interesting of itself, outside of the fact that its composer was a pupil of the wonderful Cesar Franck, who was born in Belgium and lived and worked so long in France. It was by far the most enjoyable music of the concert. At first hearing, no part of it is as striking as the opening. Later parts, indeed, drag somewhat—due in some measure, perhaps, to the continuous construction of the work. Nevertheless, the music—generally speaking—is so rich, so sweet and pleasant, so satisfying, as to produce an effect of comfort from which one parts with reluctance.

Compared with Richard Wagner's mature works, his Faust Overture, which opened the concert last night, contains little which would suggest him as its author. It is rather wan music. In consideration of what he did for music afterward, it is amusing that he intended in this early composition to portray a soul weary of life.

A long Beethoven concerto at the end of the concert was quite enough of Beethoven for one concert without prefacing it with his Egmont overture. This overture is heard more than often enough in Baltimore, anyhow, considering all the good orchestral literature which never is heard here—and some of which other cities do hear. The overture at this time served admirably to tax the attention one wished to give the concerto. It is hard enough to awaken real general interest in a single antique without increasing the number at the same time.

Kreisler played the concerto well, and seemed to endure the long strain successfully. He showed his remarkable capabilities in many ways, especially in the unaccompanied double-note passages. His tone was firm and prompt. He earned the prolonged applause he received.

J. N. H.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

Boston Symphony Yesterday.

Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, was given an ovation upon his appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon. His number was Max Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Airs." The orchestral numbers, rendered under, the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, were "Beethoven's Eigth Symphony," the Schumann overture to "Genoveva" and Brahms' "Variations on a Theme of Haydn." A large audience was present, with many standing.

1884

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 8 - 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY, WITH KREISLER AS SOLOIST

Back from the war, pale and nervous, but an even greater master of his instrument than before, Fritz Kreisler acknowledged an ovation at the Academy of Music last night when he raised his bow to play Mendelssohn's Concerto for Violin in E minor, with Dr. Karl Muck's Boston Symphony accompanying. The work has been heard here so often, and by so many interpreters, that comparisons become permissible. There is not another of the violin's great who possesses the supreme ability to endow the concerto's mellow Andante with the spark of virility. We have heard the Allegro molte appassionata with as much emotional expression and the Allegretto non troppo and its mate, the Allegro molto vivace, with as much verve and technique. But it was the Andante that stood out as the evening's masterpiece; as a separate creation, as it were, that changed musical sentimentality into powerful appeal and mere melody into a message. Kreisler, still young and evidently still rising, has even now mastered all the specialties which, singly only, belong to one or another of his rivals. Perfect bowing, the tone absolute, unfailing directness in expression and nuancing—they are all his. What will be his next achievement?

The dignified Dr. Muck was in his own element with the two preceding orchestral numbers. Beethoven's "Eroica," over a hundred years old, and still the subject of discussion and analysis, began the concert. That it is not as dramatic as some of his other great symphonies, despite its Napoleonic theme, gave Dr. Muck the opportunity to remain faithful to traditional interpretation and refrain from the search after special effects, which is rather the rule in latter-day readings. The perfection of his strings came to full demonstration in the Allegro molto (Finale), while his chorus of sonorous wood-winds spelled impressive tragedy in the second movement's Funeral March. It would probably be unfair to say that, individually, the artists of the Boston stand on a higher plane than those of other orchestras. But in their ensemble work, in the absolute unity of their purpose and unfailing devotion to the spirit of their leader's conceptions, they stand alone.

Brahms' difficult and highly artistic variations on a theme by Haydn, formed the central portion of the programme. Taken from an unpublished collection of divertimenti for wind instruments by Haydn—to quote the annotator—the original score is entitled "Chorale St. Antoni." Haydn wrote the theme about 1782, and Brahms wrote the variations almost a century later. There are eight of them and a finale, divided by pauses of less than a minute each. There is not one but abounds in phrases of beauty and distinction and not one that does not impose some special Brahmsian difficulty upon the players. The rendition throughout was scholarly.

Last night's audience filled the house—a rare testimonial to the Bostonians in these times of musical hardship, and the musicians behind the banks of palms and flowers must have felt a gratifying sense of security from the storms of the present season.

rk, 1884

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City JAN 11 1915
Date

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Kreisler with Boston Orchestra.

At the Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday afternoon, Fritz Kreisler played Max Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Airs," in which four melodies are introduced: "Auld Robert Morris," "There Was a Lad," "Who'll Buy My Caller Herrin'," and "Scots wha hae." It does not necessarily follow that a violinist who plays old Italian airs, or modern Viennese and Bohemian melodies entrancingly, will be equally happy with these Gaelic ditties, but Mr. Kreisler brought out their peculiar charms as eloquently as if he had worn kilts and played a bagpipe all his life. The orchestral programme included Beethoven's eighth—the "little" symphony, as he called it, in which Dr. Muck does not seem to be very much interested. At any rate, the first three movements were played in a rather perfunctory manner. The final allegro vivace, however, made amends, and the orchestra and its conductor were at their best in the remaining numbers: Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, the Shepherd's music from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," and the March of the Three Holy Kings from Liszt's oratorio, "Christus," which is not one of his most inspired works, yet contains much that is of interest. In the Bach piece the oboes proclaim an exquisite melody which brings tears to the eyes. It should be 1884

MUSIC AND DR

Kreisler and the Boston Orchestra.

When Mendelssohn's violin concerto had its first performance (Leipzig, March 13, 1845), Schumann is said to have remarked to Ferdinand David, the famous violinist who played it (and who also had added several to the list of concertos): "There, my dear David, we have at last the concerto you have so long been trying to compose!"

Seventy years is a long time for a concerto to live, but Mendelssohn's has stood the test of time well. Some of its ornamental trimmings may be antiquated (David had a hand in those), but its abundance of lovely melody makes the work of perennial interest. It seems hackneyed, of course, to regular concert-goers, but when it is played by Fritz Kreisler, as it was at Carnegie Hall last night, even that reproach is taken from it. He could make the C major scale sound poetic; he even succeeded in taking out of the final movement the taint of triviality which often mars Mendelssohn's rondos. He gave the andante the charm of real bel canto, and made of the first movement a genuine "allegro molto appassionato," as prescribed by the composer. His number came at the end, and the tumultuous applause lasted long after the orchestra had left the stage. Although there was no piano, the audience hoped to hear him play more—perhaps his new "Introduction and Scherzo" for violin alone; but in vain.

In the last movement of the concerto the orchestral accompaniment lacked precision, but everything else was done admirably, not only in the concerto, but in the numbers for orchestra alone, which were Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and Wagner's "Faust Overture" and "Siegfried Idyl." The contrast between the sombre "Faust in Solitude," as Wagner called his overture, and the sunny "Idyl," which so exquisitely uses the most gloriously melody in the last act of the "Siegfried" drama, was well brought out by Dr. Muck, for he has entered deeply into the spirit of Wagner's creations, having long been one of the chosen ones at Bayreuth.

A German lexicographer a century ago wrote of Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony as "overpoweringly great, fiery, perfect, pathetic, sublime." To us, who know our Beethoven, Tchaikovsky, and other masters of the nineteenth century, the words "fiery," "pathetic," and "sublime" seem ludicrously inapplicable to Mozart's merry work; but that it is "perfect" in its own way is undeniable. Sir Hubert Parry has succeeded in finding in the slow movement (slow for Mozart) "in parts, a considerable degree of passion, which brings it nearer to human sympathy than the other movements"; for, as he justly remarks, a "shade of sadness . . . is an element almost indispensable to strong human sympathy." The orchestra, under Dr. Muck's guidance, played this symphony so admirably that the players were applauded till they got up to bow, as also after the "Siegfried Idyl."

GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date JAN 8

Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

What an extraordinary maker of programmes is Dr. Muck! One week we are treated to so heavy a dose of so-called new music that subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York write letters of expostulation and exhortation, making heavy the mail of the writers on musical subjects for the daily journals, and on the next visit of the orchestra dolls and hobby-horses are trotted out, petted toys of the musical nursery. We should, of course, be grateful for more novelties. Why not an interesting one, like the pieces of Arnold Schoenberg recently played in Boston? It becomes more and more evident that Schoenberg will not be heard in New York until he is as old-fashioned as Richard Strauss. In time he will probably be praised as the last of the great melodists. Meanwhile there is Mendelssohn-Bartholdy.

This composer, save for the violin concerto, and an oratorio or two, belongs as much to the cafés now as, say, Irving Berlin. To make up for the neglect of the symphonies and piano pieces, the concerto is played somewhere or other in New York probably on an average of once a week. However, it is pretty music, and there is an excuse for a perfect performance of it. Herr Kreisler had élan in his bow last night, and he almost put soul and brain into the work, just as Sarah Bernhardt has often fashioned a tragedy out of a threadbare melodrama. And of course it would seem that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only band in America which ever takes the trouble to rehearse the "accompaniment" to a concerto. It may seem ridiculous to put it down in black and white that Dr. Muck found new beauties in the score, but the facts were there. Cunning counter-themes were mercilessly exposed.

The programme began with an enchanting performance of Mozart's Jupiter symphony, which, of course, is noble music, in the sense that the Parthenon is noble architecture. Dr. Muck and his men consecrated the composer's intention in noble sound. In the middle of the evening two pieces by Wagner were played, the "Siegfried Idyl," which was first performed, we believe, under the window of Richard Wagner's Cosima shortly after her hero-named son was born, and the "Faust" overture, which is so seldom played that it would seem almost a novelty were it not for the fact that Wagner freely repeated himself as well as other composers.

And this is a reminder that Dr. Muck has recently given Boston a revised version of Liszt's "Faust" symphony. The revisions were made by the composer himself, but we believe that the music has not been vouchsafed to New York in this edition. Composers sometimes do better when they rewrite their works (witness the several overtures which Beethoven composed for "Fidelio").

Carnegie Hall, of course, was packed last evening, and the applause was frequent and hearty. Herr Kreisler's entrance was the occasion for an especial greeting.

ALD
New York City JAN 9 - 1915

BOSTON MUSICIANS HEAR PHILHARMONIC

Members of Symphony Orchestra Attend Concert Given by Rival Organization.

k, 1884

It is seldom that the Philharmonic Society gives a concert while the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in New York and, taking advantage of a chance to hear a rival organization, many members of the Boston orchestra were seen at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, where the Philharmonic orchestra played a programme from Beethoven and Schumann. The only thing that approached novelty was Beethoven's Triple Concerto, opus 56, for piano, violin, 'cello and orchestra. Miss Germaine Schnitzer played the piano part and the other performers were from the orchestra, Mr. Maximilian Pilzer, violinist, and Mr. Leo Schultz, 'cellist. While the ensemble playing was not always smooth and the work itself is not one of the best of Beethoven—even a great composer sometimes falls below his high average—it did give much enjoyment.

The Beethoven overtures, "Coriolanus" and "Leonore" No. 3, were heard and the symphony was the first of Schumann, called often the "Spring Symphony." It is a beautiful work and it is one well suited tot the temperament of its conductor, Mr. Josef Stransky.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. JAN 1915
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMME RECITAL

The programme to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the opera house of the Academy of Music, this evening, was considered in detail by Daniel Gregory Mason in an explanatory recital given in lecture hall last night under Brooklyn Institute auspices. Mr. Mason took up first the symphony, Beethoven's famous "Eroica" symphony, and devoted the first part of his programme to the first movement, the allegro con brio, analyzing each theme and pointing out characteristic rythms. This movement shows particularly the great pains and conscientiousness with which Beethoven always worked, he said, and he illustrated how the themes reveal Beethoven's power of evolving something exquisitely beautiful out of what at first appears commonplace. Beethoven unified all materials that came to him in a wonderful way.

Mr. Mason played the first movement throughout, but for the remainder of the symphony played only the themes of the second or funeral march, the scherzo, and the finale. The finale Mr. Mason described as a set of variations applied in a peculiar way, and he showed how in this Beethoven has taken the bass rather than the melody as the theme for his variations, producing music of a beautiful and elevated character.

, 1884

---

rld

Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 7 1915

KREISLER WARMLY RECEIVED AT LYRIC

Enthusiastic Reception Given Violinist at Boston Symphony Concert.

rk, 1884

With Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as special soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave the third of its local concerts of the season at the Lyric last night. The attendance was quite good in spite of the rain. Kreisler's reception was enthusiastic.

Ropartz' symphony No. 4, in C major, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in Baltimore, is a most interesting work—interesting of itself, outside of the fact that its composer was a pupil of the wonderful Cesar Franck, who was born in Belgium and lived and worked so long in France. It was by far the most enjoyable music of the concert. At first hearing, no part of it is as striking as the opening. Later parts, indeed, drag somewhat—due in some measure, perhaps, to the continuous construction of the work. Nevertheless, the music—generally speaking—is so rich, so sweet and pleasant, so satisfying, as to produce an effect of comfort from which one parts with reluctance.

Compared with Richard Wagner's mature works, his Faust Overture, which opened the concert last night, contains little which would suggest him as its author. It is rather wan music. In consideration of what he did for music afterward, it is amusing that he intended in this early composition to portray a soul weary of life.

A long Beethoven concerto at the end of the concert was quite enough of Beethoven for one concert without prefacing it with his Egmont overture. This overture is heard more than often enough in Baltimore, anyhow, considering all the good orchestral literature which never is heard here—and some of which other cities do hear. The overture at this time served admirably to tax the attention one wished to give the concerto. It is hard enough to awaken real general interest in a single antique without increasing the number at the same time.

Kreisler played the concerto well, and seemed to endure the long strain successfully. He showed his remarkable capabilities in many ways, especially in the unaccompanied double-note passages. His tone was firm and prompt. He earned the prolonged applause he received.

J. N. H.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NEWS

Address Providence, R. I.

Date

Esta

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Wave on wave of enthusiastic loyal plause greeted Fritz Kriesler, the brill and beloved Austrian violinist, just cently returned from his native land the titanic struggle which is devastat the continent of Europe, as he appea before the packed audience in Infant hall at the head of the third Boston Sym phony concert of the winter season in th city.

The brilliant Austrian came to take the place left vacant by the sudden illness of Mme. Schumann-Heink in Chicago, who was to have been present last evening.

But much as the public was disappointed in the loss of the opportunity to hear once again the popular contralto, it was at the same time, and never more so than last night, overjoyed that the master of the violin who played before them last evening was once more able to be present, having escaped the bullets of the enemy at the front.

Never was the violinist of world-wide fame in better condition, and never, so it seemed, did he play with more pathos and skill than last evening, and the memory of what might have been, but for a merciful Something which prevented his being taken away, was a factor which seemed to enter the hearts of all who listened to the strains of such sweetness as it is given an audience to hear but few times in a life time.

Not only was the artist seemingly at his best last evening, but his work was up to his reputation as to technique. His performance of Mendelssohn's concerto in E-minor is beyond an adequate description, and to those who listened it were futile to attempt a description. The appreciation was manifacted in the manner in which the audience left little to be added. All of his work, which was supported by the orchestra, under Dr. Muck, was on a par with his past reputation, and a detailed description of the same would be but a futile attempt to do adequate justice to a man who has endeared himself to the hearts of the local and world-wide theatre-going and music-loving public.

The symphony orchestra itself last night, presenting as it did a varied program, calculated to suit all tastes, held up the rare ideals the Providence musical public have come to expect from it.

The fourth concert, for which the soloist has not yet been announced, will be given on Tuesday evening, Feb. 2.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From HERALD

Address: New York City

Date JAN 1 0 1915

Establ 1884

Mr. Kriesler Discards Violin to Stop Recalls

Even the audience at the Boston Symphony concerts, usually so sedate, was roused to an unwonted pitch of enthusiasm yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall than when Mr. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, again, as on Thursday night, closed the programme with a spirited playing of Bruch's fantasia on Scottish airs.

After repeated recalls the audience insisted on remaining. Finally the artist appeared without his violin, the lights were lowered, and the audience, which had crowded every section of the auditorium left the hall slowly and reluctantly.

Even with a work of no greater distinction than the Bruch fantasia Mr. Kreisler proclaimed himself the consummate artist. Faultless intonation, unfaltering rhythm and the true fire of the artist were revealed in his performance.

There was a belated echo of Christmastide in the programme which Dr. Muck and his players presented, particularly i the Shepherds' music from Bach's Chris mas Oratorio and Liszt's March of th Three Holy Kings from his Christma Oratorio. The overture to Schumann's al most forgotten opera "Genoveva" precede these. It was played admirably.

To many listeners the greatest musica treat of the afternoon was Beethoven Eighth Symphony, with which the conce began. This compact and beautifully wri ten work, so replete with joyous feelin was given by the Boston players wi clarity of enunciation and great unanim ty of expression. Dr. Muck, the conducto gave an unimpeachable reading.

Dr. Muck gave his audience some of the music which he had prepared for his Christmas concerto in Boston a fortnight ago at the matinee in Carnegie Hall yesterday. The third and fourth numbers of the programme were the pastoral symphony from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" and the "March of the Three Kings," from Liszt's "Christus." Before these pieces came Beethoven's eighth symphony and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, and after them Mr. Kreisler played the Scottish Fantasia by Bruch.

A happy idea this in the present case, of putting the solo number last on the programme. Mr. Kreisler, always a favorite with the public here, is this time doubly a hero by virtue of his having been (by report) killed by bomb in Nuremberg, guarded a bri in Vienna, wounded by a Cossack la in the trenches and achieved a numb of other adventures since his count undertook to help Germany in h mighty enterprise. His participati in the concert could not affect the a tendance, which is normally the mea ure of Carnegie Hall, but it could an did quicken the enthusiasm of th listeners. Under the circumstances hi artistic and patriotic admirers were able to indulge their transports of joy at seeing and hearing him to the full without protracting the concert of preventing the musicians from departing for home on schedule time.

What has been said a hundred times about the excellence of the Boston Orchestra's concert might be repeated here; unless Dr. Muck brings new or unfamiliar compositions, reviews of his concerts are all mere variations on an old theme.

H. E. K.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address: New York City

Date JAN

Es

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLA

Fritz Kreisler and Harold

Heard in One Day.

The Boston Symphony Orchestr ducted by Dr. Carl Muck, gave i cert yesterday afternoon at C Hall. The presence of Fritz and the reputation of the orches sured a large attendance. Mr. K masterly style was shown i Bruch's fantasy on Scot's airs, a orchestra was at its best in the Symphony of Beethoven. There from Schumann and Li one of th

---

From

Address: New York City

Date JAN 1 0 1915

Esta 1884

KREISLER PLAYS WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Violinist Gives Brilliant Performance of Bruch's Scotch Fantasia.

The programme offered by Dr. Muck at the matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in Carnegie Hall was of an entirely different selection from that presented at the organization's previous concert on Thursday evening. In plan, however, it again contained a classic symphony followed by music of the romantic and modern schools, and it again presented Fritz Kreisler as soloist.

The symphony was Beethoven's eighth. The other compositions for orchestra were Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, the "Shepherd's Music" from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" and the "March of the Three Holy Kings" from Liszt's oratorio "Christus." The composition played by Mr. Kreisler was Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Airs."

The Beethoven work, "The Little Symphony in F," fitted excellently into the scheme of music arranged for the afternoon's enjoyment. Vivacious in spirit, while clothed in a tonal garb of rare poetic loveliness and color, it never fails when presented with the subtle insight in interpretation asked for by its unique individuality to charm the ear and rest the mind. That it received such a presentation yesterday from the Boston men it is hardly necessary to state. It was one marked by rarest musicianly taste throughout. Lovely tonal qualities, exquisite finish in phrasing and clarity of general melodic lines were qualities among the leading features of the performance that went to make it a joy long to be remembered.

The Schumann overture served well to unite the two divisions of the programme. Thoroughly in the style of its composer, it was performed on a high plane of excellence. Of the Bach and Liszt numbers the hearing of the former met with a warmer response, though the latter, whose significance seems to be first of all in its title rather than music, afforded opportunity for admiring some matchless playing by the strings as well as remarkabl tone balance in the work done by th entire band

Mr. Kreisler's performance of th Scotch fantasy served to arouse new in terest for it. It is a work whose deliver usually must prove to be a thankless un dertaking except for the artist of highe rank. Severest demands in the accom plishment of accuracy of intonation alon serve to put the player to keenest tests a every turn in its playing aside from th many other difficulties in the requiremen of virtuosity that are offered by its scor

Mr. Kreisler approached his task wi a complete ease of manner most attracti to the moment and by the distinction his consummate art gave expressive value to his playing that was wholly remarkable. He played it with beautiful tone, fine accuracy of pitch and he imbued it with poetic feeling of high order. It was a delivery that furthermore contained much brilliant technic, though it delighted first of all by a captivating perfection in the delicacies of finish.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAATS-ZEITUNG

Address: New York City

Date JAN 1

E 1884

Am Samstag Nachmittag fand in Carnegie Hall ein Konzert der Boſtoner mit enthuſiaſtiſchem Erfolg ſtatt. Dr. Muck dirigirte Beethoven's Achte mit Herausholung des ganzen glänzenden Inhalts, namentlich auch des Humors und der feinen Grazie. Schumann's „Genoveva"-Ouverture, Bach's „Paſtorale" aus dem Weihnachts-Oratorium und Liszt's etwas äußerlicher „Marſch der Heiligen drei Könige" aus „Chriſtus" vervollſtändigten die Reihe der Orcheſtervorträge, aus denen ganz beſonders die hinreißend fein geſpielte Bach'ſche Nummer das Entzücken des Publikums erregte. Als Soliſt wirkte Herr Fritz Kreisler mit der unnachamlich friſch und virtuos geſpielten „Schottiſchen [illegible] Max Bruch mit, gefeiert [illegible]

H.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From Daily Eagle,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date JAN 9 - 1915

Est 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Kreisler, Lame in Body, but Mighty in Spirit.

Kreisler is back from the war, much thinner, looking pale and worn and with a decided limp. But, thank heaven, the Russian bayonet missed the violinist's great bow arm, his fingers are not even stiffened and, most important of all, the spirit of the man is unbroken and noble as of old. He proved all those things, last night, at the concert of the Boston [illegible] Academy, here he played the dear old Men elssohn Concerto, not like a soldier, it like a spirit of light. It is hard feel affection for a concerto, the ry qualities of display and difficulty which, in one aspect, concertos are itten tend to arouse wonder and miration while at the same time ey defeat that intimate liking which the root of the love of music. But e Mendelssohn violin concerto is an ception. He put into it melodies t haunt your ear like a Schubert g, and he caressed the violin in a for which violinists will be grate to the end of time. The audience on tiptoe for Kreisler, any way, when he sang that opening elody with the fine, clear, perfect e which is his distinguishing note, it settled back into a vast content, only to be broken by long breaths and feverish applause between the movements.

In the second movement, the feeling got pretty close to tears, so tender is the music and so deep and fine was its interpretation. The third movement reached a point of elegance in delivery which is seldom achieved, even by Kreisler. Mendelssohn's music invokes elegance and, last night, it received its due, and more than its due. At the close, there was an ovation for violinist and orchestra such as is seldom heard in staid Brooklyn. The orchestra players rushed from the stage, apparently to make it clear that Kreisler could not play again, but the audience called the violinist back time after time.

The concert up to that moment had been an excellent preparation. The first fifty-five minutes were filled with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, for inspiring which many of us are inclined to forgive Napoleon most of his sins. If only the man had been as noble as the music Beethoven wrote to celebrate his early ambitions! There are classicists who say that Dr. Muck fails to wake up for some of the old masterpieces, but, last night, they took it back and admitted that he did all that the most fervent Beethovenite could ask in bringing out the delicate shades of feeling and in setting forth the great symphony in all its manifold perfections.

Between the Symphony and the Concerto stood Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," which went to show how much more popular Brahms might have been if he had only let somebody else write his tunes for him. The Haydn tune is lovely and the things Brahms does with it proved interesting, while at the same time they served as a foil for the emotional appeal of the music which preceded and followed. It seems foolish, at this late day, to keep on talking about the playing of the Boston orchestra, but surely a word is due to the men, as well as to Dr. Muck, for the loveliness of that Beethoven and for the beauty of the orchestral part of the Concerto. Kreisler might easily have sounded less perfect with another background.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STANDARD UNION

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date JAN 9 - 1915

shed:

HEARTY WELCOME FOR FRITZ KREISLER

Austrian Violinist, Back From the War, Plays at Academy With Boston Symphony.

CONCERTO SPLENDIDLY DONE

Dr. Muck's Programme Again Inspires Criticism.

With Fritz Kreisler assisting, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night gave its third concert at the Academy of Music. One of the largest audiences of the season was present and made a more brilliant appearance than even on opera nights. Every box was filled, and there were rows of standees.

Kreisler was undoubtedly the magnet that drew the crowd. It was his first appearance in Brooklyn since he returned from the war with a wound in his leg received while fighting as a lieutenant in the Austrian army. His now famous limp was again in evidence as he came on the stage. He was greeted with an ovation the like of which has seldom been accorded to an artist by a Brooklyn audience.

Kreisler played Mendelssohn's concerto for the violin in E minor, the number he had played the previous night in Manhattan. The conclusion of each movement was the signal for enthusiastic applause, and, at the end of the piece the great player was recalled half a dozen times. Once he reappeared carrying his violin and gave rise to hopes by the encore fiends he would play again. But the concerto was the last number on the programme and the house was in disorder with the audience preparing to go and no encore was given.

The concerto is a composition of fine and delicate texture and its silken threads were spun by Kreisler with a great variety of color and poetic imagination. His tone was of pure gold, dazzling in its brilliancy at times and again warm and rich.

Kreisler is a superb violinist, now in the full maturity of his artistic growth. The concerto was child's play for him, but he played with it as with a child he dearly loved.

Heroic Symphony Played.

The symphony was Beethoven's "Eroica," and Dr. Muck also had Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn on the programme. Both were played as only the Boston orchestra can play such compositions. The Beethoven symphonies receive no more beautiful interpretations than at the hands of Dr. Muck, and last night's rendition of the "Eroica" was the result of a reading that bespoke keen intelligence and depth of feeling. The intricacies of the Brahms variations—more interesting to musicians than the average listener—were brought out in a manner that left room for nothing but admiration.

Admirable, however, as the playing of the orchestra was, again there was cause of complaint to Dr. Muck for the make-up of his programme. That it was devoted to hackneyed pieces once more is not the cause of resentment. The Boston conductor has apparently decided Brooklyn wants little besides the standard compositions—possibly he is right. It is the arrangement of such compositions on his programme that produces unsatisfactory results.

Each concert this season has produced the effect of a beautiful piece of statuary not quite complete—a head, a foot, an arm appear to be missing. The programme last night, ending with the violin concerto, did not appear to be finished. As far as any artistic balance went, it really was incomplete. Dr. Muck might well stay in New York a while and take lessons from Stransky or Damrosch on the art of programme building.

Splendid Damrosch Programme.

Yesterday afternoon he could have heard a splendid example of artistic programme building if he had attended the concert of the Symphony Society of New York in Aeolian Hall, Manhattan. There Conductor Damrosch opened with Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, which he followed by Sibelius' "The Swan of Tuonela." The second part of the programme began with Chopin's concerto in E minor for the piano, played by Josef Hoffman, and ended with a fragment from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe." Here the symphony came first, as Dr. Muck properly recognizes it should, but Damrosch did not make the mistake of leaving things hang in air with the concerto. A definite and inspiring conclusion was given to the concert by the Ravel number.

The appearance of Hoffman with the orchestra was his first in New York this year. A big audience, composed principally of women, was present. Like the Boston Orchestra's soloist, Kreisler, Hoffman is an artist who ranks at the top of his profession, stands shoulder to shoulder with Paderewski and is loved more than the great Pole by many people for his absence of affectation. His playing of the concerto yesterday was a performance of supreme artistic merit.

The Tschaikowsky symphony had its third performance this week, the other two being by the Philharmonic Society and the Philadelphia Orchestra. Another performance on Sunday by the Damrosch players will make a record number of four for one symphony in one week. It is an inspiring composition and its frequent repetition is deserved.

"The Swan of Tuonela" was heard at the first Brooklyn concert of the Boston Orchestra this year and the Ravel ballet music had an earlier performance in Damrosch's all-dance music programme. The two numbers are examples of the best of modern compositions and are of the sort in which the Symphony Society excels. The whole programme will be repeated Sunday.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address Providence, R. I.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Wave on wave of enthusiastic loyal plause greeted Fritz Kriesler, the brilli and beloved Austrian violinist, just cently returned from his native land the titanic struggle which is devastat the continent of Europe, as he appea before the packed audience in Infant hall at the head of the third Boston Sym phony concert of the winter season in th city.

The brilliant Austrian came to take the place left vacant by the sudden illness of Mme. Schumann-Heink in Chicago, who was to have been present last evening.

But much as the public was disappointed in the loss of the opportunity to hear once again the popular contralto, it was at the same time, and never more so than last night, overjoyed that the master of the violin who played before them last evening was once more able to be present, having escaped the bullets of the enemy at the front.

Never was the violinist of world-wide fame in better condition, and never, so it seemed, did he play with more pathos and skill than last evening, and the memory of what might have been, but for a merciful Something which prevented his being taken away, was a factor which seemed to enter the hearts of all who listened to the strains of such sweetness as it is given an audience to hear but few times in a life time.

Not only was the artist seemingly at his best last evening, but his work was up to his reputation as to technique. His performance of Mendelssohn's concerto in E-minor is beyond an adequate description, and to those who listened it were futile to attempt a description. The appreciation was manifacted in the manner in which the audience left little to be added. All of his work, which was supported by the orchestra, under Dr. Muck, was on a par with his past reputation, and a detailed description of the same would be but a futile attempt to do adequate justice to a man who has endeared himself to the hearts of the local and world-wide theatre-going and music-loving public.

The symphony orchestra itself last night, presenting as it did a varied program, calculated to suit all tastes, held up the rare ideals the Providence musical public have come to expect from it.

The fourth concert, for which the soloist has not yet been announced, will be given on Tuesday evening, Feb. 2.

From

Address: New York City

Date JAN 10 1915

KREISLER PLAYS WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Violinist Gives Brilliant Performance of Bruch's Scotch Fantasia.

The programme offered by Dr. Muck at the matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in Carnegie Hall was of an entirely different selection from that presented at the organization's previous concert on Thursday evening. In plan, however, it again contained a classic symphony followed by music of the romantic and modern schools, and it again presented Fritz Kreisler as sololst.

The symphony was Beethoven's eighth. The other compositions for orchestra were Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, the "Shepherd's Music" from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" and the "March of the Three Holy Kings" from Liszt's oratorio "Christus." The composition played by Mr. Kreisler was Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Airs."

The Beethoven work, "The Little Symphony in F," fitted excellently into the scheme of music arranged for the afternoon's enjoyment. Vivacious in spirit, while clothed in a tonal garb of rare poetic loveliness and color, it never fails when presented with the subtle insight in interpretation asked for by its unique individuality to charm the ear and rest the mind. That it received such a presentation yesterday from the Boston men it is hardly necessary to state. It was one marked by rarest musicianly taste throughout. Lovely tonal qualities, exquisite finish in phrasing and clarity of general melodic lines were qualities among the leading features of the performance that went to make it a joy long to be remembered.

The Schumann overture served well to unite the two divisions of the programme. Thoroughly in the style of its composer, it was performed on a high plane of excellence. Of the Bach and Liszt numbers the hearing of the former met with a warmer response, though the latter, whose significance seems to be first of all in its title rather than music, afforded opportunity for admiring some matchless playing by the strings as well as remarkable tone balance in the work done by the entire band

Mr. Kreisler's performance of the Scotch fantasy served to arouse new interest for it. It is a work whose delivery usually must prove to be a thankless undertaking except for the artist of highes rank. Severest demands in the accomplishment of accuracy of intonation alon serve to put the player to keenest tests a every turn in its playing aside from th many other difficulties in the requirement of virtuosity that are offered by its scor

Mr. Kreisler approached his task wit a complete ease of manner most attractiv to the moment and by the distinction c his consummate art gave expressive value to his playing that was wholly remarkable. He played it with beautiful tone, fine accuracy of pitch and he imbued it with poetic feeling of high order. It was a delivery that furthermore contained much brilliant technic, though it delighted first of all by a captivating perfection in the delicacies of finish.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From HERALD

Address: New York City

Date

Mr. Kriesler Discards Violin to Stop Recalls

Even the audience at the Boston Symphony concerts, usually so sedate, was roused to an unwonted pitch of enthusiasm yesterday ~~afternoon~~ in Carnegie Hall when Mr. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, again, as on Thursday night, closed the programme with a spirited playing of Bruch's fantasia on Scottish airs.

After repeated recalls the audience insisted on remaining. Finally the artist appeared without his violin, the lights were lowered, and the audience, which had crowded every section of the auditorium left the hall slowly and reluctantly.

Even with a work of no greater distinction than the Bruch fantasia Mr. Kreisler proclaimed himself the consummate artist. Faultless intonation, unfaltering rhythm and the true fire of the artist were revealed in his performance.

There was a belated echo of Christmastide in the programme which Dr. Muck and his players presented, particularly i the Shepherds' music from Bach's Christmas Oratorio and Liszt's March of th Three Holy Kings from his Christma Oratorio. The overture to Schumann's al most forgotten opera "Genoveva" precede these. It was played admirably.

To many listeners the greatest musica treat of the afternoon was Beethoven' Eighth Symphony, with which the conce began. This compact and beautifully wri ten work, so replete with joyous feelin was given by the Boston players wit clarity of enunciation and great unanim ty of expression. Dr. Muck, the conducto gave an unimpeachable reading.

Dr. Muck gave his audience some of the music which he had prepared for his Christmas concerto in Boston a fortnight ago at the matinee in Carnegie Hall yesterday. The third and fourth numbers of the programme were the pastoral symphony from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" and the "March of the Three Kings," from Liszt's "Christus." Before these pieces came Beethoven's eighth symphony and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, and after them Mr. Kreisler played the Scottish Fantasia by Bruch.

A happy idea this in the present case, of putting the solo number last on the programme. Mr. Kreisler, always a favorite with the public here, is this time doubly a hero by virtue of his having been (by report) killed by bomb in Nuremberg, guarded a brid in Vienna, wounded by a Cossack lan in the trenches and achieved a numb of other adventures since his count undertook to help Germany in h mighty enterprise. His participatio in the concert could not affect the a tendance, which is normally the mea ure of Carnegie Hall, but it could an did quicken the enthusiasm of th listeners. Under the circumstances hi artistic and patriotic admirers were able to indulge their transports of joy at seeing and hearing him to the full without protracting the concert of preventing the musicians from departing for home on schedule time.

What has been said a hundred times about the excellence of the Boston Orchestra's concert might be repeated here; unless Dr. Muck brings new or unfamiliar compositions, reviews of his concerts are all mere variations on an old theme.

H. E. K.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address: New York City

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLA

Fritz Kreisler and Harold Heard in One Day.

The Boston Symphony Orchestr ducted by Dr. Carl Muck, gave i cert yesterday afternoon at C Hall. The presence of Fritz K and the reputation of the orches sured a large attendance. Mr. K masterly style was shown i Bruch's fantasy on Scot's airs, a orchestra was at its best in the Symphony of Beethoven. There from Schumann and Li one of th

---

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From Daily Eagle,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date JAN 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Kreisler, Lame in Body, but Mighty in Spirit.

Kreisler is back from the war, much thinner, looking pale and worn and with a decided limp. But, thank heaven, the Russian bayonet missed the violinist's great bow arm, his fingers are not even stiffened and, most important of all, the spirit of the man is unbroken and noble as of old. He proved all those things, last night, at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, at the Academy, where he played the dear old Mendelssohn Concerto, not like a soldier, but like a spirit of light. It is hard to feel affection for a concerto, the very qualities of display and difficulty for which, in one aspect, concertos are written tend to arouse wonder and admiration while at the same time they defeat that intimate liking which is the root of the love of music. But the Mendelssohn violin concerto is an exception. He put into it melodies that haunt your ear like a Schubert song, and he caressed the violin in a way for which violinists will be grateful to the end of time. The audience was on tiptoe for Kreisler, any way, and when he sang that opening melody with the fine, clear, perfect tone which is his distinguishing note, it settled back into a vast content, only to be broken by long breaths and feverish applause between the movements.

In the second movement, the feeling got pretty close to tears, so tender is the music and so deep and fine was its interpretation. The third movement reached a point of elegance in delivery which is seldom achieved, even by Kreisler. Mendelssohn's music invokes elegance and, last night, it received its due, and more than its due. At the close, there was an ovation for violinist and orchestra such as is seldom heard in staid Brooklyn. The orchestra players rushed from the stage, apparently to make it clear that Kreisler could not play again, but the audience called the violinist back time after time.

The concert up to that moment had been an excellent preparation. The first fifty-five minutes were filled with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, for inspiring which many of us are inclined to forgive Napoleon most of his sins. If only the man had been as noble as the music Beethoven wrote to celebrate his early ambitions! There are classicists who say that Dr. Muck fails to wake up for some of the old masterpieces, but, last night, they took it back and admitted that he did all that the most fervent Beethovenite could ask in bringing out the delicate shades of feeling and in setting forth the great symphony in all its manifold perfections.

Between the Symphony and the Concerto stood Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," which went to show how much more popular Brahms might have been if he had only let somebody else write his tunes for him. The Haydn tune is lovely and the things Brahms does with it proved interesting, while at the same time they served as a foil for the emotional appeal of the music which preceded and followed. It seems foolish, at this late day, to keep on talking about the playing of the Boston orchestra, but surely a word is due to the men, as well as to Dr. Muck, for the loveliness of that Beethoven and for the beauty of the orchestral part of the Concerto. Kreisler might easily have sounded less perfect with another background.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAATS-ZEITUNG

Address: New York City

Date JAN 1

Am Samstag Nachmittag fand in Carnegie Hall ein Konzert der Boſtoner mit enthuſiaſtiſchem Erfolg ſtatt. Dr. Muck dirigirte Beethoven's Achte mit Herausholung des ganzen glänzenden Inhalts, namentlich auch des Humors und der feinen Grazie. Schumann's „Genoveva"-Ouverture, Bach's „Paſtorale" aus dem Weihnachts-Oratorium und Liszt's etwas äußerlicher „Marſch der Heiligen drei Könige" aus „Chriſtus" vervollſtändigten die Reihe der Orcheſtervorträge, aus denen ganz beſonders die hinreißend fein geſpielte Bach'ſche Nummer das Entzücken des Publikums erregte. Als Soliſt wirkte Herr Fritz Kreisler mit der unnachamlich friſch und virtuos geſpielten „Schottiſchen [illegible] Bruch mit, gefeiert

H.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STANDARD UNION

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date JAN 1915

HEARTY WELCOME FOR FRITZ KREISLER

Austrian Violinist, Back From the War, Plays at Academy With Boston Symphony.

CONCERTO SPLENDIDLY DONE

Dr. Muck's Programme Again Inspires Criticism.

With Fritz Kreisler assisting, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night gave its third concert at the Academy of Music. One of the largest audiences of the season was present and made a more brilliant appearance than even on opera nights. Every box was filled, and there were rows of standees.

Kreisler was undoubtedly the magnet that drew the crowd. It was his first appearance in Brooklyn since he returned from the war with a wound in his leg received while fighting as a lieutenant in the Austrian army. His now famous limp was again in evidence as he came on the stage. He was greeted with an ovation the like of which has seldom been accorded to an artist by a Brooklyn audience.

Kreisler played Mendelssohn's concerto for the violin in E minor, the number he had played the previous night in Manhattan. The conclusion of each movement was the signal for enthusiastic applause, and, at the end of the piece the great player was recalled half a dozen times. Once he reappeared carrying his violin and gave rise to hopes by the encore fiends he would play again. But the concerto was the last number on the programme and the house was in disorder with the audience preparing to go and no encore was given.

The concerto is a composition of fine and delicate texture and its silken threads were spun by Kreisler with a great variety of color and poetic imagination. His tone was of pure gold, dazzling in its brilliancy at times and again warm and rich.

Kreisler is a superb violinist, now in the full maturity of his artistic growth. The concerto was child's play for him, but he played with it as with a child he dearly loved.

Heroic Symphony Played.

The symphony was Beethoven's "Eroica," and Dr. Muck also had Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn on the programme. Both were played as only the Boston orchestra can play such compositions. The Beethoven symphonies receive no more beautiful interpretations than at the hands of Dr. Muck, and last night's rendition of the "Eroica" was the result of a reading that bespoke keen intelligence and depth of feeling. The intricacies of the Brahms variations—more interesting to musicians than the average listener—were brought out in a manner that left room for nothing but admiration.

Admirable, however, as the playing of the orchestra was, again there was cause of complaint to Dr. Muck for the make-up of his programme. That it was devoted to hackneyed pieces once more is not the cause of resentment. The Boston conductor has apparently decided Brooklyn wants little besides the standard compositions—possibly he is right. It is the arrangement of such compositions on his programme that produces unsatisfactory results.

Each concert this season has produced the effect of a beautiful piece of statuary not quite complete—a head, a foot, an arm appear to be missing. The programme last night, ending with the violin concerto, did not appear to be finished. As far as any artistic balance went, it really was incomplete. Dr. Muck might well stay in New York a while and take lessons from Stransky or Damrosch on the art of programme building.

Splendid Damrosch Programme.

Yesterday afternoon he could have heard a splendid example of artistic programme building if he had attended the concert of the Symphony Society of New York in Aeolian Hall, Manhattan. There Conductor Damrosch opened with Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, which he followed by Sibelius' "The Swan of Tuonela." The second part of the programme began with Chopin's concerto in E minor for the piano, played by Josef Hoffman, and ended with a fragment from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe." Here the symphony came first, as Dr. Muck properly recognizes it should, but Damrosch did not make the mistake of leaving things hang in air with the concerto. A definite and inspiring conclusion was given to the concert by the Ravel number.

The appearance of Hoffman with the orchestra was his first in New York this year. A big audience, composed principally of women, was present. Like the Boston Orchestra's soloist, Kreisler, Hoffman is an artist who ranks at the top of his profession, stands shoulder to shoulder with Paderewski and is loved more than the great Pole by many people for his absence of affectation. His playing of the concerto yesterday was a performance of supreme artistic merit.

The Tschaikowsky symphony had its third performance this week, the other two being by the Philharmonic Society and the Philadelphia Orchestra. Another performance on Sunday by the Damrosch players will make a record number of four for one symphony in one week. It is an inspiring composition and its frequent repetition is deserved.

"The Swan of Tuonela" was heard at the first Brooklyn concert of the Boston Orchestra this year and the Ravel ballet music had an earlier performance in Damrosch's all-dance music programme. The two numbers are examples of the best of modern compositions and are of the sort in which the Symphony Society excels. The whole programme will be repeated Sunday.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From
Address Providence, R. I.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Wave on wave of enthusiastic loyal applause greeted Fritz Kriesler, the brilliant and beloved Austrian violinist, just recently returned from his native land and the titanic struggle which is devastating the continent of Europe, as he appeared before the packed audience in Infantry hall at the head of the third Boston Symphony concert of the winter season in this city.

The brilliant Austrian came to take the place left vacant by the sudden illness of Mme. Schumann-Heink in Chicago, who was to have been present last evening.

But much as the public was disappointed in the loss of the opportunity to hear once again the popular contralto, it was at the same time, and never more so than last night, overjoyed that the master of the violin who played before them last evening was once more able to be present, having escaped the bullets of the enemy at the front.

Never was the violinist of world-wide fame in better condition, and never, so it seemed, did he play with more pathos and skill than last evening, and the memory of what might have been, but for a merciful Something which prevented his being taken away, was a factor which seemed to enter the hearts of all who listened to the strains of such sweetness as it is given an audience to hear but few times in a life time.

Not only was the artist seemingly at his best last evening, but his work was up to his reputation as to technique. His performance of Mendelssohn's concerto in E-minor is beyond an adequate description, and to those who listened it were futile to attempt a description. The appreciation was manifacted in the manner in which the audience left little to be added. All of his work, which was supported by the orchestra, under Dr. Muck, was on a par with his past reputation, and a detailed description of the same would be but a futile attempt to do adequate justice to a man who has endeared himself to the hearts of the local and world-wide theatre-going and music-loving public.

The symphony orchestra itself last night, presenting as it did a varied program, calculated to suit all tastes, held up the rare ideals the Providence musical public have come to expect from it.

The fourth concert, for which the soloist has not yet been announced, will be given on Tuesday evening, Feb. 2.

From
Address: New York City
Date JAN 10 1915

KREISLER PLAYS WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Violinist Gives Brilliant Performance of Bruch's Scotch Fantasia.

The programme offered by Dr. Muck at the matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in Carnegie Hall was of an entirely different selection from that presented at the organization's previous concert on Thursday evening. In plan, however, it again contained a classic symphony followed by music of the romantic and modern schools, and it again presented Fritz Kreisler as sololst.

The symphony was Beethoven's eighth. The other compositions for orchestra were Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, the "Shepherd's Music" from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" and the "March of the Three Holy Kings" from Liszt's oratorio "Christus." The composition played by Mr. Kreisler was Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Airs."

The Beethoven work, "The Little Symphony in F," fitted excellently into the scheme of music arranged for the afternoon's enjoyment. Vivacious in spirit, while clothed in a tonal garb of rare poetic loveliness and color, it never fails when presented with the subtle insight in interpretation asked for by its unique individuality to charm the ear and rest the mind. That it received such a presentation yesterday from the Boston men it is hardly necessary to state. It was one marked by rarest musicianly taste throughout. Lovely tonal qualities, exquisite finish in phrasing and clarity of general melodic lines were qualities among the leading features of the performance that went to make it a joy long to be remembered.

The Schumann overture served well to unite the two divisions of the programme. Thoroughly in the style of its composer, it was performed on a high plane of excellence. Of the Bach and Liszt numbers the hearing of the former met with a warmer response, though the latter, whose significance seems to be first of all in its title rather than music, afforded opportunity for admiring some matchless playing by the strings as well as remarkable tone balance in the work done by the entire band

Mr. Kreisler's performance of the Scotch fantasy served to arouse new interest for it. It is a work whose delivery usually must prove to be a thankless undertaking except for the artist of highest rank. Severest demands in the accomplishment of accuracy of intonation alone serve to put the player to keenest tests at every turn in its playing aside from the many other difficulties in the requirements of virtuosity that are offered by its score.

Mr. Kreisler approached his task with a complete ease of manner most attractive to the moment and by the distinction of his consummate art gave expressive value to his playing that was wholly remarkable. He played it with beautiful tone, fine accuracy of pitch and he imbued it with poetic feeling of high order. It was a delivery that furthermore contained much brilliant technic, though it delighted first of all by a captivating perfection in the delicacies of finish.

---

spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

HERALD
New York City
1915

Mr. Kriesler Discards Violin to Stop Recalls

Even the audience at the Boston Symphony concerts, usually so sedate, was roused to an unwonted pitch of enthusiasm yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall when Mr. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, again, as on Thursday night, closed the programme with a spirited playing of Bruch's fantasia on Scottish airs.

After repeated recalls the audience insisted on remaining. Finally the artist appeared without his violin, the lights were lowered, and the audience, which had crowded every section of the auditorium left the hall slowly and reluctantly.

Even with a work of no greater distinction than the Bruch fantasia Mr. Kreisler proclaimed himself the consummate artist. Faultless intonation, unfaltering rhythm and the true fire of the artist were revealed in his performance.

There was a belated echo of Christmastide in the programme which Dr. Muck and his players presented, particularly in the Shepherds' music from Bach's Christmas Oratorio and Liszt's March of the Three Holy Kings from his Christmas Oratorio. The overture to Schumann's almost forgotten opera "Genoveva" preceded these. It was played admirably.

To many listeners the greatest musical treat of the afternoon was Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, with which the concert began. This compact and beautifully written work, so replete with joyous feeling was given by the Boston players with clarity of enunciation and great unanimity of expression. Dr. Muck, the conductor gave an unimpeachable reading.

Dr. Muck gave his audience some of the music which he had prepared for his Christmas concerto in Boston a fortnight ago at the matinee in Carnegie Hall yesterday. The third and fourth numbers of the programme were the pastoral symphony from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" and the "March of the Three Kings," from Liszt's "Christus." Before these pieces came Beethoven's eighth symphony and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, and after them Mr. Kreisler played the Scottish Fantasia by Bruch.

A happy idea this in the present case, of putting the solo number last on the programme. Mr. Kreisler, always a favorite with the public here, is this time doubly a hero by virtue of his having been (by report) killed by a bomb in Nuremberg, guarded a bridge in Vienna, wounded by a Cossack lance in the trenches and achieved a number of other adventures since his country undertook to help Germany in her mighty enterprise. His participation in the concert could not affect the attendance, which is normally the measure of Carnegie Hall, but it could and did quicken the enthusiasm of the listeners. Under the circumstances his artistic and patriotic admirers were able to indulge their transports of joy at seeing and hearing him to the full without protracting the concert of preventing the musicians from departing for home on schedule time.

What has been said a hundred times about the excellence of the Boston Orchestra's concert might be repeated here; unless Dr. Muck brings new or unfamiliar compositions, reviews of his concerts are all mere variations on an old theme.

H. E. K.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Fritz Kreisler and Harold Bauer Heard in One Day.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Carl Muck, gave its concert yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The presence of Fritz Kreisler and the reputation of the orchestra ensured a large attendance. Mr. Kreisler's masterly style was shown in Max Bruch's fantasy on Scot's airs, and the orchestra was at its best in the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven. There were selections from Schumann and Liszt.

Mr. Harold Bauer, one of the most eloquent of masters of music living, was heard in recital at Aeolian Hall.

---

ate

OSTON SYMPHONY CONC

isler, Lame in Body, but Mighty in Spirit.

1884

Kreisler is back from the war, much thinner, looking pale and worn and with a decided limp. But, thank heaven, the Russian bayonet missed the violinist's great bow arm, his fingers are not even stiffened and, most important of all, the spirit of the man is unbroken and noble as of old.

He proved all those things, last night, at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, at the Academy, where he played the dear old Mendelssohn Concerto, not like a soldier, but like a spirit of light. It is hard to feel affection for a concerto, the very qualities of display and difficulty for which, in one aspect, concertos are written tend to arouse wonder and admiration while at the same time they defeat that intimate liking which is the root of the love of music. But the Mendelssohn violin concerto is an exception. He put into it melodies that haunt your ear like a Schubert song, and he caressed the violin in a way for which violinists will be grateful to the end of time. The audience was on tiptoe for Kreisler, any way, and when he sang that opening melody with the fine, clear, perfect tone which is his distinguishing note, it settled back into a vast content, only to be broken by long breaths and feverish applause between the movements.

In the second movement, the feeling got pretty close to tears, so tender is the music and so deep and fine was its interpretation. The third movement reached a point of elegance in delivery which is seldom achieved, even by Kreisler. Mendelssohn's music invokes elegance and, last night, it received its due, and more than its due. At the close, there was an ovation for violinist and orchestra such as is seldom heard in staid Brooklyn. The orchestra players rushed from the stage, apparently to make it clear that Kreisler could not play again, but the audience called the violinist back time after time.

The concert up to that moment had been an excellent preparation. The first fifty-five minutes were filled with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, for inspiring which many of us are inclined to forgive Napoleon most of his sins. If only the man had been as noble as the music Beethoven wrote to celebrate his early ambitions! There are classicists who say that Dr. Muck fails to wake up for some of the old masterpieces, but, last night, they took it back and admitted that he did all that the most fervent Beethovenite could ask in bringing out the delicate shades of feeling and in setting forth the great symphony in all its manifold perfections.

Between the Symphony and the Concerto stood Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," which went to show how much more popular Brahms might have been if he had only let somebody else write his tunes for him. The Haydn tune is lovely and the things Brahms does with it proved interesting, while at the same time they served as a foil for the emotional appeal of the music which preceded and followed. It seems foolish, at this late day, to keep on talking about the playing of the Boston orchestra, but surely a word is due to the men, as well as to Dr. Muck, for the loveliness of that Beethoven and for the beauty of the orchestral part of the Concerto. Kreisler might easily have sounded less perfect with another background.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

rom STAATS-ZEITUNG
ddress: New York City JAN
ate

1884

Am Samstag Nachmittag fand in Carnegie Hall ein Konzert der Boſtoner mit enthuſiaſtiſchem Erfolg ſtatt. Dr. Muck dirigirte Beethoven's Achte mit Herausholung des ganzen glänzenden Inhalts, namentlich auch des Humors und der feinen Grazie. Schumann's „Genoveva"-Ouverture, Bach's „Paſtorale" aus dem Weihnachts-Oratorium und Liszt's etwas äußerlicher „Marſch der Heiligen drei Könige" aus „Chriſtus" vervollſtändigten die Reihe der Orcheſtervorträge, aus denen ganz beſonders die hinreißend fein geſpielte Bach'ſche Nummer das Entzücken des Publikums erregte. Als Soliſt wirkte Herr Fritz Kreisler mit der unnachamlich friſch und virtuos geſpielten „Schottiſchen Phantaſie" von Max Bruch mit, gefeiert wie eben ei [illegible] H.

---

shed and Most Compl
ting Bureau in the Worl

ARD UNION
ooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 1915

TY WELCOME OR FRITZ KREISLER

Austrian Violinist, Back From the War, Plays at Academy With Boston Symphony.

CONCERTO SPLENDIDLY DONE

Dr. Muck's Programme Again Inspires Criticism.

[119]

With Fritz Kreisler assisting, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night gave its third concert at the Academy of Music. One of the largest audiences of the season was present and made a more brilliant appearance than even on opera nights. Every box was filled, and there were rows of standees.

Kreisler was undoubtedly the magnet that drew the crowd. It was his first appearance in Brooklyn since he returned from the war with a wound in his leg received while fighting as a lieutenant in the Austrian army. His now famous limp was again in evidence as he came on the stage. He was greeted with an ovation the like of which has seldom been accorded to an artist by a Brooklyn audience.

Kreisler played Mendelssohn's concerto for the violin in E minor, the number he had played the previous night in Manhattan. The conclusion of each movement was the signal for enthusiastic applause, and, at the end of the piece the great player was recalled half a dozen times. Once he reappeared carrying his violin and gave rise to hopes by the encore fiends he would play again. But the concerto was the last number on the programme and the house was in disorder with the audience preparing to go and no encore was given.

The concerto is a composition of fine and delicate texture and its silken threads were spun by Kreisler with a great variety of color and poetic imagination. His tone was of pure gold, dazzling in its brilliancy at times and again warm and rich.

Kreisler is a superb violinist, now in the full maturity of his artistic growth. The concerto was child's play for him, but he played with it as with a child he dearly loved.

Heroic Symphony Played.

The symphony was Beethoven's "Eroica," and Dr. Muck also had Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn on the programme. Both were played as only the Boston orchestra can play such compositions. The Beethoven symphonies receive no more beautiful interpretations than at the hands of Dr. Muck, and last night's rendition of the "Eroica" was the result of a reading that bespoke keen intelligence and depth of feeling. The intricacies of the Brahms variations—more interesting to musicians than the average listener—were brought out in a manner that left room for nothing but admiration.

Admirable, however, as the playing of the orchestra was, again there was cause of complaint to Dr. Muck for the make-up of his programme. That it was devoted to hackneyed pieces once more is not the cause of resentment. The Boston conductor has apparently decided Brooklyn wants little besides the standard compositions—possibly he is right. It is the arrangement of such compositions on his programme that produces unsatisfactory results.

Each concert this season has produced the effect of a beautiful piece of statuary not quite complete—a head, a foot, an arm appear to be missing. The programme last night, ending with the violin concerto, did not appear to be finished. As far as any artistic balance went, it really was incomplete. Dr. Muck might well stay in New York a while and take lessons from Stransky or Damrosch on the art of programme building.

Splendid Damrosch Programme.

Yesterday afternoon he could have heard a splendid example of artistic programme building if he had attended the concert of the Symphony Society of New York in Aeolian Hall, Manhattan. There Conductor Damrosch opened with Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, which he followed by Sibelius' "The Swan of Tuonela." The second part of the programme began with Chopin's concerto in E minor for the piano, played by Josef Hoffman, and ended with a fragment from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe." Here the symphony came first, as Dr. Muck properly recognizes it should, but Damrosch did not make the mistake of leaving things hang in air with the concerto. A definite and inspiring conclusion was given to the concert by the Ravel number.

The appearance of Hoffman with the orchestra was his first in New York this year. A big audience, composed principally of women, was present. Like the Boston Orchestra's soloist, Kreisler, Hoffman is an artist who ranks at the top of his profession, stands shoulder to shoulder with Paderewski and is loved more than the great Pole by many people for his absence of affectation. His playing of the concerto yesterday was a performance of supreme artistic merit.

The Tschaikowsky symphony had its third performance this week, the other two being by the Philharmonic Society and the Philadelphia Orchestra. Another performance on Sunday by the Damrosch players will make a record number of four for one symphony in one week. It is an inspiring composition and its frequent repetition is deserved.

"The Swan of Tuonela" was heard at the first Brooklyn concert of the Boston Orchestra this year and the Ravel ballet music had an earlier performance in Damrosch's all-dance music programme. The two numbers are examples of the best of modern compositions and are of the sort in which the Symphony Society excels. The whole programme will be repeated Sunday.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 7 1915

Established:

NEW SYMPHONY PLAYED BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

This season's third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Lyric last evening, when an unusually arranged program was presented, the soloist, Fritz Kreisler, not appearing until the last number.

Two or three years ago Dr. Muck gave us a program made up almost entirely of novelties of the ultra-modern type, and this, at the time, caused some adverse criticism. Since then, whether by accident or design, we have heard comparatively little of the new school under Dr. Muck's baton, and perhaps for this reason more than usual interest was aroused last night by the prospect of an entirely new symphony by Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz.

No program annotations were needed to inform us that the composer was an ardent disciple of Cesar Franck; the mood, the construction, even the coloring to a great extent, were Cesar Franck's all through. The symphony is a noble work which will bear much repetition—mystic at times, always reserved and lofty in feeling and more utterly without bombast and pretentiousness than any modern work heard here for a long time.

It is essentially music that would appeal to the earnest musician and not to the general public, and, therefore, one could not help feeling great maxes—were conspicuous by their sence throughout.

Vagner's "Faust" overture, which ne first on the program, could well e been dispensed with. No doubt ly experiments of the great mas- s like this have an interest all ir own to the musical connoisseur, t they are quite out of place in the oncert programs of a city like Bal- more, which is none too well ac- uainted with the masterpieces.

Dr. Muck's reading of Beethoven's me-honored "Egmont" overture was ltogether unusual. The opening was ken at an extraordinarily slow mpo, and it must be said, for this eason, in a more impressive way than can ever recall; but the main part the overture was played with a pidity almost equally extraordinary, d with just that inflexible rigidity nd lack of rubato which character- ed Dr. Muck's performance of eethoven's C-minor symphony last ear.

he last number was Beethoven's ebrated violin concerto in D. All t enthusiasm can possibly dictate s been showered on Fritz Kreisler abundantly, and more than ever st lately, that further panegyrics n his playing would be superfluous; t let it be observed that though his rformance of the concerto last every way superb, he e seal of his individual- and so make it pecu- as in the case of the rto.

H. D. P.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING MAIL
Address New York
Date JAN 8 1915

Establishe

Boston Symphony Concert.

By SIGMUND SPAETH.

The last time Karl Muck brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New York he played two programmes of such marked eccentricity as to disturb even the habitual complacency of the subscribers. Yesterday he came again, and ironically jumped to the opposite extreme by presenting a combination of ultra-conventional numbers.

Obviously, however, the Boston orchestra is better liked as an interpreter of familiar classics than as an experimentalist in obscure idiosyncrasies. Its hearers would rather say, "At last I know how that compositio should be played" than "I wonder i it could sound worse with a poor orchestra."

With such an attitude Dr. Muc should be well pleased, for to p Mozart's Jupiter symphony, Wagn Faust overture and Siegfried's I and Mendelssohn's violin concer even so superlatively well as he played them yesterday, can scarcely be called a heavy evening's work.

Fritz Kreisler was the first Boston soloist of the year, and he succeeded in spurring Mendelssohn's old war horse into new life and freshness. In many of the rapid passages he galloped ahead of his orchestra, and Dr. Muck often had trouble in keeping the pace. But the beautiful singing tone of the andante and the crisp energy of the final allegro more than made up for any minor misunderstandings.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date JAN 11 1915

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra charmed another crowded house at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon by their playing of Beethoven's eighth symphony, Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," Bach's Shepherd's Music from the Christmas Oratorio, and Liszt's "March of the Three Holy Kings." Fritz Kreisler, as the violin soloist in Bruch's fantasia on Scotish airs, evoked a demonstration.

k, 1884

From
Address: New York City
Date JAN 3 1915

Establish

Not only a book to delight and interest music lovers, but an important record and a contribution to American musical history, is to be found in M. A. de Wolf Howe's "historical sketch" entitled "The Boston Symphony Orchestra." It is published by the Houghton Mifflin Company, a book of 280 pages. From it may be learned just what Mr. Henry L. Higginson's intentions and ideals were when he established the orchestra thirty-three years ago, what he has thought and said about it and something of the trials and tribulations—and, let us add, of the joys and satisfactions—that he has experienced in these years that have crowned his work with such brilliant success. It is given to few men to realize a youthful ambition in so full a measure, or, in doing so, to perform so fine and much-needed a service for their country. It is no small thing, it is a great thing, to have created the finest orchestra in the world, to have made an established place for it, and, even more, to have imposed the high ideals toward art that such an orchestra implies. Americans ought to, and it is gratifying to think that they do, rise up and call Mr. Higginson blessed for the miracle he has wrought.

All this is a more than twice-told tale, and Mr. Higginson is secure in the gratitude and admiration of every music-loving American. But it is well to have the record so detailed, so gracefully and interestingly, so authoritatively set down as it is in Mr. Howe's book. He writes with an intimate knowledge of the conditions and surroundings into which Mr. Higginson dropped his bomb thirty-three years ago—for it was bomb-like in the surprise and, to a certain extent, the consternation it caused. At this distance it may be safe to say what has been suggested before, that Boston is a peculiar place, and in some respects its reception of Mr. Higginson's offer was peculiar. Under the circumstances a certain amount of hostility was inevitable. Mr. Howe's sense of humor enables him to set in their proper light the frame of mind and the more or less excited and ruffled comments that the new orchestra and Georg Henschel, its new conductor, and some of their methods caused. This gift horse was inspected in the mouth more than once, and some of the results are now very amusing, even instructive.

There are personal narratives about the conductors — Messrs. Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Pauer, Gericke again, Muck, Fiedler, and again Muck; about the circumstances of their coming and departure, and of their work; and some of these men have

---

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date [illegible]

, 1884

KREISLER AT THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT

Soldier-Musician Wins Plaudits at Infantry Hall.

NEW SYMPHONY BY ROPARTZ

French Composer Now Living Heard Here for First Time.—Mme. Schumann-Heink's Engagement Filled by Famous Violinist Just Returned from European War.

Seldom is it possible for a management to substitute one popular idol for another at short notice, but the announcement that Mme. Schumann-Heink was ill in Chicago and unable to fill her engagement to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert in Infantry Hall last evening, contained also the news that in her place Fritz Kreisler, the eminent Austrian violinist, would play.

Probably no other soloist would have been able to compensate for the immeasurable regret felt for the absence of the beloved contralto; certainly no instrumentalist other than Mr. Kreisler could have won so spontaneous a welcome.

Added to the recognition always accorded to the favorite violinist was the warmth of greeting to one returned from the jaws of death, and as Mr. Kreisler stood waiting for the rolling waves of applause to subside, he must have been assured of his firm hold on the affection of music lovers in this city.

Of his performance of Mendelssohn's Concerto in E-minor, it seems futile to attempt to speak adequately. All the beauty of tone, brilliancy of technique and humanity of expression with which the public has become familiar in his playing, was evident, for which the sentiment brought about by the thought of what might have been gave an additional capacity for appreciation.

The concerto is a familiar one to concertgoers here, but every one knows the hold that old melodies have upon the heart, and the symmetrical structure and exquisite orchestration of the composition were never more beautifully demonstrated than in the performance last evening.

Mr. Kreisler in faultless tones expressed the individuality of thought and style in every phrase of the composer, perfectly supported by the orchestra under Dr. Muck in the passionate strains of the first movement, through the beautiful andante to the rippling vivacity of the finale.

The large audience gave expression to its undeniable satisfaction by applause so sustained that it kept Mr. Kreisler bowing his acknowledgment for a considerable space of time. Four times he was recalled after he had left the stage, before the resumption of the programme which in its proper sequence was as follows:

Schumann.....Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81
Ropartz [illegible]
Brahms.....Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56a.
Mendelssohn-Bartholdy..Concerto in E-minor, for Violin, Op. 64.
I. Allegro molto appassionato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegretto non troppo, Allegro molto vivace.
Wagner.................Overture, "Tannhauser"

If the public has clamored for novelty as well as for variety, both were accorded last evening, in the foregoing programme,; each of the composers represented, standing for a distinct form of musical utterance in the last century or more.

The overtures with which the programme began and ended were as different as the men by whom they were written, but were equally well played, the Tannhauser overture in its grandeur, offering a fitting anti-climax.

Of the Ropartz symphony it is difficult to speak with authority since eminent critics disagreed at its earliest productions. The composer, Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz, born in France in 1864, was, at the age of 30, nominated director of the Conservatory of Music at Nancy, France, a position he still holds.

The symphony, composed in 1910, was played for the first time from manuscript in Paris, Oct. 15, 1911. Boston heard it first played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in October of this year, and in November, the Philharmonic Society, under Josef Stransky, played it in New York.

Ropartz, called by Vin[illegible] born [illegible] writer," is one of the true pupils of Cesar Franck, under whom he studied after 1872.

He has shown himself faithful to his master, although critics, as has been said, disagree as to his inspiration and individuality. The symphony in three movements, connected without obvious breaks, was played without pause, and differs from the classical model in the manner of its development and thematic treatment.

To one who looked seriously for beauty, there was much to be found in the underlying themes suggestive of French folk-song, though often overborne by the overwhelming dissonances. Its conviction and sincerity lead one to believe that the composer was influenced by some underlying poetic idea. But if so he kept it to himself and gave no suggestion of it in the title. It quite vividly conveyed to the imaginative a sense of an outdoor concourse, with little threads of melody heard at intervals, and then lost in an overpowering clamor of various moods.

The "cyclic" formula was followed with contrasts and interplay, through the ascents and descents of musical measures and delicately incisive melodies, but in less systematic manner than employed by Cesar Franck.

In the hands of Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra its interpretation was what it should be, and as the seeker finds what he looks for, those who looked for beauty did not go unsatisfied, although its rhythms and harmonies were not for those who had been conventionally brought up.

To them there could have been no greater contrast than was afforded in the opening measures of the "chorale" theme by Josef Haydn, which followed the symphony. Its simple dignity was impressively set forth before it was intricately embroidered and ingeniuously interwoven with the individuality of Brahms in his "Variations."

The composer had a fondness for variations on the themes of other composers, as if he recognized the unused possibilities in them and desired to give them new life by his ingenuity in presenting the material in new aspects, and the eight variations on Haydn's theme with finale afforded an appreciable addition to last evening's programme, which was of somewhat unusual length.

The fourth concert, for which the soloist has not yet been announced, will be given on Tuesday evening, Feb. 2.

A. W. C.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date [illegible]

Established: I

NEW SYMPHONY PLAYED BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

This season's third concert by the Boston SymphonyOrchestra took place at the Lyric last evening, when an unusually arranged program was presented, the soloist, Fritz Kreisler, not appearing until the last number.

Two or three years ago Dr. Muck gave us a program made up almost entirely of novelties of the ultra-modern type, and this, at the time, caused some adverse criticism. Since then, whether by accident or design, we have heard comparatively little of the new school under Dr. Muck's baton, and perhaps for this reason more than usual interest was aroused last night by the prospect of an entirely new symphony by Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz.

No program annotations were needed to inform us that the composer was an ardent disciple of Cesar Franck; the mood, the construction, even the coloring to a great extent, were Cesar Franck's all through. The symphony is a noble work which will bear much repetition—mystic at times, always reserved and lofty in feeling and more utterly without bombast and pretentiousness than any modern work heard here for a long time.

It is essentially music that would appeal to the earnest musician and not to the general public, and, therefore, one could not help feeling great imaxes—were conspicuous by their bsence throughout.

Wagner's "Faust" overture, which ame first on the program, could well ave been dispensed with. No doubt arly experiments of the great masers like this have an interest all heir own to the musical connoisseur, ut they are quite out of place in the oncert programs of a city like Balimore, which is none too well acuainted with the masterpieces.

Dr. Muck's reading of Beethoven's ime-honored "Egmont" overture was ltogether unusual. The opening was aken at an extraordinarily slow empo, and it must be said, for this eason, in a more impressive way than ve can ever recall; but the main part of the overture was played with a pidity almost equally extraordinary, nd with just that inflexible rigidity nd lack of rubato which charactered Dr. Muck's performance of Beethoven's C-minor symphony last year.

The last number was Beethoven's elebrated violin concerto in D. All hat enthusiasm can possibly dictate as been showered on Fritz Kreisler o abundantly, and more than ever ust lately, that further panegyrics n his playing would be superfluous; ut let it be observed that though his erformance of the concerto last every way superb, he e seal of his individualand so make it pecuas in the case of the rto.

H. D. P.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING MAIL
Address New York
Date JAN [illegible]

Establishe

Boston Symphony Concert.

By SIGMUND SPAETH.

The last time Karl Muck brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New York he played two programmes of such marked eccentricity as to disturb even the habitual complacency of the subscribers. Yesterday he came again, and ironically jumped to the opposite extreme by presenting a combination of ultra-conventional numbers.

Obviously, however, the Boston orchestra is better liked as an interpreter of familiar classics than as an experimentalist in obscure idiosyncrasies. Its hearers would rather say, "At last I know how that composition should be played" than "I wonder if it could sound worse with a poor orchestra."

With such an attitude Dr. Muc should be well pleased, for to pl Mozart's Jupiter symphony, Wagne Faust overture and Siegfried's Id and Mendelssohn's violin concert even so superlatively well as he played them yesterday, can scarcely be called a heavy evening's work.

Fritz Kreisler was the first Boston soloist of the year, and he succeeded in spurring Mendelssohn's old war horse into new life and freshness. In many of the rapid passages he galloped ahead of his orchestra, and Dr. Muck often had trouble in keeping the pace. But the beautiful singing tone of the andante and the crisp energy of the final allegro more than made up for any minor misunderstandings.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date JAN 11 1915

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra charmed another crowded house at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon by their playing of Beethoven's eighth symphony, Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," Bach's Shepherd's Music from the Christmas Oratorio, and Liszt's "March of the Three Holy Kings." Fritz Kreisler, as the violin soloist in Bruch's fantasia on Scottish airs, evoked a demonstration.

k, 1884

From
Address: New York City
Date JAN

Establish

* * *

Not only a book to delight and interest music lovers, but an important record and a contribution to American musical history, is to be found in M. A. de Wolf Howe's "historical sketch" entitled "The Boston Symphony Orchestra." It is published by the Houghton Mifflin Company, a book of 280 pages. From it may be learned just what Mr. Henry L. Higginson's intentions and ideals were when he established the orchestra thirty-three years ago, what he has thought and said about it, and something of the trials and tribulations—and, let us add, of the joys and satisfactions—that he has experienced in these years that have crowned his work with such brilliant success. It is given to few men to realize a youthful ambition in so full a measure, or, in doing so, to perform so fine and much-needed a service for their country. It is no small thing, it is a great thing, to have created the finest orchestra in the world, to have made an established place for it, and, even more, to have imposed the high ideals toward art that such an orchestra implies. Americans ought to, and it is gratifying to think that they do, rise up and call Mr. Higginson blessed for the miracle he has wrought.

All this is a more than twice-told tale, and Mr. Higginson is secure in the gratitude and admiration of every music-loving American. But it is well to have the record so detailed, so gracefully and interestingly, so authoritatively set down as it is in Mr. Howe's book. He writes with an intimate knowledge of the conditions and surroundings into which Mr. Higginson dropped his bomb thirty-three years ago—for it was bomb-like in the surprise and, to a certain extent, the consternation it caused. At this distance it may be safe to say what has been suggested before, that Boston is a peculiar place, and in some respects its reception of Mr. Higginson's offer was peculiar. Under the circumstances a certain amount of hostility was inevitable. Mr. Howe's sense of humor enables him to set in their proper light the frame of mind and the more or less excited and ruffled comments that the new orchestra and Georg Henschel, its new conductor, and some of their methods caused. This gift horse was inspected in the mouth more than once, and some of the results are now very amusing, even instructive.

There are personal narratives about the conductors — Messrs. Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Pauer, Gericke again, Muck, Fiedler, and again Muck; about the circumstances of their coming and departure, and of their work; and some of these men have

---

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

KREISLER AT THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT

, 1884

Soldier-Musician Wins Plaudits at Infantry Hall.

NEW SYMPHONY BY ROPARTZ

French Composer Now Living Heard Here for First Time.—Mme. Schumann-Heink's Engagement Filled by Famous Violinist Just Returned from European War.

Seldom is it possible for a management to substitute one popular idol for another at short notice, but the announcement that Mme. Schumann-Heink was ill in Chicago and unable to fill her engagement to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert in Infantry Hall last evening, contained also the news that in her place Fritz Kreisler, the eminent Austrian violinist, would play.

Probably no other soloist would have been able to compensate for the immeasurable regret felt for the absence of the beloved contralto; certainly no instrumentalist other than Mr. Kreisler could have won so spontaneous a welcome.

Added to the recognition always accorded to the favorite violinist was the warmth of greeting to one returned from the jaws of death, and as Mr. Kreisler stood waiting for the rolling waves of applause to subside, he must have been assured of his firm hold on the affection of music lovers in this city.

Of his performance of Mendelssohn's Concerto in E-minor, it seems futile to attempt to speak adequately. All the beauty of tone, brilliancy of technique and humanity of expression with which the public has become familiar in his playing, was evident, for which the sentiment brought about by the thought of what might have been gave an additional capacity for appreciation.

The concerto is a familiar one to concertgoers here, but every one knows the hold that old melodies have upon the heart, and the symmetrical structure and exquisite orchestration of the composition were never more beautifully demonstrated than in the performance last evening.

Mr. Kreisler in faultless tones expressed the individuality of thought and style in every phrase of the composer, perfectly supported by the orchestra under Dr. Muck in the passionate strains of the first movement, through the beautiful andante to the rippling vivacity of the finale.

The large audience gave expression to its undeniable satisfaction by applause so sustained that it kept Mr. Kreisler bowing his acknowledgment for a considerable space of time. Four times he was recalled after he had left the stage, before the resumption of the programme which in its proper sequence was as follows:

Schumann.....Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81
Ropartz [illegible]
Brahms.....Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56a.
Mendelssohn-Bartholdy..Concerto in E-minor, for Violin, Op. 64.
I. Allegro molto appassionato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegretto non troppo, Allegro molto vivace.
Wagner...............Overture, "Tannhauser"

If the public has clamored for novelty as well as for variety, both were accorded last evening, in the foregoing programme,; each of the composers represented, standing for a distinct form of musical utterance in the last century or more.

The overtures with which the programme began and ended were as different as the men by whom they were written, but were equally well played, the Tannhauser overture in its grandeur, offering a fitting anti-climax.

Of the Ropartz symphony it is difficult to speak with authority since eminent critics disagreed at its earliest productions. The composer, Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz, born in France in 1864, was, at the age of 30, nominated director of the Conservatory of Music at Nancy, France, a position he still holds.

The symphony, composed in 1910, was played for the first time from manuscript in Paris, Oct. 15, 1911. Boston heard it first played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in October of this year, and in November, the Philharmonic Society, under Josef Stransky, played it in New York.

Ropartz, called by Vincent d'Indy, "a born symphonic writer," is one of the true pupils of Cesar Franck, under whom he studied after 1872.

He has shown himself faithful to his master, although critics, as has been said, disagree as to his inspiration and individuality. The symphony in three movements, connected without obvious breaks, was played without pause, and differs from the classical model in the manner of its development and thematic treatment.

To one who looked seriously for beauty, there was much to be found in the underlying themes suggestive of French folk-song, though often overborne by the overwhelming dissonances. Its conviction and sincerity lead one to believe that the composer was influenced by some underlying poetic idea. But if so he kept it to himself and gave no suggestion of it in the title. It quite vividly conveyed to the imaginative a sense of an outdoor concourse, with little threads of melody heard at intervals, and then lost in an overpowering clamor of various moods.

The "cyclic" formula was followed with contrasts and interplay, through the ascents and descents of musical measures and delicately incisive melodies, but in less systematic manner than employed by Cesar Franck.

In the hands of Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra its interpretation was what it should be, and as the seeker finds what he looks for, those who looked for beauty did not go unsatisfied, although its rhythms and harmonies were not for those who had been conventionally brought up.

To them there could have been no greater contrast than was afforded in the opening measures of the "chorale" theme by Josef Haydn, which followed the symphony. Its simple dignity was impressively set forth before it was intricately embroidered and ingeniously interwoven with the individuality of Brahms in his "Variations."

The composer had a fondness for variations on the themes of other composers, as if he recognized the unused possibilities in them and desired to give them new life by his ingenuity in presenting the material in new aspects, and the eight variations on Haydn's theme with finale afforded an appreciable addition to last evening's programme, which was of somewhat unusual length.

The fourth concert, for which the soloist has not yet been announced, will be given on Tuesday evening, Feb. 2.

A. W. C.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NEWS

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

Established:

NEW SYMPHONY PLAYED BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

This season's third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Lyric last evening, when an unusually arranged program was presented, the soloist, Fritz Kreisler, not appearing until the last number.

Two or three years ago Dr. Muck gave us a program made up almost entirely of novelties of the ultra-modern type, and this, at the time, caused some adverse criticism. Since then, whether by accident or design, we have heard comparatively little of the new school under Dr. Muck's baton, and perhaps for this reason more than usual interest was aroused last night by the prospect of an entirely new symphony by Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz.

No program annotations were needed to inform us that the composer was an ardent disciple of Cesar Franck; the mood, the construction, even the coloring to a great extent, were Cesar Franck's all through. The symphony is a noble work which will bear much repetition—mystic at times, always reserved and lofty in feeling and more utterly without bombast and pretentiousness than any modern work heard here for a long time.

It is essentially music that would appeal to the earnest musician and not to the general public, and, therefore, one could not help feeling great satisfaction at the really cordial reception given it by the audience last night, considering that [illegible] the elements that [illegible] —in-limaxes—were conspicuous by their bsence throughout.

Wagner's "Faust" overture, which ame first on the program, could well ave been dispensed with. No doubt arly experiments of the great masers like this have an interest all heir own to the musical connoisseur, ut they are quite out of place in the oncert programs of a city like Balimore, which is none too well acuainted with the masterpieces.

Dr. Muck's reading of Beethoven's ime-honored "Egmont" overture was ltogether unusual. The opening was aken at an extraordinarily slow empo, and it must be said, for this eason, in a more impressive way than we can ever recall; but the main part of the overture was played with a apidity almost equally extraordinary, and with just that inflexible rigidity and lack of rubato which characterized Dr. Muck's performance of Beethoven's C-minor symphony last year.

The last number was Beethoven's elebrated violin concerto in D. All hat enthusiasm can possibly dictate as been showered on Fritz Kreisler o abundantly, and more than ever ust lately, that further panegyrics n his playing would be superfluous; ut let it be observed that though his erformance of the concerto last ight was in every way superb, he d not set the seal of his individual-y upon it and so make it peculrly his own as in the case of the ahms concerto.

H. D. P.

Date

Establishe

Boston Symphony Concert.

By SIGMUND SPAETH.

The last time Karl Muck brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New York he played two programmes of such marked eccentricity as to disturb even the habitual complacency of the subscribers. Yesterday he came again, and ironically jumped to the opposite extreme by presenting a combination of ultra-conventional numbers.

Obviously, however, the Boston orchestra is better liked as an interpreter of familiar classics than as an experimentalist in obscure idiosyncrasies. Its hearers would rather say, "At last I know how that composition should be played" than "I wonder if it could sound worse with a poor orchestra."

With such an attitude Dr. Muck should be well pleased, for to play Mozart's Jupiter symphony, Wagner's Faust overture and Siegfried's Idyl and Mendelssohn's violin concerto, even so superlatively well as he played them yesterday, can scarcely be called a heavy evening's work.

Fritz Kreisler was the first Boston soloist of the year, and he succeeded in spurring Mendelssohn's old war horse into new life and freshness. In many of the rapid passages he galloped ahead of his orchestra, and Dr. Muck often had trouble in keeping the pace. But the beautiful singing tone of the andante and the crisp energy of the final allegro more than made up for any minor misunderstandings.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING WORLD

Address: New York City

Date JAN 11 1915

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra charmed another crowded house at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon by their playing of Beethoven's eighth symphony, Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," Bach's Shepherd's Music from the Christmas Oratorio, and Liszt's "March of the Three Holy Kings." Fritz Kreisler, as the violin soloist in Bruch's fantasia on Scotish airs, evoked a demonstration.

k, 1884

From

Address: New York City

Date JAN

Establish

Not only a book to delight and interest music lovers, but an important record and a contribution to American musical history, is to be found in M. A. de Wolf Howe's "historical sketch" entitled "The Boston Symphony Orchestra." It is published by the Houghton Mifflin Company, a book of 280 pages. From it may be learned just what Mr. Henry L. Higginson's intentions and ideals were when he established the orchestra thirty-three years ago, what he has thought and said about it, and something of the trials and tribulations—and, let us add, of the joys and satisfactions—that he has experienced in these years that have crowned his work with such brilliant success. It is given to few men to realize a youthful ambition in so full a measure, or, in doing so, to perform so fine and much-needed a service for their country. It is no small thing, it is a great thing, to have created the finest orchestra in the world, to have made an established place for it, and, even more, to have imposed the high ideals toward art that such an orchestra implies. Americans ought to, and it is gratifying to think that they do, rise up and call Mr. Higginson blessed for the miracle he has wrought.

All this is a more than twice-told tale, and Mr. Higginson is secure in the gratitude and admiration of every music-loving American. But it is well to have the record so detailed, so gracefully and interestingly, so authoritatively set down as it is in Mr. Howe's book. He writes with an intimate knowledge of the conditions and surroundings into which Mr. Higginson dropped his bomb thirty-three years ago—for it was bomb-like in the surprise and, to a certain extent, the consternation it caused. At this distance it may be safe to say what has been suggested before, that Boston is a peculiar place, and in some respects its reception of Mr. Higginson's offer was peculiar. Under the circumstances a certain amount of hostility was inevitable. Mr. Howe's sense of humor enables him to set in their proper light the frame of mind and the more or less excited and ruffled comments that the new orchestra and Georg Henschel, its new conductor, and some of their methods caused. This gift horse was inspected in the mouth more than once, and some of the results are now very amusing, even instructive.

There are personal narratives about the conductors — Messrs. Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Pauer, Gericke again, Muck, Fiedler, and again Muck; about the circumstances of their coming and departure, and of their work; and some of these men have [illegible]

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

, 1884

KREISLER AT THIRD YMPHONY CONCERT

Soldier-Musician Wins Plaudits at Infantry Hall.

NEW SYMPHONY BY ROPARTZ

French Composer Now Living Heard Here for First Time.—Mme. Schumann-Heink's Engagement Filled by Famous Violinist Just Returned from European War.

Seldom is it possible for a management to substitute one popular idol for another at short notice, but the announcement that Mme. Schumann-Heink was ill in Chicago and unable to fill her engagement to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert in Infantry Hall last evening, contained also the news that in her place Fritz Kreisler, the eminent Austrian violinist, would play.

Probably no other soloist would have been able to compensate for the immeasurable regret felt for the absence of the beloved contralto; certainly no instrumentalist other than Mr. Kreisler could have won so spontaneous a welcome.

Added to the recognition always accorded to the favorite violinist was the warmth of greeting to one returned from the jaws of death, and as Mr. Kreisler stood waiting for the rolling waves of applause to subside, he must have been assured of his firm hold on the affection of music lovers in this city.

Of his performance of Mendelssohn's Concerto in E-minor, it seems futile to attempt to speak adequately. All the beauty of tone, brilliancy of technique and humanity of expression with which the public has become familiar in his playing, was evident, for which the sentiment brought about by the thought of what might have been gave an additional capacity for appreciation.

The concerto is a familiar one to concertgoers here, but every one knows the hold that old melodies have upon the heart, and the symmetrical structure and exquisite orchestration of the composition were never more beautifully demonstrated than in the performance last evening.

Mr. Kreisler in faultless tones expressed the individuality of thought and style in every phrase of the composer, perfectly supported by the orchestra under Dr. Muck in the passionate strains of the first movement, through the beautiful andante to the rippling vivacity of the finale.

The large audience gave expression to its undeniable satisfaction by applause so sustained that it kept Mr. Kreisler bowing his acknowledgment for a considerable space of time. Four times he was recalled after he had left the stage, before the resumption of the programme which in its proper sequence was as follows:

Schumann.....Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81
Ropartz [illegible]
[illegible]
Brahms.....Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56a.
Mendelssohn-Bartholdy..Concerto in E-minor, for Violin, Op. 64.
I. Allegro molto appassionato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegretto non troppo, Allegro molto vivace.
Wagner...............Overture, "Tannhauser"

If the public has clamored for novelty as well as for variety, both were accorded last evening, in the foregoing programme,; each of the composers represented, standing for a distinct form of musical utterance in the last century or more.

The overtures with which the programme began and ended were as different as the men by whom they were written, but were equally well played, the Tannhauser overture in its grandeur, offering a fitting anti-climax.

Of the Ropartz symphony it is difficult to speak with authority since eminent critics disagreed at its earliest productions. The composer, Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz, born in France in 1864, was, at the age of 30, nominated director of the Conservatory of Music at Nancy, France, a position he still holds.

The symphony, composed in 1910, was played for the first time from manuscript in Paris, Oct. 15, 1911. Boston heard it first played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in October of this year, and in November, the Philharmonic Society, under Josef Stransky, played it in New York.

Ropartz, called by Vincent d'Indy, "a born symphonic writer," is one of the true pupils of Cesar Franck, under whom he studied after 1872.

He has shown himself faithful to his master, although critics, as has been said, disagree as to his inspiration and individuality. The symphony in three movements, connected without obvious breaks, was played without pause, and differs from the classical model in the manner of its development and thematic treatment.

To one who looked seriously for beauty, there was much to be found in the underlying themes suggestive of French folk-song, though often overborne by the overwhelming dissonances. Its conviction and sincerity lead one to believe that the composer was influenced by some underlying poetic idea. But if so he kept it to himself and gave no suggestion of it in the title. It quite vividly conveyed to the imaginative a sense of an outdoor concourse, with little threads of melody heard at intervals, and then lost in an overpowering clamor of various moods.

The "cyclic" formula was followed with contrasts and interplay, through the ascents and descents of musical measures and delicately incisive melodies, but in less systematic manner than employed by Cesar Franck.

In the hands of Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra its interpretation was what it should be, and as the seeker finds what he looks for, those who looked for beauty did not go unsatisfied, although its rhythms and harmonies were not for those who had been conventionally brought up.

To them there could have been no greater contrast than was afforded in the opening measures of the "chorale" theme by Josef Haydn, which followed the symphony. Its simple dignity was impressively set forth before it was intricately embroidered and ingeniuously interwoven with the individuality of Brahms in his "Variations."

The composer had a fondness for variations on the themes of other composers, as if he recognized the unused possibilities in them and desired to give them new life by his ingenuity in presenting the material in new aspects, and the eight variations on Haydn's theme with finale afforded an appreciable addition to last evening's programme, which was of somewhat unusual length.

The fourth concert, for which the soloist has not yet been announced, will be given on Tuesday evening, Feb. 2.

A. W. C.

BOSTON JOURNAL,

JANUARY 16,

BRAHMS SYMPHONY WORTHILY PLAYED

Dr. Muck and Orchestra Are Given an Ovation by Audience.

The superlatively fine quality of the Symphony program and performance attained last week, when Liszt's "Faust" symphony was featured, is marked again this week.

The place of honor on this eleventh program of the season is given to Brahms' first symphony, a composition of indubitably classic worth, though it was not liked—not understood, that is, and duly appreciated—when it was introduced here late in the '70s. The representative Boston critic of those days said that it was in "some sense great," but that "certainly it cannot be popular." Now it is recognized as in many senses great; and it is indeed popular, for crowds always come to hear it.

Moreover, it has become the custom for conductors to lavish upon the performance of it all their art and feeling, with the result that its performance is almost invariably attended by an ovation for conductor and orchestra. This was exactly what happened yesterday.

Dr. Muck's reading of it is clear and sympathetic, enthusiastic, yet reverential. Great expectations were aroused by the announcement that Dr. Muck would conduct it for the first time in nearly two years. In the interim it has been played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra, and with considerable success; but yesterday's performance was successful to a brilliant degree. The composition took on an epic grandeur worthy of comparison with that which distinguishes Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony, and the artists under Dr. Muck's baton, and especially the soloists, performed with zest and with the utmost beauty of effect.

Between the Brahms' masterpiece and Mozart's sparkling "Magic Flute" overture came two numbers by Oskar Fried, a composer now living in Berlin, and, to some extent, a protege of Dr. Muck. The prelude and double fugue for string orchestra was played once before under Dr. Muck's direction, but the adagio and scherzo for wind instruments, harps and kettledrums is new to Symphony programs. Fried's music is light and agreeable. The scherzo is particularly graceful and vivacious.

The same program will be offered tonight. Next week's concerts give promise of being equally notable. Ferruccio Busoni, the eminent Italian pianist, is announced to appear as soloist. He sailed only a week ago from Genoa and there seems to be a little doubt regarding the certainty of his appearance. But if the ship should get in on time he will come to play the Liszt concerto in E flat major. Otherwise the Liszt number will give way to Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture. The big orchestral numbers will be the Sibelius symphony in E minor and the Strauss tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathzustra." Dr. Muck has never before conducted the prodigious Strauss piece in America and he has already worked the orchestra to a high pitch of enthusiasm over his dramatic interpretation of it.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

JANUARY 16,

BRAHMS SYMPHONY CONCERT FEATURE

Audience Enthuses Over Dr. Muck's Great Reading of Number.

Brahms' first symphony, coldly received and all but rejected when first heard, was yesterday afternoon most enthusiastically received as the first number on the weekly program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The audience not only recalled and recalled Dr. Muck at its close but would not be content until he had called upon the players to share in the tribute. Its only fair to say that those who first heard the symphony were not, in all probability, favored with such an artistic interpretation as Dr. Muck's, neither did the conductor lead a band of such peerless players. The first movement, rather for the musician than the average audience, gives one the impression of a dissatisfied man groping, with just a hint at its close of the search promising success. Thereafter there is some of the most delightful music heard at the symphony concerts.

Fried's selection for the strings and that for the wind instruments afforded a fine chance to estimate the great abilities of these sections of the orchestra, but were hardly interesting enough to enthuse the layman.

[illegible] "Magic Flute" overture [illegible] with the desire that Moz has been more appreciative of the beauties of the flute when played by such a master as Mr. Maquarre.

---

Symphony to Play "Zarathustra"

Dr. Muck proposes to give his first performance in Boston of Richard Strauss's gigantic tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," at next week's concerts. In the 4½ years (his first and present engagement) Dr. Muck has been in Boston he has played only one of Strauss's later tone poems, "The Symphonia Domestica," and has drawn on Strauss chiefly for the early poems, "Till Eulenspiegel," "Don Juan" and "Death and Transfiguration." The first number on the program will be the first symphony in E-minor of Sibelius. The symphony heads the program and is followed by "Zarathustra." Ferruccio Busoni is scheduled to be the soloist, playing Liszt's concerto in E-flat major, No. 1. Mr. Busoni is now on the Atlantic. In the event of Mr. Busoni failing to arrive in time Beethoven's "Leonora III." will be substituted for the final number.

ELEVENTH REHEARSAL.

Jan 16 Globe

Dr Muck Plays Brahms' First Symphony.

Performance Noble One; Two Pieces by Fried for Strings and Wind.

Dr Muck has labored for wider recognition of Oskar Fried, whose activities as composer and conductor in Berlin, in other German cities and in Russia have made his name familiar in the musical journals. He played two of his pieces at the 11th Symphony rehearsal yesterday. Fried is said to be an intimate friend of Richard Strauss and to have been his candidate for the directorship of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra following the death of Gustave Mahler.

What has become of the opera "Christopher Columbus," which Fried was reported a few years ago to be writing? It was to have been completed in 1913. Reinhardt was at work on the production. The entire action was to take place on board the explorer's ship. There was to be one act of three scenes, one of them containing a vision of Queen Isabella, who urges him on in the hour of discouragement. The Italian banker-baron, Franchetti, wrote an opera on this subject for the 400th anniversary of the discovery of the New World, celebrated at Genoa. It was given a short-lived revival by the Chicago company.

The two compositions heard yesterday were the "prelude and double fugue for grand orchestra of strings," op. 10, and the "adagio and scherzo for wind instruments, two harps and kettledrums," op. 2. The ideas in the latter are not of great consequence, nor does the treatment conceal signs of immaturity. The prelude and fugue shows Fried's fondness for the archaic in style. While disclosing also contrapuntal learning, it combines with it beauty of a high order. There is dignity, at times loftiness of thought. There is the touch of a man reticent, introspective, individual, not desiring nor bidding for general applause. While the performance of both was admirable, the richness, the incomparable tone quality of the strings was to be remarked.

While other matters claim respect and attention, the feature of the afternoon was Dr Muck's interpretation of Brahms' first symphony. There were the qualities of great interpretation—the penetrating sense of the emotional character of each movement, the regard for each as an organic structure, the keen perception of the dramatic element, of the lyric, of the nature of arioso as set off against recitative, the eloquent dynamic scale that made each bar a thing of relative value to the context, a strand in a moving tapestry in which all was woven to express the master design.

That there was clearness and euphony in the orchestral delivery of the parts was to be expected. Mr Witek's bars of melody with horn and oboe, Mr Longy's art and the polished phrasing of Mr Sand, the new clarinet, made the slow movement a song of virtuosi. It but remained for Dr Muck to read the work in an epic manner, with an elasticity which blended poetry with the heroic. Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute" summed up the mozartian grace, elegance and the mozartian flourish.

The program next week will be a noteworthy one—Sibelius' first symphony, Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and Liszt's first concerto, with Mr Busoni soloist.

BOSTON POST.

JANUARY 16,

DR. MUCK TRIUMPHS ONCE MORE

GivesMaster-Reading of Brahms at Symphony

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Brahms C minor symphony, Oscar Fried's Prelude and Double Fugue for orchestra of strings, the same composer's Adagio and Scherzo for concerts), and Mozart's overture to the opera "The Magic Flute," made the programme of the 11th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

ADMIRABLY PERFORMED

The performance of Brahms' symphony was admirable in every respect. There are those who continue to inveigh against this work and the music of Brahms in general, but the composer's position in symphonic music seems secure in spite of it all. In fact, the great symphony in C minor has become the war-horse of more than one great conductor, and also one of the popular symphonies of the modern orchestral repertoire. Audiences flock to hear it. Conductors find that the score offers material of never-ending interest for study and exposition. True, the instrumentation could be more brilliant here and there. Undoubtedly Brahms was too worshipful of the Beethoven orchestra, or else by nature so unalterably opposed to the endless richness of coloring brought about by Wagner and other contemporaries that he erred on the side of soberness and continence of coloring.

The C minor symphony would surely be more effective if certain passages were rescored. The same thing is true of some places in the ninth symphony of Beethoven, and of a hundred other orchestral master works besides. Who will rescore them? When such attempts have been made, it is found that the composer's secret died with him. Acts of unintentional vandalism are performed when the self-styled friend of the composer sets out to assist him in this manner.

Follows Brahm's Idea

The greatness of Dr. Muck's performance lay in the fact that while he revealed every possible nuance in the score, every bit of color, the last spark of dramatic fire, he did this in a spirit wholly subservient to the intentions of the composer. There was no thought of sensational effects. The number of wood wind players made certain wind parts, if memory serves, heavier and more effective than in the original score. With this exception, no reading could have shown a more faithful study of the score. Yet many a faithful student, in his reverence for the letter, loses the spirit of the music that he undertakes to interpret. In spite of his attention to the smallest details Dr. Muck was en rapport with the composer throughout. Rarely has he given a more finished and eloquent performance. The remarkable balance of technical, intellectual and emotional qualities which go to make his art have seldom been more warmly admired.

Oscar Fried's Music

The music, by Oscar Fried, has been heard before in this city. Dr. Muck produced the prelude and fugue here in 1907. The adagio and scherzo, heard for the first time at the Symphony concert, was produced by the Longy Club in 1905. The story of Fried's life is not less interesting than his music. Poverty-stricken, a Bohemian, an inveterate wanderer, Fried had travelled over much of Europe, often with only the soles of his shoes for a lodging place. He has been now a tramp on the highway, now a member of a musical organization of long and high standing. The prelude and fugue are melanchoy in their mood.

The music is very well put together, with strength and mastery. The adagio and scherzo are in romantic vein, rather Weberish in spirit. They were well received.

At the Symphony concerts of next week Mr. Busoni will be the soloist. There was apprehension that his vessel would not arrive in time. He will play Liszt's E-flat concerto. The orchestral numbers will be Sibelius's first symphony in A-minor, and Richard Straus' tone-poem, of which the orchestra has been making a fresh study, 'Thus Spake Zarathustra.'"

BOSTON POST,

JANUARY 15,

NEW HAND GUIDES THE SYMPHONY

Ernst Schmidt Proves Competency in Cambridge

The majority of those who attended the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Cambridge were unprepared for the surprise which awaited them when in place of Dr. Karl Muck, Ernst Schmidt, the newly appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took the conductor's stand.

Dr. Muck had been taken with a severe cold, and on the advice of his physician had decided to remain in his home for the evening rather than risk being further incapacitated for duty. Mr. Schmidt, with less than 12 hours' notice, conducted the perform-

A CAPABLE CONDUCTOR

He was quick to prove his sincerity and his marked ability for his task. He had to conduct the "Egmont" overture of Beethoven; the accompaniment of Beethoven's violin concerto, with Mr. Witek, concertmeister of the orchestra, as soloist, and the Surprise symphony of Haydn and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture. A programme not of too taxing a character for a conductor's first appearance, but a programme, nevertheless, compelling ability of the highest order to do the occasion justice. The accompaniment of the concerto was conducted by Mr. Schmidt, with the most admirable sympathy and attention to the needs of the soloist, with entire control of the orchestral body, with a very nice adjustment of tempi and tone values.

The virtue of Mr. Schmidt's performance lay especially in his quiet authority and control, and in the ability of the orchestra to perform its task satisfactorily. A glance here, a nod there, an occasional gesture of reminder were sufficient. The musicians felt themselves to be in competent hands; the conductor appreciated the capacities of the musicians with whom he had to deal.

Mr. Schmidt is farthest from the young conductor of talent and appetite for public applause. No one is less ostentatious than he on the stage. Last night on the stage he was entirely immersed in his task. Back of the stage, during the intermission, he was intent upon the score, refreshing his memory of Haydn's symphony and not more disposed to take his mind from the task before him. Mr. Schmidt is unquestionably an exceedingly competent conductor, a musician of experience and of authority because of his will to give all that can be given to the interpretation of the music.

The orchestral performances were solid and brilliant. With ample reason, Mr. Wittek was very warmly applauded for his solo. He gave, indeed, a thrice admirable interpretation of the work. The audience was a large one and quick to give signs of its approval.

ADVERTISER
JAN-16

THE SYMPHONY THIS WEEK

PROGRAMME THOROUGHLY CLASSICAL—NO SOLOIST

Brahms, Fried and Mozart the Contributors—Concert Thoroughly Enjoyable

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Brahms—First Symphony, C minor.
Fried—Prelude and double fugue for string orchestra.
Adagio and Scherzo for wind instruments, harps and kettle-drum.
Mozart—Overture to "The Magic Flute."

Entirely classical and entirely orchestral. We confess to being conservative enough to thoroughly enjoy just such a programme, when it is given by a really great orchestra. In such a concert we do not wish for the display of a solo singer, and the instrumental soloist only seems in place when he ceases to be an independent factor and merges himself in a really orchestral concerto.

We remember a time when Brahms's symphonies (and especially the first) were held to be beyond the comprehension of the average symphony auditor. Those were the paleolithic days of Musical Boston, when Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner were looked upon somewhat as the religious ascetic looks upon the world, the flesh and the gentleman who (according to Billy Sunday) holds Boston in his clutches. We are making musical history very quickly in these days, and Brahms is almost set back among the antiques by the tonal radicals of today.

Nevertheless, Dr. Muck has already shown us that Brahms can be made modern, dramatic, and even romantic. No one of the audience at the concert of his first season can ever forget how he made us sit up and thrill with astonishment and delight, when he read this first symphony, several years ago. He did something like this in yesterday's interpretation, although the element of surprise was no longer there, we had come to expect something great, and we certainly received it. We believe Dr. Muck's influence is so healthy that a good, long course of his symphony programmes may cure his auditors of the modern fever which is raging in music just now, an illness which causes a craving for the most indigestible stuff imaginable, and a departure from musical common sense.

There is nothing new to tell about the performance of the Brahms symphony. It was enjoyable, logical, beautiful music, and it was read in a manner that removed the work very far from the pedantry with which Brahms is sometimes (and not always unjustly) accused. One might speak a special word about the excellence of the brasses in the Intermezzo and in the great chorale of the finale. The first and last movements were the especial glory of the performance, and the string pizzicato of the Finale was finely given. At the end there was very great enthusiasm, and finally the orchestra was made to rise; but in this case the tribute was meant not to the musicians, great as they were, but to the soul of the orchestra—Dr. Muck.

After that there came a Fried double fugue. Let no one imagine that this is a citation from a Bill of Fare; Oskar Fried (if he has not yet been sent to the firing line) is in Berlin, where, if we may judge from Richard Strauss's Domestic Symphony, they have double fugues for breakfast. The double-barrelled fugue is a dangerous weapon to handle, yet it can sometimes be made attractive, as witness the

BOSTON JOURNAL—

JANUARY 16,

BRAHMS SYMPHONY WORTHILY PLAYED

Dr. Muck and Orchestra Are Given an Ovation by Audience.

The superlatively fine quality of the Symphony program and performance attained last week, when Liszt's "Faust" symphony was featured, is marked again this week.

The place of honor on this eleventh program of the season is given to Brahms' first symphony, a composition of indubitably classic worth, though it was not liked—not understood, that is, and duly appreciated—when it was introduced here late in the '70s. The representative Boston critic of those days said that it was in "some sense great," but that "certainly it cannot be popular." Now it is recognized as in many senses great; and it is indeed popular, for crowds always come to hear it.

Moreover, it has become the custom for conductors to lavish upon the performance of it all their art and feeling, with the result that its performance is almost invariably attended by an ovation for conductor and orchestra. This was exactly what happened yesterday.

Dr. Muck's reading of it is clear and sympathetic, enthusiastic, yet reverential. Great expectations were aroused by the announcement that Dr. Muck would conduct it for the first time in nearly two years. In the interim it has been played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra, and with considerable success; but yesterday's performance was successful to a brilliant degree. The composition took on an epic grandeur worthy of comparison with that which distinguishes Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony, and the artists under Dr. Muck's baton, and especially the soloists, performed with zest and with the utmost beauty of effect.

Between the Brahms' masterpiece and Mozart's sparkling "Magic Flute" overture came two numbers by Oskar Fried, a composer now living in Berlin, and, to some extent, a protege of Dr. Muck. The prelude and double fugue for string orchestra was played once before under Dr. Muck's direction, but the adagio and scherzo for wind instruments, harps and kettledrums is new to Symphony programs. Fried's music is light and agreeable. The scherzo is particularly graceful and vivacious.

The same program will be offered tonight. Next week's concerts give promise of being equally notable. Ferruccio Busoni, the eminent Italian pianist, is announced to appear as soloist. He sailed only a week ago from Genoa and there seems to be a little doubt regarding the certainty of his appearance. But if the ship should get in on time he will come to play the Liszt concerto in E flat major. Otherwise the Liszt number will give way to Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture. The big orchestral numbers will be the Sibelius symphony in E minor and the Strauss tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathzustra." Dr. Muck has never before conducted the prodigious Strauss piece in America and he has already worked the orchestra to a high pitch of enthusiasm over his dramatic interpretation of it.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

JANUARY 16,

BRAHMS SYMPHONY CONCERT FEATURE

Audience Enthuses Over Dr. Muck's Great Reading of Number.

Brahms' first symphony, coldly received and all but rejected when first heard, was yesterday afternoon most enthusiastically received as the first number on the weekly program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The audience not only recalled and recalled Dr. Muck at its close but would not be content until he had called upon the players to share in the tribute. Its only fair to say that those who first heard the symphony were not, in all probability, favored with such an artistic interpretation as Dr. Muck's, neither did the conductor lead a band of such peerless players. The first movement, rather for the musician than the average audience, gives one the impression of a dissatisfied man groping, with just a hint at its close of the search promising success. Thereafter there is some of the most delightful music heard at the symphony concerts.

Fried's selection for the strings and that for the wind instruments afforded a fine chance to estimate the great abilities of these sections of the orchestra, but were hardly interesting enough to enthuse the layman.

Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture [illegible] with the desire that Mozart had been more appreciative of the beauties of the flute when played by such a master as Mr. Maquarre.

Symphony to Play "Zarathustra"

Dr. Muck proposes to give his first performance in Boston of Richard Strauss's gigantic tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," at next week's concerts. In the 4½ years (his first and present engagement) Dr. Muck has been in Boston he has played only one of Strauss's later tone poems, "The Symphonia Domestica," and has drawn on Strauss chiefly for the early poems, "Till Eulenspiegel," "Don Juan" and "Death and Transfiguration." The first number on the program will be the first symphony in E-minor of Sibelius. The symphony heads the program and is followed by "Zarathustra." Ferruccio Busoni is scheduled to be the soloist, playing Liszt's concerto in E-flat major, No. 1. Mr. Busoni is now on the Atlantic. In the event of Mr. Busoni failing to arrive in time Beethoven's "Leonora III." will be substituted for the final number.

ELEVENTH REHEARSAL.

Jan 16 Globe

Dr Muck Plays Brahms' First Symphony.

Performance Noble One; Two Pieces by Fried for Strings and Wind.

Dr Muck has labored for wider recognition of Oskar Fried, whose activities as composer and conductor in Berlin, in other German cities and in Russia have made his name familiar in the musical journals. He played two of his pieces at the 11th Symphony rehearsal yesterday. Fried is said to be an intimate friend of Richard Strauss and to have been his candidate for the directorship of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra following the death of Gustave Mahler.

What has become of the opera "Christopher Columbus," which Fried was reported a few years ago to be writing? It was to have been completed in 1913. Reinhardt was at work on the production. The entire action was to take place on board the explorer's ship. There was to be one act of three scenes, one of them containing a vision of Queen Isabella, who urges him on in the hour of discouragement. The Italian banker-baron, Franchetti, wrote an opera on this subject for the 400th anniversary of the discovery of the New World, celebrated at Genoa. It was given a short-lived revival by the Chicago company.

The two compositions heard yesterday were the "prelude and double fugue for grand orchestra of strings," op. 10, and the "adagio and scherzo for wind instruments, two harps and kettledrums," op. 2. The ideas in the latter are not of great consequence, nor does the treatment conceal signs of immaturity. The prelude and fugue shows Fried's fondness for the archaic in style. While disclosing also contrapuntal learning, it combines with it beauty of a high order. There is dignity, at times loftiness of thought. There is the touch of a man reticent, introspective, individual, not desiring nor bidding for general applause. While the performance of both was admirable, the richness, the incomparable tone quality of the strings was to be remarked.

While other matters claim respect and attention, the feature of the afternoon was Dr Muck's interpretation of Brahms' first symphony. There were the qualities of great interpretation—the penetrating sense of the emotional character of each movement, the regard for each as an organic structure, the keen perception of the dramatic element, of the lyric, of the nature of arioso as set off against recitative, the eloquent dynamic scale that made each bar a thing of relative value to the context, a strand in a moving tapestry in which all was woven to express the master design.

That there was clearness and euphony in the orchestral delivery of the parts was to be expected. Mr Witek's bars of melody with horn and oboe, Mr Longy's art and the polished phrasing of Mr Sand, the new clarinet, made the slow movement a song of virtuosi. It but remained for Dr Muck to read the work in an epic manner, with an elasticity which blended poetry with the heroic. Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute" summed up the mozartian grace, elegance and the mozartian flourish.

The program next week will be a noteworthy one—Sibelius' first symphony, Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and Liszt's first concerto, with Mr Busoni soloist.

BOSTON POST,

JANUARY 16,

DR. MUCK TRIUMPHS ONCE MORE

GivesMaster-Reading of Brahms at Symphony

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Brahms C minor symphony, Oscar Fried's Prelude and Double Fugue for orchestra of strings, the same composer's Adagio and Scherzo for wind instruments, two harps and kett [illegible] concerts), and Mozart's overture to the opera, "The Magic Flute," made the programme of the 11th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

ADMIRABLY PERFORMED

The performance of Brahms' symphony was admirable in every respect. There are those who continue to inveigh against this work and the music of Brahms in general, but the composer's position in symphonic music seems secure in spite of it all. In fact, the great symphony in C minor has become the war-horse of more than one great conductor, and also one of the popular symphonies of the modern orchestral repertoire. Audiences flock to hear it. Conductors find that the score offers material of never-ending interest for study and exposition. True, the instrumentation could be more brilliant here and there. Undoubtedly Brahms was too worshipful of the Beethoven orchestra, or else by nature so unalterably opposed to the endless richness of coloring brought about by Wagner and other contemporaries that he erred on the side of soberness and continence of coloring.

The C minor symphony would surely be more effective if certain passages were rescored. The same thing is true of some places in the ninth symphony of Beethoven, and of a hundred other orchestral master works besides. Who will rescore them? When such attempts have been made, it is found that the composer's secret died with him. Acts of unintentional vandalism are performed when the self-styled friend of the composer sets out to assist him in this manner.

Follows Brahm's Idea

The greatness of Dr. Muck's performance lay in the fact that while he revealed every possible nuance in the score, every bit of color, the last spark of dramatic fire, he did this in a spirit wholly subservient to the intentions of the composer. There was no thought of sensational effects. The number of wood wind players made certain wind parts, if memory serves, heavier and more effective than in the original score. With this exception, no reading could have shown a more faithful study of the score. Yet many a faithful student, in his reverence for the letter, loses the spirit of the music that he undertakes to interpret. In spite of his attention to the smallest details Dr. Muck was en rapport with the composer throughout. Rarely has he given a more finished and eloquent performance. The remarkable balance of technical, intellectual and emotional qualities which go to make his art have seldom been more warmly admired.

Oscar Fried's Music

The music, by Oscar Fried, has been heard before in this city. Dr. Muck produced the prelude and fugue here in 1907. The adagio and scherzo, heard for the first time at the Symphony concert, was produced by the Longy Club in 1905. The story of Fried's life is not less interesting than his music. Poverty-stricken, a Bohemian, an inveterate wanderer, Fried had travelled over much of Europe, often with only the soles of his shoes for a lodging place. He has been now a tramp on the highway, now a member of a musical organization of long and high standing. The prelude and fugue are melanchoy in their mood.

The music is very well put together, with strength and mastery. The adagio and scherzo are in romantic vein, rather Weberish in spirit. They were well received.

At the Symphony concerts of next week Mr. Busoni will be the soloist. There was apprehension that his vessel would not arrive in time. He will play Liszt's E-flat concerto. The orchestral numbers will be Sibelius's first symphony in A-minor, and Richard Straus' tone-poem, of which the orchestra has been making a fresh study, 'Thus Spake Zarathustra.'

BOSTON POST,

JANUARY 15,

NEW HAND GUIDES THE SYMPHONY

Ernst Schmidt Proves Competency in Cambridge

The majority of those who attended the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Cambridge were unprepared for the surprise which awaited them when in place of Dr. Karl Muck, Ernst Schmidt, the newly appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took the conductor's stand.

Dr. Muck had been taken with a severe cold, and on the advice of his physician had decided to remain at his home for the evening rather than risk being further incapacitated for duty. Mr. Schmidt, with less than 12 hours' notice, conducted the perform-

A CAPABLE CONDUCTOR

He was quick to prove his sincerity and his marked ability for his task. He had to conduct the "Egmont" overture of Beethoven; the accompaniment of Beethoven's violin concerto, with Mr. Witek, concertmeister of the orchestra, as soloist, and the Surprise symphony of Haydn and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture. A programme not of too taxing a character for a conductor's first appearance, but a programme, nevertheless, compelling ability of the highest order to do the occasion justice. The accompaniment of the concerto was conducted by Mr. Schmidt, with the most admirable sympathy and attention to the needs of the solist, with entire control of the orchestral body, with a very nice adjustment of tempi and tone values.

The virtue of Mr. Schmidt's performance lay especially in his quiet authority and control, and in the ability of the orchestra to perform its task satisfactorily. A glance here, a nod there, an occasional gesture of reminder were sufficient. The musicians felt themselves to be in competent hands; the conductor appreciated the capacities of the musicians with whom he had to deal.

Mr. Schmidt is farthest from the young conductor of talent and appetite for public applause. No one is less ostentatious than he on the stage. Last night on the stage he was entirely immersed in his task. Back of the stage, during the intermission, he was intent upon the score, refreshing his memory of Haydn's symphony and not more disposed to take his mind from the task before him. Mr. Schmidt is unquestionably an exceedingly competent conductor, a musician of experience and of authority because of his will to give all that can be given to the interpretation of the music.

The orchestral performances were solid and brilliant. With ample reason, Mr. Wittek was very warmly applauded for his solo. He gave, indeed, a thrice admirable interpretation of the work. The audience was a large one and quick to give signs of its approval.

ADVERTISER
JAN - 16

THE SYMPHONY THIS WEEK

PROGRAMME THOROUGHLY CLASSICAL—NO SOLOIST

Brahms, Fried and Mozart the Contributors—Concert Thoroughly Enjoyable

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Brahms—First Symphony, C minor.
Fried—Prelude and double fugue for string orchestra.
Adagio and Scherzo for wind instruments, harps and kettle-drum.
Mozart—Overture to "The Magic Flute."

Entirely classical and entirely orchestral. We confess to being conservative enough to thoroughly enjoy just such a programme, when it is given by a really great orchestra. In such a concert we do not wish for the display of a solo singer, and the instrumental soloist only seems in place when he ceases to be an independent factor and merges himself in a really orchestral concerto.

We remember a time when Brahms's symphonies (and especially the first) were held to be beyond the comprehension of the average symphony auditor. Those were the paleolithic days of Musical Boston, when Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner were looked upon somewhat as the religious ascetic looks upon the world, the flesh and the gentleman who (according to Billy Sunday) holds Boston in his clutches. We are making musical history very quickly in these days, and Brahms is almost set back among the antiques by the tonal radicals of today.

Nevertheless, Dr. Muck has already shown us that Brahms can be made modern, dramatic, and even romantic. No one of the audience at the concert of his first season can ever forget how he made us sit up and thrill with astonishment and delight, when he read this first symphony, several years ago. He did something like this in yesterday's interpretation, although the element of surprise was no longer there, we had come to expect something great, and we certainly received it. We believe Dr. Muck's influence is so healthy that a good, long course of his symphony programmes may cure his auditors of the modern fever which is raging in music just now, an illness which causes a craving for the most indigestible stuff imaginable, and a departure from musical common sense.

There is nothing new to tell about the performance of the Brahms symphony. It was enjoyable, logical, beautiful music, and it was read in a manner that removed the work very far from the pedantry with which Brahms is sometimes (and not always unjustly) accused. One might speak a special word about the excellence of the brasses in the Intermezzo and in the great chorale of the finale. The first and last movements were the especial glory of the performance, and the string pizzicato of the Finale was finely given. At the end there was very great enthusiasm, and finally the orchestra was made to rise; but in this case the tribute was meant not to the musicians, great as they were, but to the soul of the orchestra—Dr. Muck.

After that there came a Fried double fugue. Let no one imagine that this is a citation from a Bill of Fare; Oskar Fried (if he has not yet been sent to the firing line) is in Berlin, where, if we may judge from Richard Strauss's Domestic Symphony, they have double fugues for breakfast. The double-barrelled fugue is a dangerous weapon to handle, yet it can sometimes be made attractive, as witness the one in Mozart's [illegible] ("Kyrie Eleison"), or that other melodic double-header, "He sole on High," and "Glory to His Name," in Haydn's "Creation," but for all that the double-fugue is generally music for musicians, while the laity remain simply wondering if the parts will ever catch up with each other. As the fugue was for strings only, the finest part of our orchestra had an opportunity to prove once more that they are incomparably the best band of strings in this country, or probably in the world.

The double-fugue was not pedantic, but a good modern example of what can be done in this form which the older writers have used so copiously that new fugue subjects are impossible to invent. There was a degree of attractiveness in the work, when one considers the amount of learning displayed, the strict rules that had to be followed, but it was rather lugubrious at times. We fancy that, if given in New York, the Fried fugue would be roasted.

One may recall the boarder in a western mining town who begged the waiter to bring him the butter and the hairs on separate plates. Perhaps Dr. Muck was actuated by some such impulse, when, having served up the strings in one composition, he presented the woodwind in another. The Adagio and Scherzo reminded us, in their make-up, of the novelties in this field which M. Longy manages to unearth so constantly for the concerts of the club which bears his name, and we were not surprised to hear that the Longy Club had given it. But the work had more than woodwind instruments, it gave the rare combination of two harps and also a pair of Kettle-drums. It is high time that our Kettle-drummer should come into the limelight. He has thundered upon his calfskins most artistically for a long time, and has shown that even this single-toned instrument has a tone-color which is, let us say—striking.

We wish that sometime, just for the oddity of the thing, Dr. Muck might give Tausch's concerto for Kettle-drum, in which five of those instruments are played by a single performer, and, while he is about it, we might have Beethoven's almost vanished "Battle of Vittoria," which would also give the bass-drums a chance.

But in the Adagio and Scherzo the Kettle-drum was rather repressed than otherwise. Nor did we find anything remarkably new in the Adagio. The Scherzo, however, was agreeable music and displayed the unusual combination of three flutes, two oboes, clarinettes, bassoons and harps, and English horn, Bass clarinette, contra bassoons, and Kettle-drums, to good advantages. It was not, however, a work to grow very enthusiastic over, even while enjoying it.

At the end of the concert there came Mozart's exhilarating musical champagne, in the shape of the "Magic Flute overture." Here again is an instance of how learning and melody can meet on common ground. The non-musician hears only a charmingly chattering set of tunes, while the student finds the most symmetrical fugal exposition in the work. It is odd, by the way, that Mozart, even in "The Magic Flute," did not use the flute very prominently. He disliked the instrument and never would put it in the foreground as Mendelsshon did. This is true in spite of Mozart's concerto for Harp and Flute, which he wrote merely for money,—which he did not get.

Of course the reading of the overture was very brilliant. We always dissent, however, from the break-neck speed at which the opening fugal work is taken. Every great conductor takes it thus, yet we feel sure that Mozart would not have rushed it thus, but would have allowed some of its beauties to be better perceived by the auditor through the medium of a less helter-skelter tempo. But the overture made a very successful ending to a concert which proved that even a thoroughly classical list can be heartily enjoyed by the general public, after they have been trained to the hearing of good music.

TRANSCRIPT,
JANUARY 16,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

TWO GRAVE PIECES BY OSKAR FRIED

The Wild, Wayward and Contrasting Past and the Unusual Man Behind Them—Dr. Muck Summons Again the Latent Energy, Beauty and Emotion of Brahms's First Symphony—The Players and Their Share

IF Mahler had warmed to a proposal to become the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra when he was sounded in the matter not so many years ago, probably Oskar Fried would have come to Boston with him. Mahler, who already mistrusted his nervous strength, insisted upon an assistant and Mr. Fried was his clear preference. Nothing came of the negotiations and Mr. Fried went his conducting way in Berlin and Petrograd. He has his ambitions toward the Western world, but the likelihood is that we in Boston shall know him for long only by the two orchestral pieces that Dr. Muck, who has often stood his friend, included in the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. For a composer in his forty-fourth year, Mr. Fried has written relatively little, preferring to give his time and energy to the arts of the conductor, in which he is ambitious to excel. Moreover, his best and most characteristic music lies in choral pieces of the sort that almost never, nowadays, makes its way into our concerts. A setting of Zarathustra's "Trunkne Lied" for solo voices, mixed chorus and orchestra, first heard in Berlin through the efforts of Dr. Muck, made his reputation; and subsequently another choral piece, "Erntelied," for men's choir and full orchestra, confirmed it. Both are of large and intricate dimensions; both are written in a highly modern idiom with abounding imagination, ingenuity and large sweeps of power and both are severely exacting in performance. American choral societies—except the Mendelssohn Choir—would hardly succeed with them; where would they find a conductor able to grapple with them and what care their audiences for any presumptuous modern, were he Bach himself? No more likely of performance, unless Dr. Muck should some day be minded to it, is Mr. Fried's "Verklärte Nacht," a setting of Dehmel's lyric verses, that have kindled more than one composer, for alto, tenor and full orchestra—a piece that discloses his finer imaginings and artistries. And not a singer as yet of our recitals seems to know—or to esteem—his songs.

Thus must Mr. Fried's two purely orchestral pieces stand him in what stead they may in American ears and each happens to be written for a single instrumental choir, with or without contrasting and coloring voices. The Prelude and Double Fugue that Dr. Muck played yesterday is written for strings only; the Adagio and Scherzo that followed assembles only wind instruments and adds two coloring harps and rhythming kettle-drums to them. Both, besides, were written in Mr. Fried's earlier and less characteristic years. Yet one individualizing trait shines out of them and especially from the Double Fugue for strings. The exuberantly mounting Fugue is an old, old story, even when it is carried to such exhilarating heights as Reger attains at the end of his "Hiller Variations." The gravely marching, quietly expanding Fugue, developing as it were out of an inner life of its own, seeking a deep and austere beauty rather than merely superficial glow and sweep, is rarely written nowadays. Mr. Fried has written such a Fugue, that unfolds out of his stately, songful and warmly colored Prelude, conducted with Bach-like energy and pliancy in the weaving of its contrapuntal strands. He spins the Fugue with like suggestion of grave power and earnest intensity, with like large and various command of tonal progress and with a sober beauty of tonal color and contrasts. Akin, but less individual, is the Adagio for the wind choir and the harps—gravely songful, darkly colored against the brightening strings and warming in body and tint as it nears the Scherzo. The rhythming drum-beats, the high-voiced flutes and the shimmering harps work the transition and the music flows forward in capricious rhythm, suave phrase and pleasantly distributed color. Yet a Scherzo that is graver and quieter of voice and mood than most of its kind.

The wonder is—and yet not so strange in the contrasts of men's lives when at last they find the work that quickens, absorbs and "settles" them—the wonder is that Mr. Fried should write this grave, reflective music, subdued and inner-voiced, when the wild and wandering existence that he chose for his youth has long been one of the tales of Berlin and has made him almost a romantic figure among prosaic German composers. As a boy, he chafed under the restraints of "home life" in a middle-class household and, as soon as he half suspected that he had precocious talent with musical instruments, ran away, wandered here and there among the ring of towns and villages around Berlin, and lived by his young wits and playing upon fiddle and horn. Then he pushed farther afield, following the roads up and down Germany and even into Russia and Italy, taking whatever companions the day and the way brought him, and fiddling or blowing at his horn at any chance job that could put a mark or a lira or a rouble into his pocket. Before he was twenty, he had worked his way back to Frankfurt and somehow made himself an accomplished horn-player. Humperdinck discovered him in the orchestra of the Opera House, befriended and taught him; but he consorted too much with wild and wayward youth of both sexes and all ranks, to please his middle-aged and highly respectable mentor.

Finally, the restless Fried ran away again to Munich; there he began to feel his abilities and know ambition; and chance contacts and soon regular companionship with the free-minded, free-spoken and free-living poets and novelists and artists of the "Simplicissimus" circle began to stimulate him. They were young poets like Bierbaum; young playwrights, like Wedekind, and young artists like Theodor Heine, all eager to do new things and their own things in their own way. Fried began to flower in this atmosphere; he even wrote an opera in collaboration with Bierbaum, which ended when he also took the poet's divorced wife to himself. By this time he was uneasy in Munich; departed to Paris; nearly died there of destitution and illness; somehow found his feet; and made new and stimulating friendships among writers, musicians and artists. In the congenial glow of them, the impulse and the resources to compose grew stronger and stronger in him. He went back to Berlin; hid himself in the villages by the inlets of the Havel beyond the Grunewald—and worked.

The years at first lifted neither the obscurity nor the penury; but Fried held resolutely along his course, studying and ripening as well as composing. Gradually one and another musician and amateur of music—among them Dr. Muck—discovered him. The conductor finally brought "Das Trunkne Lied" to performance in spite of all the forces it required. It made Fried's reputation in a night. On the strength of it, and still befriended by Dr. Muck, he found work and made his way as a conductor until he now ranks well in his calling in Germany, in Russia and in Paris—a stout champion, as becomes a man of his fortunes, of the newer ways of music and of neglected composers that practise them in the pleasure of their own impulses and in the pain of their obscurity. He has composed himself meanwhile, still gravely and reflectively, with broadening and deepening powers. The old wildness has vanished, except that he is clearly a conductor of moods; that he will write only when the impulse stirs irresistibly in him and that he once spoke so despitefully of the Czar of Russia—temporarily his august master—that he was bundled forthwith across the frontier. But truth and legend of the wild and wandering youth and sudden flares, even now, of the old reckless fires, make him a singular and still rather [illegible] figure in the prosaic "musical [illegible] Dr. Muck and the orchestra awaken the latent energy of the [illegible] draw from it what routine has [illegible] and overlooked, and rekindle it with what seems the passion of their playing, began and ended the concert—Brahms's symphony in C minor and the overture that Mozart wrote in strange and mysterious chords and in running and glinting fugue for his opera of "The Magic Flute." Across the rivers of the Elysian Fields, whither he long since passed from the nether world to which respectable and mistrustful Vienna consigned him, he deserved to hear the mellow sonorities of the proclaiming trombones; the depth and fulness of the whole orchestra flinging forth his chords, and the long, clear strands of his fugue, rich, warm and glowing as the orchestra spun them and their haloing harmonies. Yet, as Dr. Muck plays the overture, it sounds as a grave and mysterious music, as though under its brilliant Mozartean surface lay deeper Mozartean pools.

As of the symphony, in all the present repertory of the Symphony Orchestra there is no fuller instance of the ability of the conductor—and the band at his bidding—to release the latent energy, beauty and power of the music that they play. Who, except Mr. Nikisch of the conductors of our time in the symphony in Boston has so made his hearers feel the tremulous anticipation, the advance from shadowed into brightening beauty, the high march into exultant song of Brahms's finale? There is "head work" of the familiar Brahmsian calculation in the interstices of that same finale, but Dr. Muck and the men, by the sheer beauty of their tone, the sheer energy of their rhythms, and the sheer zest of their march, sweep upward and over it. Who, before him, and not even Mr. Nikisch himself, has so wakened the latent beauty of the manifold song of the slow movement in its resignation, its longings, its ascents and aspirations, music of the heart of a man to other men's hearts, exalting and purging them after the fashion of the antique tragedy?

And who has so written on our ears and imaginations and memories as has Dr. Muck, the seething beginning of the symphony, as out of the depths of a troubled spirit, the ascent and the descent, the murmurings, the expansions, the struggles of its two themes of human will in its strivings and of human illumination in resignation, if not content? Besides Brahms, when Tschaikowsky wrote of human hopes, effort, despairs and submission, he made tonal melodrama; Brahms in this first symphony wrought tonal tragedy, Sophoclean in its depths of beauty and its depths of power. The conductor's means—a steady heightening of the rhythms throughout the symphony; a steady energizing of its contrasts and its inner voices; as clear an enriching of its song and warming of its harmonic and instrumental colors; a sense of details that feels them as threads in a mental and emotional as well as a musical fabric; the far-flung design, the large cumulation. So far, the analyst; the rest, the heightening rest, is Dr. Muck's own divining genius. Rare it is, but hardly rarer than the whole-hearted devotion and the tireless zeal that are its instruments.

Instruments, too, of this genius, and gladly so, are the men of the orchestra, yet they bring also to the sum of its achievement their own individual and contributing talents. All Dr. Muck's sense of tonal beauty, euphony and significance, all his imaginative and imparting power with the music could not have made the first two movemnts of Brahms's symphony sound as they did but for the supplementing beauty and balance and expressiveness of Mr. Sand's clarinet or of the whole wind choir. Mozart's superb chords owed much to the mellow mastery of the three players of the trombones. And the kettle-drummer is far to seek to match Mr. Neumann in his sense of rhythm, in his feeling alike for the tonal underbeat and the tonal blow, in the range and surety of his skill; in his alert imagination for his instrument and its high place that composers, conductors and such virtuosi as he have given it in the whole musical design, the whole emotional and delineative fabric. He was a master-player of forthright power with Brahms yesterday and a master-player of delicate subtleties with Mr. Fried. Moreover, the Adagio and Scherzo have lain these five years on the shelves of the library awaiting such harpists as Mr. Holy and Miss White. If ever there was an orchestra in which all are for one and one for all, each in the fullest scope of his talents, it is the present Symphony Orchestra.

H. T. P.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
JANUARY 16,

FIRST SYMPHONY OF BRAHMS AND TWO OSKAR FRIED PIECES PLAYED BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

SYMPHONY HALL—Eleventh public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of Jan. 15. The program: Brahms, first symphony in C minor; Fried, prelude and double fugue for orchestra of strings, and adagio and scherzo for wind instruments; Mozart, overture to "The Magic Flute."

At last the time has come when a performance of the Brahms first symphony is just an ordinary event. Enough orchestra enthusiasms have originated and culminated since the composer was a subject of controversy with the Symphony concert public, to put his music in the plain old repertory classification. No flicker of argument is left about him. But this has come about only lately. For the work, right up to its last presentation in Boston, was regarded by listeners as something like the final test of their appreciation, and by the conductor as close to the supreme challenge of his talent as an interpreter. On Brahms' side it was the old story of a composer winning his way to the conviction of the public with the help of ardent champions, and of being left at the height of [illegible] everything was changed. The revival was not conceived on the conductor's part as an occasion, but as a routine event. And the first symphony was far more enjoyable for it. Brahms was more human as a result of being treated like other people. No longer shouted aloud as the successor of Beethoven the Olympian, he became the very brother of Beethoven the man.

The symphony was allowed to play itself. The voices of the orchestra were persuaded, not driven. The belaboring hand which conductors have been accustomed to hold over the pages of the score was not in evidence. The themes of the four movements, therefore, instead of being thrashed into their places, were calmly summoned. And their behavior was correspondingly intelligible, agreeable and companionable. The opening number of the concert, far from being for everybody a job in appreciation, a week-end artistic lesson, was simply a assembling of delightful sonorities, a pageant of simple, orderly and attractive melodies.

Perhaps if Dr. Muck were asked how this came about, he would reply that it is his regular way, one week something hard for the audiences to listen to, the next week something easy. On the odd counts of the calendar, light music; on the even counts, heavy music. The seventh concert, familiar Beethoven; the eighth, incomprehensible Schoenberg; the ninth, the Volbach symphony of simple form; the tenth, the Liszt "Faust" symphony of unfathomed complexity; the eleventh, the straightforward Brahms symphony in C minor; the twelfth, the philosophic "Zarathustra" tone poem of Strauss. That is all clear enough in general. But few of those who attend the concerts from week to week would have been likely to pick out the Brahms symphony in C minor, though the composer's first effort in the larger forms of orchestral writing, as being an odd number selection. Plainly now it should be considered so. Even the second movement, once as ponderous an andante as could be found in the repertory, the heaviest work of Bruckner not excepted, must now be regarded as a fresh, bubbling inspiration. For such Dr. Muck and his men made it on Friday afternoon.

With propriety the two pieces by Fried were put on an odd number program. For while they were performed with great care and accuracy, they could not have given the orchestra much trouble in preparation. They are earnest works, indicating a more chastened mood in art than appears in most music of the modern German school. Fried seems to be more interested in the universal appeal of music than the local. If his powers should develop strongly in the direction indicated in the piece for strings and the piece for wind instruments, he might make a place with Schumann and Brahms. Evidently he would not belong to the strongly nationalistic side of German musical art, as represented by Wagner and Strauss. The thing needed for a judgment of his tendencies and abilities is a composition in which he assembles both halves of the orchestra.

one in Mozart's Requiem ("Kyrie Eleison"), or that other melodic double-header, "He sole on High," and "Glory to His Name," in Haydn's "Creation," but for all that the double-fugue is generally music for musicians, while the laity remain simply wondering if the parts will ever catch up with each other. As the fugue was for strings only, the finest part of our orchestra had an opportunity to prove once more that they are incomparably the best band of strings in this country, or probably in the world.

The double-fugue was not pedantic, but a good modern example of what can be done in this form which the older writers have used so copiously that new fugue subjects are impossible to invent. There was a degree of attractiveness in the work, when one considers the amount of learning displayed, the strict rules that had to be followed, but it was rather lugubrious at times. We fancy that, if given in New York, the Fried fugue would be roasted.

One may recall the boarder in a western mining town who begged the waiter to bring him the butter and the hairs on separate plates. Perhaps Dr. Muck was actuated by some such impulse, when, having served up the strings in one composition, he presented the woodwind in another. The Adagio and Scherzo reminded us, in their make-up, of the novelties in this field which M. Longy manages to unearth so constantly for the concerts of the club which bears his name, and we were not surprised to hear that the Longy Club had given it. But the work had more than woodwind instruments, it gave the rare combination of two harps and also a pair of Kettle-drums. It is high time that our Kettle-drummer should come into the limelight. He has thundered upon his calfskins most artistically for a long time, and has shown that even this single-toned instrument has a tone-color which is, let us say—striking.

We wish that sometime, just for the oddity of the thing, Dr. Muck might give Tausch's concerto for Kettle-drum, in which five of those instruments are played by a single performer, and, while he is about it, we might have Beethoven's almost vanished "Battle of Vittoria," which would also give the bass-drums a chance.

But in the Adagio and Scherzo the Kettle-drum was rather repressed than otherwise. Nor did we find anything remarkably new in the Adagio. The Scherzo, however, was agreeable music and displayed the unusual combination of three flutes, two oboes, clarinettes, bassoons and harps, and English horn, Bass clarinette, contra bassoons, and Kettle-drums, to good advantages. It was not, however, a work to grow very enthusiastic over, even while enjoying it.

At the end of the concert there came Mozart's exhilarating musical champagne, in the shape of the "Magic Flute overture." Here again is an instance of how learning and melody can meet on common ground. The non-musician hears only a charmingly chattering set of tunes, while the student finds the most symmetrical fugal exposition in the work. It is odd, by the way, that Mozart, even in "The Magic Flute," did not use the flute very prominently. He disliked the instrument and never would put it in the foreground as Mendelsshon did. This is true in spite of Mozart's concerto for Harp and Flute, which he wrote merely for money,—which he did not get.

Of course the reading of the overture was very brilliant. We always dissent, however, from the break-neck speed at which the opening fugal work is taken. Every great conductor takes it thus, yet we feel sure that Mozart would not have rushed it thus, but would have allowed some of its beauties to be better perceived by the auditor through the medium of a less helter-skelter tempo. But the overture made a very successful ending to a concert which proved that even a thoroughly classical list can be heartily enjoyed by the general public, after they have been trained to the hearing of good music.

TRANSCRIPT,
JANUARY 16,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

TWO GRAVE PIECES BY OSKAR FRIED

The Wild, Wayward and Contrasting Past and the Unusual Man Behind Them—Dr. Muck Summons Again the Latent Energy, Beauty and Emotion of Brahms's First Symphony—The Players and Their Share

IF Mahler had warmed to a proposal to become the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra when he was sounded in the matter not so many years ago, probably Oskar Fried would have come to Boston with him. Mahler, who already mistrusted his nervous strength, insisted upon an assistant and Mr. Fried was his clear preference. Nothing came of the negotiations and Mr. Fried went his conducting way in Berlin and Petrograd. He has his ambitions toward the Western world, but the likelihood is that we in Boston shall know him for long only by the two orchestral pieces that Dr. Muck, who has often stood his friend, included in the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. For a composer in his forty-fourth year, Mr. Fried has written relatively little, preferring to give his time and energy to the arts of the conductor, in which he is ambitious to excel. Moreover, his best and most characteristic music lies in choral pieces of the sort that almost never, nowadays, makes its way into our concerts. A setting of Zarathustra's "Trunkne Lied" for solo voices, mixed chorus and orchestra, first heard in Berlin through the efforts of Dr. Muck, made his reputation; and subsequently another choral piece, "Erntelied," for men's choir and full orchestra, confirmed it. Both are of large and intricate dimensions; both are written in a highly modern idiom with abounding imagination, ingenuity and large sweeps of power and both are severely exacting in performance. American choral societies—except the Mendelssohn Choir—would hardly succeed with them; where would they find a conductor able to grapple with them and what care their audiences for any presumptuous modern, were he Bach himself? No more likely of performance, unless Dr. Muck should some day be minded to it, is Mr. Fried's "Verklärte Nacht," a setting of Dehmel's lyric verses, that have kindled more than one composer, for alto, tenor and full orchestra—a piece that discloses his finer imaginings and artistries. And not a singer as yet of our recitals seems to know—or to esteem—his songs.

Thus must Mr. Fried's two purely orchestral pieces stand him in what stead they may in American ears and each happens to be written for a single instrumental choir, with or without contrasting and coloring voices. The Prelude and Double Fugue that Dr. Muck played yesterday is written for strings only; the Adagio and Scherzo that followed assembles only wind instruments and adds two coloring harps and rhythming kettle-drums to them. Both, besides, were written in Mr. Fried's earlier and less characteristic years. Yet one individualizing trait shines out of them and especially from the Double Fugue for strings. The exuberantly mounting Fugue is an old, old story, even when it is carried to such exhilarating heights as Reger attains at the end of his "Hiller Variations." The gravely marching, quietly expanding Fugue, developing as it were out of an inner life of its own, seeking a deep and austere beauty rather than merely superficial glow and sweep, is rarely written nowadays. Mr. Fried has written such a Fugue, that unfolds out of his stately, songful and warmly colored Prelude, conducted with Bach-like energy and pliancy in the weaving of its contrapuntal strands. He spins the Fugue with like suggestion of grave power and earnest intensity, with like large and various command of tonal progress and with a sober beauty of tonal color and contrasts. Akin, but less individual, is the Adagio for the wind choir and the harps—gravely songful, darkly colored against the brightening strings and warming in body and tint as it nears the Scherzo. The rhythming drum-beats, the high-voiced flutes and the shimmering harps work the transition and the music flows forward in capricious rhythm, suave phrase and pleasantly distributed color. Yet a Scherzo that is graver and quieter of voice and mood than most of its kind.

The wonder is—and yet not so strange in the contrasts of men's lives when at last they find the work that quickens, absorbs and "settles" them—the wonder is that Mr. Fried should write this grave, reflective music, subdued and inner-voiced, when the wild and wandering existence that he chose for his youth has long been one of the tales of Berlin and has made him almost a romantic figure among prosaic German composers. As a boy, he chafed under the restraints of "home life" in a middle-class household and, as soon as he half suspected that he had precocious talent with musical instruments, ran away, wandered here and there among the ring of towns and villages around Berlin, and lived by his young wits and playing upon fiddle and horn. Then he pushed farther afield, following the roads up and down Germany and even into Russia and Italy, taking whatever companions the day and the way brought him, and fiddling or blowing at his horn at any chance job that could put a mark or a lira or a rouble into his pocket. Before he was twenty, he had worked his way back to Frankfurt and somehow made himself an accomplished horn-player. Humperdinck discovered him in the orchestra of the Opera House, befriended and taught him; but he consorted too much with wild and wayward youth of both sexes and all ranks, to please his middle-aged and highly respectable mentor.

Finally, the restless Fried ran away again to Munich; there he began to feel his abilities and know ambition; and chance contacts and soon regular companionship with the free-minded, free-spoken and free-living poets and novelists and artists of the "Simplicissimus" circle began to stimulate him. They were young poets like Bierbaum; young playwrights, like Wedekind, and young artists like Theodor Heine, all eager to do new things and their own things in their own way. Fried began to flower in this atmosphere; he even wrote an opera in collaboration with Bierbaum, which ended when he also took the poet's divorced wife to himself. By this time he was uneasy in Munich; departed to Paris; nearly died there of destitution and illness; somehow found his feet; and made new and stimulating friendships among writers, musicians and artists. In the congenial glow of them, the impulse and the resources to compose grew stronger and stronger in him. He went back to Berlin; hid himself in the villages by the inlets of the Havel beyond the Grunewald—and worked.

The years at first lifted neither the obscurity nor the penury; but Fried held resolutely along his course, studying and ripening as well as composing. Gradually one and another musician and amateur of music—among them Dr. Muck—discovered him. The conductor finally brought "Das Trunkne Lied" to performance in spite of all the forces it required. It made Fried's reputation in a night. On the strength of it, and still befriended by Dr. Muck, he found work and made his way as a conductor until he now ranks well in his calling in Germany, in Russia and in Paris—a stout champion, as becomes a man of his fortunes, of the newer ways of music and of neglected composers that practise them in the pleasure of their own impulses and in the pain of their obscurity. He has composed himself meanwhile, still gravely and reflectively, with broadening and deepening powers. The old wildness has vanished, except that he is clearly a conductor of moods; that he will write only when the impulse stirs irresistibly in him and that he once spoke so despitefully of the Czar of Russia—temporarily his august master—that he was bundled forthwith across the frontier. But truth and legend of the wild and wandering youth and sudden flares, even now, of the old reckless fires, make him a singular and still rather [illegible] figure in the prosaic "musical [illegible] as Dr. Muck and the orchestra awaken the latent energy of the music, draw from it what routine has crusted and overlooked, and rekindle it with what seems the passion of their playing, began and ended the concert—Brahms's symphony in C minor and the overture that Mozart wrote in strange and mysterious chords and in running and glinting fugue for his opera of "The Magic Flute." Across the rivers of the Elysian Fields, whither he long since passed from the nether world to which respectable and mistrustful Vienna consigned him, he deserved to hear the mellow sonorities of the proclaiming trombones; the depth and fulness of the whole orchestra flinging forth his chords, and the long, clear strands of his fugue, rich, warm and glowing as the orchestra spun them and their haloing harmonies. Yet, as Dr. Muck plays the overture, it sounds as a grave and mysterious music, as though under its brilliant Mozartean surface lay deeper Mozartean pools.

As of the symphony, in all the present repertory of the Symphony Orchestra there is no fuller instance of the ability of the conductor—and the band at his bidding—to release the latent energy, beauty and power of the music that they play. Who, except Mr. Nikisch of the conductors of our time in the symphony in Boston has so made his hearers feel the tremulous anticipation, the advance from shadowed into brightening beauty, the high march into exultant song of Brahms's finale? There is "head work" of the familiar Brahmsian calculation in the interstices of that same finale, but Dr. Muck and the men, by the sheer beauty of their tone, the sheer energy of their rhythms, and the sheer zest of their march, sweep upward and over it. Who, before him, and not even Mr. Nikisch himself, has so wakened the latent beauty of the manifold song of the slow movement in its resignation, its longings, its ascents and aspirations, music of the heart of a man to other men's hearts, exalting and purging them after the fashion of the antique tragedy?

And who has so written on our ears and imaginations and memories as has Dr. Muck, the seething beginning of the symphony, as out of the depths of a troubled spirit, the ascent and the descent, the murmurings, the expansions, the struggles of its two themes of human will in its strivings and of human illumination in resignation, if not content? Besides Brahms, when Tschaikowsky wrote of human hopes, effort, despairs and submission, he made tonal melodrama; Brahms in this first symphony wrought tonal tragedy, Sophoclean in its depths of beauty and its depths of power. The conductor's means—a steady heightening of the rhythms throughout the symphony; a steady energizing of its contrasts and its inner voices; as clear an enriching of its song and warming of its harmonic and instrumental colors; a sense of details that feels them as threads in a mental and emotional as well as a musical fabric; the far-flung design, the large cumulation. So far, the analyst; the rest, the heightening rest, is Dr. Muck's own divining genius. Rare it is, but hardly rarer than the whole-hearted devotion and the tireless zeal that are its instruments.

Instruments, too, of this genius, and gladly so, are the men of the orchestra, yet they bring also to the sum of its achievement their own individual and contributing talents. All Dr. Muck's sense of tonal beauty, euphony and significance, all his imaginative and imparting power with the music could not have made the first two movemnts of Brahms's symphony sound as they did but for the supplementing beauty and balance and expressiveness of Mr. Sand's clarinet or of the whole wind choir. Mozart's superb chords owed much to the mellow mastery of the three players of the trombones. And the kettle-drummer is far to seek to match Mr. Neumann in his sense of rhythm, in his feeling alike for the tonal underbeat and the tonal blow, in the range and surety of his skill; in his alert imagination for his instrument and its high place that composers, conductors and such virtuosi as he have given it in the whole musical design, the whole emotional and delineative fabric. He was a master-player of forthright power with Brahms yesterday and a master-player of delicate subtleties with Mr. Fried. Moreover, the Adagio and Scherzo have lain these five years on the shelves of the library awaiting such harpists as Mr. Holy and Miss White. If ever there was an orchestra in which all are for one and one for all, each in the fullest scope of his talents, it is the present Symphony Orchestra.

H. T. P.

MONITOR, BOSTON, JANUARY 16,

FIRST SYMPHONY OF BRAHMS AND TWO OSKAR FRIED PIECES PLAYED BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

SYMPHONY HALL—Eleventh public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of Jan. 15. The program: Brahms, first symphony in C minor; Fried, prelude and double fugue for orchestra of strings, and adagio and scherzo for wind instruments; Mozart, overture to "The Magic Flute."

At last the time has come when a performance of the Brahms first symphony is just an ordinary event. Enough orchestra enthusiasms have originated and culminated since the composer was a subject of controversy with the Symphony concert public, to put his music in the plain old repertory classification. No flicker of argument is left about him. But this has come about only lately. For the work, right up to its last presentation in Boston, was regarded by listeners as something like the final test of their appreciation, and by the conductor as close to the supreme challenge of his talent as an interpreter. On Brahms' side it was the old story of a composer winning his way to the conviction of the public with the help of ardent champions, and of being left at the height of [illegible] everything was changed. The revival was not conceived on the conductor's part as an occasion, but as a routine event. And the first symphony was far more enjoyable for it. Brahms was more human as a result of being treated like other people. No longer shouted aloud as the successor of Beethoven the Olympian, he became the very brother of Beethoven the man.

The symphony was allowed to play itself. The voices of the orchestra were persuaded, not driven. The belaboring hand which conductors have been accustomed to hold over the pages of the score was not in evidence. The themes of the four movements, therefore, instead of being thrashed into their places, were calmly summoned. And their behavior was correspondingly intelligible, agreeable and companionable. The opening number of the concert, far from being for everybody a job in appreciation, a week-end artistic lesson, was simply a assembling of delightful sonorities, a pageant of simple, orderly and attractive melodies.

Perhaps if Dr. Muck were asked how this came about, he would reply that it is his regular way, one week something hard for the audiences to listen to, the next week something easy. On the odd counts of the calendar, light music; on the even counts, heavy music. The seventh concert, familiar Beethoven; the eighth, incomprehensible Schoenberg; the ninth, the Volbach symphony of simple form; the tenth, the Liszt "Faust" symphony of unfathomed complexity; the eleventh, the straightforward Brahms symphony in C minor; the twelfth, the philosophic "Zarathustra" tone poem of Strauss. That is all clear enough in general. But few of those who attend the concerts from week to week would have been likely to pick out the Brahms symphony in C minor, though the composer's first effort in the larger forms of orchestral writing, as being an odd number selection. Plainly now it should be considered so. Even the second movement, once as ponderous an andante as could be found in the repertory, the heaviest work of Bruckner not excepted, must now be regarded as a fresh, bubbling inspiration. For such Dr. Muck and his men made it on Friday afternoon.

With propriety the two pieces by Fried were put on an odd number program. For while they were performed with great care and accuracy, they could not have given the orchestra much trouble in preparation. They are earnest works, indicating a more chastened mood in art than appears in most music of the modern German school. Fried seems to be more interested in the universal appeal of music than the local. If his powers should develop strongly in the direction indicated in the piece for strings and the piece for wind instruments, he might make a place with Schumann and Brahms. Evidently he would not belong to the strongly nationalistic side of German musical art, as represented by Wagner and Strauss. The thing needed for a judgment of his tendencies and abilities is a composition in which he assembles both halves of the orchestra.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 23,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

STRAUSS'S "ZARATHUSTRA" FROM A NEW ANGLE

Dr. Muck's Very "Personal" Version of the Tone-Poem—His Transformation of It Into a Grave and Brooding Music of Human Longing—The Comforting Realities of Beethoven's "Leonore" and Sibelius's Passion for Expression

TO Dr. Muck, "Zarathustra" is a different music from what it has seemed to other conductors that have undertaken Strauss's tone-poem at the Symphony Concerts. He had not proceeded far, yesterday afternoon, with the introduction before it was clear that he was understanding, imagining and transmitting the piece as he apprehended and felt it, regardless of other conceptions and even of the precedents that now, after twenty years, are beginning to be traditions with Strauss's symphonic music. Audiences, the world over, are accustomed to hear the introduction to "Zarathustra" with the orchestra driven to the utmost of its powers—the pealing trumpets, the rolling organ, the up-swelling strings, piling sonority upon sonority and stress upon stress. Behold the epical and epochal dawn wherein Zarathustra, all-knowing and all-wise superman, arises in his wisdom and goes forth to enlighten his fellows. As Dr. Muck "read" the music, the piled sonorities became deepening solemnities, the trumpets spoke in calm majesty and not in excited proclamation; the strings, the whole orchestra quivered with the expectant intensity of the instant. The impression was of a grave and solemn music, unrolling the curtains of the world before the spirit of man. Not within long memory had the prelude to "Zarathustra" so sounded or so nearly deserved to be called sublime.

The tone-poem proceeded through the divisions that Strauss has labelled "Of the Dwellers in the Rear-World"; "Of the Great Longing"; "Of Joys and Passions"; "Of Science and Learning," and as it went its way, Dr. Muck's purpose and design, comprehension and illumination with the music became clearer and clearer. In sombre voice, dark colors and struggling rhythms went the passage of "the Rear World" in the Nietzschean nomenclature. But there was no thought to the hearer of Nietzsche and all his works; only of the spirit of man struggling out of the bewilderments, the mysteries, the strivings of the universe in which some power had placed him. The tonal darkness slowly cleared; the tonal struggle was slowly stilled. Then in the spirit of man awoke "The Great Longing"—for once the Nietzschean terms held good—to know himself, to search out these mysteries, to solve the riddles of existence and the universe. Again in long memory, never has this passage in "Zarathustra" had such gravely passionate and poignant voice. It seemed to rise out of the depths of the spirit of man; it stirred such depths in those that listened. At last "Zarathustra" was to be a tone-poem of brooding human longing, a spiritual music.

First, the spirit of man brooded over "The Joys and Passions" that might be the satisfactions and the solutions of its desires and gropings. They passed in the music as Dr. Muck felt and communicated it, like phantoms of thought and mood that left empty the human hands clutching at them. Still possessed by "The Great Longing," the human spirit brooded upon death and its mysteries, wistful yet a little soothed and so plaintive, remote, and gentle sounded what Strauss and Nietzsche label "The Grave Song." Brooding still, the human spirit sought the solutions and the soothings of learning, and Dr. Muck assembled and expanded the strands of the fugato as though he were laying dry tome and dry tome side by side until all the sum of human knowledge had been gathered. Never before has this passage in "Zarathustra" sounded, as Strauss surely intended it, so barren, sterile, so of the wastes of such human brooding.

Then on to the intermediary passage called in the Nietzschean terminology "Of the Convalescent." It mattered little what it was named. Still the music brooded; but it had begun to quiver with a strange and troubling expectancy. There was nervous preluding; there were glimmers and darts of tonal light; then flashing radiance; then the tremors, the hesitations, the mounting excitements of fulfilment and the music began its dance. The brooding human spirit had found release, solution, satisfaction as in a grave joy, as in a vision of all the phantoms that had haunted it moving in a rhythmed order and a clear calm light. The song swelled low and grave out of the dance and the great longing had become as the great tranquillity. Again, as never before, the music spoke in deep and spiritual voice. Then slowly the vision faded; the song died, and the human spirit sat once more brooding over the eternal mysteries and questionings. The final measures spoke the pity and the pang of its hopeless and baffling fate.

So to hear "Zarathustra" was like revelation equally of a finer, deeper and more spiritual content in Strauss's music than hitherto it had ever seemed to bear and of the divining and the transfiguring power of Dr. Muck's mind, imagination and spirit in play upon it. In all that he has done in the ears of his audiences in four long seasons and in half of another, never before has he wrought such a transforming feat, or one in which the transmitting medium seemed to surpass composer and music. Hitherto we have wn "Zarathustra" for the sonorous magnificence of the introduction; for the intricate polyphonic fabric that Strauss thereafter wove; for the tonal colors that brightened and darkened it; for the thematic manipulation that made the music seem as thought busy with abstraction; for the rhythmic excitement of the dance; for the broad unfolding of the midnight song; for the mystery and the tonal titillation of the end. So hearing, we have marvelled at the design and the detail, the purpose and the accomplishment of the tone-poem. We have counted Strauss in it as fain to be the superman of music on the Nietzschean model, to conceive it out of thought about abstractions rather than out of mood, emotion and vision; to make the course of these reflections follow the close-knit course of a symphonic poem; to suggest each turn of these broodings in harmonic, polyphonic or instrumental detail: and yet to stir emotion in those that heard. So, after theirmanner, have the conductors construed "Zarathustra." They have sought to make it as mighty and magnificent, as big and glowing, as variously intricate and eloquent as they might. For the playing of it should be their feat, too, as orchestral supermen.

Yesterday from end to end, from the solemn beginning to the piteous close, Dr. Muck kept "Zarathustra" a low-voiced, grave, sober-colored, brooding music. Even the mounting radiance of the vision of the world in rhythmed and dancing tranquillity, he scaled relatively low. Even the sonorous introduction was all solemn and shadowed splendors. Not once did he lay on his instrumental and harmonic colors with flaring and emphatic hand; not once did he stress the polyphonic intricacies, the sheer technical feats of Strauss in the music. He held those but as means to the composer's end. No more would he have his hearers heed his own marvellous weaving of the fugato; or his own or Mr. Witek's feats of rhythm with the mounting dance; or the whole rhythmic and thematic life that he infused into the music. Least of all would he make it grandiloquent and glaring, huge and heavy. "Zarathustra" rose from his hands as a profound, deeply spiritualized, gravely emotional tone-poem of the mind and the heart of man brooding over the mysteries of his existence and of the universe, and seeking in vision to sound them; stirred by the great longing and seeking in vision to soothe it.

So conceived and so transmitted, "Zarathustra" seemed very grave, beautiful, poignant and human music—a more spiritual music than ever before or since has come from Strauss's hand, a unique achievement in his manifold accomplishment and, perhaps, in all the accomplishment of music. Somewhere Mr. Newman has written of Strauss in "Zarathustra" as a "Titan in chains." Yesterday, if the music really be as Dr. Muck made it sound, the conductor broke the composer's bonds. It was Dr. Muck's "Zarathustra" rather than Strauss's, and yet without Strauss—and this strangely spiritualized Strauss—it could not have been. The conductor professes to care little for the composer's later tone-poems. And lo! he draws from "Zarathustra" what no man has ever divined there before and transfigures it. Twenty remarkable achievements of Dr. Muck will dwell longer in the memories of his hearers because they have been easier to grasp and feel; but none of them is to be compared in mental and spiritual fineness with this transformation of "Zarathustra." It is the grave, the solemn, the beautiful and the poignant epic of "The Great Longing" as our time has felt it and our music expressed it.

The rest of the concert was close-packed, too, but with more expected, plain-spoken and less-exacting matter. At the end, indeed, Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture brought the warm and comforting glow of a familiar reality. There it was—Florestan's air in the prison, the suspensive trumpet calls, the elation of "O Namenlose Freude," the solemn thanksgiving and all the rest—music-drama in vivid and eloquent epitome, compact with emotion, action in tones almost, so rich of instrumental song, so high in human power and with every one of its glories the brighter and fuller for the reciprocal eloquence that conductor and men brought to it. The masterpiece of overtures that would be music-drama in little. Even Wagner might not equal it.

How easily had Beethoven seemed to say all that he would to the utmost of its scope and to the utmost of his power and yet in the result by such simple, effortless, free and full-handed means. Strauss had needed the divining and the spiritualizing genius of a conductor, and endless care and pains besides, that his music might at last gain its true voice. And Sibelius, whose first symphony began the concert, seemed, as nowadays he always does in his long pieces, to be striving so intently for the power and poignancy of expression that, perhaps, is his master-passion. We look backward now at this symphony in E-minor as we could not when it came first to our ears. The terse brevity of the musical thoughts; the melodies beginning wan and hollow and wistful and rising out of brooding melancholy into passion and power; the rugged progressions; the acrid harmonies; the dark and fitful instrumental coloring; the striding or the surging rhythms; the wild and wayward mood of the music; its bursts of tonal rage and its recessions into tonal gloom—all these are familiar characteristics now of Sibelius's symphonies. It is the custom—it is hard to say why—to fit them into the aspects of Finnish and northern lights and landscape, into Finnish and viking mood and impulse. May they not as plausibly be the expression of an individual mind and imagination in which such traits and moods and feelings play, no more influenced by its environment than would be any moody, sensitive and observant spirit?

More than once yesterday in the course of the symphony a great passion of self-expression seemed to ring through the music, a great striving for an intensity of utterance that would always in its very nature be insatiable. So it is possible to hear the naked song of the clarinet at the tions, the passionate upbuildings of it at gling and broken rhythms, the recurring drum-rolls, the sudden upleapings of the instruments are all of this quest for intensified utterance. Of it again are the penetrating melodies, the melancholy mood, the angry turn upon them as though they were too inarticulate, of the music of the slow movement. The scherzo may be less northern wildness than the wildness and the weariness of this quest. And so, again, in the turbulence of the finale that would break its bonds of utterance and yet never quite snaps them, and rises to the full heights of the composer's will. In three symphonies, Sibelius used the old musical speech in his own way. In the fourth, again in his own way, he has turned to the new.

Perhaps, he did so because he believed that the old still refused him the intensity of self-expression that he craved and that in the new he might attain it. But with him, as with most that pursue it, the quest will have no end.

H. T. P.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

JANUARY 23, 1915

NATIONALISM FEATURE OF MUSIC PLAYED BY SYMPHONY AT ITS TWELFTH REHEARSAL

SYMPHONY HALL—Twelfth rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of Jan. 22. The program: Sibelius, symphony No. 1 in E-minor, op. 39; Strauss, tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" (after Nietzache) op. 30; Beethoven, overture to "Leonora," No.

In an orchestral concert which presents works by composers of the present day two questions appeal to the listener's judgment. The first is as to how the pieces were interpreted. The second is as to the purport of the music itself. The two are so interlocked for the time being that they seem like one question. The general meaning of the composer and the particular reading of the conductor look like the same thing. But they are not. What the composer means in a symphonic work is the only point of final importance. Appraisal of the conductor is ordinarily well enough disposed of with a compliment for the phrasing here, an expression of doubt in regard to the speed there, and with other remarks that are appropriate where idea has to be presented through elaborate social machinery. For actually the performance of an orchestral conductor, for the moment so impressive, is nothing but the print, paper and binding of the book. It is not the book's message.

Whatever, then, is to be said in praise of Dr. Muck's reading of Sibelius, whatever in disparagement of his reading of Strauss, the two compositions remain to be considered for what they tell the modern world about itself. And, all external problems about them aside, the problem of the symphony as an example of thematic structure and of balanced and contrasted movements, together with the problem of the tone poem as an example of program music, probably the most striking trait of the pieces is their nationalism.

No more certain fact has evolved from the Symphony concerts, which from start to finish are an imported product in Boston, and necessarily so, since practically no genuinely native art in their formulas exist, than that European orchestral writers have been striving with all their might for the past generation to express the motives and aims of the countries in which they are citizens. If there has been any concept of music as an universal art, it has been exceptional. The music that holds its place in the repertory, the music that Bostonians like to hear, is that which is replete with nationalist feeling. It is music such as was on the program of Friday afternoon, music like the first symphony of Sibelius, the Russian or, provincially speaking, the Finn, and music like the tone poem of Strauss, the German.

The nationalist qualities of these two typical modern composers have been analized only casually. When it has been done, the emphasis has usually been put on mood rather than intention. The picturesque side has been brought to notice more than any other. The musical symbol has been turned into a verbal one, and so the chief question has been dodged. Sibelius has been a melancholy dreamer, brooding savagely over the instrumental tone scheme, ever devising some new translation for the word despair. Strauss has been a Wild Huntsman, chasing out of hiding harmonies and themes that nobody ever had the temerity to pursue before. He has been a splendid romanticist, a reckless satirist. He has been every commonplace thing that criticism could plausibly call him.

Meantime the public has heard the music and has got its impression of the purposes that impel it into existence, purposes that may be operative in their own country as well as in the countries in which Sibelius and Strauss live. The outcome for time to show is whether the listening is just a pleasure for the community in a certain epoch of its history; or whether it is a stimulation to a counter expression of national aims, through the tone art or some other art; or whether, finally, it is a contemplative protest against the employment of melody and harmony to restricted, fractional human ends.

BOSTON GLOBE—

JANUARY 23,

TWELFTH REHEARSAL.

Mr Busoni Not Yet Arrived in Boston.

"Zarathustra" and Sibelius' First Symphony Chief Numbers.

Mr Busoni had not arrived in this country in time to appear as soloist at the 12th Symphony Orchestra rehearsal yesterday afternoon. The "Leonore" overture No. 3 was substituted for the Liszt concerto he was announced to play. It was preceded by Sibelius' first symphony in E minor and Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

The symphony is an hour long. Its prevailing mood is a serious one, for when are the moods of Mr Sibelius not serious? It is true that in the scherzo he falls into rude and boisterous merriment. There is dance rhythm and clumsily shod feet are heard. The peasants disport themselves with abandon, and one wonders whether the composer laughs at the country bumpkins or with them. There are the indefatigable nationalists, the friends and champions of the Finns, to whom all utterances of Sibelius are epic.

Art With the Clarinet.

The layman of moderate conservatism might wish all the pages wore as well as those which begin and end the symphony. The mournful song of the clarinet is not easily forgotten; majestically sombre, yet tender; of a color not satisfied elsewhere as in the chalumeau register of the clarinet. Mr Sand, zealous in experimentation with mouthpieces and reeds, has found a tone of admirable qualities, flexible, blending resonance with mellowness in good proportion, emotional and characteristic of the instrument. He phrased the passage in a truly improvisational vein, with a beautiful legato and subtlety of nuance.

The return of the theme as a glorified apotheosis for the orchestra at the close of the last movement is among the noblest passages of symphonic literature. There is the lofty beauty, the grandeur of vision, which few men since Beethoven have been able to contemplate with steady gaze. There is a strange discrepancy with portions of the scherzo, inconsequential passages in which the composer might have been inspired by Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture.

Accurate Performance.

It is not necessary to inquire into the precise relationship of Strauss' ponderous tone poem to the cryptic philosophy of Nietzsche. The whole problem of "program" music, the degree to which musical sounds may express or suggest concrete or abstract ideas, might be discussed with it as a basis. Zarathustra, the "superman," the "over" or "beyond man," may be the fiction of a brain and nervous system for which experience has blended asceticism with religious mysticism and tinctured both with morbidity. Strauss' conception of these phases of experience has illusion, at times potentiality, in any event it reveals the colossal musical brain, the amazing contrapuntal cleverness, the orchestral daring that can weave such a complex fabric of sound.

The performance was one upon which Dr Muck has expended much care and labor. There was brilliant virtuosity and the higher quality of imagination. To single out one section above another would be difficult, but the cool, calculating accuracy with which the fuge "Of Science" was built up through its conflicting rhythms was no less a feat of technic than the dazzling execution of other portions. The riddle remained unsolved. Strauss knew how far to preach Nietzsche's doctrine.

The orchestra will make a special Western trip next week.

BOSTON POST,

JANUARY 23,

STRAUSS AND MUCK AT ODDS

Symphony Far From Tradition in "Zarathustra"

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall was of the most exceptional interest: The First Symphony of Jean Sibelius, the tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" of Richard Strauss; the Third "Leonore" overture of Beethoven.

A SUPERB PERFORMANCE

The music of Sibelius, elemental, fierce and melancholy, seemed from another civilization than the present, and was given the finest possible performance by Dr. Muck and his players. The music of Strauss, come out of the very vortex of modern European culture, with all the characteristics of this culture, of the restlessness and sophistication of the age, yet informed with desperate heroism. The spiritual audacity of one of the heroes of this age was the most impressive of contrasts. Above all was Beethoven.

It is not possible to praise adequately the performance of Sibelius' symphony, or to give adequate thanks for new music of such simplicity and conviction and primeval power. For a first essay in the symphonic form, this work astonishes one by its strength and its sweep, its savor of wild northern nature, its sureness of touch and originality of thought. And then there is the glorious orchestral coloring, coloring which, on account of its beauty and its clearness and individuality, somewhat tarnished the brilliant orchestral dress of Strauss' tone poem.

The composer might well have rejoiced in his spokesmen. In spite of the tumultuous inspiration of the music there are moments of indecision, more particularly in the slow movement, and of conventional procedures of composition in other movements, which are singularly at variance with the spirit of the work. In these cases the conductor came nobly to the rescue. If there was a weak joining place in the structure, its underlying spirit was made to bridge the gap. If some phrase was a little more commonplace than is usual with the later Sibelius, it was treated in such a manner that it was deeply impressive. Consider the broad and sad melody of the last moment—that melody which alternates with savage dance rhythms and music of the elements at play. Nothing could have been more moving than its treatment by Dr. Muck. A noble work, nobly interpreted. No wonder there was enthusiasm. The conductor was repeatedly called back to the stage. Finally the orchestra arose and bowed with him.

Departs From Tradition

Much had been expected of Dr. Muck's reading of the "Zarathustra." Was it the spontaneity, the force, the beauty of Sibelius' music which interfered with the effect of the latter work? Only partly. Dr. Muck had carefully prepared a performance which was in some respects a departure from tradition. The orchestra had restudied the score. When Dr. Muck does not like a work he prepares it even more carefully, if possible, than he prepares a composition with which he is in sympathy. We do not believe that he believes over much in the "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Granting that no one has a better right to his conception of Strauss than this remarkable musician, it remains that to this reviewer the performance was notably unsympathetic, uncharacteristic of Strauss, even comparatively ineffective.

It often seemed to us that Dr. Muck felt Strauss to be unrefined and sensational in this score, and wished to redeem some passages of what may impress him as bombast or exaggeration. The introduction could certainly have been broader, mightier, more apocalyptic. Then, as for instance with the chromatic theme that has been associated, and well associated it seems to us, with Zarathustra's turning away from old formulas—a theme first thundered out by the trombones toward the end of the music "of joys and passions," and later interpolated by wind instruments in the midst of the fugue—there was by no means the possible degree of sarcasm, irony, the Nietzschean laughter which this theme, gibbered by various wind instruments, certainly suggests. The march of the fugue, as we think of it, could have been mightier, had a heavier tread. The solo passage for the horn at the place (etwas ruhiger) after the announcement of the dance song—which was admirably accomplished—could well have been broader, more serenely prophetic of soul's salvation. And where, oh, where, were the 12 strokes of the bell, which should resound through all the immense sonorities of the orchestra at the final climax—the "Nightwanderer's Song," we do not swear to the physical absence of the [illegible] but we do assert emphatically that it did not have the effect the composer intended.

Why omit this? Is it, too, sensational? It is surely one of Strauss' most characteristic effects, and for most of us a superb effect from any point of view. Nothing could make the final measures more effective than this tolling, that echoes softer and softer—softly and more softly—and then gives place to the theme of the ideal, soaring aloft.

Stamps on Platform

In brief, the essentially rhapsodic quality of the amazing music inspired by the singular rhapsody of Nietbsche, the temperamental qualities of Strauss music, and what is frequently the surpassing grandeur of his vision, were usually lacking. It is easy to believe, especially as one remembers Dr. Muck stamping on the platform at one moment of the performance, that this performance did not go wholly to his liking, and that the performance this evening will sound more spontaneous. It cannot be said that it sounded so yesterday.

With all the cerebral quality of Strauss, he has always seemed to us first a composer of a splendidly nervous temperament. That nervousness and incisiveness and that volcanic energy that flames in every measure of his music, and sweeps you from your feet as though a whirlwind had taken you in its arms, was not felt. Conviction seemed to us to be absent and never before had a work of indisputable audacity and inspiration sounded so empty, so like a mere box of orchestral tricks.

BOSTON HERALD.

JANUARY 23, 1915.

12TH PUBLIC SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Extraordinarily Romantic Work by Sibelius Played by Orchestra.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 12th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Busoni had been announced as soloist, but on arriving in New York he declared that he was "too weak" to play after the voyage of 14 days from Genoa. Beethoven's "Leonore" overture was therefore substituted for Liszt's piano concerto in E flat. The program was as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. 1, E minor; Strauss, tone-poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra"; Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3.

Nearly 10 years ago Mr. Gericke produced the second symphony of Sibelius, the one in D major. The composer was then unknown in Boston except by name. The reception of the work by the public was so cool that Mr. Gericke dropped Sibelius. Mr. Fiedler was favorably inclined toward the Finn, but he did not bring out the symphony in E minor. The performance of yesterday was the third under Dr. Muck, who put it on the program in 1907 and in 1912.

It is an extraordinarily romantic work; to us the most imaginative and effective of the three symphonies that have been performed here. M. Weber, for years the music critic of Le Temps, once wrote an article in which he proved neatly to his own satisfaction that there is no such thing in music as local color. He argued that when we find the contour of a melody, or some strange harmonies and unusual rhythms exotic, Persian, Egyptian, what you will, it is because we have been told that these musical characteristics are associated with some particular country; but a land is not to be musically described.

This depends a good deal on the hearer. The introduction to the third act of "Aida" may remind us of a sultry night on the Nide on account of what has gone before, the stage-setting and the entrance of Egyptian priest, princess, and slave. Perhaps we might not realize the loneliness and immeasurable distance of a Russian steppe from Borodin's orchestral piece, unless the word "Steppe" were in the title. Yet in either instance the music is peculiarly suited to the scene. So hearing the symphony of Sibelius, knowing that he is a Finn, knowing also something about the scenery of Finland, the history of that land, its sagas, and the "Kalevala," it is very easy to find the full, wild, tumultuous expression of what we conceive Finland to be in this music of Sibelius, and we find it here to a greater extent than in the second symphony, or in the fourth in which Sibelius seems to have wandered far from his country and his true self in search of strange gods and strange mental conditions. In this respect the first symphony is to be ranked with the violin concerto and "The Swan of Tuonela."

The first movement is surely one of the frankest and most emotional outpourings of the composer's soul. It might stand alone as a tragic overture, fiery, passionate, inexpressibly sad. There is only a slight taint of formalism, of pedantry, in this movement, the desire of a composer to show in his first symphony that he knows his counterpoint and all the tricks. In the second movement this fault is more noticeable, for it is more deliberate and more extended. It is as if the composer were saying to his audience: "Now I'll prove to you that I have studied diligently." These faults, however, are negligible when the sweep and pathos of the whole symphony are taken into consideration. The performance was superb.

Sibelius gives no program, no clue to the contents of his symphony. Strauss furnishes an introductory note, a passage from Nietzsche's book, to his "Zarathustra," and there are sub-captions in the score: "Of the Dwellers in the Rear World," "Of the Great Tearning," etc. He is reported as having said that he put "freely after Frieda, Nietzsche" in the title, because he would otherwise have been accused of translating Nietzsche's book into music with a view of doing the same thing later with Kant and Schopenhauer. When there are such guide-posts in a program-book, the hearer, if he is not content with simply listening to the music, is apt to take the wrong direction or miss a post to his utter confusion. "Where are we now? Is this the 'Grave Song' or the section about 'Science'?" There is no mistaking the "Dance Song," but we like to think the girls met by Zarathustra danced to a more seductive tune. The inherent cheapness of this tune—and Vernon Blackburn defined a tune as a melody that is overripe—is atoned for by the amazing treatment of it, and yesterday by the brilliance of the general performance and the remarkably incisive playing of the solo violin passages by Mr. Witek.

The introduction is impressive; the section "Of Science" sounds as though Strauss had wished to show the aridity and endlessness of much scientific teaching; the music towards the close is very beautiful, to be put by the side of a few pages of "Don Quixote" and the domestic symphony. As a work of pure art and a complete realization of a composer's intention no one of the so-called colossal tone-poems of Strauss equals "Till Eulenspiegel" or "Don Juan." With them and "Death and Transfiguration" Strauss ceased to be purely and constantly musical as a writer of symphonic poems. The close of "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and Zarathustra speaks too much in Nietsche's poem and in Strauss's music—has been greatly admired as mystic, wonderful, an attempt to solve the riddle of the universe; but this riddle is not to be solved by sounds from piccolos, flute and a violin or two alternating with pizzicato notes of double basses.

Beethoven, for a comparatively small orchestra, wrote his "Leonore" overture No. 3 over a hundred years ago, a work that by the loftiness, the nobility of the ideas and by the dramatic expression still sways the hearer and purifies the passions.

There will be no concerts next week. The program of Feb. 5, 6 will be as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 4; Spohr, Concerto for string quartet with orchestra, op. 131 (first time at these concerts); Mahler, "Lays of a Travelling Journeyman" (Paul Draper, singer); Dvorak, "Carnaval" overture.

ADVERTISER.

JANUARY 23

THE SYMPHONY THIS WEEK

ONCE AGAIN A PURELY ORCHESTRAL PROGRAMME

Sibelius, Strauss and Beethoven Contributors—Busoni Not Able to Appear

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Sibelius. Symphony No. 1. E minor.
Strauss. "Also Sprach Zarathustra."
Beethoven. Leonore Overture, No. 3.

The best laid plans o' mice and orchestral conductors gang aft agley. Mr. Busoni was ill from the results of a tempestuous sea voyage. Perhaps he was fortunate in being sick, for to have given the Liszt E-flat concerto after an hour and three-quarters of modern music, and especially after the tonal shimmerings of Richard Strauss, might have been tempting Providence. We shall now hope to hear the great pianist under more favorable circumstances than these.

He was replaced by Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, No. 3, and even that, with the frenzied joy at its end, suffered somewhat from the juxta-position. But at least it was a good deal shorter than the Liszt concerto would have been. Therefore, while expressing the heartiest sympathy for Mr. Busoni in his temporary illness, we cannot but be pleased that he did not play on this particular occasion.

But one can rhapsodize over the instrumental works which formed this oddly made-up programme. To go from the fourth symphony of Sibelius, to this first one, was like going from Philip drunk to Philip sober. In the fourth symphony all seems experimental, while in the first there is definite attainment.

From the very beginning, where the clarinette has a theme of dreamy melancholy and loneliness, the attention is enchained. There is the Northern sadness in much of the work, but it reminds of Longfellow's

"Feeling of sadness and longing.
That is not akin to Pain,
And resembles Sorrow only
As the mist resembles rain."

This sadness seems to be a Scandinavian heritage in music and has its own great power. Yet the chief theme of the first movement is full of resolution and heroism and contrasted well with the brooding and mystery which reigned elsewhere. Muted horns suggested evil, and most sudden contrasts spoke of tragedy. A fine climax is worked up in the first movement and logically too, being well derived from preceding tonal material.

The Andante was less impressive in its complainings. But the Scherzo is a Finnish gem. It had all the heartiness and virility of the northern folk-dances, and the Trio with its horn passages was in fine contrast [illegible] performance was something to grow enthusiastic over. Even the kettle-drum seemed inspired when it rapped out the figure in the returning passage from the Trio to the Scherzo. As with the Brahms symphony of last week, the finale had many derivations from preceding movements, but this device of thematic transference has become quite usual in modern symphonies, although when Beethoven introduced it in the finale of his ninth symphony it was criticised. In spite of the often frenzied power, of the growls of the deep wood-wind, of the sudden contrasts and the unexpectedly soft pizzicato ending, we prefer the Sibelius Scherzo to this more unrestful movement, and we think the first movement the strongest part of the entire work. The Andante would also be very effective if it had less of sequence treatment.

But when a man can give such poetic and comprehensible thoughts as Sibelius does in this, we must hesitate in giving a verdict upon his more vague and less intelligible works. After studying this symphony we dare not pronounce a sure verdict upon his fourth symphony. We may dislike that work, but we cannot say with jaunty confidence, "It is bad," but rather, "We cannot understand it!" The performance yesterday afternoon aroused real enthusiasm and, as usual, the orchestra was obliged to rise in acknowledgment.

After this Zarathustra also spoke. That is he sometimes roared and he sometimes whispered. We have had this work now at least a dozen times and it is a retrospect full of meaning when we think of the appalling effect it first made, and how we now expect the Brobdignagian score as a matter of course. It has been said that the car can accustom itself to anything, and we have now passed Zarathustra and are chewing upon Schoenberg, who is a great deal more indigestible.

Our orchestra played the Strauss work magnificently. It is just as well that they tread these thorny paths frequently, if only that they may convince the New York critics that our musical organization is absolutely "hors concours." But we have seldom heard even our wonderful orchestra reach quite the level that marked the interpretation of the first part of this work. It was colossal in its powerful effects and beautiful in its more tender phrases. Organ and trumpet deserve especial words for the effects they produced. This man has something to say; he is not a mere modern musical eccentric. The work may be too long, and at times too abstruse, but the voice of genius is heard sometimes, amid the confusion. The performance was less unified in the last part of this tone-poem than in its majestic beginning.

It is singular how in such a large composition the feminine element is almost entirely absent, only appearing in the dance episode. The work will therefore not find great favor in the Suffragette ranks, and some day a female composer will give us—"Thus spoke Mrs. Zarathustra"—and by the way, she does speak, and with emphasis, in the Strauss family.

After this Beethoven's overture finished the concert. Had it been given as originally planned we believe it would have been nearly two hours and a half in length.

TRANSCRIPT,

, JANUARY 19,

News of the Symphony Orchestra—Concerts Cancelled and to Come

At last and in at least one piece, the Symphony Orchestra has gained in Dr. Muck's ears all the perfections of tone, balance and communicating eloquence that he seeks. The band did these things in its playing of Brahms's symphony in C minor last Friday and last Saturday and ever since, in private talk and beyond his wont, he has been warm in praise of them. On Saturday evening, in particular, when the audience had recalled him four times at the end of the symphony and brought the orchestra to its feet, he shook the concert-master, as its collective representative, heartily by the hand. Few frequenters of the concerts recall a similar circumstance.

When the Symphony Orchestra goes westward at the end of the month, it will pay its first visit to Wheeling in West Virginia. Thus does each year, especially in the Middle West, set new dots on the musical map.

By all report, Mr. Ernst Schmidt of the first violins of the Symphony Orchestra acquitted himself well, when he conducted, in the absence of Dr. Muck, at the concert in Cambridge last Thursday evening. His manner is quiet; he left much, and with reason, to the orchestra in the repertory pieces that made the programme, but not so much as to hide his clear understanding of the music, his elastic control of his forces, his regard for tonal balance and his excellent sense of pace and rhythm.

BOSTON POST,

JANUARY 23,

STRAUSS AND MUCK AT ODDS

Symphony Far From Tradition in "Zarathustra"

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall was of the most exceptional interest: The First Symphony of Jean Sibelius, the tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" of Richard Strauss; the Third "Leonore" overture of Beethoven.

A SUPERB PERFORMANCE

The music of Sibelius, elemental, fierce and melancholy, seemed from another civilization than the present, and was given the finest possible performance by Dr. Muck and his players. The music of Strauss, come out of the very vortex of modern European culture, with all the characteristics of this culture, of the restlessness and sophistication of the age, yet informed with desperate heroism. The spiritual audacity of one of the heroes of this age was the most impressive of contrasts. Above all was Beethoven.

It is not possible to praise adequately the performance of Sibelius' symphony, or to give adequate thanks for new music of such simplicity and conviction and primeval power. For a first essay in the symphonic form, this work astonishes one by its strength and its sweep, its savor of wild northern nature, its sureness of touch and originality of thought. And then there is the glorious orchestral coloring, coloring which, on account of its beauty and its clearness and individuality, somewhat tarnished the brilliant orchestral dress of Strauss' tone poem.

The composer might well have rejoiced in his spokesmen. In spite of the tumultuous inspiration of the music there are moments of indecision, more particularly in the slow movement, and of conventional procedures of composition in other movements, which are singularly at variance with the spirit of the work. In these cases the conductor came nobly to the rescue. If there was a weak joining place in the structure, its underlying spirit was made to bridge the gap. If some phrase was a little more commonplace than is usual with the later Sibelius, it was treated in such a manner that it was deeply impressive. Consider the broad and sad melody of the last moment—that melody which alternates with savage dance rhythms and music of the elements at play. Nothing could have been more moving than its treatment by Dr. Muck. A noble work, nobly interpreted. No wonder there was enthusiasm. The conductor was repeatedly called back to the stage. Finally the orchestra arose and bowed with him.

Departs From Tradition

Much had been expected of Dr. Muck's reading of the "Zarathustra." Was it the spontaneity, the force, the beauty of Sibelius' music which interfered with the effect of the latter work? Only partly. Dr. Muck had carefully prepared a performance which was in some respects a departure from tradition. The orchestra had restudied the score. When Dr. Muck does not like a work he prepares it even more carefully, if possible, than he prepares a composition with which he is in sympathy. We do not believe that he believes over much in the "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Granting that no one has a better right to his conception of Strauss than this remarkable musician, it remains that to this reviewer the performance was notably unsympathetic, uncharacteristic of Strauss, even comparatively ineffective.

It often seemed to us that Dr. Muck felt Strauss to be unrefined and sensational in this score, and wished to redeem some passages of what may impress him as bombast or exaggeration. The introduction could certainly have been broader, mightier, more apocalyptic. Then, as for instance with the chromatic theme that has been associated, and well associated it seems to us, with Zarathustra's turning away from old formulas—a theme first thundered out by the trombones toward the end of the music "of joys and passions," and later interpolated by wind instruments in the midst of the fugue—there was by no means the possible degree of sarcasm, irony, the Nietzschean laughter which this theme, gibbered by various wind instruments, certainly suggests. The march of the fugue, as we think of it, could have been mightier, had a heavier tread. The solo passage for the horn at the place (etwas ruhiger) after the announcement of the dance song—which was admirably accomplished—could well have been broader, more serenely prophetic of soul's salvation. And where, oh, where, were the 12 strokes of the bell, which should resound through all the immense sonorities of the orchestra at the final climax—the "Nightwanderer's Song." we do not swear to the physical absence of the [illegible] but we do assert emphatically that it did not have the effect the composer intended.

Why omit this? Is it, too, sensational? It is surely one of Strauss' most characteristic effects, and for most of us a superb effect from any point of view. Nothing could make the final measures more effective than this tolling, that echoes softer and softer—softly and more softly—and then gives place to the theme of the ideal, soaring aloft.

Stamps on Platform

In brief, the essentially rhapsodic quality of the amazing music inspired by the singular rhapsody of Nietbsche, the temperamental qualities of Strauss music, and what is frequently the surpassing grandeur of his vision, were usually lacking. It is easy to believe, especially as one remembers Dr. Muck stamping on the platform at one moment of the performance, that this performance did not go wholly to his liking, and that the performance this evening will sound more spontaneous. It cannot be said that it sounded so yesterday.

With all the cerebral quality of Strauss, he has always seemed to us first a composer of a splendidly nervous temperament. That nervousness and incisiveness and that volcanic energy that flames in every measure of his music, and sweeps you from your feet as though a whirlwind had taken you in its arms, was not felt. Conviction seemed to us to be absent and never before had a work of indisputable audacity and inspiration sounded so empty, so like a mere box of orchestral tricks.

BOSTON HERALD.

JANUARY 23, 1915.

12TH PUBLIC SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Extraordinarily Romantic Work by Sibelius Played by Orchestra.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 12th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Busoni had been announced as soloist, but on arriving in New York he declared that he was "too weak" to play after the voyage of 14 days from Genoa. Beethoven's "Leonore" overture was therefore substituted for Liszt's piano concerto in E flat. The program was as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. 1, E minor; Strauss, tone-poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra"; Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3.

Nearly 10 years ago Mr. Gericke produced the second symphony of Sibelius, the one in D major. The composer was then unknown in Boston except by name. The reception of the work by the public was so cool that Mr. Gericke dropped Sibelius. Mr. Fiedler was favorably inclined toward the Finn, but he did not bring out the symphony in E minor. The performance of yesterday was the third under Dr. Muck, who put it on the program in 1907 and in 1912.

It is an extraordinarily romantic work; to us the most imaginative and effective of the three symphonies that have been performed here. M. Weber, for years the music critic of Le Temps, once wrote an article in which he proved neatly to his own satisfaction that there is no such thing in music as local color. He argued that when we find the contour of a melody, or some strange harmonies and unusual rhythms exotic, Persian, Egyptian, what you will, it is because we have been told that these musical characteristics are associated with some particular country; but a land is not to be musically described.

This depends a good deal on the hearer. The introduction to the third act of "Aida" may remind us of a sultry night on the Nide on account of what has gone before, the stage-setting and the entrance of Egyptian priest, princess, and slave. Perhaps we might not realize the loneliness and immeasurable distance of a Russian steppe from Borodin's orchestral piece, unless the word "Steppe" were in the title. Yet in either instance the music is peculiarly suited to the scene. So hearing the symphony of Sibelius, knowing that he is a Finn, knowing also something about the scenery of Finland, the history of that land, its sagas, and the "Kalevala," it is very easy to find the full, wild, tumultuous expression of what we conceive Finland to be in this music of Sibelius, and we find it here to a greater extent than in the second symphony, or in the fourth in which Sibelius seems to have wandered far from his country and his true self in search of strange gods and strange mental conditions. In this respect the first symphony is to be ranked with the violin concerto and "The Swan of Tuonela."

The first movement is surely one of the frankest and most emotional outpourings of the composer's soul. It might stand alone as a tragic overture, fiery, passionate, inexpressibly sad. There is only a slight taint of formalism, of pedantry, in this movement, the desire of a composer to show in his first symphony that he knows his counterpoint and all the tricks. In the second movement this fault is more noticeable, for it is more deliberate and more extended. It is as if the composer [illegible] "Now I'll prove to you that I have studied diligently." These faults, however, are negligible when the sweep and pathos of the whole symphony are taken into consideration. The performance was superb.

Sibelius gives no program, no clue to the contents of his symphony. Strauss furnishes an introductory note, a passage from Nietzsche's book, to his "Zarathustra," and there are sub-captions in the score: "Of the Dwellers in the Rear World," "Of the Great Tearning," etc. He is reported as having said that he put "freely after Frieda, Nietzsche" in the title, because he would otherwise have been accused of translating Nietzsche's book into music with a view of doing the same thing later with Kant and Schopenhauer. When there are such guide-posts in a program-book, the hearer, if he is not content with simply listening to the music, is apt to take the wrong direction or miss a post to his utter confusion. "Where are we now? Is this the 'Grave Song' or the section about 'Science'?" There is no mistaking the "Dance Song," but we like to think the girls met by Zarathustra danced to a more seductive tune. The inherent cheapness of this tune—and Vernon Blackburn defined a tune as a melody that is over-ripe—is atoned for by the amazing treatment of it, and yesterday by the brilliance of the general performance and the remarkably incisive playing of the solo violin passages by Mr. Witek.

The introduction is impressive; the section "Of Science" sounds as though Strauss had wished to show the aridity and endlessness of much scientific teaching; the music towards the close is very beautiful, to be put by the side of a few pages of "Don Quixote" and the domestic symphony. As a work of pure art and a complete realization of a composer's intention no one of the so-called colossal tone-poems of Strauss equals "Till Eulenspiegel" or "Don Juan." With them and "Death and Transfiguration" Strauss ceased to be purely and constantly musical as a writer of symphonic poems. The close of "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and Zarathustra speaks too much in Nietsche's poem and in Strauss's music—has been greatly admired as mystic, wonderful, an attempt to solve the riddle of the universe; but this riddle is not to be solved by sounds from piccolos, flute and a violin or two alternating with pizzicato notes of double basses.

Beethoven, for a comparatively small orchestra, wrote his "Leonore" overture No. 3 over a hundred years ago, a work that by the loftiness, the nobility of the ideas and by the dramatic expression still sways the hearer and purifies the passions.

There will be no concerts next week. The program of Feb. 5, 6 will be as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 4; Spohr, Concerto for string quartet with orchestra, op. 131 (first time at these concerts); Mahler, "Lays of a Travelling Journeyman" (Paul Draper, singer); Dvorak, "Carnaval" overture.

ADVERTISER.

JANUARY 23

THE SYMPHONY THIS WEEK

ONCE AGAIN A PURELY ORCHESTRAL PROGRAMME

Sibelius, Strauss and Beethoven Contributors—Busoni Not Able to Appear

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Sibelius. Symphony No. 1. E minor.
Strauss. "Also Sprach Zarathustra."
Beethoven. Leonore Overture. No. 3.

The best laid plans o' mice and orchestral conductors gang aft agley. Mr. Busoni was ill from the results of a tempestuous sea voyage. Perhaps he was fortunate in being sick, for to have given the Liszt E-flat concerto after an hour and three-quarters of modern music, and especially after the tonal shimmerings of Richard Strauss, might have been tempting Providence. We shall now hope to hear the great pianist under more favorable circumstances than these.

He was replaced by Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, No. 3, and even that, with the frenzied joy at its end, suffered somewhat from the juxta-position. But at least it was a good deal shorter than the Liszt concerto would have been. Therefore, while expressing the heartiest sympathy for Mr. Busoni in his temporary illness, we cannot but be pleased that he did not play on this particular occasion.

But one can rhapsodize over the instrumental works which formed this oddly made-up programme. To go from the fourth symphony of Sibelius, to this first one, was like going from Philip drunk to Philip sober. In the fourth symphony all seems experimental, while in the first there is definite attainment.

From the very beginning, where the clarinette has a theme of dreamy melancholy and loneliness, the attention is enchained. There is the Northern sadness in much of the work, but it reminds of Longfellow's

"Feeling of sadness and longing,
That is not akin to Pain,
And resembles Sorrow only
As the mist resembles rain."

This sadness seems to be a Scandinavian heritage in music and has its own great power. Yet the chief theme of the first movement is full of resolution and heroism and contrasted well with the brooding and mystery which reigned elsewhere. Muted horns suggested evil, and most sudden contrasts spoke of tragedy. A fine climax is worked up in the first movement and logically too, being well derived from preceding tonal material.

The Andante was less impressive in its complainings. But the Scherzo is a Finnish gem. It had all the heartiness and virility of the northern folk-dances, and the Trio with its horn passages was in fine contrast. The performance was something to grow enthusiastic over. Even the kettle-drum seemed inspired when it rapped out the figure in the returning passage from the Trio to the Scherzo. As with the Brahms symphony of last week, the finale had many derivations from preceding movements, but this device of thematic transference has become quite usual in modern symphonies, although when Beethoven introduced it in the finale of his ninth symphony it was criticised. In spite of the often frenzied power, of the growls of the deep wood-wind, of the sudden contrasts and the unexpectedly soft pizzicato ending, we prefer the Sibelius Scherzo to this more unrestful movement, and we think the first movement the strongest part of the entire work. The Andante would also be very effective if it had less of sequence treatment.

But when a man can give such poetic and comprehensible thoughts as Sibelius does in this, we must hesitate in giving a verdict upon his more vague and less intelligible works. After studying this symphony we dare not pronounce a sure verdict upon his fourth symphony. We may dislike that work, but we cannot say with jaunty confidence, "It is bad," but rather, "We cannot understand it!" The performance yesterday afternoon aroused real enthusiasm and, as usual, the orchestra was obliged to rise in acknowledgment.

After this Zarathustra also spoke. That is he sometimes roared and he sometimes whispered. We have had this work now at least a dozen times and it is a retrospect full of meaning when we think of the appalling effect it first made, and how we now expect the Brobdignagian score as a matter of course. It has been said that the car can accustom itself to anything, and we have now passed Zarathustra and are chewing upon Schoenberg, who is a great deal more indigestible.

Our orchestra played the Strauss work magnificently. It is just as well that they tread these thorny paths frequently, if only that they may convince the New York critics that our musical organization is absolutely "hors concours." But we have seldom heard even our wonderful orchestra reach quite the level that marked the interpretation of the first part of this work. It was colossal in its powerful effects and beautiful in its more tender phrases. Organ and trumpet deserve especial words for the effects they produced. This man has something to say; he is not a mere modern musical eccentric. The work may be too long, and at times too abstruse, but the voice of genius is heard sometimes, amid the confusion. The performance was less unified in the last part of this tone-poem than in its majestic beginning.

It is singular how in such a large composition the feminine element is almost entirely absent, only appearing in the dance episode. The work will therefore not find great favor in the Suffragette ranks, and some day a female composer will give us—"Thus spoke Mrs. Zarathustra"—and by the way, she does speak, and with emphasis, in the Strauss family.

After this Beethoven's overture finished the concert. Had it been given as originally planned we believe it would have been nearly two hours and a half in length.

TRANSCRIPT,

, JANUARY 19,

News of the Symphony Orchestra—Concerts Cancelled and to Come

AT last and in at least one piece, the Symphony Orchestra has gained in Dr. Muck's ears all the perfections of tone, balance and communicating eloquence that he seeks. The band did these things in its playing of Brahms's symphony in C minor last Friday and last Saturday and ever since, in private talk and beyond his wont, he has been warm in praise of them. On Saturday evening, in particular, when the audience had recalled him four times at the end of the symphony and brought the orchestra to its feet, he shook the concert-master, as its collective representative, heartily by the hand. Few frequenters of the concerts recall a similar circumstance.

When the Symphony Orchestra goes westward at the end of the month, it will pay its first visit to Wheeling in West Virginia. Thus does each year, especially in the Middle West, set new dots on the musical map.

By all report, Mr. Ernst Schmidt of the first violins of the Symphony Orchestra acquitted himself well, when he conducted, in the absence of Dr. Muck, at the concert in Cambridge last Thursday evening. His manner is quiet; he left much, and with reason, to the orchestra in the repertory pieces that made the programme, but not so much as to hide his clear understanding of the music, his elastic control of his forces, his regard for tonal balance and his excellent sense of pace and rhythm.

[104]

FEBRUARY 6,

THIRTEENTH SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Beethoven's No. 4 Given, Finale Having Special Character from Dr. Muck's Reading.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 13th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major......Beethoven
Concerto in D minor, for two violins and Orchestra of strings..........Bach
Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen ("Songs of a Traveling Journeyman"), with orchestra. First time in Boston..Mahler
Overture, "Carnival,"..............Dvorak

Of the nine symphonies of Beethoven the fourth and the sixth are the least impressive. The first is historically interesting and its finale is delightfully gay. The second is also interesting as showing the development of Beethoven's musical mind. After the "Eroica" the fourth, in spite of Berlioz's famous rhapsody about the archangel Michael sighing the Adagio when overcome by melancholy, seems a droop in the flight of imagination. Yet there are noble and strange things in this symphony, things that only Beethoven could have written—the introduction, the mysterious measures with the crescendo that majestically re-establishes the chief tonality in the first movement; the superb Adagio. Yesterday the Finale had more than ordinary character, thanks to Dr. Muck's spirited and dramatic reading.

A concerto by Spohr for string quartet and orchestra had been announced, but on account of the Western trip and concerts in the neighborhood this week, there was no time for the quartet to rehearse. Bach's concerto in D minor for two violins and orchestra of strings was substituted. No doubt the audience gained by the change, for even the admirers of Spohr in Leipsic where his concerto was first performed were not as a rule enthusiastic. A little of Spohr at his best goes a long way. Bach's concerto had not been heard at these concerts since October, 1890, when Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler were the solo violinists. The concert then was in memory of Otto Dresel. Yesterday Messrs. Witek and Noack, the concertmasters of the orchestra, gave an excellent performance. The Largo of the concerto is very beautiful. Sir Hubert Parry has written a page to show why Bach's slow movements fascinate persons that are not essentially musical. He argues that the answer is this: the form is "psychological rather than essentially musical." Sir Hubert might be asked what he means by "essentially musical"; and cannot the form of a composition be psychological and essentially musical? A hearer may be wholly ignorant of counterpoint and yet be fascinated by the Finale of Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, which is a miracle of "essentially musical" form. The Largo of Bach pleases because it is very beautiful to the ear; and it also awakens emotions in the hearer. The other movements appeal to the audience because they give an opportunity for good fiddling, and a certain persistence in musical figures and in rhythm excites the nerves.

Gustav Mahler's "songs of a travelling journeyman" were heard here for the first time. They are four in number. Mahler wrote the words. The music was composed at Cassel when a was 23 years old, and not happy as second conductor at the opera house. This journeyman should have travelled with the Dismal Jimmy of Schubert's familiar song-cycle. Each one mourned a girl that was another's; each one was given to finding the world alternately fair and gloomy; each one had much to say about weeping in his chamber and in the open, with talk of his dead heart and the silent tomb. The vocal part of Mahler's songs is comparatively simple, conceived in folk song spirit; the moods are expressed by an ingenious use of a full orchestra, that includes piccolo, English horn, bass clarinet, harp, bass drum and other percussion instruments. The first two songs "When My Love Is a Bride" and "As I Walked Abroad This Morn," are chiefly lyrical with an illustrative orchestra; but the third, in which the youth exclaims that he has been stabbed in the breast, is wildly dramatic. The fourth, "The Two Blue Eyes of My Sweetheart" with its march rhythm, is again sentimental, although Mahler has said that the poem should not end sentimentally. These four songs are unusual. With another singer they might be much more effective. Mr. Paul Draper, who sang them yesterday, has neither the voice nor the vocally dramatic skill to confirm the intentions of the poet-composer.

Dvorak's "Carnival" overture is a fine example of the genuine Dvorak, delighting in color, rhythm, fury and tumultuous gaiety. It reminds one pleasantly of the earlier Dvorak, the gifted child of nature with the simple peasant heart and mind, before he had been admired in England and persuaded to write oratorios; before he had been Americanized and fed on "Negro melodies"; before he was tempted in his last years to concoct realistic symphonic poems.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Schumann, Symphony in D minor; Monteverdi, the Lament of Ariadne; Bach, Suite in B minor for flute and orchestra of strings ([illegible] flutist); Handel, "Dan sei Dir"; Beethoven, "Adelaide" ([illegible] ration by Schoenberg); Mendelssohn, verture to "A Midsummer Night's ream." Mme. Julia Culp will be the nger.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

FEBRUARY 6,

THREE SYMPHONY SOLOISTS HEARD

Second Half of Season Is Given a Brilliant Introduction.

Friday brought the thirteenth Symphony "rehearsal," with one of the most interesting programs and one of the most pleasing performances, to mark the beginning of the second half of the season.

The eleventh-hour change of program put the Bach concerto in D minor, for two violins and string orchestra, in place of Spohr's string quartet, and the solo playing of Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack, supported by the admirably balanced string sections of the orchestra, was delightful. There stood out the remarkable virtuosity of the orchestra. The two soloists, who share the desk at the head of the first violins week after week, gave a performance that would be hard to equal. They proved worthy representatives of an assemblage of string players whose brilliancy has made the orchestra famous the world over.

Spirited and artistic, too, was the performance of Beethoven's fourth symphony, which was conducted by Dr. Muck with exquisite feeling. The enthusiasm of the audience lasted until the whole orchestra stood up to make its acknowledgments with the gifted leader.

The novelty on the program was Gustav Mahler's "Songs of a Traveling Journeyman," four pieces somewhat resembling folk-songs in form and mood, all for tenor solo and with orchestral accompaniment. It has been generally conceded that Mahler's muse was at its happiest in little works like these. Paul Draper sang the songs sympathetically, but their chief charm lies in the graphic and often piquant orchestral accompaniment. The number was warmly applauded.

Dvorak's "Carnival" overture ends the program, which, as usual, will be played again tonight.

The program for next week's concerts includes the Schumann symphony in D minor, Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, Bach's suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra, with Mr. Maquarre as soloist, and three songs, Monteverdi's "Lament of Ariadne," an aria by Handel, and Beethoven's "Adelaide," with orchestration by Schoenberg. Mme. Julia Culp will be the singer.

BOSTON GLOBE—

FEBRUARY 6.

'NEW' MAHLER SONGS.

Dramatic Settings of 'Folk' Character Lyrics.

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony Part of Unusual Program.

Mahler's four "Songs of a Traveling Journeyman" were heard yesterday afternoon at the 13th Symphony rehearsal, for the first time in Boston. Paul Draper was the singer. They were written, words and music, when Mahler was 23. In both he has kept the folk song character. There is simplicity, directness and a homely pathos in these songs of the humble journeyman, who fares forth with a heart heavy for love, who dreams of his adored, who sees her hair in the waving fields of corn, who wishes he were dead with his longing for her. An honest confession of an honest heart, unembellished by rhetoric or rhapsody, a melancholy, through which cheer in nature struggles now and again, a melancholy which in the third song cries out in flaming rebellion, but after all calls forth answering tenderness, softening pity.

The voice is used as a principal instrument for the delivery of the text. The orchestra is a source of much beauty, of true emotional expression as direct, clear and searching as the lines themselves. The musical ideas are singularly apt and delineative. There is breadth of treatment and of scoring, but with a voice of commensurate resources it would not override the singer.

There is a fine sensitivenes in the appreciation for the varying moods, for these words to some composers might steadily encourage the devices of woe and incur monotony. In the last of the lyrics, when the journeyman sets out at dead of night, with no one to bid farewell to him, with love and grief as his companions, the temptation would have been strong for some to accompany him with the English horn singing with mournful sentimentality or with sobs of cellos. It might have been well had Mahler kept as moving an inspiration in the later years, given to his ponderous symphonies with their expansive schemes and unwieldly apparatus.

Mr Draper is not blessed with a voice either voluminous or sensuously beautiful, but he is by every sign an artist, an interpreter. He finds and projects the heart of feeling in whatever he undertakes. The color of tone, the facial [illegible] and the characterizing flavor he imparts to words—these things are immeasurably superior to mere beauty of tone. A larger voice is to be desired in these songs, it is true, and wider range and greater resonance, but Mr Draper at this first hearing penetrated to the spirit of them, and deserves general thanks. Dr Muck and the orchestra made the score a thing of absorbing interest and of satisfying beauty, a score which made each song a dramatic picture.

Beethoven's fourth symphony, showing forth the genial, the playful spirit of the man, was played with an incompassing lovliness of style and feeling. The exuberant first movement, sparkling here and there with humor as the conversation of friends; the heavenly beauty of the slow movement, in which the wood wind virtuosi vied with one another as masters of sustained and gracefully embellished song, and the rousing finale bubbling with exhilaration—all could not fail to give joy to an audience when played in the incomparable manner of that of yesterday.

Bach's figurative concerto in D minor for solo violins and strings is a noble composition, well calculated to display the art of the soloists without the guise of mere virtuosity. Messrs Witek and Noack, concert masters of the orchestra, performed with fitting skill. Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, a score abounding in color, reminding at times of the rhythmic pattern and exuberance of the music of "Carmen" in the first of the last act, was played superbly. Altogether a program of uncommon interest and enjoyment.

Miss Culp will be the soloist next week. The orchestral numbers will be Schumann's symphony in D minor, Bach's suite in B minor for flute and strings (Mr Maquarre soloist), and Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

BOSTON POST,

FEBRUARY 6,

NEW SONGS HEARD WITH SYMPHONY

Draper Sings Mahler's Works—Two Solo Violins

BY OLIN DOWNES

Four striking songs for tenor with orchestral accompaniment, by Gustav Mahler, were the novel feature of the programme presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Bach's Concerto in D minor for two violins and orchestra of strings (solo violins, Messrs. Witek and Noack, first and second concertmeisters of the orchestra) and Dvorak's overture "Carnival" completed the programme.

SINGER AND MUSICIAN

Paul Draper was the singer who interpreted Mahler's songs, not as a petted and spoiled vocalist grown arrogant from public favor, but as a musician of the highest qualifications and as one of the finest interpreters of the orchestra.

The songs are in themselves remarkable. It would be difficult to wholly deprive them of their eloquence, under any circumstances, but it should be said that they would not have been nearly so effective had they lacked Dr. Muck's superb orchestral accompaniment and Mr. Draper's masterly interpretation. His diction, for purity and for dramatic force, has not been equalled in the recollection of the writer since Dr. Wullner has visited this city some seasons ago. Mr. Draper's voice has not unusual sensuous beauty, but it was employed with the most admirable intelligence and effect. In his treatment of phrase and text the singer deserved the highest praise, and the sincerity and feeling of his interpretations crowned the careful objective study of the songs which he evidently had made.

Eloquence in Songs

As for the songs themselves, they were astonishing to the great majority of music lovers of this city to whom Mahler means the immense C-sharp minor symphony. The songs are simple, melodic and solely original. Singable, diatonic in the general character of the phrases, now lyric, now dramatic, they are always amazingly faithful to the innermost meaning of the text. A homeless wanderer has lost his adored, who has deserted him and whatever the scene, the morning sunlight, or the dark and dreary moor, the face, the voice, haunt him. For a moment he can shake free from care, and respond to the joyousness of nature, but he is pursued as by a phantom, forgetfulness and salvation he cannot find.

The eloquence of the poetry, which is also by Mahler, of the early years, the inimitable conviction and depth of sentiment which the music expresses the sequence of moods, and the wonderful heightening of these moods the remarkable orchestral accompaniments—these things were immensely appreciated yesterday.

New Beauties in Beethoven

Dr. Muck's reading of the fourth symphony found the conductor again in one of his strongest positions. When Dr. Muck conducts Beethoven, one can hardly fail to be impressed all over again with the greatness of the music. It is the time-beaters or the conductors who follow purely conventional procedure, and forget the spirit in their absorption with the letter, who often make Beethoven appear dull to the younger generation. With Dr. Muck there is always, one feels, the fresh, earnest study of a well known work, no matter how often he has played it, and there is the fire of deep inner conviction. The fourth symphony is not one of Beethoven's greatest works, but the slow movement alone would make necessary its presence on orchestral programme, and the whole of the first movement—not only the introduction, is stirring music.

The concerto of Bach was substituted for a work by Spohr, for solo players of stringed instruments with accompaniment of other instruments, which was originally intended for performance this week. Bach's music is melodic, polyphonic, of course, two-fisted in the first and last movements, most beautiful in the slow movement. All of this music is strictly in accordance with canons of its time. Without doubt Bach turned out a great number of similar sterling compositions each month and each year. There is no better illustration of the incalculable value of good counterpoint. It is partly for the reason that the style of composition in Germany of the early 18th century was so solid, so meaty, and so logical in its development of themes, that such a workman as Bach could hardly fail to produce music that had both vitality and style.

It was a strict and an honest school of composition. When one could conform to its rules he had at least more than a rudimentary idea of his trade, and could be trusted, at the worst, to turn out a fairly solid piece of goods. There was the great carpenter shop in which most of the lumber for future generations of composers was made and stored—all the beams and arches and supports that the later symphonists, and Wagner, the dramatic composer, and many others were to utilize in their structures of tone. More or less routine music this, but how marvellously superior is Bach's routine to the average of even gifted modern musicians.

Worthy Interpreters

Honest, virile, glowing music, the music of a man, and in the slow movement of a man with poetry in his soul. It should be said of the performances of Messrs. Witek and Noack that they in their turn were as worthy of Bach as Mr. Draper's performance was of the best in Mahler. It is for reviewers with more technical knowledge of the violin than this one to compare the prowess of two admirable artists. Suffice it that yesterday both men seemed to excel and supplement each other till they were a thousand strong, and again it was a pleasure to note the absence of the soloist element. Mr. Draper stood by Dr. Muck, with the score that he sang from open before him for reference. In a similar fashion and spirit, Mr. Witek and Mr. Noack, companions of the first desk of the violins, rose from their seats and took part with the other strings in a five ensemble performance. The audience recalled Dr. Muck repeatedly after Beethoven5s symphony, and the solo performers were also thus honored. Dvorak's brilliant overture was a cheerful conclusion of the concert.

---

glimpses at these two important nations, their principal cities, towns and villages, their architectural, artistic and industrial phases, besides introducing many life-portraits in motion of the Kaisers of Germany and Austria and their daily life at home, in public ceremonials, and surrounded by their generals in camp and on the field of battle. Especially notable are many motion pictures of the Kaiser on board ship watching target practice, the exploding of mines and the evolutions of torepdo boat destroyers and submarines.

From ....NEWS..........
Address ....[illegible]ence, R. I.
Date ....JAN 2 3 1915 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The appearance of Frieda Hempel, the great coloratura soprona of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, as soloist at the Fourth Boston Symphony concert which wil be given in Infantry hall, Tuesday evening, February 2, has excited unusual interest among all lovers of fine singing in this city. This if anything has been increased by the announcement of the numbers she will sing.

Her first number will be the great aria of Astrifiammente, The Queen of the Night in Mozart's fantastic opera "The Magic Flute. The aria has won great dramatic appeal and shows Mozart's melodic invention at its best. Like all Mozart's music it must be "sung" for beauty of voice and skill of singing are indispensable in music of this class.

Her second number will be the fascinating Valse song from Gounod's opera "Mireille" which gives her fine opportunity to display all the technical resources of a coloratura singer.

The orchestral numbers will be the charming little "Surprise" symphony of Hayden, the "Shephelds Music" from Bach's "Christmas Oratoria," "The March of the Three Holy Kings" from Liszt's Oratorio "Christus" and Weber's overture "Der Freischuetz."

[105]

[illegible]

FEBRUARY 6,

THIRTEENTH SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Beethoven's No. 4 Given, Finale Having Special Character from Dr. Muck's Reading.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 13th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major ..... Beethoven
Concerto in D minor, for two violins and Orchestra of strings .... Bach
Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen ("Songs of a Traveling Journeyman"), with orchestra. First time in Boston .. Mahler
Overture, "Carnival," .... Dvorak

Of the nine symphonies of Beethoven the fourth and the sixth are the least impressive. The first is historically interesting and its finale is delightfully gay. The second is also interesting as showing the development of Beethoven's musical mind. After the "Eroica" the fourth, in spite of Berlioz's famous rhapsody about the archangel Michael sighing the Adagio when overcome by melancholy, seems a droop in the flight of imagination. Yet there are noble and strange things in this symphony, things that only Beethoven could have written—the introduction, the mysterious measures with the crescendo that majestically re-establishes the chief tonality in the first movement; the superb Adagio. Yesterday the Finale had more than ordinary character, thanks to Dr. Muck's spirited and dramatic reading.

A concerto by Spohr for string quartet and orchestra had been announced, but on account of the Western trip and concerts in the neighborhood this week, there was no time for the quartet to rehearse. Bach's concerto in D minor for two violins and orchestra of strings was substituted. No doubt the audience gained by the change, for even the admirers of Spohr in Leipsic where his concerto was first performed were not as a rule enthusiastic. A little of Spohr at his best goes a long way. Bach's concerto had not been heard at these concerts since October, 1890, when Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler were the solo violinists. The concert then was in memory of Otto Dresel. Yesterday Messrs. Witek and Noack, the concert masters of the orchestra, gave an excellent performance. The Largo of the concerto is very beautiful. Sir Hubert Parry has written a page to show why Bach's slow movements fascinate persons that are not essentially musical. He argues that the answer is this: the form is "psychological rather than essentially musical." Sir Hubert might be asked what he means by "essentially musical"; and cannot the form of a composition be psychological and essentially musical? A hearer may be wholly ignorant of counterpoint and yet be fascinated by the Finale of Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, which is a miracle of "essentially musical" form. The Largo of Bach pleases because it is very beautiful to the ear; and it also awakens emotions in the hearer. The other movements appeal to the audience because they give an opportunity for good fiddling, and a certain persistence in musical figures and in rhythm excites the nerves.

Gustav Mahler's "songs of a travelling journeyman" were heard here for the first time. They are four in number. Mahler wrote the words. The music was composed at Cassel when a was 23 years old, and not happy as second conductor at the opera house. This journeyman should have travelled with the Dismal Jimmy of Schubert's familiar song-cycle. Each one mourned a girl that was another's; each one was given to finding the world alternately fair and gloomy; each one had much to say about weeping in his chamber and in the open, with talk of his dead heart and the silent tomb. The vocal part of Mahler's songs is comparatively simple, conceived in folk song spirit; the moods are expressed by an ingenious use of a full orchestra, that includes piccolo, English horn, bass clarinet, harp, bass drum and other percussion instruments. The first two songs "When My Love Is a Bride" and "As I Walked Abroad This Morn," are chiefly lyrical with an illustrative orchestra; but the third, in which the youth exclaims that he has been stabbed in the breast, is wildly dramatic. The fourth, "The Two Blue Eyes of My Sweetheart" with its march rhythm, is again sentimental, although Mahler has said that the poem should not end sentimentally. These four songs are unusual. With another singer they might be much more effective. Mr. Paul Draper, who sang them yesterday, has neither the voice nor the vocally dramatic skill to confirm the intentions of the poet-composer.

Dvorak's "Carnival" overture is a fine example of the genuine Dvorak, delighting in color, rhythm, fury and tumultuous gaiety. It reminds one pleasantly of the earlier Dvorak, the gifted child of nature with the simple peasant heart and mind, before he had been admired in England and persuaded to write oratorios; before he had been Americanized and fed on "Negro melodies"; before he was tempted in his last years to concoct realistic symphonic poems.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Schumann, Symphony in D minor; Monteverdi, the Lament of Ariadne; Bach, Suite in B minor for flute and orchestra of strings [illegible] flutist); Handel, "Dank sei Dir"; Beethoven, Adelaide [illegible]

BOSTON JOURNAL—
FEBRUARY 6,

THREE SYMPHONY SOLOISTS HEARD

Second Half of Season Is Given a Brilliant Introduction.

Friday brought the thirteenth Symphony "rehearsal," with one of the most interesting programs and one of the most pleasing performances, to mark the beginning of the second half of the season.

The eleventh-hour change of program put the Bach concerto in D minor, for two violins and string orchestra, in place of Spohr's string quartet, and the solo playing of Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack, supported by the admirably balanced string sections of the orchestra, was delightful. There stood out the remarkable virtuosity of the orchestra. The two soloists, who share the desk at the head of the first violins week after week, gave a performance that would be hard to equal. They proved worthy representatives of an assemblage of string players whose brilliancy has made the orchestra famous the world over.

Spirited and artistic, too, was the performance of Beethoven's fourth symphony, which was conducted by Dr. Muck with exquisite feeling. The enthusiasm of the audience lasted until the whole orchestra stood up to make its acknowledgments with the gifted leader.

The novelty on the program was Gustav Mahler's "Songs of a Traveling Journeyman," four pieces somewhat resembling folk-songs in form and mood, all for tenor solo and with orchestral accompaniment. It has been generally conceded that Mahler's muse was at its happiest in little works like these. Paul Draper sang the songs sympathetically, but their chief charm lies in the graphic and often piquant orchestral accompaniment. The number was warmly applauded.

Dvorak's "Carnival" overture ends the program, which, as usual, will be played again tonight.

The program for next week's concerts includes the Schumann symphony in D minor, Mendelssohn's "Midsummer [illegible]ight's Dream" overture. Bach s suite [illegible] minor for flute and string orches[illegible]ith Mr. Maquarre as soloist, and [illegible]ngs. Monteverdi's "Lament of [illegible]n aria by Handel, and Beet[illegible]elaide," with orchestration S[illegible]rg. Mme. Julia Culp will the [illegible]er.

BOSTON GLOBE—
FEBRUARY 6.

'NEW' MAHLER SONGS.

Dramatic Settings of 'Folk' Character Lyrics.

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony Part of Unusual Program.

Mahler's four "Songs of a Traveling Journeyman" were heard yesterday afternoon at the 13th Symphony rehearsal, for the first time in Boston. Paul Draper was the singer. They were written, words and music, when Mahler was 23. In both he has kept the folk song character. There is simplicity, directness and a homely pathos in these songs of the humble journeyman, who fares forth with a heart heavy for love, who dreams of his adored, who sees her hair in the waving fields of corn, who wishes he were dead with his longing for her. An honest confession of an honest heart, unembellished by rhetoric or rhapsody, a melancholy, through which cheer in nature struggles now and again, a melancholy which in the third song cries out in flaming rebellion, but after all calls forth answering tenderness, softening pity.

The voice is used as a principal instrument for the delivery of the text. The orchestra is a source of much beauty, of true emotional expression as direct, clear and searching as the lines themselves. The musical ideas are singularly apt and delineative. There is breadth of treatment and of scoring, but with a voice of commensurate resources it would not override the singer.

There is a fine sensitivenes in the appreciation for the varying moods, for these words to some composers might steadily encourage the devices of woe and incur monotony. In the last of the lyrics, when the journeyman sets out at dead of night, with no one to bid farewell to him, with love and grief as his companions, the temptation would have been strong for some to accompany him with the English horn singing with mournful sentimentality or with sobs of cellos. It might have been well had Mahler kept as moving an inspiration in the later years, given to his ponderous symphonies with their expansive schemes and unwieldly apparatus.

Mr Draper is not blessed with a voice either voluminous or sensuously beautiful, but he is by every sign an artist, an interpreter. He finds and projects the heart of feeling in whatever he undertakes. The color of tone, the facial [illegible] and the characterizing flavor he imparts to words—these things are immeasurably superior to mere beauty of tone. A larger voice is to be desired in these songs, it is true, and wider range and greater resonance, but Mr Draper at this first hearing penetrated to the spirit of them, and deserves general thanks. Dr Muck and the orchestra made the score a thing of absorbing interest and of satisfying beauty, a score which made each song a dramatic picture.

Beethoven's fourth symphony, showing forth the genial, the playful spirit of the man, was played with an encompassing lovliness of style and feeling. The exuberant first movement, sparkling here and there with humor as the conversation of friends; the heavenly beauty of the slow movement, in which the wood wind virtuosi vied with one another as masters of sustained and gracefully embellished song, and the rousing finale bubbling with exhilaration—all could not fail to give joy to an audience when played in the incomparable manner of that of yesterday.

Bach's figurative concerto in D minor for solo violins and strings is a noble composition, well calculated to display the art of the soloists without the guise of mere virtuosity. Messrs Witek and Noack, concert masters of the orchestra, performed with fitting skill. Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, a score abounding in color, reminding at times of the rhythmic pattern and exuberance of the music of "Carmen" in the first of the last act, was played superbly. Altogether a program of uncommon interest and enjoyment.

Miss Culp will be the soloist next week. The orchestral numbers will be Schumann's symphony in D minor, Bach's suite in B minor for flute and strings (Mr Maquarre soloist), and Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

BOSTON. POST,
FEBRUARY 6,

NEW SONGS HEARD WITH SYMPHONY

Draper Sings Mahler's Works—Two Solo Violins

BY OLIN DOWNES

Four striking songs for tenor with orchestral accompaniment, by Gustav Mahler, were the novel feature of the programme presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Bach's Concerto in D minor for two violins and orchestra of strings (solo violins, Messrs. Witek and Noack, first and second concertmeisters of the orchestra) and Dvorak's overture "Carnival" completed the programme.

SINGER AND MUSICIAN

Paul Draper was the singer who interpreted Mahler's songs, not as a petted and spoiled vocalist grown arrogant from public favor, but as a musician of the highest qualifications and as one of the finest interpreters of the orchestra.

The songs are in themselves remarkable. It would be difficult to wholly deprive them of their eloquence, under any circumstances, but it should be said that they would not have been nearly so effective had they lacked Dr. Muck's superb orchestral accompaniment and Mr. Draper's masterly interpretation. His diction, for purity and for dramatic force, has not been equalled in the recollection of the writer since Dr. Wullner has visited this city some seasons ago. Mr. Draper's voice has not unusual sensuous beauty, but it was employed with the most admirable intelligence and effect. In his treatment of phrase and text the singer deserved the highest praise, and the sincerity and feeling of his interpretations crowned the careful objective study of the songs which he evidently had made.

Eloquence in Songs

As for the songs themselves, they were astonishing to the great majority of music lovers of this city to whom Mahler means the immense C-sharp minor symphony. The songs are simple, melodic and solely original. Singable, diatonic in the general character of the phrases, now lyric, now dramatic, they are always amazingly faithful to the innermost meaning of the text. A homeless wanderer has lost his adored, who has deserted him and whatever the scene, the morning sunlight, or the dark and dreary moor, the face, the voice, haunt him. For a moment he can shake free from care, and respond to the joyousness of nature, but he is pursued as by a phantom, forgetfulness and salvation he cannot find.

The eloquence of the poetry, which is also by Mahler, of the early years, the inimitable conviction and depth of sentiment which the music expresses the sequence of moods, and the wo[illegible]derful heightening of these moods the remarkable orchestral accor[illegible]ments—these things were [illegible] appreciated yesterday.

New Beauties in Beethoven

Dr. Muck's reading of the fourth symphony found the conductor again in one of his strongest positions. When Dr. Muck conducts Beethoven, one can hardly fail to be impressed all over again with the greatness of the music. It is the time-beaters or the conductors who follow purely conventional procedure, and forget the spirit in their absorption with the letter, who often make Beethoven appear dull to the younger generation. With Dr. Muck there is always, one feels, the fresh, earnest study of a well known work, no matter how often he has played it, and there is the fire of deep inner conviction. The fourth symphony is not one of Beethoven's greatest works, but the slow movement alone would make necessary its presence on orchestral programme, and the whole of the first movement—not only the introduction, is stirring music.

The concerto of Bach was substituted for a work by Spohr, for solo players of stringed instruments with accompaniment of other instruments, which was originally intended for performance this week. Bach's music is melodic, polyphonic, of course, two-fisted in the first and last movements, most beautiful in the slow movement. All of this music is strictly in accordance with canons of its time. Without doubt Bach turned out a great number of similar sterling compositions each month and each year. There is no better illustration of the incalculable value of good counterpoint. It is partly for the reason that the style of composition in Germany of the early 18th century was so solid, so meaty, and so logical in its development of themes, that such a workman as Bach could hardly fail to produce music that had both vitality and style.

It was a strict and an honest school of composition. When one could conform to its rules he had at least more than a rudimentary idea of his trade, and could be trusted, at the worst, to turn out a fairly solid piece of goods. There was the great carpenter shop in which most of the lumber for future generations of composers was made and stored—all the beams and arches and supports that the later symphonists, and Wagner, the dramatic composer, and many others were to utilize in their structures of tone. More or less routine music this, but how marvellously superior is Bach's routine to the average of even gifted modern musicians.

Worthy Interpreters

Honest, virile, glowing music, the music of a man, and in the slow movement of a man with poetry in his soul. It should be said of the performances of Messrs. Witek and Noack that they in their turn were as worthy of Bach as Mr. Draper's performance was of the best in Mahler. It is for reviewers with more technical knowledge of the violin than this one to compare the prowess of two admirable artists. Suffice it that yesterday both men seemed to excel and supplement each other till they were a thousand strong, and again it was a pleasure to note the absence of the soloist element. Mr. Draper stood by Dr. Muck, with the score that he sang from open before him for reference. In a similar fashion and spirit, Mr. Witek and Mr. Noack, companions of the first desk of the violins, rose from their seats and took part with the other strings in a five ensemble performance. The audience recalled Dr. Muck repeatedly after Beethoven5s symphony, and the solo perfonmers were also thus honored. Dvorak's brilliant overture was a cheerful conclusion of the concert.

---

glimpses at these two important nations, their principal cities, towns and villages, their architectural, artistic and industrial phases, besides introducing many life-portraits in motion of the Kaisers of Germany and Austria and their daily life at home, in public ceremonials, and surrounded by their generals in camp and on the field of battle. Especially notable are many motion pictures of the Kaiser on board ship watching target practice, the exploding of mines and the evolutions of torepdo boat destroyers and submarines.

From [illegible]ews
Address [illegible]ence, R. I.
Date JAN 23 1915
, 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The appearance of Frieda Hempel, the great coloratura soprona of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, as soloist at the Fourth Boston Symphony concert which wil be given in Infantry hall, Tuesday evening, February 2, has excited unusual interest among all lovers of fine singing in this city. This if anything has been increased by the announcement of the numbers she will sing.

Her first number will be the great aria of Astrifiammente, The Queen of the Night in Mozart's fantastic opera "The Magic Flute. The aria has won great dramatic appeal and shows Mozart's melodic invention at its best. Like all Mozart's music it must be "sung" for beauty of voice and skill of singing are indispensable in music of this class.

Her second number will be the fascinating Valse song from Gounod's opera "Mireille" which gives her fine opportunity to display all the technical resources of a coloratura singer.

The orchestral numbers will be the charming little "Surprise" symphony of Hayden, the "Shepheld's Music" from Bach's "Christmas Oratoria," "The March of the Three Holy Kings" from Liszt's Oratorio "Christus" and Weber's overture "Der Freischuetz."

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.

Date JAN 3 1 1915

The Personal Side of Dr. Karl Muck

Establis

SEE him off the stage and without his baton which has such a remarkable influence upon his players, and Dr. Karl Muck, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, seems to be a youngster, writes Archie Bell in the Cleveland Leader. In many critical circles, he is believed to be the foremost orchestra conductor of the world, while in Europe he is known as an operatic conductor of the first water. But see this celebrated gentleman off parade, as I did frequently at Bayreuth last summer, and one forgets that he is a doctor of music, that several nations have bid one against the other for his services, and he seems to be only a young fellow who enjoys the company of his fellow musical artists just a little more than the ordinary or garden variety of musician, who, next to his favorite instrument, thinks more of a talkfest than of anything else in the world.

Muck conducts the performances of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth. He was the conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin, the famous Philharmonic Orchestra of Vienna, and the Royal Orchestra of Berlin, before he came to America in 1906, by a special leave of absence personally granted by the German Kaiser, to conduct the famous Boston Symphony. It would seem he has about reached the highest honors that may fall to a conductor, but one would not recognize that fact, either in conversation with the eminent man or observing him when he is not before the gaze of the public.

For example, at a social function at the home of the Wagners, Wahnfried, which has an almost sacred air about it to the chosen few who are invited there at festival time, I saw him receiving homage, as celebrated men and women grasped his hand and made him quite the lion of the evening. Then, suddenly, he left the highnesses and other more or less courtly functionaries, and soon after, under the guidance of one who had the privilege of the house, I was endeavoring to make a retreat to the free air of the garden and passed through the butler's pantry toward a side door. Another, whose ennui at the rather stilted affair had quite overcome him, had preceded me. Dr. Karl Muck, with various imperial decorations adorning his shirt front, was stowed away beneath a shelf, quietly smoking a cigarette and looking to be the absolute symbol of the bored.

"Sh——!" he hissed, fearing we might laugh so loud it would bring a crowd.

And one might be tempted to keep quiet, now, excepting that it is all so typical of the man, so typical of the truly great man, that it tells more of Dr. Muck's real nature than any amount of description would be able to do. He is modest in the extreme. He does not stand with a baton in his hand for the glory that it will add to his name, but for the pleasure of the thing.

When he came to Boston the first season he found a splendid organization that must have surprised him in many ways, but it was an organization that needed the vivifying impulse of genius to make it perfect. This impulse he supplied, and toward the end of the season, when it was feared he might return to Germany, representations were made by powerful persons through diplomatic circles requesting the Kaiser to extend his leave of absence for another year. This was accomplished and his second season was more successful than his first.

At the end of the second season, he was recalled to Berlin, but promised to return and he came back in 1912.

Dr. Muck is a Bohemian. In his student days he was thought to be a talented pianist. Then he was conductor of the opera in Zurich, Switzerland, for which he received $25 a month. But wonderful days soon followed and he went from one post to another, in all parts of Europe, until he was called to Berlin and made an officer of the Imperial German court.

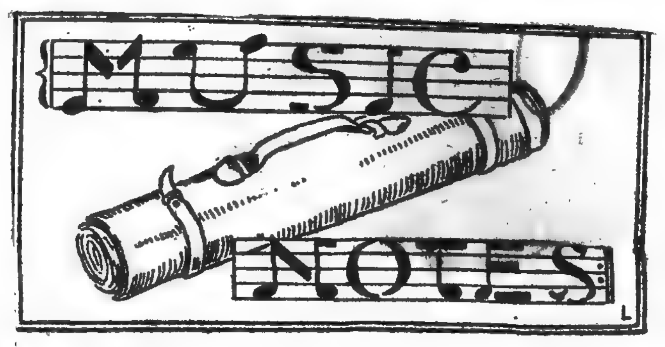
He has never composed, or at least the world has not heard his music. He declares that when he was a student he composed a symphony, but decided that if "it must all be as bad as that," the world would not be bothered with his output, so he has devoted his entire attention to interpreting the works of other men.

Asked about the ever-vital matter of subvention for opera and great musical institutions in Europe, the doctor declared that he favored the idea.

"Of course," he said, "the foundation of the great opera house is the chorus and the orchestra. The institutions are obliged to be expensive. In Berlin, the opera house is full every night, but there is a yearly deficit of 1,000,000 marks, or $250,000."

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.

Date JAN 3 1 1915



k, 1884

FOR this week the principal musical event will be, as a matter of course, the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, when Frieda Hempel, the noted singer of the Metropolitan Opera Company will make her first appearance in this city, as well as her first appearance with the orchestra.

The week will end with a glee club concert by the Tufts College Clubs and between the two there will be little besides meetings of clubs or similar events.

* * *

Instead of the aria from "The Magic Flute" which was first announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its programme for Tuesday evening, Mme. Frieda Hempel, the soloist, will sing for her first number the aria from Mozart's opera, "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail," an opera which still holds its place on the stage in Germany, although it has not been heard in this country for many years.

The aria, of which the first words are "Mattern Aller Arten" is highly dramatic, making also great demands on vocal agility. Miss Hempel's second number will be the vocal waltz from Gounod's opera "Mireille."

To Miss Hempel, who is the first coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera, falls the parts which in days past in New York were allotted to Adelina Patti, Christine Nillson, Nellie Melba and Marcella Sembrich, and in Miss Hempel are preserved the best traditions of the delicate art of vocal bravura.

The concert will open with the "Surprise Symphony" of Josef Haydn, known to the Germans as the "Paukenschlag," because the playful composer at its first performance startled the fine ladies of London who were present with the sharp stroke on the kettledrum, following a pianissimo passage. Some of the London wags said at the time that Haydn had resorted to his startling drum strokes to rouse the English women in his audience from their sleep, but this Haydn was gallant enough to deny.

The work, which has always been popular, is the third of 12 symphonies written for Salomon, the famous impresario of London. It was composed in 1791 and was played for the first time on March 23, 1792.

The entire programme is decidedly classical in cast; three of the numbers by composers of the 18th century and the other three belonging to the last century, but none of them ultra-modern.

In the second part of the programme the orchestra will play the "Symphony" which is known as "Shepherds' Music," from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio;" the "March of the Three Holy Kings," from Liszt's Oratorio, "Christus," and the ever popular overture to Weber's opera, "Der Freischuetz." The Bach and Liszt numbers are in a sense Christmas music and it is interesting to observe the contrast between the serene, long-flowing lines of the music by the Cantor of St. Thomas's, Leipsic, and the highly colored pomp of the Abbe Liszt.

The programme in its proper order is as follows: Haydn, Symphony in G major, "The Surprise" (B. and H., No. 6); Mozart. Aria from "Il Seraglio;" J. S. Bach, Symphony (Shepherds' Music), from the "Christmas Oratorio;" Liszt, "March of the Three Holy Kings," from the Oratorio, "Christus;" Gounod, vocal waltz, from "Mireille;" Weber, overture to the opera, "Der Freischuetz."

* * *

TRANSCRIPT.
FEBRUARY 6, 1915

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A CLASSIC CONCERTO AND MODERN SONGS

Chamber Music from Bach, with Two Solo Violins by Way of Return to an Old Custom in Programmes—Mahler's "Tramp Songs" as Tone-Poems in Little—Beethoven for Beginning and Dvorak for Ending

GRADUALLY Dr. Muck is restoring to the Symphony Concerts a custom that prevailed in the early years of the orchestra and then fell into what President Cleveland liked to call desuetude—the playing of concerted pieces, usually by eighteenth-century composers, in which one or more members of the band take solo parts. Such pieces stood relatively often on the programmes in Mr. Henschel's and Mr. Nikisch's time and through Mr. Gericke's first term. Then they almost disappeared from the concerts, until little by little Dr. Muck began to set them there again. Two seasons ago Mr. Maquarre played the solo part in a suite by Bach for flute and strings, as he will again, a week hence; last year he shared with Mr. Holy a concerto by Mozart for harp, flute and orchestra; with like purpose Spohr's concerto for a quartet of strings with orchestra was to have been heard yesterday; and, when it proved insufficiently prepared, Bach's concerto in D minor for two violins and string band was substituted for it with Mr. Witek and Mr. Noack, standing in their places, for the solo instruments. The restoration of such pieces to the active repertory—the concerto of Friday had not been played in Boston for twenty-five years—acquaints the audiences with pleasurable music that it would not otherwise hear; displays the individual abilities with which the orchestra abounds and so encourages the esprit de corps of the men; and provides quasi-soloists to satisfy the liking of a considerable part of the public for such incidents to symphony concerts.

Outside the slow movement, Bach's concerto in itself is no more remarkable or interesting than much music that a hundred composers from Naples to Nuremberg wrote in the first quarter of the eighteenth century for the little bands that they led and that their "noble patrons" maintained. It belongs indeed among the many compositions all in the day's work that Bach wrote for his "august master," Prince Leoplold of Anhalt-Cöthen; and it belongs also to the multitude of music that was modelled on the Italian concertos of the fashionable Vivaldi. Now, after nearly two hundred years, Vivaldi's music is rather the fashion again with violinists, and the analogies between his concertos, as Mr. Kreisler, Mr. Ysaye and the rest play them, and Bach's concerto of yesterday are easy to trace. There is an opening and a closing allegro in which Bach treats the two solo violins as instruments in the whole string band, only a little more conspicuous than the rest. Each movement proceeds at a brisk pace; each reiterates persistent figures with steadily increasing emphasis and cumulation; and each runs to a clear, sharp and insistent rhythm. In both there is ingenious interweaving and contrasting of the several string choirs and once and again the solo instruments have outstanding passages, together or separately, of their own. It would not be the truth, however, to say that the melodic material, thus worked, is more than routine.

All this is in the manner of Vivaldi. Yet more in the fashion of the Italian's concertos is Bach's concentration upon his slow movement. The string band then becomes a mere background to the solo instruments, asserting itself only in occasional light "tutti" when the steady flow of the melody halts pool-like. Meanwhile, the solo instruments publish the melody, broadening, deepening, and occasionally adorning it, in sympathetic supplement oftener than in contrasting voice. Upon that melody, moreover, as it expands into song, Bach lavishes his feeling for large sensuous beauty and warm and deep emotional expression. The music is robust and rich, penetrating and grave, with his own northern sobriety added to Vivaldi's southern suavity. Between them, Mr. Witek and Mr. Noack, played this song with sensitive regard for their interlaced parts, with a single understanding of their music and feeling for it and with euphonius blending of their tone. The spice to it and to the music was the touch of difference between the full body of Mr. Witek's instrumental voice and the finely attuned delicacy of Mr. Noack's.

The other unusual pieces in the concert were the four "Tramp Songs"—"Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen," as the glorifying German title runs—that Mahler wrote in his twenties for orchestra with a tenor voice as an additional instrument, and that have never before been heard in Boston and perhaps not in all America. Mr. Paul Draper, the young tenor, who is studious and curious over modern music, brought them to the attention of Dr. Muck and it was only courteous that he should provide the added voice, though the lack of resonance and color in his tones told against the music in spite of his intelligence with it, his clear and elastic German diction and his long pondering of the moods and emotions of the pieces. Like most young Americans of pure blood he lacks impulse and freedom with music on its emotional side, and it is his misfortune that as yet his voice is lustreless and monotonous. Studiously he had mastered the songs in large design and incidental detail; but he could not release and communicate the emotions within them and, presumably, within him, too. Not by pure reason and application may a singer sing such moody pieces. Moreover, as some in the audience were frank to say, for so limited a singer, there has been over much of Mr. Draper, even as an added voice, at the Symphony Concerts this year.

Mahler himself, as his custom was, wrote both the verses and the music of his songs. In the verses he sought the simple and wayward expression of folk-poetry. His tramp, as tramps usually are when they are drafted into the service of the arts, is a poetizing and melancholy fellow, haunted by the memory of the girl who has refused his love and who has left his heart empty and dead. Sometimes, he is but plaintively musing upon love and loss and again he writhes wildly in bitter pangs. He would find comfort in the spring-time world about him, in sky and trees, in birds and breeze and in his own joy of wandering; but in the midst of his gladness the haunting memories creep back in their pain. The melodies out of which Mahler expands the songs have in themselves not a few qualities of folk-music. They are relatively homely and simple; they are full of frank mood and direct feeling; they accord with folk-song in profile and rhythm. On the other hand, his handling of them, studied in detail on the engraved page, is highly sophisticated. He modulates freely and boldly; he piles harmonic and instrumental color; he uses a large orchestra seldom, not for effects of mass, but insistently for strokes of imaginative and subtle detail; and he is sometimes at one with the contemporary "impressionists" in music in his fashion of modulation and transition, in his pointing of harmonic and instrumental detail, in his whole suggestion of the mood and passion. In the orchestra flows the main current of the songs; out of the orchestra spring the details that ruffle it with light and shade and changeful motion; while the voice in declamation or in song but adds its color and expressive quality to the rest of the instruments.

Yet, curiously, out of this multitude and sophistication of means, the songs in their impression upon the sensibilities of those that hear emerge as a homely and heartfelt music, as direct and honest, almost, as the folk-pieces of which they are born. In the first song, of regretful memory, the comfort of spring sounds and sights, and melancholy musing again, the verses, the melodies, the modulations, the transitions, and the color, the whole orchestral and vocal suggestion are fused into a whole of a rarely simple beauty that touches ear and heart. Matter and medium, substance and spirit are at one. In the second, the tonal picturing of the spring morning and the tonal imparting of the gay mood that stirs for the instant in the tramp are quietly blithe and warm. The mounting mood suffuses the music and stirs the hearer, until the sombre drum-taps, which Mahler has already begun to use, seem as the coming tread of the haunting memories. The third song seethes with the rushing pangs of memory in a wild music that pauses now and then as in soothing vision of the loved girl. There is passion in the music of the pangs and poetry in the music of the vision; while at the end comes, in vivid suggestion, the mood of dull despair. The piece to light marching rhythm is as the course of melancholy thoughts keeping pace with the wanderer's own footfall. . . . It is a quiet song of manly resignation. It is as though Mahler would have the end, foreseen from the beginning, in the peace of his tones.

Beethoven's fourth symphony, in the biennial performance exacted by orthodox custom in symphony concerts the world over, began the programme and Dr. Muck and the orchestra spared not their pains to make what is often routine music as interesting as they might. But with all their rhythmic vigor and sprightly contrasts in the scherzo, they could not make it more than music that runs on until it has filled its formal mould, and they saved the finale from like tedium only by their briskness of pace, spirit of accent and the skill with which they sent the music whirring upward into a semblance of tonal flight and excitement. The introduction to the first movement is another thing and the conductor summoned its mysterious and gently solemn voices, its quivering pauses of expectation and its grave climax before the leap into the allegro. The orchestra, in turn, filled it with sustained or tremulous tone of liquid and lovely texture. The allegro itself is routine again, in spite of all the nimble arabesques of the wood winds and its general suggestion of a robuster Haydn, until the long and noted crescendo rises from murmured phrases and gathering drum beats. Of course, orchestra and conductor accomplished it impressively, but they did better service to that same allegro when they relieved its monotony with little crescendi out of their imaginative promptings. The slow movement almost matches the introduction as saving grace to the symphony; yet with all the beauty of articulation, the justness of underbeat, the warmth and insistence of exfoliating but interrupted song that Dr. Muck spent upon it, did he not take it at a pace that was a little too slow and with an occasional emphasis that put it out of character with the rest of a light symphony? After all, this Fourth of Beethoven has its pitfalls as well as its routine wastes and its shining oases. As the concert had begun gravely so it ended brightly and gayly with the bright harmonic and instrumental colors, the snapping rhythms, the biting Czech melodies, the intermezzo of plaintive song—as of some moody stray, solitary in a corner of the fete—the racing exuberance, the sheer whirl of tone and fancy that make Dvoràk's "Carnival" overture a flashing and exhilarating show-piece, with the tang of his whole tribe and of his own spirit beating through it. If he had only stuck to that Bohemian and natural last!

H. T. P.

TRANSCRIPT.

FEBRUARY 13.

Symphony Concert

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

DR. MUCK ABSENT AND MME. CULP TRIUMPHANT

Mr. Schmidt Takes the Orchestra, and to Routine and Tedious Outcome—The Singer's Unusual Pieces Out of the Old Music of Monteverde and Haendel—The Beauty, the Majesty and the Rare Sense of "The Grand Style" with Which She Sang Them

MORE, even, than there had been reason to anticipate from the scope and nature of the announced programme, Mme. Culp had the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon to her music and her singing—rare fortune to befall an "assisting artist," but fortune that could hardly have been better bestowed. Though no announcement was vouchsafed to the audience beyond a laconic line on the programme: "Mr. Ernst Schmidt will conduct this concert," and though no prior word had been sent to the newspapers—contrary to previous custom of the management in such contingencies—it appeared that Dr. Muck had been ill throughout the week with a touch of influenza and lumbago and had kept his house. He is mending now, but as he had not rehearsed the music to be played, he could not, of course, lead belatedly in it. Accordingly Mr. Schmidt of the first violins—some time concert-master of the Court Orchestra at Darmstadt and leader of a choral society there—took his place as second conductor as he has already twice done this season—once in a concert at Cambridge and once in a concert at Providence. The orchestra seemed well disposed toward him; and the audience heaped him with applause which, at the end of Schumann's symphony in D minor, he vainly tried to persuade the band to share.

Mr. Schmidt seemed versed in the routine of conducting; he was unobtrusive upon what the Germans call "the podium" and he discreetly let the orchestra go its own way. But the outcome of his and its labors upon the symphony aforesaid, upon Bach's suite in B minor for flute and strings and upon Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" was of a sort to make even the mildly exacting hearer wish Dr. Muck a full and speedy recovery and an immunity from illness through the rest of the season. It was also of a sort to provoke deeper reflections upon the degree to which all the orchestral virtues from quality of tone through pace and rhythm, shading and climax, to sustained and varied eloquence—and even with such a band as ours—depend upon the conductor who is actually rehearsing and leading it. Nay; this same outcome might even provoke cynical inquiries as to the much-vaunted "educative value" of symphony concerts, when what is presumably a practised and discriminating audience lavished such applause upon Mr. Schmidt as it has not been Mr. Weingartner's or as it was not Mahler's to receive in Boston and such as, more than once, has not even fallen to Dr. Muck himself.

Thus on the orchestral side, the concert was routine and tedious. Mr. Schmidt merely rushed the band through Schumann's symphony, which needs all the aid that a conductor can give it in the clear and characterizing utterance of its instrumental song, the pointing of its rhythms, the shading of its harmonic and instrumental coloring, the opening and the interweaving of its thickly written parts and the general clarification of the musical design. In his symphonies, and even in so relatively outspoken and joyous a symphony as this in D minor, Schumann is less than himself without the prompting imagination and the guiding skill of such a conductor as Dr. Muck to loose his tonal tongue. Once before when Dr. Muck announced the piece he fell ill and Mr. Urack led in it; and now once more, its seeming fate has pursued it. For the rest, Mr. Schmidt did no more with Bach's suite and Mendelssohn's overture than any practised kapellmeister might accomplish in the ordinary course of the day's work. Nor did even Mr. Maquarre come off too well with his solo part. Of course he displayed his wonted skill and lightness with bravura passages for his flute and often he gained in its sustained song an agreeable suavity and evenness; but as often in such measures, his tone lacked body, warmth and characteristic color. As is bound to befall once or twice in a season the day was not a good day for the orchestra.

The more, accordingly, did the glories of Mme. Culp's voice and singing and of two of her chosen pieces shine in contrast. Her first number was "Ariadne's Lament," the sole existing fragment of one of the earliest of music-dramas, Monteverde's "Ariadne" first represented at Mantua, three hundred and six years ago. It survives, moreover, only in fragments that Mme. Culp and an ingeniously assisting Italian savant of music patiently put together and provided with a congruous orchestral part written chiefly for strings, wood-winds and occasional darkening or sonorous brass. Even so, "The Lament" remains to this day a very noble and eloquent music. Through broad and mounting phrases, it unfolds in long and full melodic line. The content that this line bears is of a deep and austere beauty, as pure fresco in songful sound and as the expression of the mournful entreaty of the abandoned Ariadne to the departed Theseus and of her fitful anger and even imprecation at his flight. The measures of sorrow stir answering pity by their penetrating beauty as the voice of her woe; the measures of rage do not lack their flights of power even though they hardly evoke the awe which was the other concomitant of antique tragedy. None the less Monteverde's speech of song has its clear analogies with Sophocles's speech of word and yet clearer is the likeness of the music in its large flow of line, spaciousness of phrase, ample march, full and stately rhythm, breadth of proportion, unity of impression and noble chastity of ornament to the traits of Greek architecture in its serene prime. It is a music of passion nobly intensified and gravely controlled, sounding out of great spaces of like-moulded song.

As unusual was the air out of one of Händel's unnamed "cantatas" for voice and small orchestra that was Mme. Culp's second number. No doubt the busy old Prussian wrote this and a hundred other airs as a mere incident in his day's work out of the well-nigh exhaustless invention that flowed within him. And two centuries later a listening world holds its breath at the beauty of melody in this workaday song; at its course through its rich progressions and expansions into the deep glow of its climax. When the song is a song of pious thanksgiving, even the thanksgiving of a whole host, as it is in the air that Mme. Culp sang, then does it bear upon its unfolding voice a veritable majesty of emotion. A century or less ago the writers about music called a sham thing that then abode in the Opéra in Paris "the grand style." It dwells more truly and enduringly in such music as Händel—and maybe Rameau—wrote. The third of Mme. Culp's pieces was Beethoven's song, "Adelaide," composed in his youth, abounding in German melancholy and musing à la Werther, dressed in music à l'Italienne, and beloved for nearly a century by sentimental singers and sentimental hearers. For Mme. Culp, Schönberg has clothed it in ingenious and not incongruous orchestral dress that often runs in Beethovian idiom but that has its contemporary tang in pretty little delineative arabesques and high instrumental pointing, even to a tinkling triangle. Yet so dolled, "Adelaide" nowadays seems but artificial, sentimentalized and faded music.

Upon all three pieces alike Mme. Culp shed not merely the richness of her voice and the manifold resources of her song, but a differentiating and characterizing vocal means and imparting imagination that made each live in its individual eloquence. Those illustrious singers of record and legend in the golden centuries of sustained song and nearly unbelievable vocal feats could hardly have maintained more amply and continuously Monteverde's ascending and descending, broadening and deepening melodic line. They could hardly have sung the music with more amplitude of phrase, with larger sense of vocal design, with more sober intensity of tonal color, with more noble communication of mournful or insurgent passion. The mere technical wonders of Mme. Culp's breathing in "The Lament"—and no less in the air from Händel—were less marvellous than her imaginative revelation of the very speech and spirit of the music. Well-nigh perfect singer of songs as she is, yet can she also summon the noble utterance and the noble manner of the old and austere music-drama and recall what is really the "grand style" to a generation to whom it has often seemed but a phrase and a tradition. Such tonal beauty and such spiritual majesty she brought to Händel's air; while in her singing the long spirals of "Adelaide" ascended in lovely line and melted finally into her softly-breathed echoes of the beloved name. She could not make Beethoven's sentimentality passion, but she could make it lyric memory and lyric longing. H. T. P.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

FEBRUARY 13

SYMPHONY HALL—Fourteenth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Ernst Schmidt conducting; Mme. Julia Culp, soprano soloist; afternoon of Feb. 12. The program: Schumann, fourth symphony in D minor; Monteverdi, aria, "Ariadne's Lament"; Bach, second suite in B minor for flute and strings (von Buelow's arrangement); Handel, aria, "Dank sei Dir"; Beethoven, song, "Adelaide" (orchestration of Schoenberg); Mendelssohn, overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream."

The long program was performed with vigor and brilliancy and, broadly speaking, nothing was lost by the absence of the conductor-in-chief. As to the orchestra, an unwonted freedom of execution and freshness of tone prevailed. High polish of style and perfect vocal command characterized the work of the soloist. The afternoon could not have gone better. Everybody must have been brightened in mood by this concert as by hardly any other that has preceded it this winter. Whether anybody was profoundly stirred, either emotionally or intellectually, is a question to be answered next week or next month. The occasion, viewed in relation to the 13 occasions that have gone before and to the 10 that will follow, was delightfully handled. Dr. Muck could not have planned a more suitable program or a more acceptable time for turning affairs over to his junior in command. In the grand strategy of the year, the fourteenth rehearsal and concert will count as of much contributory importancie. The contrast in temper with the pairs of concerts at which compositions of the larger interpretive demand have been presented justifies it artistically. Impressive performances of music by Ropartz, Reznicek and Liszt have brought the year its due acclaim. Let the applause of highly exemplary routine conducting and of buoyant, yet scholarly playing, answer for one, or perhaps two or three, out of the 24 programs.

There is a humanism about music that can scarcely be found in any other of the arts; for music has absolutely no utilitarian purpose, outside that, possibly, of a nationalistic propaganda. For that reason, it is rather gratuitous for a musician to impose a feeling of humanism on his performance. Graciousness, attractiveness and charm are there to begin with. They do not need to be added. The better thing for the performer to do is to search out expression which is less obviously musical. For the external beauties, such as sweetness of sound and swiftness and ease of execution, are not, to the thoughtful listener, the full meaning of the tone art.

If they were, yesterday's concert would be the standard of achievement for the Symphony orchestra.

On this point modern society breaks with that of former days. Orchestral music does not today find its effect solely in exquisite performance. It finds it in something almost extra-musical, which we call interpretation. A great interpreter's failure, therefore, with the Schumann symphony in D minor might be, probably would be, better worth while than a mere conductor's success.

It would be a strange thing for a soloist to come to the Symphony concerts poorly prepared. Sometimes the pianists or the violinists who come seem to be wanting in preparation. But that is usually because their ideas and those of the conductor do not fall into line together. Singers are invariably ready for their task, and inasmuch as their part in the program is of no great orchestral import, they and the conductor are sure to be in agreement. Mme. Culp sang to Mr. Schmidt's conducting as though she had been doing nothing else for the past week. And she executed her melody with a vocal mastery that was near enough to flawless. Scarcely any other singer on the platform has a speech technique so thorough as hers. And as for tone, she is beyond reproach. Her phrasing is always marked by an understanding of the musical structure, and so is satisfactory mechanically; but it is the least persuasive part of her singing. It did not show the daring and individuality in the old arias and the song that were required for keeping the various parts of the music welded together. Her interpretations had a scattered, disrupted effect. Her work in her song recitals has been more impressive on this point of phrasing.

BOSTON GLOBE—

FEBRUARY 13.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Assistant Leader Schmidt Makes First Appearance.

Mme Julia Culp Sings Monteverdi Aria Emotionally.

In the absence of Dr Muck from the 14th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon, Ernst Schmidt, the assistant conductor and a first violin, made his first appearance at the desk. He made no attempt unduly to project his individuality. He showed musicianship and taste. The orchestra played with increasing regard for his authority.

Mme Julia Culp was the soloist. Her voice yesterday, full-bodied, emotional, admirable in breath control, bore little resemblance to that at her last recital here, when the traces of recent illness still were upon her. The numbers sung were of unequal interest, but Monteverdi's aria, "Ariadne's Lament," from "Arianna," was an admirably composed piece of dramatic singing, superbly phrased, poignant and moving.

It is interesting, yet not generally significant, to remember that Schumann's D minor symphony was a herald in its day of the new romantic movement. Not quite three-quarters of a century ago its innovations must have disturbed the classicists grievously—the elasticity of form, the harmonic boldness, the freshness and spontaneity of the thought, the free, unstudied expression. Not every composer since, who desired the four movements of his symphony played without pause, has confined their duration to half an hour.

Mr Maquarre, the admired flutist of the orchestra, played Bach's suite No. 2 in B minor for flute and strings. The seven movements may have more variety than was heard in them. Orchestra vies with the solo instrument in imparting character to the dance forms. Mr Maquarre's polished execution and style are familiar features at these concerts. Yesterday he again was the accomplished virtuoso. The closing presto excited surprise and admiration.

Handel may have written the cantata "with instruments," from which Mme Culp chose the "Thanks Be to Thee," sung in German, for some church festival. Its invention is perfunctory, although to some it will linger sweetly in the ear for the reminiscences of the piece known as the "Largo." Mme Culp's art gave it identity.

Schoenberg, who we read, orchestrated the song "Adelaide" four years ago, had respect for the spirit of Beethoven. Although beyond the younger period of his quartet in D minor, played here by the Flonzaleys, an extraordinary composition in which genius and madness met, he refrained from embellishing Beethoven's song in the harmonic idiom of his recent five orchestral pieces, in which some, fearful of posterity's judgment, say that genius has survived; some madness. It is said that Beethoven's "Adelaide" is one of his four best songs. However that may be, Schoenberg has written an interesting and sympathetic accompaniment for orchestra. Mme Culp, in any case, would do better with it with piano, for the song does not require more.

Her singing of the Monteverdi aria, with that breadth and intensity of passion that was the glory of "the grand manner," a style the inheritance of few of the declaiming vocalists of today, was a privilege to hear. It is not easy to remember singing at these concerts as deeply, as vitally emotional. The final number of the concert was the concert overture in E major to "A Mid-Summer Night's Dream."

BOSTON HERALD,

FEBRUARY 13.

14TH SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Ernst Schmidt, One of First Violins, Conducts—Cold Keeps Dr. Muck Away.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 14th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck is suffering from a severe cold. Mr. Ernst Schmidt, one of the first violins, conducted in his stead and will conduct tonight. The program was as follows:

Symphony in D minor, No. 4..........Schumann
Aria, "Il Lamento d'Arianna," from "Arianna"..........Monteverdi
Suite No. 2 in B minor for flute and strings..........Bach
Solo Flute, Andre Maquarre.
"Dank Sei Dir" ("Thanks Be to Thee"), from a "Cantata con Stromenti"....Handel
"Adelaide"..........Beethoven
Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"..........Mendelssohn

At this concert the singer, Mme. Julia Culp, overshadowed the orchestra. The performance of Schumann's symphony was characterized by restlessness and vigor rather than by romantic feeling and a fine discrimination in nuances. Mr. Maquarre played the flute part in Bach's suite in a most musical manner, but his tone was small and the orchestra in accompaniment was not sufficiently subdued.

Mme. Culp sang two arias that had not been heard in Boston: the pathetic lament of Ariadne from the opera of Monteverdi that was produced in 1608, and an air of Handel taken from a German cantata, "Con Stromenti." She also sang Beethoven's "Adelaide," with an orchestral accompaniment written for her by Arnold Schoenberg. Mr. [illegible]os, the pianist who accompanies Mme. Culp, kindly furnished the compiler of the program-book with information about the instrumentation of these songs, but his information was not accurate. He stated that the accompaniment of Handel's aria was for strings and organ. The harp was also employed. He stated that the accompaniment of Monteverdi's aria arranged by Resphighi of Bologna was for full orchestra; but horns and clarinets were not used.

Schoenberg orchestrated Beethoven's "Adelaide" for Mme. Culp and introduced the triangle. Was his instrumentation worth while? The air with piano accompaniment in its native form is to us insignificant. Beethoven as a song writer is not among the great, and Schoenberg's triangle does not save "Adelaide." Vincent d'Indy has been censured for speaking out his mind about this song. "Strange to say, this little work, a romance neither better nor worse than the majority of innumerable romances of the same epoch, contributed mightily to make Beethoven known, while his serious compositions were for a long time ignored. * * * This 'Adelaide' was quickly accepted as the sorrowful cry of a wounded heart, as the supreme complaint of the poor lover calling on his 'beautiful one,' even in the shadow of the tomb. * * * There is nothing truly expressive in it; it is one more romance, and that is all. And at the same time it is another proof of the old fact that the public in all ages reserves its favors for mediocre works, and passes by, indifferent, true beauty." This sums up the matter. No, Schoenberg's triangle does not save the sentimental song, nor did the art of Mme. Culp.

Two singers this season, and only two, have justified their appearance at these concerts: Miss Florence Hinkle and Mme. Julia Culp. The latter, justly renowned as a Lieder singer, showed yesterday that she is also mistress of the grand style. When the Lament of Ariadne was first sung in the theatre at Mantua by La Florinda before a great audience, we are told by one who was there that all the hearers were deeply affected, "and there were tears in every woman's eyes." Today this Lament is profoundly moving. Over three centuries have gone by, yet the

TRANSCRIPT.

FEBRUARY 13.

Symphony Concert

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

DR. MUCK ABSENT AND MME. CULP TRIUMPHANT

Mr. Schmidt Takes the Orchestra, and to Routine and Tedious Outcome—The Singer's Unusual Pieces Out of the Old Music of Monteverde and Haendel—The Beauty, the Majesty and the Rare Sense of "The Grand Style" with Which She Sang Them

MORE, even, than there had been reason to anticipate from the scope and nature of the announced programme, Mme. Culp had the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon to her music and her singing—rare fortune to befall an "assisting artist," but fortune that could hardly have been better bestowed. Though no announcement was vouchsafed to the audience beyond a laconic line on the programme: "Mr. Ernst Schmidt will conduct this concert," and though no prior word had been sent to the newspapers—contrary to previous custom of the management in such contingencies—it appeared that Dr. Muck had been ill throughout the week with a touch of influenza and lumbago and had kept his house. He is mending now, but as he had not rehearsed the music to be played, he could not, of course, lead belatedly in it. Accordingly Mr. Schmidt of the first violins—some time concert-master of the Court Orchestra at Darmstadt and leader of a choral society there—took his place as second conductor as he has already twice done this season—once in a concert at Cambridge and once in a concert at Providence. The orchestra seemed well disposed toward him; and the audience heaped him with applause which, at the end of Schumann's symphony in D minor, he vainly tried to persuade the band to share.

Mr. Schmidt seemed versed in the routine of conducting; he was unobtrusive upon what the Germans call "the podium" and he discreetly let the orchestra go its own way. But the outcome of his and its labors upon the symphony aforesaid, upon Bach's suite in B minor for flute and strings and upon Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" was of a sort to make even the mildly exacting hearer wish Dr. Muck a full and speedy recovery and an immunity from illness through the rest of the season. It was also of a sort to provoke deeper reflections upon the degree to which all the orchestral virtues from quality of tone through pace and rhythm, shading and climax, to sustained and varied eloquence—and even with such a band as ours—depend upon the conductor who is actually rehearsing and leading it. Nay; this same outcome might even provoke cynical inquiries as to the much-vaunted "educative value" of symphony concerts, when what is presumably a practised and discriminating audience lavished such applause upon Mr. Schmidt as it has not been Mr. Weingartner's or as it was not Mahler's to receive in Boston and such as, more than once, has not even fallen to Dr. Muck himself.

Thus on the orchestral side, the concert was routine and tedious. Mr. Schmidt merely rushed the band through Schumann's symphony, which needs all the aid that a conductor can give it in the clear and characterizing utterance of its instrumental song, the pointing of its rhythms, the shading of its harmonic and instrumental coloring, the opening and the interweaving of its thickly written parts and the general clarification of the musical design. In his symphonies, and even in so relatively outspoken and joyous a symphony as this in D minor, Schumann is less than himself without the prompting imagination and the guiding skill of such a conductor as Dr. Muck to loose his tonal tongue. Once before when Dr. Muck announced the piece he fell ill and Mr. Urack led in it; and now once more, its seeming fate has pursued it. For the rest, Mr. Schmidt did no more with Bach's suite and Mendelssohn's overture than any practised kapellmeister might accomplish in the ordinary course of the day's work. Nor did even Mr. Maquarre come off too well with his solo part. Of course he displayed his wonted skill and lightness with bravura passages for his flute and often he gained in its sustained song an agreeable suavity and evenness; but as often in such measures, his tone lacked body, warmth and characteristic color. As is bound to befall once or twice in a season the day was not a good day for the orchestra.

The more, accordingly, did the glories of Mme. Culp's voice and singing and of two of her chosen pieces shine in contrast. Her first number was "Ariadne's Lament," the sole existing fragment of one of the earliest of music-dramas, Monteverde's "Ariadne" first represented at Mantua, three hundred and six years ago. It survives, moreover, only in fragments that Mme. Culp and an ingeniously assisting Italian savant of music patiently put together and provided with a congruous orchestral part written chiefly for strings, wood-winds and occasional darkening or sonorous brass. Even so, "The Lament" remains to this day a very noble and eloquent music. Through broad and mounting phrases, it unfolds in long and full melodic line. The content that this line bears is of a deep and austere beauty, [illegible] as pure fresco in songful sound and as the expression of the mournful entreaty of the abandoned Ariadne to the departed Theseus and of her fitful anger and even imprecation at his flight. The measures of sorrow stir answering pity by their penetrating beauty as the voice of her woe; the measures of rage do not lack their flights of power even though they hardly evoke the awe which was the other concomitant of antique tragedy. None the less Monteverde's speech of song has its clear analogies with Sophocles's speech of word and yet clearer is the likeness of the music in its large flow of line, spaciousness of phrase, ample march, full and stately rhythm, breadth of proportion, unity of impression and noble chastity of ornament to the traits of Greek architecture in its serene prime. It is a music of passion nobly intensified and gravely controlled, sounding out of great spaces of like-moulded song.

As unusual was the air out of one of Händel's unnamed "cantatas" for voice and small orchestra that was Mme. Culp's second number. No doubt the busy old Prussian wrote this and a hundred other airs as a mere incident in his day's work out of the well-nigh exhaustless invention that flowed within him. And two centuries later a listening world holds its breath at the beauty of melody in this workaday song; at its course through its rich progressions and expansions into the deep glow of its climax. When the song is a song of pious thanksgiving, even the thanksgiving of a whole host, as it is in the air that Mme. Culp sang, then does it bear upon its unfolding voice a veritable majesty of emotion. A century or less ago the writers about music called a sham thing that then abode in the Opéra in Paris "the grand style." It dwells more truly and enduringly in such music as Händel—and maybe Rameau—wrote. The third of Mme. Culp's pieces was Beethoven's song, "Adelaide," composed in his youth, abounding in German melancholy and musing à la Werther, dressed in music à l'Italienne, and beloved for nearly a century by sentimental singers and sentimental hearers. For Mme. Culp, Schönberg has clothed it in ingenious and not incongruous orchestral dress that often runs in Beethovian idiom but that has its contemporary tang in pretty little delineative arabesques and high instrumental pointing, even to a tinkling triangle. Yet so dolled, "Adelaide" nowadays seems but artificial, sentimentalized and faded music.

Upon all three pieces alike Mme. Culp shed not merely the richness of her voice and the manifold resources of her song, but a differentiating and characterizing vocal means and imparting imagination that made each live in its individual eloquence. Those illustrious singers of record and legend in the golden centuries of sustained song and nearly unbelievable vocal feats could hardly have maintained more amply and continuously Monteverde's ascending and descending, broadening and deepening melodic line. They could hardly have sung the music with more amplitude of phrase, with larger sense of vocal design, with more sober intensity of tonal color, with more noble communication of mournful or insurgent passion. The mere technical wonders of Mme. Culp's breathing in "The Lament"—and no less in the air from Händel—were less marvellous than her imaginative revelation of the very speech and spirit of the music. Well-nigh perfect singer of songs as she is, yet can she also summon the noble utterance and the noble manner of the old and austere music-drama and recall what is really the "grand style" to a generation to whom it has often seemed but a phrase and a tradition. Such tonal beauty and such spiritual majesty she brought to Händel's air; while in her singing the long spirals of "Adelaide" ascended in lovely line and melted finally into her softly-breathed echoes of the beloved name. She could not make Beethoven's sentimentality passion, but she could make it lyric memory and lyric longing. H. T. P.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

FEBRUARY 13

SYMPHONY HALL—Fourteenth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Ernst Schmidt conducting; Mme. Julia Culp, soprano soloist; afternoon of Feb. 12. The program: Schumann, fourth symphony in D minor; Monteverdi, aria, "Ariadne's Lament"; Bach, second suite in B minor for flute and strings (von Buelow's arrangement); Handel, aria, "Dank sei Dir"; Beethoven, song, "Adelaide" (orchestration of Schoenberg); Mendelssohn, overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream."

The long program was performed with vigor and brilliancy and, broadly speaking, nothing was lost by the absence of the conductor-in-chief. As to the orchestra, an unwonted freedom of execution and freshness of tone prevailed. High polish of style and perfect vocal command characterized the work of the soloist. The afternoon could not have gone better. Everybody must have been brightened in mood by this concert as by hardly any other that has preceded it this winter. Whether anybody was profoundly stirred, either emotionally or intellectually, is a question to be answered next week or next month. The occasion, viewed in relation to the 13 occasions that have gone before and to the 10 that will follow, was delightfully handled. Dr. Muck could not have planned a more suitable program or a more acceptable time for turning affairs over to his junior in command. In the grand strategy of the year, the fourteenth rehearsal and concert will count as of much contributory importancie. The contrast in temper with the pairs of concerts at which compositions of the larger interpretive demand have been presented justifies it artistically. Impressive performances of music by Ropartz, Reznicek and Liszt have brought the year its due acclaim. Let the applause of highly exemplary routine conducting and of buoyant, yet scholarly playing, answer for one, or perhaps two or three, out of the 24 programs.

There is a humanism about music that can scarcely be found in any other of the arts; for music has absolutely no utilitarian purpose, outside that, possibly, of a nationalistic propaganda. For that reason, it is rather gratuitous for a musician to impose a feeling of humanism on his performance. Graciousness, attractiveness and charm are there to begin with. They do not need to be added. The better thing for the performer to do is to search out expression which is less obviously musical. For the external beauties, such as sweetness of sound and swiftness and ease of execution, are not, to the thoughtful listener, the full meaning of the tone art.

If they were, yesterday's concert would be the standard of achievement for the Symphony orchestra.

On this point modern society breaks with that of former days. Orchestral music does not today find its effect solely in exquisite performance. It finds it in something almost extra-musical, which we call interpretation. A great interpreter's failure, therefore, with the Schumann symphony in D minor might be, probably would be, better worth while than a mere conductor's success.

It would be a strange thing for a soloist to come to the Symphony concerts poorly prepared. Sometimes the pianists or the violinists who come seem to be wanting in preparation. But that is usually because their ideas and those of the conductor do not fall into line together. Singers are invariably ready for their task, and inasmuch as their part in the program is of no great orchestral import, they and the conductor are sure to be in agreement. Mme. Culp sang to Mr. Schmidt's conducting as though she had been doing nothing else for the past week. And she executed her melody with a vocal mastery that was near enough to flawless. Scarcely any other singer on the platform has a speech technique so thorough as hers. And as for tone, she is beyond reproach. Her phrasing is always marked by an understanding of the musical structure, and so is satisfactory mechanically; but it is the least persuasive part of her singing. It did not show the daring and individuality in the old arias and the [illegible]ng that were required for keeping the [illegible]s parts of the music welded together. Her interpretations had a scat[illegible]ted effect. Her work in her [illegible]s has been more impressive [illegible]int of phrasing.

BOSTON GLOBE—

FEBRUARY 13.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Assistant Leader Schmidt Makes First Appearance.

Mme Julia Culp Sings Monteverdi Aria Emotionally.

In the absence of Dr Muck from the 14th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon, Ernst Schmidt, the assistant conductor and a first violin, made his first appearance at the desk. He made no attempt unduly to project his individuality. He showed musicianship and taste. The orchestra played with increasing regard for his authority.

Mme Julia Culp was the soloist. Her voice yesterday, full-bodied, emotional, admirable in breath control, bore little resemblance to that at her last recital here, when the traces of recent illness still were upon her. The numbers sung were of unequal interest, but Monteverdi's aria, "Ariadne's Lament," from "Arianna," was an admirably composed piece of dramatic singing, superbly phrased, poignant and moving.

It is interesting, yet not generally significant, to remember that Schumann's D minor symphony was a herald in its day of the new romantic movement. Not quite three-quarters of a century ago its innovations must have disturbed the classicists grievously—the elasticity of form, the harmonic boldness, the freshness and spontaneity of the thought, the free, unstudied expression. Not every composer since, who desired the four movements of his symphony played without pause, has confined their duration to half an hour.

Mr Maquarre, the admired flutist of the orchestra, played Bach's suite No. 2 in B minor for flute and strings. The seven movements may have more variety than was heard in them. Orchestra vies with the solo instrument in imparting character to the dance forms. Mr Maquarre's polished execution and style are familiar features at these concerts. Yesterday he again was the accomplished virtuoso. The closing presto excited surprise and admiration.

Handel may have written the cantata "with instruments," from which Mme Culp chose the "Thanks Be to Thee," sung in German, for some church festival. Its invention is perfunctory, although to some it will linger sweetly in the ear for the reminiscences of the piece known as the "Largo." Mme Culp's art gave it identity.

Schoenberg, who we read, orchestrated the song "Adelaide" four years ago, had respect for the spirit of Beethoven. Although beyond the younger period of his quartet in D minor, played here by the Flonzaleys, an extraordinary composition in which genius and madness met, he refrained from embellishing Beethoven's song in the harmonic idiom of his recent five orchestral pieces, in which some, fearful of posterity's judgment, say that genius has survived; some madness. It is said that Beethoven's "Adelaide" is one of his four best songs. However that may be, Schoenberg has written an interesting and sympathetic accompaniment for orchestra. Mme Culp, in any case, would do better with it with piano, for the song does not require more.

Her singing of the Monteverdi aria, with that breadth and intensity of passion that was the glory of "the grand manner," a style the inheritance of few of the declaiming vocalists of today, was a privilege to hear. It is not easy to remember singing at these concerts as deeply, as vitally emotional. The final number of the concert was the concert overture in E major to "A Mid-Summer Night's Dream."

BOSTON HERALD,

FEBRUARY 13,

14TH SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Ernst Schmidt, One of First Violins, Conducts—Cold Keeps Dr. Muck Away.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 14th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck is suffering from a severe cold. Mr. Ernst Schmidt, one of the first violins, conducted in his stead and will conduct tonight. The program was as follows:

Symphony in D minor, No. 4..........Schumann
Aria, "Il Lamento d'Arianna," from "Arianna"..........Monteverdi
Suite No. 2 in B minor for flute and strings..........Bach
Solo Flute, Andre Maquarre.
"Dank Sei Dir" ("Thanks Be to Thee"), from a "Cantata con Stromenti"....Handel
"Adelaide"..........Beethoven
Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"..........Mendelssohn

At this concert the singer, Mme. Julia Culp, overshadowed the orchestra. The performance of Schumann's symphony was characterized by restlessness and vigor rather than by romantic feeling and a fine discrimination in nuances. Mr. Maquarre played the flute part in Bach's suite in a most musical manner, but his tone was small and the orchestra in accompaniment was not sufficiently subdued.

Mme. Culp sang two arias that had not been heard in Boston: the pathetic lament of Ariadne from the opera of Monteverdi that was produced in [illegible]608, and an air of Handel taken from a German cantata, "Con Stromenti." She also sang Beethoven's "Adelaide," with an orchestral accompaniment written for her by Arnold Schoenberg. Mr. [illegible]s, the pianist who accompanies Mme. Culp, kindly furnished the compiler of the program-book with information about the instrumentation of these songs, but his information was not accurate. He stated that the accompaniment of Handel's aria was for strings and organ. The harp was also employed. He stated that the accompaniment of Monteverdi's aria arranged by Resphighi of Bologna was for full orchestra; but horns and clarinets were not used.

Schoenberg orchestrated Beethoven's "Adelaide" for Mme. Culp and introduced the triangle. Was his instrumentation worth while? The air with piano accompaniment in its native form is to us insignificant. Beethoven as a song writer is not among the great, and Schoenberg's triangle does not save "Adelaide." Vincent d'Indy has been censured for speaking out his mind about this song. "Strange to say, this little work, a romance neither better nor worse than the majority of innumerable romances of the same epoch, contributed mightily to make Beethoven known, while his serious compositions were for a long time ignored. * * * This 'Adelaide' was quickly accepted as the sorrowful cry of a wounded heart, as the supreme complaint of the poor lover calling on his 'beautiful one,' even in the shadow of the tomb. * * * There is nothing truly expressive in it; it is one more romance, and that is all. And at the same time it is another proof of the old fact that the public in all ages reserves its favors for mediocre works, and passes by, indifferent, true beauty." This sums up the matter. No, Schoenberg's triangle does not save the sentimental song, nor did the art of Mme. Culp.

Two singers this season, and only two, have justified their appearance at these concerts: Miss Florence Hinkle and Mme. Julia Culp. The latter, justly renowned as a Lieder singer, showed yesterday that she is also mistress of the grand style. When the Lament of Ariadne was first sung in the theatre at Mantua by La Florinda before a great audience, we are told by one who was there that all the hearers were deeply affected, "and there were tears in every woman's eyes." Today this Lament is profoundly moving. Over three centuries have gone by, yet the music is fresh and dramatic; it is even ultra-modern in its wild freedom of expression. And how nobly beautiful is the aria of Handel, the great melodist! Noble in the simplicity of its lines; beautiful in its fervor. Hearing such music, sung with remarkable control of breath, haunting tonal quality, consummate art and genuine feeling by Mme. Culp, one might easily find the dramatic music of this generation tawdry, forced, artificial. For Verdi left no successor.

There will be no concerts next week. The program of Feb. 26, 27, will be as follows: Schubert, symphony in C major; Strube, variations on an original theme (first performance); Goldmark, overture "Sakuntala."

BOSTON JOURNAL—

FEBRUARY 13,

SCHMIDT CONDUCTS AT THE SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck's Assistant Makes Favorable Impression; Mme. Culp Sings.

Ernest Schmidt is taking Dr. Muck's place this week as conductor of the Symphony concerts. Dr. Muck is not feeling well.

Mr. Schmidt, who joined the orchestra this year as assistant conductor and violinist, had his first opportunity yesterday to show his ability as a leader, so far as the Boston concerts are concerned. He impressed the audience very favorably, being a man of dignified appearance and a musician whose interpretative side is marked by fine taste and a sure hand.

His first effort, made with the Schumann symphony in D minor, was so successful that both audience and orchestra paid tribute to him. He brought forth without exaggeration the varied and celebrated beauties of the composition; he indulged in no intrusive mannerisms, and thus he evinced his regard for the music and for the artists under his baton. His success with the remainder of the program was equally impressive.

Mme. Julia Culp, the principal soloist of the week, sang the Monteverde aria, "Ariadne's Lament," a classic relic of one of the earliest operas; the "Thanks Be to Thee," from one of the Handel cantatas, and Beethoven's "Adelaide," with orchestral accompaniment arranged by Schoenberg. Her rich voice and artistic style furnished rare enjoyment. She is one of the few singers whose art really graces a Symphony performance.

Mr. Maquarre, the principal flute player of the orchestra, also delighted one of the largest audiences of the season with his solos in the Bach overture in B minor, for flute and strings. A spirited performance of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture closed the concert.

The orchestra will be out of town next week. The following week the program will consist of the Schubert symphony in C major, Strube's "Variations on an Original Theme" and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture.

BOSTON POST,

FEBRUARY 13,

SYMPHONY CONDUCTED BY SCHMIDT

Mme. Culp and Mr. Maquarre the Soloists

BY OLIN DOWNES

As the east winds had indisposed Dr. Muck, Ernest Schmidt, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted the public rehearsal yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Julia Culp, mezzo-soprano, was the visiting soloist. Mr. Maquarre, the first flute, was the soloist in the performances of Bach's suite for flute and strings in B minor, arranged by von Bulow. Mme. Culp's solos consisted of the music for the Lament of Ariadne, from Mondeverde's "Arianna"; an air, "Thanks to Thee," from one of Handel's cantatas, with accompaniment of instruments, and Beethoven's "Adelaide," with an orchestra accompaniment by Arnold Schonber The orchestral compositions were Sch mann's symphony in D minor, Bach's suite, and Mendellsohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

---

A THANKLESS WORK

Why Schonberg should have troubled to write an orchestral accompaniment for the sentimental air of Beethoven is a mystery. If he had impertinently meddled with a symphony or chamber work of the "Ferne Geliebte" cycle, one could at least discern some object in the proceeding. But of all sentimental and innocuous songs, commend us to this "Adelaide." It might have been written by anybody save Beethoven. It was immensely popular in Beethoven's lifetime, and was published, according to Vincent d'Indy, in innumerable "transcriptions for all instruments from a hand organ to a guitar." Schonberg, the rabid iconoclast, has now joined the ranks of an unblessed majority and added one more to the ill-judged versions of this song. His orchestration is ingenious and discreet.

Helped Arrange Orchestration

The most modern music on the programme was without doubt the air of Monteverde. Whether an audience broke into tears when Ariane first sang her lament on the stage in 1608 is another story. We need not take incrusted legend too seriously, but certain it is that this music, which probably did not move profoundly audiences of the early 17th century, was modern, highly dramatic, noble in its melodic curve and its impassioned declamation yesterday. The orchestral accompaniment—the arrangement was that of Ottorino Resphigi of Bologna, who was assisted in his arranging by Mme. Culp—was also ultra-modern. This would not have disturbed Monteverde, the first genius of modern music. His orchestra was far more surprising in its day.

Mme. Culp sang the air in the grand style, and with dramatic effect. The song which pleased the audience most was undoubtedly that of Handel. Not without reason. The air has a noble line, a grand repose, and in observing this melodic line Mme. Culp was again fortunate, and at her best. The air reminds one of the too famous Largo.

Mr. Schmidt Recalled

Mr. Schmidt is an honest and reliable conductor of solid acquirements. He does not attempt to infuse "personality in his readings, but takes his music sanely, and realizes that he has to deal with an orchestra composed of musicians and virtuosi. After the Schumann symphony Mr. Schmidt was recalled several times. He had reason to be gratified with his success, which he accepted with evident modesty, and in his gesture of acceptance indicated the players themselves. They declined to rise and share in the applause. Mr. Schmidt was cordially received by the players of the orchestra as fell as the audience yesterday.

Mr. Maquarre's fine tone and finished artistry has often been admired in these columns. The suite is rather long to give in its entirety. The programme was in fact too long. The performance of Mendellsohn's overture was appropriate in spirit and its coloring. There will be no concerts next week.

BOSTON AMERICAN,

FEBRUARY 13, 1915.

MME. CULP SINGS AT THE SYMPHONY

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Julia Culp was soloist at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. Dr. Muck was indisposed and Ernest Schmidt came out of the first violins to conduct.

The program included the Schumann Symphony in D, played without pause; Bach Suite, No. 2, for flute and strings, Mendelssohn's Overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream," Monteverdi's Lament of Ariadne from the ancient Italian's lost opera "Ariadne," an air "Thanks Be to Thee" from a Handel accompanied cantata, and Beethoven's "Adelaide" orchestrated by Arnold Schonberg. The last three numbers were sung by Mme. Culp.

The Schumann Symphony is only thirty minutes long, and is played without pause. It should therefore be used in the middle rather than at the beginning of a concert. More than a hundred people were left outside during the playing of the Symphony. The argument in favor of beginning a Symphony concert with the symphonic number is its length, but if it be short, it might well be preceded by an overture. Certainly, last place on the program is not the destined place of an overture, but that is where the overtures are usually placed.

Mr. Schmidt, the assistant conductor, was warmly applauded after the playing of the Symphony. He seemed a careful rather than a brilliant leader. In the Bach Suite, the solo part of which was played by Mr. Maquarre with superb artistry, it did not seem to me that Mr. Schmidt secured the necessary contrasts of rhythms and tempi between such sharply distinct compositions as a Sarabande, a Polonaise or a minuet. However, at his first appearance he was probably content with a good general effect.

Mme. Culp is now a great favorite in Boston. Few mezzo sopranos rival her in vocal gifts. Her tone is rich, warm and mellow. She sings with deep insight and rare power of expression. In these days of dramatic recitative composers might well study the three hundred year old Lament of Ariadne, which is poignantly expressive of desolation and unending sorrow. Berthoven's Ariadne was orchestrated by Schonberg, the violent Viennese composer whose harmonic revolutions were

---

BOSTON TRAVELER,

FEBRUARY 13,

ERNST SCHMIDT LEADS SYMPHONY

Makes Favorable Impression—Julia Culp and Maquarre Soloists.

The coupling of the expected and the unexpected provided enough material to keep the audience interested throughout yesterday afternoon's concert by the Symphony orchestra. The expected was, of course, the regular program with Julia Culp and Andre Maquarre as soloists. The unexpected was the appearance of Ernst Schmidt of the first violins at the conductor's desk in place of Dr. Muck. Those who did not know Dr. Muck was laid by with a cold were wondering just what was up. Mr. Schmidt, however, soon held their attention through his masterly reading of the Schumann D minor symphony, not a wonderful work, perhaps, but ever interesting and with moments of exceptional beauty.

Mme. Culp's beautiful voice and finished artistry has never been heard here to better advantage than in the selections of yesterday afternoon, the Lament of Ariadne from Mondeverde's "Arianna"; Handel's "Thanks to Thee," and Beethoven's "Adelaide." Mr. Maquarre's playing in the Bache suite for flute and strings in B minor was a genuine treat.

While Mr. Schmidt was less successful in Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" the closing number, nevertheless he can congratulate himself upon the success of his debut as a conductor of the orchestra before the Symphony Hall audiences. He fairly shared with the soloists in the approval of the audience, approval which left not the slightest doubt of the success of the concert.

As the orchestra will be away on another trip there will be no concerts the coming week.

From...

Published at....................PITTSBURGH S

Date...

JAN 28 1915

Ellis Series Closed By Symphony Concert

With Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," on the program, the Boston Symphony orchestra and Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, presented the finale of the Ellis series of concerts in Carnegie Music hall last night. After each of the compositions mentioned, the applause of the large audience compelled the men of the orchestra to rise in acknowledgment.

The technical perfection of the Boston orchestra has become axiomatic. Dr. Muck, however, revealed a new quality of feeling last night. His interpretation of the "Eroica" had a distinctive individuality that blended intellect and emotion. In the Strauss poem Dr. Muck gave a colorful reading. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture was finely interpreted, and an admirable performance of Weber's "Dreischuetz" overture closed the program.

Cornell President I

CLIPPED FROM THE
PITTSBURG DISPATCH

Date JAN 28 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY DELIGHTS LARGE AUDIENCE AT MUSIC HALL

Only Four Numbers on Program but They Prove to Be Right Kind

When an orchestra is unsurpassed and has a star conductor it can get along without a soloist, provided the program appeals to the public.

That was the case in Carnegie Music Hall last evening when Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played. The orchestra was, as it always has been when it played in Pittsburg, in excellent form—what a superb body of players Dr. Muck and well [illegible] number, and the audience was as large as if a noted soloist had sung or played.

There were only four numbers on the program, but they were of the right kind.

The Beethoven symphony in E flat major, "Eroica," was the symphony selected. It is one of Beethoven's most emotional works and well suited to Dr. Muck's style of conducting. In the dramatic first movement the bite of dissonances is remarkable. Brelioz wrote concerning this movement: "When, with disjointed rhythm, rude dissonances come to present themselves in combination, like those we find near the middle of the second repeat, where the first violins strike F natural against E (the fifth in the chord of A minor), it is impossible to repress a sensation of fear at such a picture of ungovernable fury. It is the voice of despair, almost rage." It was in this spirit that the movement was played last night by Dr. Muck and his men. The second movement—the funeral march—however, did not quite rise to the thrilling climax that a Mahler might have achieved. The scherzo, on the other hand, had probably never before had what Wagner called "buoyant gayety" and "wild unruliness" brought out so impressively as it was last night.

After the intermission came Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," the best of Richard Strauss' tone poems, "Don Juan," and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz." Of these numbers we will concern ourselves, since space is limited, with the performance of the difficult and multi-colored "Don Juan," which was simply incomparable. When it was over the orchestra had to rise in a body again and again before the excitement could be abated. The exquisitely delicate playing of the aboe solo over a ravishing accompaniment in the episode which portrays the loveliness of Anna—"love's bliss and happiness"—will long be remembered by those who were lucky enough to hear it.

In all, not since Mahler's last memorable concert here have we heard such playing. Dr Muck knows how to lead, how to shade, how to express every passion and every mood. He follows the pathway of desire, and the marvellous melodies, the sublime harmonies, are as free as the air. The Boston Symphony Orchestra stands today as one of the greatest orchestras in the country and it shows what money, sympathy, co-operation and a Col. Higginson will do.

C. J. E.

CLIPPED FROM THE PITTSBURGH POST

Date JAN 28 1915

DR. MUCK CONDUCTS BRILLIANT CONCERT

Magnificent Rendition Marks Closing Program of Ellis Series.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gave a concert in Carnegie Music Hall last evening before an audience that filled the auditorium and which throughout the program manifested great enthusiasm. At the close of the symphony Dr. Muck was recalled to the stage several times and not until he had included the whole orchestra in his acknowledgement was the audience satisfied. Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," aroused equal enthusiasm and at the close of the program the audience remained for renewed applause.

These tributes were more than deserved for the orchestra played magnificently. This organization seems to have found an ideal conductor in Dr. Muck who, while he retains all the orchestra's technical perfection, imparts to its playing a brilliancy and vigor and a freedom in tempo it did not always possess. In his reading of the Beethoven "Erocai" symphony Dr. Muck revealed a rare combination of the intellectual and the romantic. All the classic beauty was brought out but it was a living classic. In past years Dr. Muck seemed not to have as much elasticity in his baton as he evidenced last evening. The entire symphony showed this elasticity and in no movement more than in the "Funeral March," which became a tone poem under his baton. It is true that such superlative control of dynamics as this orchestra possesses and such delicacy of attack, in themselves make for elasticity in effect. To this quality Dr. Muck adds just that right touch of individuality which gives the orchestra an emotional utterance.

READING CONSERVATIVE.

The performance of the "Don Juan" was not only a brilliant exposition of Strauss but served to show the virtuosity of the orchestra. Dr. Muck's reading of this score is conservative so far as tempi are concerned, but not so in regard to tone color. It was a musical canvas painted in striking contrasts which he produced. This number was preceded by Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, which, even when played as the Boston Symphony plays it, lacks in inspiration. Coming as it did after the noble "Erocai" it suffered by comparison. But not so the "Freischuetz," which brought the concert to a close. This lovely work was most beautifully given, all its poetry enhanced by Dr. Muck's conception of it, and by the orchestra's playing.

It was throughout a great concert and it was thoroughly appreciated. It brought the second series of Ellis' concerts in this city to a close.

J. M.

music is fresh and dramatic; it is even ultra-modern in its wild freedom of expression. And how nobly beautiful is the aria of Handel, the great melodist! Noble in the simplicity of its lines; beautiful in its fervor. Hearing such music, sung with remarkable control of breath, haunting tonal quality, consummate art and genuine feeling by Mme. Culp, one might easily find the dramatic music of this generation tawdry, forced, artificial. For Verdi left no successor.

There will be no concerts next week. The program of Feb. 26, 27, will be as follows: Schubert, symphony in C major; Strube, variations on an original theme (first performance); Goldmark, overture "Sakuntala."

BOSTON JOURNAL—

FEBRUARY 13,

SCHMIDT CONDUCTS AT THE SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck's Assistant Makes Favorable Impression; Mme. Culp Sings.

Ernest Schmidt is taking Dr. Muck's place this week as conductor of the Symphony concerts. Dr. Muck is not feeling well.

Mr. Schmidt, who joined the orchestra this year as assistant conductor and violinist, had his first opportunity yesterday to show his ability as a leader, so far as the Boston concerts are concerned. He impressed the audience very favorably, being a man of dignified appearance and a musician whose interpretative side is marked by fine taste and a sure hand.

His first effort, made with the Schumann symphony in D minor, was so successful that both audience and orchestra paid tribute to him. He brought forth without exaggeration the varied and celebrated beauties of the composition; he indulged in no intrusive mannerisms, and thus he evinced his regard for the music and for the artists under his baton. His success with the remainder of the program was equally impressive.

Mme. Julia Culp, the principal soloist of the week, sang the Monteverde aria, "Ariadne's Lament," a classic relic of one of the earliest operas; the "Thanks Be to Thee," from one of the Handel cantatas, and Beethoven's "Adelaide," with orchestral accompaniment arranged by Schoenberg. Her rich voice and artistic style furnished rare enjoyment. She is one of the few singers whose art really graces a Symphony performance.

Mr. Maquarre, the principal flute player of the orchestra, also delighted one of the largest audiences of the season with his solos in the Bach overture in B minor, for flute and strings. A spirited performance of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture closed the concert.

The orchestra will be out of town next week. The following week the program will consist of the Schubert symphony in C major, Strube's "Variations on an Original Theme" and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture.

BOSTON POST,

FEBRUARY 13,

SYMPHONY CONDUCTED BY SCHMIDT

Mme. Culp and Mr. Maquarre the Soloists

BY OLIN DOWNES

As the east winds had indisposed Dr. Muck, Ernest Schmidt, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted the public rehearsal yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Julia Culp, mezzo-soprano, was the visiting soloist. Mr. Maquarre, the first flute, was the soloist in the performances of Bach's suite for flute and strings in B minor, arranged by von Bulow. Mme. Culp's solos consisted of the music for the Lament of Ariadne, from Mondeverde's "Arianna"; an air, "Thanks to Thee," from one of Handel's cantatas, with accompaniment of instruments, and Beethoven's "Adelaide," with an orchestral accompaniment by Arnold Schonber The orchestral compositions were Sch mann's symphony in D minor, Bach's suite, and Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

---

A THANKLESS WORK

Why Schonberg should have troubled to write an orchestral accompaniment for the sentimental air of Beethoven is a mystery. If he had impertinently meddled with a symphony or chamber work of the "Ferne Geliebte" cycle, one could at least discern some object in the proceeding. But of all sentimental and innocuous songs, commend us to this "Adelaide." It might have been written by anybody save Beethoven. It was immensely popular in Beethoven's lifetime, and was published, according to Vincent d'Indy, in innumerable "transcriptions for all instruments from a hand organ to a guitar." Schonberg, the rabid iconoclast, has now joined the ranks of an unblessed majority and added one more to the ill-judged versions of this song. His orchestration is ingenious and discreet.

Helped Arrange Orchestration

The most modern music on the programme was without doubt the air of Monteverde. Whether an audience broke into tears when Ariane first sang her lament on the stage in 1608 is another story. We need not take incrusted legend too seriously, but certain it is that this music, which probably did not move profoundly audiences of the early 17th century, was modern, highly dramatic, noble in its melodic curve and its impassioned declamation yesterday. The orchestral accompaniment—the arrangement was that of Ottorino Resphigi of Bologna, who was assisted in his arranging by Mme. Culp—was also ultra-modern. This would not have disturbed Monteverde, the first genius of modern music. His orchestra was far more surprising in its day.

Mme. Culp sang the air in the grand style, and with dramatic effect. The song which pleased the audience most was undoubtedly that of Handel. Not without reason. The air has a noble line, a grand repose, and in observing this melodic line Mme. Culp was again fortunate, and at her best. The air reminds one of the too famous Largo.

Mr. Schmidt Recalled

Mr. Schmidt is an honest and reliable conductor of solid acquirements. He does not attempt to infuse "personality in his readings, but takes his music sanely, and realizes that he has to deal with an orchestra composed of musicians and virtuosi. After the Schumann symphony Mr. Schmidt was recalled several times. He had reason to be gratified with his success, which he accepted with evident modesty, and in his gesture of acceptance indicated the players themselves. They declined to rise and share in the applause. Mr. Schmidt was cordially received by the players of the orchestra as fell as the audience yesterday.

Mr. Maquarre's fine tone and finished artistry has often been admired in these columns. The suite is rather long to give in its entirety. The programme was in fact too long. The performance of Mendellsohn's overture was appropriate in spirit and its coloring. There will be no concerts next week.

BOSTON AMERICAN,

FEBRUARY 13, 1915.

MME. CULP SINGS AT THE SYMPHONY

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Julia Culp was soloist at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. Dr. Muck was indisposed and Ernest Schmidt came out of the first violins to conduct.

The program included the Schumann Symphony in D, played without pause; Bach Suite, No. 2, for flute and strings, Mendelssohn's Overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream," Monteverdi's Lament of Ariadne from the ancient Italian's lost opera "Ariadne," an air "Thanks Be to Thee" from a Handel accompanied cantata, and Beethoven's "Adelaide" orchestrated by Arnold Schonberg. The last three numbers were sung by Mme. Culp.

The Schumann Symphony is only thirty minutes long, and is played without pause. It should therefore be used in the middle rather than at the beginning of a concert. More than a hundred people were left outside during the playing of the Symphony. The argument in favor of beginning a Symphony concert with the symphonic number is its length, but if it be short, it might well be preceded by an overture. Certainly, last place on the program is not the destined place of an overture, but that is where the overtures are usually placed.

Mr. Schmidt, the assistant conductor, was warmly applauded after the playing of the Symphony. He seemed a careful rather than a brilliant leader. In the Bach Suite, the solo part of which was played by Mr. Maquarre with superb artistry, it did not seem to me that Mr. Schmidt secured the necessary contrasts of rhythms and tempi between such sharply distinct compositions as a Sarabande, a Polonaise or a minuet. However, at his first appearance he was probably content with a good general effect.

Mme. Culp is now a great favorite in Boston. Few mezzo sopranos rival her in vocal gifts. Her tone is rich, warm and mellow. She sings with deep insight and rare power of expression. In these days of dramatic recitative composers might well study the three hundred year old Lament of Ariadne, which is poignantly expressive of desolation and unending sorrow. Berthoven's Ariadne was orchestrated by Schonberg, the violent Viennese composer whose harmonic revolutions were

---

BOSTON TRAVELER,

FEBRUARY 13,

ERNST SCHMIDT LEADS SYMPHONY

Makes Favorable Impression—Julia Culp and Maquarre Soloists.

The coupling of the expected and the unexpected provided enough material to keep the audience interested throughout yesterday afternoon's concert by the Symphony orchestra. The expected was, of course, the regular program with Julia Culp and Andre Maquarre as soloists. The unexpected was the appearance of Ernst Schmidt of the first violins at the conductor's desk in place of Dr. Muck. Those who did not know Dr. Muck was laid by with a cold were wondering just what was up. Mr. Schmidt, however, soon held their attention through his masterly reading of the Schumann D minor symphony, not a wonderful work, perhaps, but ever interesting and with moments of exceptional beauty.

Mme. Culp's beautiful voice and finished artistry has never been heard here to better advantage than in the selections of yesterday afternoon, the Lament of Ariadne from Mondeverde's "Arianna"; Handel's "Thanks to Thee," and Beethoven's "Adelaide." Mr. Maquarre's playing in the Bache suite for flute and strings in B minor was a genuine treat.

While Mr. Schmidt was less successful in Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" the closing number, nevertheless he can congratulate himself upon the success of his debut as a conductor of the orchestra before the Symphony Hall audiences. He fairly shared with the soloists in the approval of the audience, approval which left not the slightest doubt of the success of the concert.

As the orchestra will be away on another trip there will be no concerts the coming week.

From SUN

Published at PITTSBURGH S

Date

JAN 28 1915

Ellis Series Closed By Symphony Concert

With Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," on the program, the Boston Symphony orchestra and Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, presented the finale of the Ellis series of concerts in Carnegie Music hall last night. After each of the compositions mentioned, the applause of the large audience compelled the men of the orchestra to rise in acknowledgment.

The technical perfection of the Boston orchestra has become axiomatic. Dr. Muck, however, revealed a new quality of feeling last night. His interpretation of the "Eroica" had a distinctive individuality that blended intellect and emotion. In the Strauss poem Dr. Muck gave a colorful reading. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture was finely interpreted, and an admirable performance of Weber's "Dreischuetz" overture closed the program.

Cornell President Is

CLIPPED FROM THE
PITTSBURG DISPATCH

Date JAN 28 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY DELIGHTS LARGE AUDIENCE AT MUSIC HALL

Only Four Numbers on Program but They Prove to Be Right Kind

When an orchestra is unsurpassed and has a star conductor it can get along without a soloist, provided the program appeals to the public.

That was the case in Carnegie Music Hall last evening when Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played. The orchestra was, as it always has been when it played in Pittsburg, in excellent form—what a superb body of players Dr. Muck and well deserved [illegible] ber, and the audience was as large as if a noted soloist had sung or played.

There were only four numbers on the program, but they were of the right kind.

The Beethoven symphony in E flat major, "Eroica," was the symphony selected. It is one of Beethoven's most emotional works and well suited to Dr. Muck's style of conducting. In the dramatic first movement the bite of dissonances is remarkable. Brelioz wrote concerning this movement: "When, with disjointed rhythm, rude dissonances come to present themselves in combination, like those we find near the middle of the second repeat, where the first violins strike F natural against E (the fifth in the chord of A minor), it is impossible to repress a sensation of fear at such a picture of ungovernable fury. It is the voice of despair, almost rage." It was in this spirit that the movement was played last night by Dr. Muck and his men. The second movement—the funeral march—however, did not quite rise to the thrilling climax that a Mahler might have achieved. The scherzo, on the other hand, had probably never before had what Wagner called "buoyant gayety" and "wild unruliness" brought out so impressively as it was last night.

After the intermission came Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," the best of Richard Strauss' tone poems, "Don Juan," and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz." Of these numbers we will concern ourselves, since space is limited, with the performance of the difficult and multi-colored "Don Juan," which was simply incomparable. When it was over the orchestra had to rise in a body again and again before the excitement could be abated. The exquisitely delicate playing of the aboe solo over a ravishing accompaniment in the episode which portrays the loveliness of Anna—"love's bliss and happiness"—will long be remembered by those who were lucky enough to hear it.

In all, not since Mahler's last memorable concert here have we heard such playing. Dr Muck knows how to lead, how to shade, how to express every passion and every mood. He follows the pathway of desire, and the marvellous melodies, the sublime harmonies, are as free as the air. The Boston Symphony Orchestra stands today as one of the greatest orchestras in the country and it shows what money, sympathy, co-operation and a Col. Higginson will do.

C. J. E.

CLIPPED FROM THE
PITTSBURGH POST

Date JAN 28 1915

DR. MUCK CONDUCTS BRILLIANT CONCERT

Magnificent Rendition Marks Closing Program of Ellis Series.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gave a concert in Carnegie Music Hall last evening before an audience that filled the auditorium and which throughout the program manifested great enthusiasm. At the close of the symphony Dr. Muck was recalled to the stage several times and not until he had included the whole orchestra in his acknowledgement was the audience satisfied. Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," aroused equal enthusiasm and at the close of the program the audience remained for renewed applause.

These tributes were more than deserved for the orchestra played magnificently. This organization seems to have found an ideal conductor in Dr. Muck who, while he retains all the orchestra's technical perfection, imparts to its playing a brilliancy and vigor and a freedom in tempo it did not always possess. In his reading of the Beethoven "Erocai" symphony Dr. Muck revealed a rare combination of the intellectual and the romantic. All the classic beauty was brought out but it was a living classic. In past years Dr. Muck seemed not to have as much elasticity in his baton as he evidenced last evening. The entire symphony showed this elasticity and in no movement more than in the "Funeral March," which became a tone poem under his baton. It is true that such superlative control of dynamics as this orchestra possesses and such delicacy of attack, in themselves make for elasticity in effect. To this quality Dr. Muck adds just that right touch of individuality which gives the orchestra an emotional utterance.

READING CONSERVATIVE.

The performance of the "Don Juan" was not only a brilliant exposition of Strauss but served to show the virtuosity of the orchestra. Dr. Muck's reading of this score is conservative so far as tempi are concerned, but not so in regard to tone color. It was a musical canvas painted in striking contrasts which he produced. This number was preceded by Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, which, even when played as the Boston Symphony plays it, lacks in inspiration. Coming as it did after the noble "Erocai" it suffered by comparison. But not so the "Freischuetz," which brought the concert to a close. This lovely work was most beautifully given, all its poetry enhanced by Dr. Muck's conception of it, and by the orchestra's playing.

It was throughout a great concert and it was thoroughly appreciated. It brought the second series of Ellis' concerts in this city to a close.

J. M.

music is fresh and dramatic; it is even ultra-modern in its wild freedom of expression. And how nobly beautiful is the aria of Handel, the great melodist! Noble in the simplicity of its lines; beautiful in its fervor. Hearing such music, sung with remarkable control of breath, haunting tonal quality, consummate art and genuine feeling by Mme. Culp, one might easily find the dramatic music of this generation tawdry, forced, artificial. For Verdi left no successor.

There will be no concerts next week. The program of Feb. 26, 27, will be as follows: Schubert, symphony in C major; Strube, variations on an original theme (first performance); Goldmark, overture "Sakuntala."

BOSTON JOURNAL—

FEBRUARY 13,

SCHMIDT CONDUCTS AT THE SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck's Assistant Makes Favorable Impression; Mme. Culp Sings.

Ernest Schmidt is taking Dr. Muck's place this week as conductor of the Symphony concerts. Dr. Muck is not feeling well.

Mr. Schmidt, who joined the orchestra this year as assistant conductor and violinist, had his first opportunity yesterday to show his ability as a leader, so far as the Boston concerts are concerned. He impressed the audience very favorably, being a man of dignified appearance and a musician whose interpretative side is marked by fine taste and a sure hand.

His first effort, made with the Schumann symphony in D minor, was so successful that both audience and orchestra paid tribute to him. He brought forth without exaggeration the varied and celebrated beauties of the composition; he indulged in no intrusive mannerisms, and thus he evinced his regard for the music and for the artists under his baton. His success with the remainder of the program was equally impressive.

Mme. Julia Culp, the principal soloist of the week, sang the Monteverde aria, "Ariadne's Lament," a classic relic of one of the earliest operas; the "Thanks Be to Thee," from one of the Handel cantatas, and Beethoven's "Adelaide," with orchestral accompaniment arranged by Schoenberg. Her rich voice and artistic style furnished rare enjoyment. She is one of the few singers whose art really graces a Symphony performance.

Mr. Maquarre, the principal flute player of the orchestra, also delighted one of the largest audiences of the season with his solos in the Bach overture in B minor, for flute and strings. A spirited performance of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture closed the concert.

The orchestra will be out of town next week. The following week the program will consist of the Schubert symphony in C major, Strube's "Variations on an Original Theme" and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture.

BOSTON POST,

FEBRUARY 13,

SYMPHONY CONDUCTED BY SCHMIDT

Mme. Culp and Mr. Maquarre the Soloists

BY OLIN DOWNES

As the east winds had indisposed Dr. Muck, Ernest Schmidt, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted the public rehearsal yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Julia Culp, mezzo-soprano, was the visiting soloist. Mr. Maquarre, the first flute, was the soloist in the performances of Bach's suite for flute and strings in B minor, arranged by von Bulow. Mme. Culp's solos consisted of the music for the Lament of Ariadne, from Mondeverde's "Arianna"; an air, "Thanks to Thee," from one of Handel's cantatas, with accompaniment of instruments, and Beethoven's "Adelaide," with an orchestral accompaniment by Arnold Schonberg. The orchestral compositions were Sch mann's symphony in D minor, Bach's suite, and Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

A THANKLESS WORK

Why Schonberg should have troubled to write an orchestral accompaniment for the sentimental air of Beethoven is a mystery. If he had impertinently meddled with a symphony or chamber work of the "Ferne Geliebte" cycle, one could at least discern some object in the proceeding. But of all sentimental and innocuous songs, commend us to this "Adelaide." It might have been written by anybody save Beethoven. It was immensely popular in Beethoven's lifetime, and was published, according to Vincent d'Indy, in innumerable "transcriptions for all instruments from a hand organ to a guitar." Schonberg, the rabid iconoclast, has now joined the ranks of an unblessed majority and added one more to the ill-judged versions of this song. His orchestration is ingenious and discreet.

Helped Arrange Orchestration

The most modern music on the programme was without doubt the air of Monteverde. Whether an audience broke into tears when Ariane first sang her lament on the stage in 1608 is another story. We need not take incrusted legend too seriously, but certain it is that this music, which probably did not move profoundly audiences of the early 17th century, was modern, highly dramatic, noble in its melodic curve and its impassioned declamation yesterday. The orchestral accompaniment—the arrangement was that of Ottorino Resphigi of Bologna, who was assisted in his arranging by Mme. Culp—was also ultra-modern. This would not have disturbed Monteverde, the first genius of modern music. His orchestra was far more surprising in its day.

Mme. Culp sang the air in the grand style, and with dramatic effect. The song which pleased the audience most was undoubtedly that of Handel. Not without reason. The air has a noble line, a grand repose, and in observing this melodic line Mme. Culp was again fortunate, and at her best. The air reminds one of the too famous Largo.

Mr. Schmidt Recalled

Mr. Schmidt is an honest and reliable conductor of solid acquirements. He does not attempt to infuse "personality in his readings, but takes his music sanely, and realizes that he has to deal with an orchestra composed of musicians and virtuosi. After the Schumann symphony Mr. Schmidt was recalled several times. He had reason to be gratified with his success, which he accepted with evident modesty, and in his gesture of acceptance indicated the players themselves. They declined to rise and share in the applause. Mr. Schmidt was cordially received by the players of the orchestra as fell as the audience yesterday.

Mr. Maquarre's fine tone and finished artistry has often been admired in these columns. The suite is rather long to give in its entirety. The programme was in fact too long. The performance of Mendellsohn's overture was appropriate in spirit and its coloring. There will be no concerts next week.

BOSTON AMERICAN,

FEBRUARY 13, 1915.

MME. CULP SINGS AT THE SYMPHONY

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Julia Culp was soloist at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. Dr. Muck was indisposed and Ernest Schmidt came out of the first violins to conduct.

The program included the Schumann Symphony in D, played without pause; Bach Suite, No. 2, for flute and strings, Mendelssohn's Overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream," Monteverdi's Lament of Ariadne from the ancient Italian's lost opera "Ariadne," an air "Thanks Be to Thee" from a Handel accompanied cantata, and Beethoven's "Adelaide" orchestrated by Arnold Schonberg. The last three numbers were sung by Mme. Culp.

The Schumann Symphony is only thirty minutes long, and is played without pause. It should therefore be used in the middle rather than at the beginning of a concert. More than a hundred people were left outside during the playing of the Symphony. The argument in favor of beginning a Symphony concert with the symphonic number is its length, but if it be short, it might well be preceded by an overture. Certainly, last place on the program is not the destined place of an overture, but that is where the overtures are usually placed.

Mr. Schmidt, the assistant conductor, was warmly applauded after the playing of the Symphony. He seemed a careful rather than a brilliant leader. In the Bach Suite, the solo part of which was played by Mr. Maquarre with superb artistry, it did not seem to me that Mr. Schmidt secured the necessary contrasts of rhythms and tempi between such sharply distinct compositions as a Sarabande, a Polonaise or a minuet. However, at his first appearance he was probably content with a good general effect.

Mme. Culp is now a great favorite in Boston. Few mezzo sopranos rival her in vocal gifts. Her tone is rich, warm and mellow. She sings with deep insight and rare power of expression. In these days of dramatic recitative composers might well study the three hundred year old Lament of Ariadne, which is poignantly expressive of desolation and unending sorrow. Berthoven's Ariadne was orchestrated by Schonberg, the violent Viennese composer whose harmonic revolutions were causing much

---

BOSTON TRAVELER,

FEBRUARY 13,

ERNST SCHMIDT LEADS SYMPHONY

Makes Favorable Impression—Julia Culp and Maquarre Soloists.

The coupling of the expected and the unexpected provided enough material to keep the audience interested throughout yesterday afternoon's concert by the Symphony orchestra. The expected was, of course, the regular program with Julia Culp and Andre Maquarre as soloists. The unexpected was the appearance of Ernst Schmidt of the first violins at the conductor's desk in place of Dr. Muck. Those who did not know Dr. Muck was laid by with a cold were wondering just what was up. Mr. Schmidt, however, soon held their attention through his masterly reading of the Schumann D minor symphony, not a wonderful work, perhaps, but ever interesting and with moments of exceptional beauty.

Mme. Culp's beautiful voice and finished artistry has never been heard here to better advantage than in the selections of yesterday afternoon, the Lament of Ariadne from Mondeverde's "Arianna"; Handel's "Thanks to Thee," and Beethoven's "Adelaide." Mr. Maquarre's playing in the Bache suite for flute and strings in B minor was a genuine treat.

While Mr. Schmidt was less successful in Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" the closing number, nevertheless he can congratulate himself upon the success of his debut as a conductor of the orchestra before the Symphony Hall audiences. He fairly shared with the soloists in the approval of the audience, approval which left not the slightest doubt of the success of the concert.

As the orchestra will be away on another trip there will be no concerts the coming week.

From [illegible] SUN

Published at PITTSBURGH S

Date JAN 28 1915

Ellis Series Closed By Symphony Concert

With Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," on the program, the Boston Symphony orchestra and Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, presented the finale of the Ellis series of concerts in Carnegie Music hall last night. After each of the compositions mentioned, the applause of the large audience compelled the men of the orchestra to rise in acknowledgment.

The technical perfection of the Boston orchestra has become axiomatic. Dr. Muck, however, revealed a new quality of feeling last night. His interpretation of the "Eroica" had a distinctive individuality that blended intellect and emotion. In the Strauss poem Dr. Muck gave a colorful reading. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture was finely interpreted, and an admirable performance of Weber's "Dreischuetz" overture closed the program.

Cornell President Is

CLIPPED FROM THE
PITTSBURG DISPATCH

Date JAN 28 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY DELIGHTS LARGE AUDIENCE AT MUSIC HALL

Only Four Numbers on Program but They Prove to Be Right Kind

When an orchestra is unsurpassed and has a star conductor it can get along without a soloist, provided the program appeals to the public.

That was the case in Carnegie Music Hall last evening when Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played. The orchestra was, as it always has been when it played in Pittsburg, in excellent form—what a superb body of players Dr. Muck and well deserved [illegible]ber, and the audience was as large as if a noted soloist had sung or played.

There were only four numbers on the program, but they were of the right kind.

The Beethoven symphony in E flat major, "Eroica," was the symphony selected. It is one of Beethoven's most emotional works and well suited to Dr. Muck's style of conducting. In the dramatic first movement the bite of dissonances is remarkable. Brelioz wrote concerning this movement: "When, with disjointed rhythm, rude dissonances come to present themselves in combination, like those we find near the middle of the second repeat, where the first violins strike F natural against E (the fifth in the chord of A minor), it is impossible to repress a sensation of fear at such a picture of ungovernable fury. It is the voice of despair, almost rage." It was in this spirit that the movement was played last night by Dr. Muck and his men. The second movement—the funeral march—however, did not quite rise to the thrilling climax that a Mahler might have achieved. The scherzo, on the other hand, had probably never before had what Wagner called "buoyant gayety" and "wild unruliness" brought out so impressively as it was last night.

After the intermission came Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," the best of Richard Strauss' tone poems, "Don Juan," and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz." Of these numbers we will concern ourselves, since space is limited, with the performance of the difficult and multi-colored "Don Juan," which was simply incomparable. When it was over the orchestra had to rise in a body again and again before the excitement could be abated. The exquisitely delicate playing of the aboe solo over a ravishing accompaniment in the episode which portrays the loveliness of Anna—"love's bliss and happiness"—will long be remembered by those who were lucky enough to hear it.

In all, not since Mahler's last memorable concert here have we heard such playing. Dr Muck knows how to lead, how to shade, how to express every passion and every mood. He follows the pathway of desire, and the marvellous melodies, the sublime harmonies, are as free as the air. The Boston Symphony Orchestra stands today as one of the greatest orchestras in the country and it shows what money, sympathy, co-operation and a Col. Higginson will do.

C. J. E.

BRACKEN CHARGED WITH FORGERY

CLIPPED FROM THE
PITTSBURGH POST

Date JAN 28 1915

DR. MUCK CONDUCTS BRILLIANT CONCERT

Magnificent Rendition Marks Closing Program of Ellis Series.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gave a concert in Carnegie Music Hall last evening before an audience that filled the auditorium and which throughout the program manifested great enthusiasm. At the close of the symphony Dr. Muck was recalled to the stage several times and not until he had included the whole orchestra in his acknowledgement was the audience satisfied. Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," aroused equal enthusiasm and at the close of the program the audience remained for renewed applause.

These tributes were more than deserved for the orchestra played magnificently. This organization seems to have found an ideal conductor in Dr. Muck who, while he retains all the orchestra's technical perfection, imparts to its playing a brilliancy and vigor and a freedom in tempo it did not always possess. In his reading of the Beethoven "Erocal" symphony Dr. Muck revealed a rare combination of the intellectual and the romantic. All the classic beauty was brought out but it was a living classic. In past years Dr. Muck seemed not to have as much elasticity in his baton as he evidenced last evening. The entire symphony showed this elasticity and in no movement more than in the "Funeral March," which became a tone poem under his baton. It is true that such superlative control of dynamics as this orchestra possesses and such delicacy of attack, in themselves make for elasticity in effect. To this quality Dr. Muck adds just that right touch of individuality which gives the orchestra an emotional utterance.

READING CONSERVATIVE.

The performance of the "Don Juan" was not only a brilliant exposition of Strauss but served to show the virtuosity of the orchestra. Dr. Muck's reading of this score is conservative so far as tempi are concerned, but not so in regard to tone color. It was a musical canvas painted in striking contrasts which he produced. This number was preceded by Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, which, even when played as the Boston Symphony plays it, lacks in inspiration. Coming as it did after the noble "Erocai" it suffered by comparison. But not so the "Freischuetz," which brought the concert to a close. This lovely work was most beautifully given, all its poetry enhanced by Dr. Muck's conception of it, and by the orchestra's playing.

It was throughout a great concert and it was thoroughly appreciated. It brought the second series of Ellis' concerts in this city to a close.

J. M.

[108

CLIPPED FROM THE
PITTSBURGH LEADER

Date JAN 28 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES LARGE AUDIENCE

The Boston Symphony orchestra presented an unusually attractive program at its concert last evening in the Carnegie music hall. In spite of the fact that there was no noted soloist with the orchestra, Dr. Muck's organization received hearty welcome and the various numbers of the excellently rendered program brought out a large crowd of Pittsburg music lovers.

The Beethoven symphony in E flat major, "Eroica," was the symphony selected. It is one of Beethoven's most emotional works and well suited to Dr. Muck's style of conducting.

After the intermission came Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," the best of Richard Strauss' tone poems, "Don Juan," and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz." When it was over the orchestra had to rise in a body again before the excitement could be abated.

In all, not since Mahler's last memorable concert here has there been such playing. Dr. Muck knows how to lead, how to shade, how to express every passion and every mood. He follows the pathway of desire, and the marvelous melodies, the sublime harmonies, are as free as the air.

For Economical Reasons

New Lady Boarder—Mercy! What

CLIPPED FROM THE
PITTSBURG PRESS

Date JAN 28 1915

BRILLIANT CONCERT CLOSES ELLIS SERIES.

The Ellis series of concerts was brought to a brilliant close last night with a magnificent concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. Applause renewed again and again after almost every number, showed the appreciation of the audience, which filled the house almost to capacity. On the program were Beethoven, Schumann, Richard Strauss and Weber. Interest centered chiefly around Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan" a comparatively little known work. It is an interesting composition revealing unexpected depths and colorings.

It is vivid and subtle and offers enormous technical difficulties, all of which were oversome in splendid style.

The "Eroicax Symphony" was given beautifully, the performance equalling the composition in splendor, than which no higher praise can be given the musicians. Dr. Muck does not infuse his own personality annoyingly into the big works he presents. He subordinates himself constantly to the thought and mind of the composer. "Der Freischuetz" was given in a manner almost above criticism and almost beyond praise. The whole concert was of almost unsurpassable excellence.

What do

CLIPPED FROM THE PITTSBURGH CHRONICLE TELEGRAPH

Date JAN 28 1915

Meritorious Concert By Boston Symphony

Dr. Karl Muck and His Musicians Please Large Audience With a "Request Program."

CLOSE OF THE ELLIS SERIES

The closing concert of the Ellis series was given last night at Carnegie Music Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Dr. Carl Muck. The program was selected from compositions asked for by patrons, and the selections indicate a very high taste on the part of Pittsburgh concertgoers. The composers represented numbered only four. They were Beethoven, Schumann, Strauss and Weber. Doubtless some wonder will be felt that Wagner was not included. But the choice made was a very good one for a night's program.

The symphony was Beethoven's "Eroica," that wonderful composition which perhaps more than any other exhibits the genius of its composer. It is a very long one, a fact which the composer himself recognized would militate against popularity, for he advised that it be performed at the beginning rather than at the end of a concert, on account of the danger "that it will not produce on the audience, which attention will be already wearied by preceding pieces, the effect which the composer purposed in his own mind to attain." That purpose was admirably interpreted by Dr. Muck and his large company of musicians, which quite filled the stage. The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays with delightful unity and in thorough accord with the directing mind.

Schumann was represented by his overture to "Genoveva," one of his less known works, but of which the overture is decidedly the bast part, being crowded with musical themes well worked out. The tone poem, "Don Juan," by Richard Strauss, which is full of fine melody, was given with appreciation of the writer's intent. The shading was delicate in the extreme, the whole abounding with poetical ideas musically interpreted. Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz" was the closing number of the program. virile work was ably handled and

---

From GAZETTE-TIMES
Published at
Date JAN 28 1915

t Performance Boston Symphony

Dr. Muck's Orchestra Gives Triumphant Close to Ellis Series.

By GLENDINNING KEEBLE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, gave a triumphant close to the Ellis series of concerts in Carnegie Music Hall last night. The incomprehensible feature of the occasion was that there were empty seats in the orchestra circle—few perhaps, but by that much too many. This orchestra is beyond question the most valuable musical institution in America, and the program, without being exacting, was fully worthy of it; so that the only conceivable explanation of those empty chairs is the fact that a year ago its program was universally disappointing. When it returns next year, however, there can be no such trouble. The audience last night was stirred to a rare degree of enthusiasm, and enthusiasm is splendidly communicative.

The composers represented on the program were Beethoven, Schumann, Richard Strauss and Weber. The shorter numbers—the lovely overture Schumann gave to his otherwise ineffective opera "Genoveva" and Weber's brilliant overture to "Der Freischuetz"—need not be spoken of in detail, for they are presumably quite familiar to all. Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan" may not be so common a story, although it was given in this city in recent years by Arthur Nikisch, when he visited us with the London Philharmonic Society. It is a vivid musical version of Lenau's poem, revealed in interesting melody, subtle rhythms and ravishing orchestral color. The technical difficulties it offers are enormous, and with great pride we confess that our own orchestra (for this band established by Mr. Higginson cannot be limited in its scope to a single city, but is necessarily a national institution), gave a better performance than England's most famous orchestra. The balance of tone and clarity of color were marvelous.

As for the "Eroica Symphony"—the one in E-flat, the third of Beethoven's immortal nine—who can attempt to praise it? The Strauss tone poem shows that in some ways the art of music has broadened its resources in the century and more which have passed since the "Eroica" was first performed; but Beethoven himself is the only composer who has surpassed it in symphonic writing, and even Beethoven surpassed it very seldom. It remains one of the conspicuous achievements of a genius who was as many sided as he was exalted, a masterpiece of supreme beauty and depth of thought, in which a vigorous dignity is not incompatible with a sublime tenderness.

The conductor who interprets such work and the orchestra which plays it share in an almost priestly function, which Dr. Muck and the Boston Orchestra seemed to realize. It has been a recent fashion for conductors to intrude their own personalities in strained and exaggerated readings. Dr. Muck recognizes that his greatest glory is in identifying himself as closely as possible with the spirit of Beethoven, and the "Eroica" was throughout treated with a reverence as rare as it is admirable, and the orchestra responded with complete sympathy and flexibility.

After acknowledging this much, there can be little to say specifically about last night's performance. It was inevitable that there should be slight technical slips, with so exacting a program and with so large a body of even the best players; but the emotional and mental tension rarely relaxed enough to give one opportunity for recognizing them. We do not attempt to give a description of the superlative excellence that was demonstrated, yet we may say that for brilliant sonority of tone, for infinite gradation of color and shading, for splendid unanimity of high musicianship, the Boston Symphony Orchestra could not imaginably be surpassed.

BULLETIN
vidence, R. I.

FEB 3 1915

OSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES 4TH CONCERT HERE

Frieda Hempel, Metropolitan Grand Opera Soprano, Is Soloist in Infantry Hall Programme. Entertainment is Somewhat Shorter Than Usual.

With Frieda Hempel, the brilliant coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert of the season last evening in Infantry Hall, which was nearly filled with the customary large and appreciative audience.

As the concert was about to begin announcement was made that owing to the absence of the conductor, Dr. Muck, his place would be taken by the assistant conductor, Mr. Schmidt. It was the first time this season that Dr. Muck has been absent from the conductor's desk at the concerts in this city and some curiosity was felt concerning his substitute.

Mr. Schmidt assumed and carried on his office with dignity, apparently perfectly at home at his task, with which he seemed amply able to cope. Without undue muscular exertion he led the orchestra through the intricacies of the programme, which was arranged in the following order:

Haydn..Symphony in G-major, "The Surprise" (B. & H. No. 6)
I. Adagio: Vivace assai.
II. Andante.
III. Menuetto.
IV. Allegro di molto.
Mozart..Air, "Martern aller Arten," from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail," Act II., No. 11.
J. S. Bach..Symphony (Shepherds' Music) from the Christmas Oratorio.
Liszt..March of the Three Holy Kings, from the Oratorio, "Christus."
Gounod.."O legere hirondelle," from the Opera "Mireille," Act I.
Weber..Overture to the Opera, "Der Freischuetz."

While the programme was made up of more than the usual number of selections, in point of time, it was rather less instead of more than usual length, and contained no ultra modern compositions to puzzle over. Instead, it was largely of a classical nature, covering a range of a century and a half, and from Bach to Liszt offering as great a diversity in style.

It is a good many years since Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, with which the concert opened, was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but it is perennially fresh, and never fails to impress the listener with Haydn's aim toward perfection in his art. As the themes weave in and out, taken up in turn by the different instruments, one feels his command of melody and harmony, and all the elements of music, and is moved to admiration for the quality of his compositions, so removed from the later influences of noise and novelty.

And yet it was noise and novelty that gave the "surprise" to the symphony, and as the familiar air of the second movement, so gracefully played, and so daintily repeated, was punctuated by th startling drumstroke, a ripple of gentl laughter swept over the audience lik a summer breeze. After over a centur Haydn still has his little joke on "th ladies."

The menuetto, so like a rustic dance was as distinctively played, while th full beauty of the first and last movements was well brought out.

Bach's music is not often incorporated into the Symphony programmes here and the beautiful shepherd's music from the Christmas Oratorio was heard with interest. Its simplicity was effectively contrasted with the brilliant intricacy of Liszt's "March of the Three Holy Kings" from the oratorio of "Christus," which followed; and from the standpoint of sentiment the two seemed appropriately connected. It is almost superfluous to state that each in its way was beautifully played, and illustrated the wide range covered by Christmas music.

It was Miss Hempel's first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but the cordiality manifested, alike by orchestra and audience, could have left her no doubt of the feeling she inspired.

As the singer came forward for her first solo she looked very young to be assigned to the task of upholding the best traditions of the art of vocal bravura, but the beauty and range of her voice and the fluency with which she scaled the heights of the florid passages left no doubt that she had a "nimble throat," such as Katharina Cavalieri, to display whose vocal "agility" Mozart wrote the air, "Martern aller Aeten," which Miss Hempel gave with dramatic fervor.

The waltz song of "Mireille," "O legere hirondelle," was aother solo also written to please a soprano who had a desire to shine in florid song, and Miss Hempel gave it with a brilliant daintiness that won her recall after recall, as had her previous number.

The concluding number on the programme, Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz," was a brilliant performance. The overture which is so symmetrical in form embraces practically all the airs in the opera, selections of which have been popular on Symphony programmes here. Most of Weber's overtures have also been played here from time to time by the orchestra, but few more acceptably than that which closed the programme last evening.

The fifth concert in the series will be given on Tuesday evening, March 2, when the soloist will be Anton Witek, the concert master of the organization, who, with Mme. Witek, is still pleasantly remembered for the recital given before The Listeners a few years ago in Churchill House.

A. W. C.

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

Word comes from Boston that Dr. Muck, because of "conditions over which he has no control," is obliged to make several changes in the program that was originally announced for the Boston Symphony Concert at the Lyric on February 17. In other words, the Spohr concerto will not be played. Compositions by "The Three B's" will be offered. The symphony will be Brahm's first, the one in C minor. Other numbers on the program will be the "Shepherd's Music" from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" and the same composer's "Double Concerto," for two violins, a work in D minor, the solo violinists being Witek and Noack, the first and second concertmeisters of the orchestra. The concert will close with the third "Lenore" overture by Beethoven.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address: New York City
Date EB 7 - 1915

REVISED 'FAUST' SYMPHONY.

The Boston Sympthony Orchestra played at its concerts in Boston a few weeks ago the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt, using for the first time a version of the work which was revised and changed by Liszt in his last years. When Dr. Muck was in Baireuth in the Summer of 1912, it is explained, he found in looking through the library of Wahnfried, the home of the Wagners, a score of the "Faust" Symphony which bore many changes and additions penciled in the handwriting of the composer. Siegfried Wagner told him that Liszt had made these revisions about 1883, and they had never been published. The score was given to Dr. Muck with permission to perform the revised symphony if he should see fit.

In no way has Liszt changed the thematic contour, nor has he made serious changes in the development or the episodes. The changes, for the most part, affect the orchestration. Thus, early in "Faust," an arioso written originally for a bassoon is given to the bass clarinet, which was not at first in Liszt's table of instruments to be employed. Here and there wind instruments are introduced, reinforced, or for the sake of greater brilliance. The greatest part of the changes is in "Mephistopheles," where the "Vision of Gretchen" is made much more effective. There are excisions throughout the symphony, sometimes only a measure, sometimes more. Dr. Muck is of the opinion that the changes greatly benefit the work.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.

3 6 1915
Date

CHANGES ITS PROGRAM

It has been found necessary to make certain changes in the program announced for the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Lyric Theatre Wednesday evening, February 17. The program, as revised, will be devoted to works by those who Von Buelow called the "Three Great B's"—Bach, Beethoven and Brahms.

The symphony, as already announced, will be the great C minor symphony of Brahms. In the second part there will be two pieces by Bach—the lovely Shepherds' music from the "Christmas Oratorio" and the "Double Concerto for Two Violins in D Minor." The final number will be Beethoven's "Leonore III" overture.

17

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 7 - 1915

The performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its next concert in the Academy of Music, Monday evening, February 15, of Spohr's Concerto for quartet of string instruments and orchestra, brings forward four of the most interesting personalities in the membership of the orchestra. The quartet will be played by Anton Witek, the concert master, as first violin; Walter Habenicht, leader of the second violins, as second violin; Emile Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, violoncello. Anton Witek is now in his fifth year as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has proved a most efficient musician and has shown himself in his various appearances as soloist a violin virtuoso of high rank. For 16 years previous to his coming to America he was concert master of the Philarmonic Orchestra of Berlin.

Walther Habenicht, the leader of the second violins, is in the third year of his engagement in Boston. Previous to his coming to America, he was concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra in Kiel, Germany, and sat at the third desk of the first violins in the orchestra at the festival performances in Bayreuth. He was specially engaged to come to America as leader of the second violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Emile Ferir, first viola of the orchestra, has been called by Kreisler and Ysaye the finest viola player in the world. His playing is notable for the extraordinary tone he gets from his instrument. He is a Belgian, a graduate of the Brussels Conservatory, and before coming to America, he was first viola of the Lamoureux and Colonne Orchestras of Paris, and the Queen's Hall Orchestra of London. Heinrich Warnke has been solo 'cellist of the orchestra for 10 years, and is an artist of highest rank.

The other numbers on the program will be the first Symphony in E minor, by Sibelius; the "Der Freischuetz" overture by Weber, and the "Carneval" overture by Dvorak.

* * *

The program given by the Philadelphia

CLIPPED FROM THE PITTSBURGH LEADER

Date JAN 28 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES LARGE AUDIENCE

The Boston Symphony orchestra presented an unusually attractive program at its concert last evening in the Carnegie music hall. In spite of the fact that there was no noted soloist with the orchestra, Dr. Muck's organization received hearty welcome and the various numbers of the excellently rendered program brought out a large crowd of Pittsburg music lovers.

The Beethoven symphony in E flat major, "Eroica," was the symphony selected. It is one of Beethoven's most emotional works and well suited to Dr. Muck's style of conducting.

After the intermission came Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," the best of Richard Strauss' tone poems, "Don Juan," and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz." When it was over the orchestra had to rise in a body again before the excitement could be abated.

In all, not since Mahler's last memorable concert here has there been such playing. Dr. Muck knows how to lead, how to shade, how to express every passion and every mood. He follows the pathway of desire, and the marvelous melodies, the sublime harmonies, are as free as the air.

For Economical Reasons

New Lady Boarder—Mercy! What

CLIPPED FROM THE
PITTSBURG PRESS

Date JAN 28 1915

BRILLIANT CONCERT CLOSES ELLIS SERIES.

The Ellis series of concerts was brought to a brilliant close last night with a magnificent concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. Applause renewed again and again after almost every number, showed the appreciation of the audience, which filled the house almost to capacity. On the program were Beethoven, Schumann, Richard Strauss and Weber. Interest centered chiefly around Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan" a comparatively little known work. It is an interesting composition revealing unexpected depths and colorings.

It is vivid and subtle and offers enormous technical difficulties, all of which were oversome in splendid style.

The "Eroicax Symphony" was given beautifully, the performance equalling the composition in splendor, than which no higher praise can be given the musicians. Dr. Muck does not infuse his own personality annoyingly into the big works he presents. He subordinates himself constantly to the thought and mind of the composer. "Der Freischuetz" was given in a manner almost above criticism and almost beyond praise. The whole concert was of almost unsurpassable excellence.

What do you

CLIPPED FROM THE
PITTSBURGH CHRONICLE TELEGRAPH

Date JAN 28 1915

Meritorious Concert By Boston Symphony

Dr. Karl Muck and His Musicians Please Large Audience With a "Request Program."

CLOSE OF THE ELLIS SERIES

The closing concert of the Ellis series was given last night at Carnegie Music Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Dr. Carl Muck. The program was selected from compositions asked for by patrons, and the selections indicate a very high taste on the part of Pittsburgh concertgoers. The composers represented numbered only four. They were Beethoven, Schumann, Strauss and Weber. Doubtless some wonder will be felt that Wagner was not included. But the choice made was a very good one for a night's program.

The symphony was Beethoven's "Eroica," that wonderful composition which perhaps more than any other exhibits the genius of its composer. It is a very long one, a fact which the composer himself recognized would militate against popularity, for he advised that it be performed at the beginning rather than at the end of a concert, on account of the danger "that it will not produce on the audience, which attention will be already wearied by preceding pieces, the effect which the composer purposed in his own mind to attain." That purpose was admirably interpreted by Dr. Muck and his large company of musicians, which quite filled the stage. The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays with delightful unity and in thorough accord with the directing mind.

Schumann was represented by his overture to "Genoveva," one of his less known works, but of which the overture is decidedly the bast part, being crowded with musical themes well worked out. The tone poem, "Don Juan," by Richard Strauss, which is full of fine melody, was given with appreciation of the writer's intent. The shading was delicate in the extreme, the whole abounding with poetical ideas musically interpreted. Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz" was the closing number of the program. This virile work was ably handled and

---

From GAZETTE-TIMES
Published at
Date JAN 28 1915

t Performance Boston Symphony

Dr. Muck's Orchestra Gives Triumphant Close to Ellis Series.

By GLENDINNING KEEBLE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, gave a triumphant close to the Ellis series of concerts in Carnegie Music Hall last night. The incomprehensible feature of the occasion was that there were empty seats in the orchestra circle—few perhaps, but by that much too many. This orchestra is beyond question the most valuable musical institution in America, and the program, without being exacting, was fully worthy of it; so that the only conceivable explanation of those empty chairs is the fact that a year ago its program was universally disappointing. When it returns next year, however, there can be no such trouble. The audience last night was stirred to a rare degree of enthusiasm, and enthusiasm is splendidly communicative.

The composers represented on the program were Beethoven, Schumann, Richard Strauss and Weber. The shorter numbers—the lovely overture Schumann gave to his otherwise ineffective opera "Genoveva" and Weber's brilliant overture to "Der Freischuetz"—need not be spoken of in detail, for they are presumably quite familiar to all. Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan" may not be so common a story, although it was given in this city in recent years by Arthur Nikisch, when he visited us with the London Philharmonic Society. It is a vivid musical version of Lenau's poem, revealed in interesting melody, subtle rhythms and ravishing orchestral color. The technical difficulties it offers are enormous, and with great pride we confess that our own orchestra (for this band established by Mr. Higginson cannot be limited in its scope to a single city, but is necessarily a national institution), gave a better performance than England's most famous orchestra. The balance of tone and clarity of color were marvelous.

As for the "Eroica Symphony"—the one in E-flat, the third of Beethoven's immortal nine—who can attempt to praise it? The Strauss tone poem shows that in some ways the art of music has broadened its resources in the century and more which have passed since the "Eroica" was first performed; but Beethoven himself is the only composer who has surpassed it in symphonic writing, and even Beethoven surpassed it very seldom. It remains one of the conspicuous achievements of a genius who was as many sided as he was exalted, a masterpiece of supreme beauty and depth of thought, in which a vigorous dignity is not incompatible with a sublime tenderness.

The conductor who interprets such work and the orchestra which plays it share in an almost priestly function, which Dr. Muck and the Boston Orchestra seemed to realize. It has been a recent fashion for conductors to intrude their own personalities in strained and exaggerated readings. Dr. Muck recognizes that his greatest glory is in identifying himself as closely as possible with the spirit of Beethoven, and the "Eroica" was throughout treated with a reverence as rare as it is admirable, and the orchestra responded with complete sympathy and flexibility.

After acknowledging this much, there can be little to say specifically about last night's performance. It was inevitable that there should be slight technical slips, with so exacting a program and with so large a body of even the best players; but the emotional and mental tension rarely relaxed enough to give one opportunity for recognizing them. We do not attempt to give a description of the superlative excellence that was demonstrated, yet we may say that for brilliant sonority of tone, for infinite gradation of color and shading, for splendid unanimity of high musicianship, the Boston Symphony Orchestra could not imaginably be surpassed.

---

idence, R. I.

FEB 3 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES 4TH CONCERT HERE

Frieda Hempel, Metropolitan Grand Opera Soprano, is Soloist in Infantry Hall Programme. Entertainment is Somewhat Shorter Than Usual.

With Frieda Hempel, the brilliant coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert of the season last evening in Infantry Hall, which was nearly filled with the customary large and appreciative audience.

As the concert was about to begin announcement was made that owing to the absence of the conductor, Dr. Muck, his place would be taken by the assistant conductor, Mr. Schmidt. It was the first time this season that Dr. Muck has been absent from the conductor's desk at the concerts in this city and some curiosity was felt concerning his substitute.

Mr. Schmidt assumed and carried on his office with dignity, apparently perfectly at home at his task, with which he seemed amply able to cope. Without undue muscular exertion he led the orchestra through the intricacies of the programme, which was arranged in the following order:

Haydn..Symphony in G-major, "The Surprise" (B. & H. No. 6)
I. Adagio: Vivace assai.
II. Andante.
III. Menuetto.
IV. Allegro di molto.
Mozart..Air, "Martern aller Arten," from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail," Act II., No. 11.
J. S. Bach..Symphony (Shepherds' Music) from the Christmas Oratorio.
Liszt..March of the Three Holy Kings, from the Oratorio, "Christus."
Gounod.."O legere hirondelle," from the Opera "Mireille," Act I.
Weber..Overture to the Opera, "Der Freischuetz."

While the programme was made up of more than the usual number of selections, in point of time, it was rather less instead of more than usual length, and contained no ultra modern compositions to puzzle over. Instead, it was largely of a classical nature, covering a range of a century and a half, and from Bach to Liszt offering as great a diversity in style.

It is a good many years since Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, with which the concert opened, was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but it is perennially fresh, and never fails to impress the listener with Haydn's aim toward perfection in his art. As the themes weave in and out, taken up in turn by the different instruments, one feels his command of melody and harmony, and all the elements of music, and is moved to admiration for the quality of his compositions, so removed from the later influences of noise and novelty.

And yet it was noise and novelty that gave the "surprise" to the symphony, and as the familiar air of the second movement, so gracefully played, and so daintily repeated, was punctuated by the startling drumstroke, a ripple of gentle laughter swept over the audience like a summer breeze. After over a century Haydn still has his little joke on "the ladies."

The menuetto, so like a rustic dance, was as distinctively played, while the full beauty of the first and last movements was well brought out.

Bach's music is not often incorporated into the Symphony programmes here and the beautiful shepherd's music from the Christmas Oratorio was heard with interest. Its simplicity was effectively contrasted with the brilliant intricacy of Liszt's "March of the Three Holy Kings" from the oratorio of "Christus," which followed; and from the standpoint of sentiment the two seemed appropriately connected. It is almost superfluous to state that each in its way was beautifully played, and illustrated the wide range covered by Christmas music.

It was Miss Hempel's first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but the cordiality manifested, alike by orchestra and audience, could have left her no doubt of the feeling she inspired.

As the singer came forward for her first solo she looked very young to be assigned to the task of upholding the best traditions of the art of vocal bravura, but the beauty and range of her voice and the fluency with which she scaled the heights of the florid passages left no doubt that she had a "nimble throat," such as Katharina Cavalieri, to display whose vocal "agility" Mozart wrote the air, "Martern aller Aeten," which Miss Hempel gave with dramatic fervor.

The waltz song of "Mireille," "O legere hirondelle," was aother solo also written to please a soprano who had a desire to shine in florid song, and Miss Hempel gave it with a brilliant daintiness that won her recall after recall, as had her previous number.

The concluding number on the programme, Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz," was a brilliant performance. The overture which is so symmetrical in form embraces practically all the airs in the opera, selections of which have been popular on Symphony programmes here. Most of Weber's overtures have also been played here from time to time by the orchestra, but few more acceptably than that which closed the programme last evening.

The fifth concert in the series will be given on Tuesday evening, March 2, when the soloist will be Anton Witek, the concert master of the organization, who, with Mme. Witek, is still pleasantly remembered for the recital given before The Listeners a few years ago in Churchill House.

A. W. C.

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Word comes from Boston that Dr. Muck, because of "conditions over which he has no control," is obliged to make several changes in the program that was originally announced for the Boston Symphony Concert at the Lyric on February 17. In other words, the Spohr concerto will not be played. Compositions by "The Three B's" will be offered. The symphony will be Brahm's first, the one in C minor. Other numbers on the program will be the "Shepherd's Music" from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" and the same composer's "Double Concerto," for two violins, a work in D minor, the solo violinists being Witek and Noack, the first and second concertmeisters of the orchestra. The concert will close with the third "Lenore" overture by Beethoven.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address: New York City
Date FEB 7

REVISED 'FAUST' SYMPHONY.

The Boston Sympthony Orchestra played at its concerts in Boston a few weeks ago the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt, using for the first time a version of the work which was revised and changed by Liszt in his last years. When Dr. Muck was in Baireuth in the Summer of 1912, it is explained, he found in looking through the library of Wahnfried, the home of the Wagners, a score of the "Faust" Symphony which bore many changes and additions penciled in the handwriting of the composer. Siegfried Wagner told him that Liszt had made these revisions about 1883, and they had never been published. The score was given to Dr. Muck with permission to perform the revised symphony if he should see fit.

In no way has Liszt changed the thematic contour, nor has he made serious changes in the development or the episodes. The changes, for the most part, affect the orchestration. Thus, early in "Faust," an arioso written originally for a bassoon is given to the bass clarinet, which was not at first in Liszt's table of instruments to be employed. Here and there wind instruments are introduced, reinforced, or for the sake of greater brilliance. The greatest part of the changes is in "Mephistopheles," where the "Vision of Gretchen" is made much more effective. There are excisions throughout the symphony, sometimes only a measure, sometimes more. Dr. Muck is of the opinion that the changes greatly benefit the work.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

CHANGES ITS PROGRAM

It has been found necessary to make certain changes in the program announced for the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Lyric Theatre Wednesday evening, February 17. The program, as revised, will be devoted to works by those who Von Buelow called the "Three Great B's"—Bach, Beethoven and Brahms.

The symphony, as already announced, will be the great C minor symphony of Brahms. In the second part there will be two pieces by Bach—the lovely Shepherds' music from the "Christmas Oratorio" and the "Double Concerto for Two Violins in D Minor." The final number will be Beethoven's "Leonore III" overture.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 7 - 1915

The performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its next concert in the Academy of Music, Monday evening, February 15, of Spohr's Concerto for quartet of string instruments and orchestra, brings forward four of the most interesting personalities in the membership of the orchestra. The quartet will be played by Anton Witek, the concert master, as first violin; Walter Habenicht, leader of the second violins, as second violin; Emile Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, violoncello. Anton Witek is now in his fifth year as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has proved a most efficient musician and has shown himself in his various appearances as soloist a violin virtuoso of high rank. For 16 years previous to his coming to America he was concert master of the Philarmonic Orchestra of Berlin.

Walther Habenicht, the leader of the second violins, is in the third year of his engagement in Boston. Previous to his coming to America, he was concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra in Kiel, Germany, and sat at the third desk of the first violins in the orchestra at the festival performances in Bayreuth. He was specially engaged to come to America as leader of the second violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Emile Ferir, first viola of the orchestra, has been called by Kreisler and Ysaye the finest viola player in the world. His playing is notable for the extraordinary tone he gets from his instrument. He is a Belgian, a graduate of the Brussels Conservatory, and before coming to America, he was first viola of the Lamoureux and Colonne Orchestras of Paris, and the Queen's Hall Orchestra of London. Heinrich Warnke has been solo 'cellist of the orchestra for 10 years, and is an artist of highest rank.

The other numbers on the program will be the first Symphony in E minor, by Sibelius; the "Der Freischuetz" overture by Weber, and the "Carneval" overture by Dvorak.

* * *

The program given by the Philadelphia

CLIPPED FROM THE PITTSBURGH LEADER

Date JAN 28 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES LARGE AUDIENCE

The Boston Symphony orchestra presented an unusually attractive program at its concert last evening in the Carnegie music hall. In spite of the fact that there was no noted soloist with the orchestra, Dr. Muck's organization received hearty welcome and the various numbers of the excellently rendered program brought out a large crowd of Pittsburg music lovers.

The Beethoven symphony in E flat major, "Eroica," was the symphony selected. It is one of Beethoven's most emotional works and well suited to Dr. Muck's style of conducting.

After the intermission came Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," the best of Richard Strauss' tone poems, "Don Juan," and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz." When it was over the orchestra had to rise in a body again before the excitement could be abated.

In all, not since Mahler's last memorable concert here has there been such playing. Dr. Muck knows how to lead, how to shade, how to express every passion and every mood. He follows the pathway of desire, and the marvelcus melodies, the sublime harmonies, are as free as the air.

For Economical Reasons

New Lady Boarder—Mercy! What

CLIPPED FROM THE
PITTSBURG PRESS

Date JAN 28 1915

BRILLIANT CONCERT CLOSES ELLIS SERIES.

The Ellis series of concerts was brought to a brilliant close last night with a magnificent concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. Applause renewed again and again after almost every number, showed the appreciation of the audience, which filled the house almost to capacity. On the program were Beethoven, Schumann, Richard Strauss and Weber. Interest centered chiefly around Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan" a comparatively little known work. It is an interesting composition revealing unexpected depths and colorings.

It is vivid and subtle and offers enormous technical difficulties, all of which were oversome in splendid style. The "Eroicax Symphony" was given beautifully, the performance equalling the composition in splendor, than which no higher praise can be given the musicians. Dr. Muck does not infuse his own personality annoyingly into the big works he presents. He subordinates himself constantly to the thought and mind of the composer. "Der Freischuetz" was given in a manner almost above crit[illegible]n and almost beyond praise. The whole concert was of almost unsurpassable excellence.

What do you use to destroy germs? Every home should have Creolol, the safe, sure germicide and antiseptic. It is healing to man, but it kills all kinds of bugs from germs to roaches. All druggists—25 cents a bottle.

LYCEUM MINSTREL SHOW

Dr. Karl Muck and His Musicians Please Large Audience With a "Request Program."

CLOSE OF THE ELLIS SERI

The closing concert of the Ellis ser was given last night at Carnegie Mu Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchest conducted by Dr. Carl Muck. The pi gram was selected from compositic asked for by patrons, and the selectic indicate a very high taste on the pi of Pittsburgh concertgoers. The co posers represented numbered only fo They were Beethoven, Schumann, Strau and Weber. Doubtless some wonder w be felt that Wagner was not include But the choice made was a very go one for a night's program.

The symphony was Beethove "Eroica," that wonderful compositi which perhaps more than any other e hibits the genius of its composer. It is very long one, a fact which the composer himself recognized would militate against popularity, for he advised that it be performed at the beginning rather than at the end of a concert, on account of the danger "that it will not produce on the audience, which attention will be already wearied by preceding pieces, the effect which the composer purposed in his own mind to attain." That purpose was admirably interpreted by Dr. Muck and his large company of musicians, which quite filled the stage. The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays with delightful unity and in thorough accord with the directing mind.

Schumann was represented by his overture to "Genoveva," one of his less known works, but of which the overture is decidedly the bast part, being crowded with musical themes well worked out. The tone poem, "Don Juan," by Richard Strauss, which is full of fine melody, was given with appreciation of the writer's intent. The shading was delicate in the extreme, the whole abounding with poetical ideas musically interpreted. Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz" was the closing number of the program. [illegible] work was ably handled and

---

From GAZ[illegible]TE-TIMES
Published at
Date JAN 28 1915

t Performance Boston Symphony

Dr. Muck's Orchestra Gives Triumphant Close to Ellis Series.

By GLENDINNING KEEBLE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, gave a triumphant close to the Ellis series of concerts in Carnegie Music Hall last night. The incomprehensible feature of the occasion was that there were empty seats in the orchestra circle—few perhaps, but by that much too many. This orchestra is beyond question the most valuable musical institution in America, and the program, without being exacting, was fully worthy of it; so that the only conceivable explanation of those empty chairs is the fact that a year ago its program was universally disappointing. When it returns next year, however, there can be no such trouble. The audience last night was stirred to a rare degree of enthusiasm, and enthusiasm is splendidly communicative.

The composers represented on the program were Beethoven, Schumann, Richard Strauss and Weber. The shorter numbers—the lovely overture Schumann gave to his otherwise ineffective opera "Genoveva" and Weber's brilliant overture to "Der Freischuetz"—need not be spoken of in detail, for they are presumably quite familiar to all. Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan" may not be so common a story, although it was given in this city in recent years by Arthur Nikisch, when he visited us with the London Philharmonic Society. It is a vivid musical version of Lenau's poem, revealed in interesting melody, subtle rhythms and ravishing orchestral color. The technical difficulties it offers are enormous, and with great pride we confess that our own orchestra (for this band established by Mr. Higginson cannot be limited in its scope to a single city, but is necessarily a national institution), gave a better performance than England's most famous orchestra. The balance of tone and clarity of color were marvelous.

As for the "Eroica Symphony"—the one in E-flat, the third of Beethoven's immortal nine—who can attempt to praise it? The Strauss tone poem shows that in some ways the art of music has broadened its resources in the century and more which have passed since the "Eroica" was first performed; but Beethoven himself is the only composer who has surpassed it in symphonic writing, and even Beethoven surpassed it very seldom. It remains one of the conspicuous achievements of a genius who was as many sided as he was exalted, a masterpiece of supreme beauty and depth of thought, in which a vigorous dignity is not incompatible with a sublime tenderness.

The conductor who interprets such work and the orchestra which plays it share in an almost priestly function, which Dr. Muck and the Boston Orchestra seemed to realize. It has been a recent fashion for conductors to intrude their own personalities in strained and exaggerated readings. Dr. Muck recognizes that his greatest glory is in identifying himself as closely as possible with the spirit of Beethoven, and the "Eroica" was throughout treated with a reverence as rare as it is admirable, and the orchestra responded with complete sympathy and flexibility.

After acknowledging this much, there can be little to say specifically about last night's performance. It was inevitable that there should be slight technical slips, with so exacting a program and with so large a body of even the best players; but the emotional and mental tension rarely relaxed enough to give one opportunity for recognizing them. We do not attempt to give a description of the superlative excellence that was demonstrated, yet we may say that for brilliant sonority of tone, for infinite gradation of color and shading, for splendid unanimity of high musicianship, the Boston Symphony Orchestra could not imaginably be surpassed.

Newspaper Cutting

From
Address [illegible]idence, R. I.
Date FEB 3 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES 4TH CONCERT HERE

Frieda Hempel, Metropolitan Grand Opera Soprano, is Soloist in Infantry Hall Programme. Entertainment is Somewhat Shorter Than Usual.

With Frieda Hempel, the brilliant coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert of the season last evening in Infantry Hall, which was nearly filled with the customary large and appreciative audience.

As the concert was about to begin announcement was made that owing to the absence of the conductor, Dr. Muck, his place would be taken by the assistant conductor, Mr. Schmidt. It was the first time this season that Dr. Muck has been absent from the conductor's desk at the concerts in this city and some curiosity was felt concerning his substitute.

Mr. Schmidt assumed and carried on his office with dignity, apparently perfectly at home at his task, with which he seemed amply able to cope. Without undue muscular exertion he led the orchestra through the intricacies of the programme, which was arranged in the following order:

Haydn..Symphony in G-major, "The Surprise" (B. & H. No. 6)
- I. Adagio: Vivace assai.
- II. Andante.
- III. Menuetto.
- IV. Allegro di molto.

Mozart..Air, "Martern aller Arten," from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail," Act II., No. 11.
J. S. Bach..Symphony (Shepherds' Music) from the Christmas Oratorio.
Liszt..March of the Three Holy Kings, from the Oratorio, "Christus."
Gounod.."O legere hirondelle," from the Opera "Mireille," Act I.
Weber..Overture to the Opera, "Der Freischuetz."

While the programme was made up of more than the usual number of selections, in point of time, it was rather less instead of more than usual length, and contained no ultra modern compositions to puzzle over. Instead, it was largely of a classical nature, covering a range of a century and a half, and from Bach to Liszt offering as great a diversity in style.

It is a good many years since Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, with which the concert opened, was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but it is perennially fresh, and never fails to impress the listener with Haydn's aim toward perfection in his art. As the themes weave in and out, taken up in turn by the different instruments, one feels his command of melody and harmony, and all the elements of music, and is moved to admiration for the quality of his compositions, so removed from the later influences of noise and novelty.

And yet it was noise and novelty that gave the "surprise" to the symphony, and as the familiar air of the second movement, so gracefully played, and so daintily repeated, was punctuated by the startling drumstroke, a ripple of gentle laughter swept over the audience like a summer breeze. After over a century Haydn still has his little joke on "the ladies."

The menuetto, so like a rustic dance, was as distinctively played, while the full beauty of the first and last movements was well brought out.

Bach's music is not often incorporated into the Symphony programmes here and the beautiful shepherd's music from the Christmas Oratorio was heard with interest. Its simplicity was effectively contrasted with the brilliant intricacy of Liszt's "March of the Three Holy Kings" from the oratorio of "Christus," which followed; and from the standpoint of sentiment the two seemed appropriately connected. It is almost superfluous to state that each in its way was beautifully played, and illustrated the wide range covered by Christmas music.

It was Miss Hempel's first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but the cordiality manifested, alike by orchestra and audience, could have left her no doubt of the feeling she inspired.

As the singer came forward for her first solo she looked very young to be assigned to the task of upholding the best traditions of the art of vocal bravura, but the beauty and range of her voice and the fluency with which she scaled the heights of the florid passages left no doubt that she had a "nimble throat," such as Katharina Cavalieri, to display whose vocal "agility" Mozart wrote the air, "Martern aller Aeten," which Miss Hempel gave with dramatic fervor.

The waltz song of "Mireille," "O legere hirondelle," was aother solo also written to please a soprano who had a desire to shine in florid song, and Miss Hempel gave it with a brilliant daintiness that won her recall after recall, as had her previous number.

The concluding number on the programme, Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz," was a brilliant performance. The overture which is so symmetrical in form embraces practically all the airs in the opera, selections of which have been popular on Symphony programmes here. Most of Weber's overtures have also been played here from time to time by the orchestra, but few more acceptably than that which closed the programme last evening.

The fifth concert in the series will be given on Tuesday evening, March 2, when the soloist will be Anton Witek, the concert master of the organization, who, with Mme. Witek, is still pleasantly remembered for the recital given before The Listeners a few years ago in Churchill House.

A. W. C.

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

Estabı

Word comes from Boston that Dr. Muck, because of "conditions over which he has no control," is obliged to make several changes in the program that was originally announced for the Boston Symphony Concert at the Lyric on February 17. In other words, the Spohr concerto will not be played. Compositions by "The Three B's" will be offered. The symphony will be Brahm's first, the one in C minor. Other numbers on the program will be the "Shepherd's Music" from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" and the same composer's "Double Concerto," for two violins, a work in D minor, the solo violinists being Witek and Noack, the first and second concertmeisters of the orchestra. The concert will close with the third "Lenore" overture by Beethoven.

[169]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address: New York City
Date FEB 7

REVISED 'FAUST' SYMPHONY.

The Boston Sympthony Orchestra played at its concerts in Boston a few weeks ago the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt, using for the first time a version of the work which was revised and changed by Liszt in his last years. When Dr. Muck was in Baireuth in the Summer of 1912, it is explained, he found in looking through the library of Wahnfried, the home of the Wagners, a score of the "Faust" Symphony which bore many changes and additions penciled in the handwriting of the composer. Siegfried Wagner told him that Liszt had made these revisions about 1883, and they had never been published. The score was given to Dr. Muck with permission to perform the revised symphony if he should see fit.

In no way has Liszt changed the thematic contour, nor has he made serious changes in the development or the episodes. The changes, for the most part, affect the orchestration. Thus, early in "Faust," an arioso written originally for a bassoon is given to the bass clarinet, which was not at first in Liszt's table of instruments to be employed. Here and there wind instruments are introduced, reinforced, or for the sake of greater brilliance. The greatest part of the changes is in "Mephistopheles," where the "Vision of Gretchen" is made much more effective. There are excisions throughout the symphony, sometimes only a measure, sometimes more. Dr. Muck is of the opinion that the changes greatly benefit the work.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

rom EVENING SUN
ddress: Baltimore, Md.

te 1915

CHANGES ITS PROGRAM

It has been found necessary to make ertain changes in the program announced for the fourth concert of the oston Symphony Orchestra, which ill be given in the Lyric Theatre Wedesday evening, February 17. The program, as revised, will be devoted to works by those who Von Buelow called the "Three Great B's"—Bach, Beethoven and Brahms.

The symphony, as already announced, will be the great C minor symphony of Brahms. In the second part there will be two pieces by Bach—the lovely Shepherds' music from the "Christmas Oratorio" and the "Double Concerto for Two Violins in D Minor." The final number will be Beethoven's "Leonore III" overture.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 7 - 1915

The performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its next concert in the Academy of Music, Monday evening, February 15, of Spohr's Concerto for quartet of string instruments and orchestra, brings forward four of the most interesting personalities in the membership of the orchestra. The quartet will be played by Anton Witek, the concert master, as first violin; Walter Habenicht, leader of the second violins, as second violin; Emile Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, violoncello. Anton Witek is now in his fifth year as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has proved a most efficient musician and has shown himself in his various appearances as soloist a violin virtuoso of high rank. For 16 years previous to his coming to America he was concert master of the Philarmonic Orchestra of Berlin.

Walther Habenicht, the leader of the second violins, is in the third year of his engagement in Boston. Previous to his coming to America, he was concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra in Kiel, Germany, and sat at the third desk of the first violins in the orchestra at the festival performances in Bayreuth. He was specially engaged to come to America as leader of the second violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Emile Ferir, first viola of the orchestra, has been called by Kreisler and Ysaye the finest viola player in the world. His playing is notable for the extraordinary tone he gets from his instrument. He is a Belgian, a graduate of the Brussels Conservatory, and before coming to America, he was first viola of the Lamoureux and Colonne Orchestras of Paris, and the Queen's Hall Orchestra of London. Heinrich Warnke has been solo 'cellist of the orchestra for 10 years, and is an artist of highest rank.

The other numbers on the program will be the first Symphony in E minor, by Sibelius; the "Der Freischuetz" overture by Weber, and the "Carneval" overture by Dvorak.

* * *

The program given by the Philadelphia

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date FEB 3 1915

CONCERT GAVE KEEN DELIGHT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Ably Assisted by Miss Frieda Hempel as Soloist.

In spite of the bad weather Infantry Hall was well filled last night for the fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme was an especially pleasing one. It was entirely classical in character and yet the selections were light and popular in their nature. All the music for the orchestra was simple and tuneful and the selections by Miss Frieda Hempel, the soloist, were particularly delightful. Miss Hempel is regarded as the best leading coloraturo soprano of the day and naturally she makes a specialty of selections that show her voice to the highest degree in the line of singing, but she does not by any means confine her programme to that class of music but also sings lyric roles with equal ease and excellence. The orchestra and the soloist combined to make the concert one of the most enjoyable that this musical organization has given in this city.

In the enforced absence of Dr. Muck, the conductor, Mr. Schmidt, his assistant, took his place with the baton and filled the position so capably that the absence of Dr. Muck was scarcely to be noticed. He led the orchestra with assurance and an evidence of familiarity with the work and the selections that left little to be desired.

The orchestra opened the concert with the "Surprise Symphony" of Haydn. This is a charming work in the best vein of the noted composer and has always been a favorite during the century and quarter since it was written. It was rendered with full appreciation and the characteristic skill of the Boston musicians and was received with much evidence of enjoyment by the audience. The second orchestral number was a double one, including the "Symphony" or "Shepherds' Music" from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" and the "March of the Three Holy Kings" from Listz's oratorio, "Christus." These are both, as is evident from their titles, of the nature of Christmas music and they gave a fresh tone to the concert for that reason. Both were rendered most acceptably and they furnished an admirable contrast between the two styles of composition, the music of one being quiet, simple and serene, and that of the other brilliant, colorful and pompous.

The final number by the orchestra was Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz." This is a beautiful composition and selections from the opera are always popular and this orchestra plays them in a manner that wins sincere favor.

Miss Hempel is regarded as a worthy successor as a coloraturo soprano to her great predecessors, Patti, Nillsen, Melba and Sembrich, and she is justly entitled to that fame. She is aided in this impression by a prepossessing appearance that wins her audience even before she begins to sing when her voice captures the ear as her personality has caught the eye. There is an exquisite quality to voice and a skill in handling it that is beyond criticism. She has at her command all the points that training and cultivation can give and she uses them faultlessly. But there is much more to her credit than the ability to show the range and elasticity of her vocal powers, for she can also render most effectively and pleasurably songs of the great composers which do not require such exhibitions of vocal agility, but the capacity to give expression to noble music through the medium of a voice naturally sweet and clear and powerful and rendered almost perfect by careful and continued training and development. Her every number, and it might well be said her every note, is a distinct delight and the audience last night was insistent in its applause and demand for her re-appearance.

Her first number was the great aria, "Martern Aller Arten," from Mozart's opera best known by its Italian title, "Il Seraglio." This is a highly dramatic selection and gave wide opportunity for the exhibition of her ability as a coloratura singer. The second number was the vocal waltz from Gounod's opera, "Mireille," a delightful selection which appealed strongly to the audience and won for her full recognition of her remarkable gift of song.

The programme in full and in the order of rendition was as follows:

Haydn......Symphony in G-minor, "The Surprise" (B. & H. No. 6)
  I. Adagio; Vivace assai.
  II. Andante.
  III. Menuetto.
  IV. Allegro di molto.
Mozart—Air, "Martern aller Artern," from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail," Act. II., No. 11.
J. S. Bach—Symphony (Shepherds' Music) from the Christmas Oratorio.
Liszt—March of the Three Holy Kings, from the Oratorio, "Christus."
Gounod—"O legere hirondelle," from the Opera "Mireille," Act 1.
Weber—Overture to the Opera, "Der Freischutz."

THE BUFFALO EXPRESS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck gave last evening in Elmwood Music hall its annual concert in this city, attracting, as usual, a large audience, which welcomed the great conductor and his players demonstratively. Even the non-musical realize something of the musical value of the achievements of this splendid organization, achievements which have brought to it world-wide fame and the genuine admiration of the musicians and the masses alike. The virtues which have raised the orchestra to first rank, the loveliness of strings, woodwind and brasses, the perfection of ensemble, the command of every inflection from a most delicate pianissimo to a crashing fortissimo, the finish of detail and, at the same time, the tracing of the bold outline, these virtues were all present in the performance of last night, and won enthusiastic approval.

Buffalo is being treated to unusual draughts of Brahms this season, and, strange to say, seems to like it. Last month, Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra played the Somber second symphony of Brahms, and last evening Dr. Muck and his men gave their first Buffalo performance of the lighter and more easily comprehensible No. 1, in C minor. This work, with its wealth of melody, its marvelous thematic development, its nobility of musical thought and its originality, for rarely does it suggest anyone but the composer himself, made deep appeal. It was followed with close attention by the audience and each movement was received with spontaneous applause. Through Dr. Muck's beautiful reading, the music carried its message to receptive ears and hearts.

Another novelty on last night's programme was Wagner's A Faust Overture, a tone picture of Goethe's hero, a portrayal in music of a soul weary of life, yet ever forced by his indwelling demon to engage anew in life's endeavors. It is strange that this orchestral writing, which bears in every measure the stamp of Wagner, yet is of great euphony and cnarm, should so rarely be heard. It was played last evening with most beautiful tonal coloring and made no less an instant impression than the symphony.

Wagner's Siegfried Idyl, with its charming warp and woof of themes from the music drama of the Nibelungen trilogy, dotted here and there with the old folksong, Schlaf, Mein Kind, Schlaf' Ein, received beautiful treatment by the various orchestral choirs and the programme was brought to a close by a brilliant performance of Beethoven's Egmont overture. Dr. Muck was rewarded with applause quite overwhelming in its intensity and honors, in which he made his players take their rightful share.

The next concert in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's series will be given on February 16th by Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Mme. van Endert, soprano.

M. M. H.

BUFFALO COURIER.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES BRILLIANT EVENT

Again Justifies Its Reputation of Being Superb Musical Organization—Representative Audience Attends Concert at Music Hall.

WONDERFUL MASSING OF HARMONIES BY DR. MUCK

With each succeeding visit to Buffalo, the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Dr. Muck, conductor, justifies its reputation for being the finest musical organization in America, and this reputation was never more brilliantly sustained than at the concert last evening given in the Elmwood Music hall before a brilliant and representative audience.

The programme arranged by Dr. Muck was one of heroic stature, and the performances were all flawless in precision, elasticity, strength and freshness of rhythm. It was a matter of special delight to many musicians present that Brahm's Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Opus 68, was presented, and Dr. Muck's reading of the noble work glowed with fire and a tensity of emotional grip. Adhering to tradition, making it a scholarly presentation of polished elegance, Dr. Muck demanded something more of his musicians than time-honored acceptance of the composer's ideas, and through the medium of each individual player infused a vital quality that made for a wonderful ensemble effect.

Strongly Dramatic.

The first movement of the symphony is strongly dramatic and moving in style, and at the hands of Dr. Muck was enlivened with such richness of color and massing of harmonies of the various choirs that nothing more perfect in orchestral presentation could be desired. Notably fine was the work of Mr. Witek, the concert-meister. The Andante of the second movement, with its stately measures, the picturesque note of the French horns in the third and the imposing finale of the last movement aroused the audience to expressions of fervent appreciation, Dr. Muck being recalled several times and finally insisting that the members of his orchestra rise and share in the honors.

"A Faust Overture," by Wagner, offered further enjoyment, being brilliantly orchestrated and affording opportunity for displaying the resources of the players.

Dr. Muck's genius once more shone resplendent as a Wagnerian conductor in "A Siegfried Idyl," which was etherealized into fairy-like beauty as delicate as frost-pictures, some wonderful effects being attained by the muted strings, and the clarity of the wood winds.

A fitting finale was the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84, by Beethoven, a dazzling exhibition of virtuosity and technical fluency.

Dr. Muck was recalled at the close of the programme with another warm demonstration of enthusiasm. This was the fourth concert in the series under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith.

---

tion before he leaves Buffalo.

BRILLIANT PERFORMANCE BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

News

Wonderful Playing is Worthy of America's Greatest Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its annual concert in Buffalo last night at Elmwood Music hall under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith. This wonderful band of players, America's greatest artistic organization, presented some of the most notable performances heard in this city for some seasons.

Dr. Muck opened the program with Brahms' C minor symphony. The noble formal outlines of the beginning of this work but prepare the mind for the exalted thought, large conceptions, transfusion of classical form with romantic feeling, perfect harmony of the emotion and its manner of expression, that combine to make Brahms tower immeasurably above all composers after Beethoven. The magnificent playing of the different choirs comprising the Symphony orchestra serve to throw into relief all the various lovely passages, particularly of the first and third movements, where the thematic development of this symphony is so wonderfully voiced, and which is full of the true Brahms spirit.

Wagner's "Faust Overture" was given a notable performance, the intensity and vividness with which Wagner portrayed his dramatic and poetic feeling for Goethe's imperishable creation being interpreted in masterly manner. Of the many fine performances presented here of the "Siegfried" idyl, that heard last night from Dr. Muck stands out above all others. No Pied Piper ever led his captives with more magical art than this wonderful conductor guided his hearers almost breathlessly fascinated through this most poetic of love dreams. The concert closed with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, than with nothing nobler and more impressive was heard throughout the evening.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SUCCESS

Dr. Karl Muck, Eminent Conductor, Draws Large Crowd of Music-Lovers to Elmwood Music Hall.

Times

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, was an attraction sufficiently powerful to draw a large crowd to Elmwood Music Hall last evening. This was the fourth concert in the series under the management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith.

The organization is composed of some of the best performers possible to be obtained who are supplied with very fine instruments and this, combined with the fact that Dr. Muck is one of the most eminent conductors, makes the pre-eminence of the orchestra unquestionable. As a conductor, Dr. Muck is not demonstrative and accomplishes marvelous results with little effort. What might ordinarily be uninteresting becomes under his baton full of meaning and beauty. Of this forceful interpretation the Brahm's Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68 was an example. The compelling rhythm of the first movement, the organ-like tones in the second and the third and fourth movements in which the themes were carried in turn by the strings and woodwinds all combined to make this number an exquisite delight. Dr. Muck was recalled and invited his men to acknowledge the applause with him.

A Faust Overture and A Siegfried Idyll. The former received a thrilling interpretation and the haunting theme of the latter was tossed back and forth from woodwinds to violins in a most fascinating manner.

The full power of the orchestra was brought into requisition in Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's Egmont Op. 84, the final number of the program. At the close of the concert the audience was loath to leave and showed their appreciation by prolonged applause.

The fifth subscription concert will take place Tuesday evening, February 16t, in Elmwood Music Hall with Fritz Kreisler, the famous violinist, and Mme. Elisakbeth van Endert, a lyric soprano, new to Buffalo, as soloists.

SUPERB CONCERT VERY MUCH ENJOYED

Commercial

Annual Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra at Elmwood Music Hall.

The annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, was given at Elmwood Music Hall last evening before a large and enthusiastic audience. This was the fourth in the subscription concert series arranged by Mrs. Mai Davis Smith and without doubt one of the finest concerts given in Buffalo in many seasons.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has long ranked as one of the leading musical organizations in the world and under the capable leadership of Dr. Muck it has won added honors. The rare beauty of the tonal quality, the perfect ensemble and the contrast in colors are a few of the reasons why this orchestra is so popular. All the musicians are in accord with their leader and never are the tones blurred or harsh, even in the utmost forte passages, and such delightful pianissimo playing has seldom been heard here before.

Dr. Muck is not only a great conductor, he is a musician with a soul and he reads his score as if inspired. The most distinctive qualities of his art are rare beauty or tone, superb phrasing and dramatic power of climaxes.

Brahms's symphony in C minor was the opening number on the program last evening. The first movement did not make a great impression, may be this was due to the fact that the audience was not warmed up to the occasion, but the other three movements won much well merited applause. The lovely andante sostenuoto with its serious theme and the allegretto with its three well worked out themes were the most enjoyable movements of the symphony and they were played with a profound conception, artistic technical finish and wealth of color that made them stand out above the rest of the symphony.

A Faust overture by Wagner was heard here for the first time and it made a profound impression. The orchestration is wonderful and the tone picture of Goethe's hero is worthy of the great German master.

The crowning achievement of the concert was the performance of Wagner's A Siegfried Idyl. Dr. Muck is one of the greatest Wagner conductors of the present time and his reading of this number was superb. The various lovely melodies were played with rare beauty by strings, reeds and horns. Beethoven's overture to Egmont was the closing number and it was given a wonderful performance. Dr. Muck and his capable players were loudly applauded after each number.

Fritz Kreisler, the famous violin virtuoso, and Elizabeth Van Endert, soprano, will give the next concert in the series, Tuesday evening, February 16th.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.

Date FEB 3

CONCERT GAY KEEN DELIGHT

Est

Boston Symphony Orches Ably Assisted by Miss Frieda Hempel as Soloist.

In spite of the bad weather Infantry Hall was well filled last night for the fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme was an especially pleasing one. It was entirely classical in character and yet the selections were light and popular in their nature. All the music for the orchestra was simple and tuneful and the selections by Miss Frieda Hempel, the soloist, were particularly delightful. Miss Hempel is regarded as the best leading coloraturo soprano of the day and naturally she makes a specialty of selections that show her voice to the highest degree in the line of singing, but she does not by any means confine her programme to that class of music but also sings lyric roles with equal ease and excellence. The orchestra and the soloist combined to make the concert one of the most enjoyable that this musical organization has given in this city.

In the enforced absence of Dr. Muck, the conductor, Mr. Schmidt, his assistant, took his place with the baton and filled the position so capably that the absence of Dr. Muck was scarcely to be noticed. He led the orchestra with assurance and an evidence of familiarity with the work and the selections that left little to be desired.

The orchestra opened the concert with the "Surprise Symphony" of Haydn. This is a charming work in the best vein of the noted composer and has always been a favorite during the century and quarter since it was written. It was rendered with full appreciation and the characteristic skill of the Boston musicians and was received with much evidence of enjoyment by the audience. The second orchestral number was a double one, including the "Symphony" or "Shepherds' Music" from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" and the "March of the Three Holy Kings" from Liszt's oratorio, "Christus." These are both, as is evident from their titles, of the nature of Christmas music and they gave a fresh tone to the concert for that reason. Both were rendered most acceptably and they furnished an admirable contrast between the two styles of composition, the music of one being quiet, simple and serene, and that of the other brilliant, colorful and pompous.

The final number by the orchestra was Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz." This is a beautiful composition and selections from the opera are always popular and this orchestra plays them in a manner that wins sincere favor.

Miss Hempel is regarded as a worthy successor as a coloraturo soprano to her great predecessors, Patti, Nillsen, Melba and Sembrich, and she is justly entitled to that fame. She is aided in this impression by a prepossessing appearance that wins her audience even before she begins to sing when her voice captures the ear as her personality has caught the eye. There is an exquisite quality to voice and a skill in handling it that is beyond criticism. She has at her command all the points that training and cultivation can give and she uses them faultlessly. But there is much more to her credit than the ability to show the range and elasticity of her vocal powers, for she can also render most effectively and pleasurably songs of the great composers which do not require such exhibitions of vocal agility, but the capacity to give expression to noble music through the medium of a voice naturally sweet and clear and powerful and rendered almost perfect by careful and continued training and development. Her every number, and it might well be said her every note, is a distinct delight and the audience last night was insistent in its applause and demand for her re-appearance.

Her first number was the great aria, "Martern Aller Arten," from Mozart's opera best known by its Italian title, "Il Seraglio." This is a highly dramatic selection and gave wide opportunity for the exhibition of her ability as a coloraturo singer. The second number was the vocal waltz from Gounod's opera, "Miteille," a delightful selection which appealed strongly to the audience and won for her full recognition of her remarkable gift of song.

The programme in full and in the order of rendition was as follows:

Haydn......Symphony in G-minor, "The Surprise" (B. & H. No. 6)
  I. Adagio: Vivace assai.
  II. Andante.
  III. Menuetto.
  IV. Allegro di molto.
Mozart—Air, "Martern aller Artern," from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail," Act. II., No. 11.
J. S. Bach—Symphony (Shepherds' Music) from the Christmas Oratorio.
Liszt—March of the Three Holy Kings, from the Oratorio, "Christus."
Gounod—"O legere hirondelle," from the Opera "Mireille," Act 1.
Weber—Overture to the Opera, "Der Freischutz."

HE BUFFALO EXPRESS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck gave last evening in Elmwood Music hall its annual concert in this city, attracting, as usual, a large audience, which welcomed the great conductor and his players demonstratively. Even the non-musical realize something of the musical value of the achievements of this splendid organization, achievements which have brought to it world-wide fame and the genuine admiration of the musicians and the masses alike. The virtues which have raised the orchestra to first rank, the loveliness of strings, woodwind and brasses, the perfection of ensemble, the command of every inflection from a most delicate pianissimo to a crashing fortissimo, the finish of detail and, at the same time, the tracing of the bold outline, these virtues were all present in the performance of last night, and won enthusiastic approval.

Buffalo is being treated to unusual draughts of Brahms this season, and, strange to say, seems to like it. Last month, Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra played the Somber second symphony of Brahms, and last evening Dr. Muck and his men gave their first Buffalo performance of the lighter and more easily comprehensible No. 1, in C minor. This work, with its wealth of melody, its marvelous thematic development, its nobility of musical thought and its originality, for rarely does it suggest anyone but the composer himself, made deep appeal. It was followed with close attention by the audience and each movement was received with spontaneous applause. Through Dr. Muck's beautiful reading, the music carried its message to receptive ears and hearts.

Another novelty on last night's programme was Wagner's A Faust Overture, a tone picture of Goethe's hero, a portrayal in music of a soul weary of life, yet ever forced by his indwelling demon to engage anew in life's endeavors. It is strange that this orchestral writing, which bears in every measure the stamp of Wagner, yet is of great euphony and cnarm, should so rarely be heard. It was played last evening with most beautiful tonal coloring and made no less an instant impression than the symphony.

Wagner's Siegfried Idyl, with its charming warp and woof of themes from the music drama of the Nibelungen trilogy, dotted here and there with the old folksong, Schlaf, Mein Kind, Schlaf' Ein, received beautiful treatment by the various orchestral choirs and the programme was brought to a close by a brilliant performance of Beethoven's Egmont overture. Dr. Muck was rewarded with applause quite overwhelming in its intensity and honors, in which he made his players take their rightful share.

The next concert in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's series will be given on February 16th, by Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Mme. van Endert, soprano.

M. M. H.

BUFFALO COURIER.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES BRILLIANT EVENT

Again Justifies Its Reputation of Being Superb Musical Organization—Representative Audience Attends Concert at Music Hall.

WONDERFUL MASSING OF HARMONIES BY DR. MUCK

With each succeeding visit to Buffalo, the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Dr. Muck, conductor, justifies its reputation for being the finest musical organization in America, and this reputation was never more brilliantly sustained than at the concert last evening given in the Elmwood Music hall before a brilliant and representative audience.

The programme arranged by Dr. Muck was one of heroic stature, and the performances were all flawless in precision, elasticity, strength and freshness of rhythm. It was a matter of special delight to many musicians present that Brahm's Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Opus 68, was presented, and Dr. Muck's reading of the noble work glowed with fire and a tensity of emotional grip. Adhering to tradition, making it a scholarly presentation of polished elegance, Dr. Muck also demanded something more of his musicians than time-honored acceptance of the composer's ideas, and through the medium of each individual player infused a vital quality that made for a wonderful ensemble effect.

Strongly Dramatic.

The first movement of the symphony is strongly dramatic and moving in style, and at the hands of Dr. Muck was enlivened with such richness of color and massing of harmonies of the various choirs that nothing more perfect in orchestral presentation could be desired. Notably fine was the work of Mr. Witek, the concert-meister. The Andante of the second movement, with its stately measures, the picturesque note of the French horns in the third and the imposing finale of the last movement aroused the audience to expressions of fervent appreciation, Dr. Muck being recalled several times and finally insisting that the members of his orchestra rise and share in the honors.

"A Faust Overture," by Wagner, offered further enjoyment, being brilliantly orchestrated and affording opportunity for displaying the resources of the players.

Dr. Muck's genius once more shone resplendent as a Wagnerian conductor in "A Siegfried Idyl," which was etherealized into fairy-like beauty as delicate as frost-pictures, some wonderful effects being attained by the muted strings, and the clarity of the wood winds.

A fitting finale was the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84, by Beethoven, a dazzling exhibition of virtuosity and technical fluency.

Dr. Muck was recalled at the close of the programme with another warm demonstration of enthusiasm. This was the fourth concert in the series under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith.

BRILLIANT PERFORMANCE BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

News

Wonderful Playing is Worthy of America's Greatest Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its annual concert in Buffalo last night at Elmwood Music hall under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith. This wonderful band of players, America's greatest artistic organization, presented some of the most notable performances heard in this city for some seasons.

Dr. Muck opened the program with Brahms' C minor symphony. The noble formal outlines of the beginning of this work but prepare the mind for the exalted thought, large conceptions, transfusion of classical form with romantic feeling, perfect harmony of the emotion and its manner of expression, that combine to make Brahms tower immeasurably above all composers after Beethoven. The magnificent playing of the different choirs comprising the Symphony orchestra serve to throw into relief all the various lovely passages, particularly of the first and third movements, where the thematic development of this symphony is so wonderfully voiced, and which is full of the true Brahms spirit.

Wagner's "Faust Overture" was given a notable performance, the intensity and vividness with which Wagner portrayed his dramatic and poetic feeling for Goethe's imperishable creation being interpreted in masterly manner. Of the many fine performances presented here of the "Siegfried" idyl, that heard last night from Dr. Muck stands out above all others. No Pied Piper ever led his captives with more magical art than this wonderful conductor guided his hearers almost breathlessly fascinated through this most poetic of love dreams. The concert closed with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, than with nothing nobler and more impressive was heard throughout the evening.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SUCCESS

Dr. Karl Muck, Eminent Conductor, Draws Large Crowd of Music-Lovers to Elmwood Music Hall.

Times

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, was an attraction sufficiently powerful to draw a large crowd to Elmwood Music Hall last evening. This was the fourth concert in the series under the management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith.

The organization is composed of some of the best performers possible to be obtained who are supplied with very fine instruments and this, combined with the fact that Dr. Muck is one of the most eminent conductors, makes the pre-eminence of the orchestra unquestionable. As a conductor, Dr. Muck is not demonstrative and accomplishes marvelous results with little effort. What might ordinarily be uninteresting becomes under his baton full of meaning and beauty. Of this forceful interpretation the Brahm's Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68 was an example. The compelling rhythm of the first movement, the organ-like tones in the second and the third and fourth movements in which the themes were carried in turn by the strings and woodwinds all combined to make this number an exquisite delight. Dr. Muck was recalled and invited his men to acknowledge the applause with him.

Two Wagner numbers followed this: A Faust Overture and A Siegfried Idyll. The former received a thrilling interpretation and the haunting theme of the latter was tossed back and forth from woodwinds to violins in a most fascinating manner.

The full power of the orchestra was brought into requisition in Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's Egmont Op. 84, the final number of the program. At the close of the concert the audience was loath to leave and showed their appreciation by prolonged applause.

The fifth subscription concert will take place Tuesday evening, February 16t, in Elmwood Music Hall with Fritz Kreisler, the famous violinist, and Mme. Elisakbeth van Endert, a lyric soprano, new to Buffalo, as soloists.

SUPERB CONCERT VERY MUCH ENJOYED

Commercial

Annual Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra at Elmwood Music Hall.

The annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, was given at Elmwood Music Hall last evening before a large and enthusiastic audience. This was the fourth in the subscription concert series arranged by Mrs. Mai Davis Smith and without doubt one of the finest concerts given in Buffalo in many seasons.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has long ranked as one of the leading musical organizations in the world and under the capable leadership of Dr. Muck it has won added honors. The rare beauty of the tonal quality, the perfect ensemble and the contrast in colors are a few of the reasons why this orchestra is so popular. All the musicians are in accord with their leader and never are the tones blurred or harsh, even in the utmost forte passages, and such delightful pianissimo playing has seldom been heard here before.

Dr. Muck is not only a great conductor, he is a musician with a soul and he reads his score as if inspired. The most distinctive qualities of his art are rare beauty or tone, superb phrasing and dramatic power of climaxes.

Brahms's symphony in C minor was the opening number on the program last evening. The first movement did not make a great impression, may be this was due to the fact that the audience was not warmed up to the occasion, but the other three movements won much well merited applause. The lovely andante sostenuoto with its serious theme and the allegretto with its three well worked out themes were the most enjoyable movements of the symphony and they were played with a profound conception, artistic technical finish and wealth of color that made them stand out above the rest of the symphony.

A Faust overture by Wagner was heard here for the first time and it made a profound impression. The orchestration is wonderful and the tone picture of Goethe's hero is worthy of the great German master.

The crowning achievement of the concert was the performance of Wagner's A Siegfried Idyl. Dr. Muck is one of the greatest Wagner conductors of the present time and his reading of this number was superb. The various lovely melodies were played with rare beauty by strings, reeds and horns. Beethoven's overture to Egmont was the closing number and it was given a wonderful performance. Dr. Muck and his capable players were loudly applauded after each number.

Fritz Kreisler, the famous violin virtuoso, and Elizabeth Van Endert, soprano, will give the next concert in the series, Tuesday evening, February 16th.

Rochester
Union & Advertiser
Jan 26 15

CONVENTION HALL.

The fourth and last Ellis concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening, at Convention Hall, and afforded all lovers of instrumental music a rare treat. This orchestra, one of the very greatest organizations of its kind, is composed of performers of the first rank and was greeted by a large and enthusiastic audience. Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, is one of the most interesting directors of the day. He is dignified and void of all unnecessary mannerisms and conveys instantly to his associates the effects that he wishes to obtain. The Beethoven Symphony No. 3, in E flat Major, when first composed called the "Bonaparte," but after the Little Corporal made himself Emperor renamed "Sinphonia Eroica," is a work of great length and if not performed by a first rate orchestra is at times very boresome. It was the first number on the programme last evening and every phrase showed careful training and thorough musical understanding and was greatly enjoyed. The first movement with its two themes was delightful and the second movement "Marcia Funebre; Adagio Assai," is most appealing and will linger long in the memory of those who were fortunate to hear it. It will suffice to say that the "Scherzo: Allego Vivace; Trio" and the "Finale: Allego Molto" was played as only an organization of its kind is capable of doing. The symphony is a great work and would take many paragraphs to describe its many great qualities. Schumann's overture, "Geneoveva," from the opera was played with keen poet insight. A tone poem, "Don Juan," by Richard Strauss, a very boisterous work, was one of the most interesting numbers on the programme. Although boisterous it was in several instances very weird and then again startling. The overture of "Euryanthe," a grand heroic-romantic opera, composed by Maria von Weber, was the last number on the programme. It is a melodious work and gives especially the strings several good opportunities for the display of many technical feats. The concert was under the local management of James E. Furlong, who announces the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, with Julia Culp, soprano soloist, at Convention Hall, February 18th.

Rochester
Post Express
Jan 26/15

Music and

CONVENTION HALL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always a musical event of the first order, but it is sometimes just a little less enjoyable than it might be because of the somewhat hackneyed selection of a part of the orchestra's touring programme. Last night's concert was a pleasant contrast; the symphony was Beethoven's great Eroica, and the three other numbers were none of them commonplace or over-familiar. Schumann's Genoveva Overture, Strauss's Don Juan, and Weber's Euryanthe Overture are all works of great charm, and offer a sufficient variety of musical styles to make an evening of unalloyed delight. The large audience gave every evidence of keen appreciation both of the music and of the genius of the conductor.

Dr. Karl Muck is a worthy successor to such men as Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur. He stands to-day at the head of an organization which has probably no equal in this country and few in the world. It is a wonderful story, as told by Mr. Howe in his recent history of the orchestra, how the munificence and splendid public spirit and musical culture of a Boston millionaire have during the past third of a century built up a collection of artists into a great artistic whole. Dr. Muck's manner on the platform is very quiet, with none of the wild gesticulation and restlessness often seen. He has his men under absolute control, drawing from them effects so sudden, so delicate, as to be almost marvelous. So far as could be discerned, his interpretation of the symphony has no personal mannerisms or novelties. Perhaps he lays more stress than some leaders on sforzando effects, the sudden changes in the volume of tone which add so much to the phrasing of the older music. In the Strauss number, Dr. Muck seemed particularly in his element, leading his men up to the heavy climaxes with a most masterly hand.

After all, it is the players that make the orchestra; a perfect conductor can do nothing without an organization made up of men who are all masters in their own field. Such string tone as was heard in the funeral march of the symphony, such clarinet playing as marked the [illegible] overture, such as sang both in the trio of the symphony and in the closing number—these are the things no ordinary orchestra can ever hope to attain. All one can do is to listen and admire. The Boston orchestra seems to be growing better all the time, whether because of adding to its ranks new players of greater merit, or more probably because of a mellowing and seasoning process like that of an old violin. May the time never come when it will have to lower its standard or commercialize its system because of any lessening of that endowment which has made it what it is.

The programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 3. in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55..........Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.
Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81..Schumann
Tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20.......Richard Strauss
Overture to "Euryanthe"............Weber

Rochester Times
Herald. Jan 26/15

ORCHESTRA IN STRONG CONCERT

Boston Organization Gives Rare Pleasure to Large Audience.

PLAYS BEETHOVEN SYMPHONY

Famous Musical Body, under Direction of Dr. Karl Muck, Offers Impressive Programme.

Although most of its members, including its renowned conductor, hail from foreign countries, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is truly an American organization, both in training and in tradition, and one of the few that has succeeded in upholding the orchestra standard of this country on a par with that of other nations. In the concert that the orchestra gave before an extremely large audience in Convention Hall last evening, opportunity was given once more to observe just how high that standard is, just how near to perfect orchestral expression it has come.

Every member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a true artist, technically proficient and familiar with all the best traditions of his art. Their concerted playing gives forth not merely an ample volume of melody, but a full, rich, luscious quality, charged with sincere emotional appreciation that satisfies both the musical sense and the imagination of the hearer. Under the baton of Dr. Karl Muck, the players become one, strings, reeds and brasses become fused into an harmonious unit, obedient to the slightest will of the directing mind. Its playing gives no suggestion of a mere musical machine, and that, in the last analysis, is the most vital test of perfect orchestral work, for it signifies that the minds of leader and players are actually en rapport, not merely their hands.

The orchestra gave first an inspiring performance of Beethoven's third or "Eroica" symphony, the first of the composer's great works that was entirely his own. History says that the symphony was intended first to typify the heroic life of Napoleon, but before its completion Beethoven, disgusted with the Corsican's selfish assumption of power, dedicated it to heroism in general. The vigor and vitality that marks the symphony, its suggestion of the turmoil of conflicting forces and finally the triumph of indomitable heroism, give it a particular interest to-day. It was played with perfect understanding of its meaning and the purpose of the composer. As in all great symphonies the strings carried the chief burden throughout the four movements and the color and fluency with which they permeated the work showed the care that has been bestowed in that section of the orchestra. The other elements, however, were no less effective, the brasses particularly showing to impressive advantage in the minor strains of the funeral march of the second movement. The final movement, the allegro molto, was played with considerable fire and virility, in justice to one of the most strongly original passages in Beethoven.

For its second number the orchestra played Schumann's overture to the opera "Genoveva." Schumann was always and essentially a poet and it was with full appreciation of that fact that the overture was played. The charming love theme with which the overture opens was given a delicate reading that was one of the particularly satisfying features of the concert. One modern composer was represented in the concert in Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan." Some room for criticism might have been found in thus choosing a lesser classic in preference to any of the wealth of material to be found in the works of the great masters, but the setting that Strauss has given to Nicholas Lenau's dramatic poem is music of the highest order, impressively orchestrated and filled with dramatic appeal. The orchestra played it with marked power.

The final number was Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," in which the singing tones of the violins were made especially prominent. Strongly effective also was the largo passage, suggestingly vividly the mystic atmosphere in which the opera strongly abounds. Dr. Muck's conducting throughout the concert was, of course, the greatest single reason for the enjoyment it gave. His directing was marked by his accustomed dignity, coupled with power and authority.

The concert was the last in the series of four arranged by C. A. Ellis of Boston and given here under direction of James E. Furlong.

Rochester Times
Jan 26/15

DR. MUCK AND HIS MEN HERE

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays at Convention Hall.

IN NOTABLE CONCERT

All German Program, Including Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony.

That splendid musical institution, The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Carl Muck as its distinguished conductor, paid one of its rare and highly prized visits to Rochester last night at Convention Hall and was heard by a large audience, representative of the city's best musical interests. The concert was the fourth and last in the Ellis series, under the local management of J. E. Furlong. Expressions of appreciation and descriptions of the superlative qualities of this incomparable organization have long since been exhausted and the chronicler of musical events can find only old phrases to record the sensation of aesthetic refreshment aroused by a performance of this magnificent body of musicians. What Kreisler is to the violin, Harold Bauer to the piano, Pablo Casals to the violoncello and Madame Sembrich to the art of singing, the Boston players are to orchestral music. What is there to say concerning the perfection of their performance, their opulence of tone, their absolute technical precision? They are heard with gladness and with that delicious sense of satisfaction that comes in the presence of great art and supreme beauty. The vocabularly of praise, particularly of written praise, is too circumscribed to permit of a reproduction of the mental stimulus, the joy and relaxation that are experienced at such a concert. We can only applaud in happy recognition of the privilege extended to us and cherish it in our gallery of musical memories.

The program, composed entirely of German works, began with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony which Dr. Muck played at the first New York concert of the autumn, after his return from abroad. This symphony, as is well known, Beethoven decicated to Napoleon but revoked the tribute when he realized the ambitions of the Emperor of the French. Its sublime funeral march undoubtedly explains its inclusion on the opening programs of nearly all the orchestras of Germany this season. The exquisite finish of the nuancing, the eloquence of the reading of the conductor, the miraculous unanimity of the orchestra and its superb vigor and elasticity made the performance last night a notable publisher of a musical message. Dr. Muck's interpretation was in every sense an exposition of the composer's thought.

Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," with its wonderful horn-call, one of the loveliest moments in the realm of music, was played as one would expect Dr. Muck's musicians to interpret a creation of one of the most commanding and noble personalities in all German art. Next came Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan," which ranks among this spectacular composer's finest achievements. It hardly need be said that the orchestra gave it with extraordinary virtuosity and brilliancy. The program closed with the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," that truly German opera, whose "romantic realism, conjugal tenderness and chivalry" were brought out with a performance of surpassing beauty which indicated the wisdom of Signor Toscanini who selected it for this season's Metropolitan Opera House list to "bridge the chasm between Beethoven and Wagner," as Mr. Krehbiel put it.

Mr. Furlong announces the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, Josef Stransky, conductor, with Julia Culpas soloist, on the evening of February 18, at Convention Hall.

Democrat & Chronicle
Jan. 26/15

ROCHESTER

CONVENTION HALL.

To speak of the magnificence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of the individual virtuosity of its members, of the collective splendor of their playing, of the superb mass of tone resulting from their combined efforts, of immaculate technic lending itself to the service of the highest musical intelligence, would be to repeat an oft-told tale. In a general way, then, it must suffice to say that the concert at Convention Hall last night was satisfying, inspiring and uplifting. Dr. Mack chose for his opening number Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, known as the "Eroica." This name is given by authority of Beethoven himself. It was bestowed in honor of Napoleon Bonaparte, then known as a champion of freedom and a man of affairs who had been of immense service to the people of France. But when Napoleon took the title of emberor, Beethoven was enraged and tore in two the title page on which the name of the new ruler was inscribed.

But all this is of no special consequence so far as the symphony itself is concerned. It still stands as originally written, and will probably always endure as one of the foremost contributions musical literature. It has also a historical significance, being the fulfillment of Beethoven's declared purpose to "take a new road." He was not satisfied with the formalism of his first two symphonies, and in the third he made an excursion into the field of romanticism so daring that a sensation was created among the musicians of his day. The first movement, after two great chords by the full orchestra, is promptly ushered in by a theme-text of the cimplest possible form. The elaboration immediately begins, and continues in a most dazzling and varied manner. But a description of the symphony would be superfluous, since it is familiar to all concertgoers. It was played here two or three years ago by the same orchestra under Max Fiedler. Dr. Muck's interpretation is warm and elequent. It made a profound impression throughout the four movements, the scherzo being played with wonderful delicacy, daintiness and rhythmic grace, while the final movement, with its variations on two themes, was given with a succession exciting climaxes.

Schumann's romantic "Genoveva" overture had a beautiful rendering. The tone-poem, "Don Juan," by Richard Strauss, afforded a rich feast of the ultra "modern" in music. It was played in a picturesque and dramatic manner, and with a wealth of tonal coloring which would have delighted Strauss himself, since instrumental gorgeousness constitutes the chief melody and suggestions of several others. But the latter are speedily lost in an overpowering pandemonium of shrieks, groans and wails; all of which have a certain interest despite their lack of coherence, or perhaps because of it. At any rate the audience was treated to some new and frenzied sensations, while the orchestra distinguished itself by an amazing display of technic, clearness and winder-work in dynamic embellishment. Weber's splendid "Eurpanthe" overture brought the concert to a brilliant close. Mr. J. E. Furlong, the local manager, announces the New York Philharmonic Society for a date late in February.

CONVENTION HALL.

The fourth and last Ellis concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening, at Convention Hall, and afforded all lovers of instrumental music a rare treat. This orchestra, one of the very greatest organizations of its kind, is composed of performers of the first rank and was greeted by a large and enthusiastic audience. Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, is one of the most interesting directors of the day. He is dignified and void of all unnecessary mannerisms and conveys instantly to his associates the effects that he wishes to obtain. The Beethoven Symphony No. 3, in E flat Major, when first composed called the "Bonaparte," but after the Little Corporal made himself Emperor renamed "Sinphonia Eroica," is a work of great length and if not performed by a first rate orchestra is at times very boresome. It was the first number on the programme last evening and every phrase showed careful training and thorough musical understanding and was greatly enjoyed. The first movement with its two themes was delightful and the second movement "Marcia Funebre; Adagio Assai," is most appealing and will linger long in the memory of those who were fortunate to hear it. It will suffice to say that the "Scherzo: Allego Vivace; Trio" and the "Finale: Allego Molto" was played as only an organization of its kind is capable of doing. The symphony is a great work and would take many paragraphs to describe its many great qualities. Schumann's overture, "Geneoveva," from the opera was played with keen poet insight. A tone poem, "Don Juan," by Richard Strauss, a very boisterous work, was one of the most interesting numbers on the programme. Although boisterous it was in several instances very weird and then again startling. The overture of "Euryanthe," a grand heroic-romantic opera, composed by Maria von Weber, was the last number on the programme. It is a melodious work and gives especially the strings several good opportunities for the display of many technical feats. The concert was under the local management of James E. Furlong, who announces the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, with Julia Culp, soprano soloist, at Convention Hall, February 18th.

Rochester
Post Express
Jan 26

Music and

CONVENTION HALL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always a musical event of the first order, but it is sometimes just a little less enjoyable than it might be because of the somewhat hackneyed selection of a part of the orchestra's touring programme. Last night's concert was a pleasant contrast; the symphony was Beethoven's great Eroica, and the three other numbers were none of them commonplace or over-familiar. Schumann's Genoveva Overture, Strauss's Don Juan, and Weber's Euryanthe Overture are all works of great charm, and offer a sufficient variety of musical styles to make an evening of unalloyed delight. The large audience gave every evidence of keen appreciation both of the music and of the genius of the conductor.

Dr. Karl Muck is a worthy successor to such men as Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur. He stands to-day at the head of an organization which has probably no equal in this country and few in the world. It is a wonderful story, as told by Mr. Howe in his recent history of the orchestra, how the munificence and splendid public spirit and musical culture of a Boston millionaire have during the past third of a century built up a collection of artists into a great artistic whole. Dr. Muck's manner on the platform is very quiet, with none of the wild gesticulation and restlessness often seen. He has his men under absolute control, drawing from them effects so sudden, so delicate, as to be almost marvelous. So far as could be discerned, his interpretation of the symphony has no personal mannerisms or novelties. Perhaps he lays more stress than some leaders on sforzando effects, the sudden changes in the volume of tone which add so much to the phrasing of the older music. In the Strauss number, Dr. Muck seemed particularly in his element, leading his men up to the heavy climaxes with a most masterly hand.

After all, it is the players that make the orchestra; a perfect conductor can do nothing without an organization made up of men who are all masters in their own field. Such string tone as was heard in the funeral march of the symphony, such clarinet playing as marked the Strauss overture, such …as sang both in the trio of the symphony and in the closing number—these are the things no ordinary orchestra can ever hope to attain. All one can do is to listen and admire. The Boston orchestra seems to be growing better all the time, whether because of adding to its ranks new players of greater merit, or more probably because of a mellowing and seasoning process like that of an old violin. May the time never come when it will have to lower its standard or commercialize its system because of any lessening of that endowment which has made it what it is.

The programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55..........Beethoven
- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
- III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio.
- IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81..Schumann
Tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20.......Richard Strauss
Overture to "Euryanthe"............Weber

10

ORCHESTRA IN STRONG CONCERT

Boston Organization Gives Rare Pleasure to Large Audience.

PLAYS BEETHOVEN SYMPHONY

Famous Musical Body, under Direction of Dr. Karl Muck, Offers Impressive Programme.

Although most of its members, including its renowned conductor, hail from foreign countries, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is truly an American organization, both in training and in tradition, and one of the few that has succeeded in upholding the orchestra standard of this country on a par with that of other nations. In the concert that the orchestra gave before an extremely large audience in Convention Hall last evening, opportunity was given once more to observe just how high that standard is, just how near to perfect orchestral expression it has come.

Every member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a true artist, technically proficient and familiar with all the best traditions of his art. Their concerted playing gives forth not merely an ample volume of melody, but a full, rich, luscious quality, charged with sincere emotional appreciation that satisfies both the musical sense and the imagination of the hearer. Under the baton of Dr. Karl Muck, the players become one, strings, reeds and brasses become fused into an harmonious unit, obedient to the slightest will of the directing mind. Its playing gives no suggestion of a mere musical machine, and that, in the last analysis, is the most vital test of perfect orchestral work, for it signifies that the minds of leader and players are actually en rapport, not merely their hands.

The orchestra gave first an inspiring performance of Beethoven's third or "Eroica" symphony, the first of the composer's great works that was entirely his own. History says that the symphony was intended first to typify the heroic life of Napoleon, but before its completion Beethoven, disgusted with the Corsican's selfish assumption of power, dedicated it to heroism in general. The vigor and vitality that marks the symphony, its suggestion of the turmoil of conflicting forces and finally the triumph of indomitable heroism, give it a particular interest to-day. It was played with perfect understanding of its meaning and the purpose of the composer. As in all great symphonies the strings carried the chief burden throughout the four movements and the color and fluency with which they permeated the work showed the care that has been bestowed in that section of the orchestra. The other elements, however, were no less effective, the brasses particularly showing to impressive advantage in the minor strains of the funeral march of the second movement. The final movement, the allegro molto, was played with considerable fire and virility, in justice to one of the most strongly original passages in Beethoven.

For its second number the orchestra played Schumann's overture to the opera "Genoveva." Schumann was always and essentially a poet and it was with full appreciation of that fact that the overture was played. The charming love theme with which the overture opens was given a delicate reading that was one of the particularly satisfying features of the concert. One modern composer was represented in the concert in Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan." Some room for criticism might have been found in thus choosing a lesser classic in preference to any of the wealth of material to be found in the works of the great masters, but the setting that Strauss has given to Nicholas Lenau's dramatic poem is music of the highest order, impressively orchestrated and filled with dramatic appeal. The orchestra played it with marked power.

The final number was Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," in which the singing tones of the violins were made especially prominent. Strongly effective also was the largo passage, suggestingly vividly the mystic atmosphere in which the opera strongly abounds. Dr. Muck's conducting throughout the concert was, of course, the greatest single reason for the enjoyment it gave. His directing was marked by his accustomed dignity, coupled with power and authority.

The concert was the last in the series of four arranged by C. A. Ellis of Boston and given here under direction of James E. Furlong.

DR. MUCK AND HIS MEN HERE

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays at Convention Hall.

IN NOTABLE CONCERT

All German Program, Including Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony.

That splendid musical institution, The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Carl Muck as its distinguished conductor, paid one of its rare and highly prized visits to Rochester last night at Convention Hall and was heard by a large audience, representative of the city's best musical interests. The concert was the fourth and last in the Ellis series, under the local management of J. E. Furlong. Expressions of appreciation and descriptions of the superlative qualities of this incomparable organization have long since been exhausted and the chronicler of musical events can find only old phrases to record the sensation of aesthetic refreshment aroused by a performance of this magnificent body of musicians. What Kreisler is to the violin, Harold Bauer to the piano, Pablo Casals to the violoncello and Madame Sembrich to the art of singing, the Boston players are to orchestral music. What is there to say concerning the perfection of their performance, their opulence of tone, their absolute technical precision? They are heard with gladness and with that delicious sense of satisfaction that comes in the presence of great art and supreme beauty. The vocabularly of praise, particularly of written praise, is too circumscribed to permit of a reproduction of the mental stimulus, the joy and relaxation that are experienced at such a concert. We can only applaud in happy recognition of the privilege extended to us and cherish it in our gallery of musical memories.

The program, composed entirely of German works, began with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony which Dr. Muck played at the first New York concert of the autumn, after his return from abroad. This symphony, as is well known, Beethoven decicated to Napoleon but revoked the tribute when he realized the ambitions of the Emperor of the French. Its sublime funeral march undoubtedly explains its inclusion on the opening programs of nearly all the orchestras of Germany this season. The exquisite finish of the nuancing, the eloquence of the reading of the conductor, the miraculous unanimity of the orchestra and its superb vigor and elasticity made the performance last night a notable publisher of a musical message. Dr. Muck's interpretation was in every sense an exposition of the composer's thought.

Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," with its wonderful horn-call, one of the loveliest moments in the realm of music, was played as one would expect Dr. Muck's musicians to interpret a creation of one of the most commanding and noble personalities in all German art. Next came Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan," which ranks among this spectacular composer's finest achievements. It hardly need be said that the orchestra gave it with extraordinary virtuosity and brilliancy. The program closed with the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," that truly German opera, whose "romantic realism, conjugal tenderness and chivalry" were brought out with a performance of surpassing beauty which indicated the wisdom of Signor Toscanini who selected it for this season's Metropolitan Opera House list to "bridge the chasm between Beethoven and Wagner," as Mr. Krehbiel put it.

Mr. Furlong announces the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, Josef Stransky, conductor, with Julia Culpas soloist, on the evening of February 18, at Convention Hall.

ROCHESTER

CONVENTION HALL.

To speak of the magnificence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of the individual virtuosity of its members, of the collective splendor of their playing, of the superb mass of tone resulting from their combined efforts, of immaculate technic lending itself to the service of the highest musical intelligence, would be to repeat an oft-told tale. In a general way, then, it must suffice to say that the concert at Convention Hall last night was satisfying, inspiring and uplifting. Dr. Mack chose for his opening number Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, known as the "Eroica." This name is given by authority of Beethoven himself. It was bestowed in honor of Napoleon Bonaparte, then known as a champion of freedom and a man of affairs who had been of immense service to the people of France. But when Napoleon took the title of emberor, Beethoven was enraged and tore in two the title page on which the name of the new ruler was inscribed.

But all this is of no special consequence so far as the symphony itself is concerned. It still stands as originally written, and will probably always endure as one of the foremost contributions musical literature. It has also a historical significance, being the fulfillment of Beethoven's declared purpose to "take a new road." He was not satisfied with the formalism of his first two symphonies, and in the third he made an excursion into the field of romanticism so daring that a sensation was created among the musicians of his day. The first movement, after two great chords by the full orchestra, is promptly ushered in by a theme-text of the cimplest possible form. The elaboration immediately begins, and continues in a most dazzling and varied manner. But a description of the symphony would be superfluous, since it is familiar to all concert-goers. It was played here two or three years ago by the same orchestra under Max Fiedler. Dr. Muck's interpretation is warm and elequent. It made a profound impression throughout the four movements, the scherzo being played with wonderful delicacy, daintiness and rhythmic grace, while the final movement, with its variations on two themes, was given with a succession exciting climaxes.

Schumann's romantic "Genoveva" overture had a beautiful rendering. The tone-poem, "Don Juan," by Richard Strauss, afforded a rich feast of the ultra "modern" in music. It was played in a picturesque and dramatic manner, and with a wealth of tonal coloring which would have delighted Strauss himself, since instrumental gorgeousness constitutes the chief melody and suggestions of several others. But the latter are speedily lost in an overpowering pandemonium of shrieks, groans and wails; all of which have a certain interest despite their lack of coherence, or perhaps because of it. At any rate the audience was treated to some new and frenzied sensations, while the orchestra distinguished itself by an amazing display of technic, clearness and winder-work in dynamic embellishment. Weber's splendid "Eurpanthe" overture brought the concert to a brilliant close. Mr. J. E. Furlong, the local manager, announces the New York Philharmonic Society for a date late in February.

Enquirer

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

An unusually large audience was attracted to the Elmwood Music hall last evening, the occasion being the annual concert in Buffalo of the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of the famous Dr. Karl Muck. Never before was the musical ability of this organization better demonstrated than last evening, and the appreciation of the large audience was manifest with a whole-heartedness that was good to see. In the brilliant crowd that attended last night's concert there were few who were not capable of understanding the higher order of things musical. It was a most critical audience, and the fact that every number rendered by the orchestra was given a stirring, impulsive recognition, is a tribute not to be overlooked.

When one hears this wonderful organization of musical artists it is easy to comprehend why it has risen to the ranks of fame as perhaps the greatest orchestra in America. All those qualities of perfection, which have been reached only through years of hard labor, consistent effort and untiring eradication of all that did not come up to the highest ideals of the master artist, were present last evening. The mellow wood winds, the loveliness of the strings, the true, ringing, yet muffled tender, tone of the brasses—not one detail was lacking to mar the stamp of perfection.

An excellent programme was offered last evening. Brahms' No. 1 in C minor was one of the features of the entertainment. This number appealed deeply to the soul of the artist through the masterful interpretation of the musicians.

Nothing short of absolute individual perfection of each player could produce the wonderful result reached by the orchestra in this number. Wagner's "A Faust Overture," a tone picture of Goethe's hero, was another number that aroused unusual sentiment. Both of these pieces are rich in melody and dramatic development. Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" also was a wonderfully beautiful piece of work. The programme was brought to a close with a brilliant performance of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

The next concert in the series given by Mai Davis Smith will take place on February 16. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Mme. van Endert, soprano, will be the stars.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City

Date FEB 7 - 1915

BOSTON TO SEND ORCHESTRA WEST

For First Time Famous Symphony Aggregation Will Be Heard on Pacific Coast.

WILL MAKE START IN MAY

Agreement With Panama-Pacific Exposition Prohibits Concerts on the Way.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Feb. 6.

For the first time in its thirty-four years of existence the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be heard next May on the Pacific Coast. Several weeks ago the management of the Panama-Pacific Exposition at San Francisco proposed to Maj. Henry L. Higginson that the orchestra should undertake twelve concerts at the fair in May. Although no contracts have yet been signed the management has decided to authorize the trip.

The Boston concerts will end May 8, and immediately thereafter the band, with full ranks and with Dr. Muck at its head, will leave for San Francisco. There will be no stops for concerts, either going or coming; in fact, the proposal from the fair management stipulates that there shall be no other performances. At San Francisco the concerts will take place at Festival Hall at the exhibition grounds. They will be given on twelve consecutive days and the programme will include classical, modern and ultra-modern music.

The Boston "pops" will be deferred until Monday, May 31, and the usual eight or nine weeks will be cut to four or five. The last appearance of the Symphony players at a fair was at Chicago in 1893, when Mr. Kneisel was conductor.

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date FEB 3 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FOURTH CONCERT

Large Audience Gathers at Infantry Hall for Event.

FRIEDA HEMPEL IS SOLOIST

Assistant Conductor, Mr. Schmidt, Occupies Leader's Desk in Absence of Dr. Muck.—Programme Somewhat Shorter Than Usual, but Mostly of Classical Nature.

With Frieda Hempel, the brilliant coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert of the season last evening in Infantry Hall, which was nearly filled with the customary large and appreciative audience.

As the concert was about to begin announcement was made that owing to the absence of the conductor, Dr. Muck, his place would be taken by the assistant conductor, Mr. Schmidt. It was the first time this season that Dr. Muck has been absent from the conductor's desk at the concerts in this city and some curiosity was felt concerning his substitute.

Mr. Schmidt assumed and carried on his office with dignity, apparently perfectly at home at his task, with which he seemed amply able to cope. Without undue muscular exertion he led the orchestra through the intricacies of the programme, which was arranged in the following order:

Haydn. Symphony in G-major, "The Surprise" (B. & H. No. 6)
  I. Adagio; Vivace assai.
  II. Andante.
  III. Menuetto.
  IV. Allegro di molto.
Mozart. Air, "Martern aller Arten," from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail," Act II., No. 11.
J. S. Bach. Symphony (Shepherds' Music) from the Christmas Oratorio.
Liszt. March of the Three Holy Kings, from the Oratorio, "Christus."
Gounod. "O legere hirondelle," from the Opera "Mireille," Act I.
Weber. Overture to the Opera, "Der Freischuetz."

While the programme was made up of more than the usual number of selections, in point of time, it was rather less instead of more than usual length, and contained no ultra modern compositions to puzzle over. Instead, it was largely of a classical nature, covering a range of a century and a half, and from Bach to Liszt offering as great a diversity in style.

It is a good many years since Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, with which the concert opened, was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but it is perennially fresh, and never fails to impress the listener with Haydn's aim toward perfection in his art. As the themes weave in and out, taken up in turn by the different instruments, one feels his command of melody and harmony, and all the elements of music, and is moved to admiration for the quality of his compositions, so removed from the later influences of noise and novelty.

And yet it was noise and novelty that gave the "surprise" to the symphony, and as the familiar air of the second movement, so gracefully played, and so daintily repeated, was punctuated by the startling drumstroke, a ripple of gentle laughter swept over the audience like a summer breeze. After over a century Haydn still has his little joke on "the ladies."

The menuetto, so like a rustic dance, was as distinctively played, while the full beauty of the first and last movements was well brought out.

Bach's music is not often incorporated into the Symphony programmes here and the beautiful shepherd's music from the Christmas Oratorio was heard with interest. Its simplicity was effectively contrasted with the brilliant intricacy of Liszt's "March of the Three Holy Kings" from the oratorio of "Christus," which followed; and from the standpoint of sentiment the two seemed appropriately connected. It is almost superfluous to state that each in its way was beautifully played, and illustrated the wide range covered by Christmas music.

It was Miss Hempel's first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but the cordiality manifested, alike by orchestra and audience, could have left her no doubt of the feeling she inspired.

As the singer came forward for her first solo she looked very young to be assigned to the task of upholding the best traditions of the art of vocal bravura, but the beauty and range of her voice and the fluency with which she scaled the heights of the florid passages left no doubt that she had a "nimble throat," such as Katharina Cavalieri, to display whose vocal "agility" Mozart wrote the air, "Martern aller Aeten," which Miss Hempel gave with dramatic fervor.

The waltz song of "Mireille," "O legere hirondelle," was aother solo also written to please a soprano who had a desire to shine in florid song, and Miss Hempel gave it with a brilliant daintiness that won her recall after recall, as had her previous number.

The concluding number on the programme, Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz," was a brilliant performance. The overture which is so symmetrical in form embraces practically all the airs in the opera, selections of which have been popular on Symphony programmes here. Most of Weber's overtures have also been played here from time to time by the orchestra, but few more acceptably than that which closed the programme last evening.

The fifth concert in the series will be given on Tuesday evening, March 2, when the soloist will be Anton Witek, the concert master of the organization, who, with Mme. Witek, is still pleasantly remembered for the recital given before. The

---

Cleveland Town Topics
2/6/15

The Concert by The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The rapidly written review which appears the next morning certainly has a freshness not possible to that in a weekly paper, but compensation comes from the consensus of opinion gathered during the week from those in the audience, and in respect to the concert by the Boston Orchestra there is but one opinion, which is, that the last concert, given on January twenty-ninth, under Doctor Karl Muck, was finer than any remembered concert of our whole Symphony series. Granted that the work of the Boston Orchestra shines with superlative beauty in the classic compositions requiring perfection of finish and polish, such as is only possible to orchestras of long continued existence, there is certainly a tide in the affairs of orchestras, as well as of men, which, taken at its flood, leads on to fortunate performance. Never has the tone produced by the marvelously beautiful instruments of this band sung clearer notes of sweetness and power. One had no thought for the imperfections of brass instruments, or the vagaries of woodwinds, or the effect of atmosphere upon strings, all were at a point of ideal perfection. The artistry of individual players seldom is more keenly felt than when Concertmeister Witek rushed forward into the stirring phrases of ornamentation woven by Brahms about the theme of Haydn's. The program made its own appeal of fine symmetry. The Mozart Symphony in C, known as the one with the fugue finale, the "Jupiter," is of compelling charm; the Weber overture to "Euryanthe" has much spirit, and the Richard Strauss tone-poem, "Don Juan," painted with a wealth of color, only to be compared to the riot of rainbow-tints in a Venetian picture. And what a rest to eyes and sensibilities it is to have a conductor who knows how to stand still.

One admits the unconsciousness of the excitement in which a young, emotional conductor enacts before his audience the passion of highly complex modern music, but there certainly is satisfaction in seeing with one's eyes, and hearing with one's ears, that after all it is a small factor in the public performance, for no coldness was perceptible in the dramatic Strauss music played by the men, while their conductor kept his head, and with quiet gesture controlled the forces working under him. Doubtless, too, Doctor Muck knows his orchestral scores by heart, but he makes no theatrical display of the fact by dispensing with them upon his conductor's desk. Cleveland is glad to unite with the other cities of their tour, in thanks to Boston for according permission to this world-famous orchestra to make its annual visit.

During the past month there has been issued by the Houghton-Mifflin Company a book entitled the "Boston Symphony Orchestra," in which there is a most interesting sketch of its founder, that may well be quoted in this connection. Mr. Higginson entered Harvard at seventeen, and left two years later on account of poor health. For several years he was in business in Boston, but in 1856 went to Europe, where he stayed four years, devoting himself chiefly to the study of music, at Vienna. Writing to his father in regard to his studies, he says: "What is to come of it all if successful? I do not know. But this is clear. I have improved my own powers, which is every man's duty. I have a resource to which I can always turn with delight, however the world may go with me. * * * It is carrying out the idea of making an imperishable capital in education." It is interesting to note that strain due to over-practice with an arm weakened by the old-fashioned operation of bleeding, compelled him to abandon the hope of becoming a pianist. When he returned to Boston about the end of 1860, he had the broad apprehension of what music might mean to an individual and to a community, even to a nation. The outbreak of the war between the states called him into the field, and later into great business operations, which formed the basis of the ample means which enabled him to found and support the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Cleveland Plain Dealer
[illegible]

SYMPHONY CONCERT

he annual Cleveland concert of the ston Symphony orchestra took ce last night at the Grays armory under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. The audience was one of the largest of this season's symphony series. In conformity with the custom of previous years, no soloist appeared.

A distinguished English lady once said to Col. Higginson, founder and financial supporter of the Boston Symphony orchestra, that "life in the United States is hard and dry. Your country is a great cornfield. See that you plant flowers in it."

It was a remark that Col. Higginson never forgot. Partly as a result of this remark and partly of Col. Higginson's own conception of life's philosophy, the Boston Symphony orchestra grew from a small but carefully nursed little flower into the most magnificent orchestral plant on earth.

"How does the Boston Symphony compare with the Philharmonie in Berlin or the Leipzig Gewandhaus orchestra or the other great orchestras of the European capitals of the present day?"

The writer put this question to Dr. Muck last night during the short intermission. Here is Dr. Muck's answer:

"I take it that you mean, of course, before the outbreak of the war. I have conducted not only orchestras of great opera houses, but symphony orchestras as well. I speak positively in stating that the Boston Symphony orchestra has no rivals anywhere in Europe. It is the greatest body of orchestral players in the world today."

It was an entire German program which Dr. Muck presented at the armory last night. The intelligent and discriminating applause of the large audience rose to an ovation after the playing of Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan." The large majority of those present must undoubtedly have considered it a special privilege to listen to this program of Mozart, Weber, Brahms, Strauss and

The magnificent interpretations of the greatest body of orchestral players in the world and the quiet but forceful personality of the man whose dignity of conception of the reading of the different scores of Germany's master minds of music made their understanding illuminative and, proportionally speaking, simple.

The reading of the Mozart "Jupiter" symphony demonstrated that the conductor is sure of himself, of his orchestra of artists and of the results. True, without the help of splendid instruments such wonderfully vibrating and scintillating strings would not be possible.

But the men in whose hands these instruments rest have the training and artistic conception to bring out the hidden beauties of a Mozart symphony in their fullest glory, their "calm, god-like beauty." The tonal effects of the strings were golden.

Throughout the playing of the symphony the precision of the strings possessed the unity and individuality of a string quartet.

Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, in Dr. Muck's hands, became revivified. The time-honored overture which, to use a common phrase, has been "played to death" for half a century, was molded again into a living, breathing thing, full of beauty and full of life. The opening bars of Brahms' "Variations on a Haydn Theme" brought the full resources of the wonderful wind section of the orchestra into magnificent action and the variations themselves the different solo voices in their individual beauty. The enormous technic of the full orchestra came to its fullest display in Strauss' "Don Juan" tone poem. The climaxes were magnificent. The audience fully rose to the occasion and raised the volume of applause to the proportions of an ovation that only ended with the orchestra's rising. Beethoven's "Egmont" overture brought the concert to a fitting close.

Americans are indeed fortunate in possessing such an organization as the Boston Symphony orchestra. More than any other orchestra, with the possible exception of the old

[112]

Enquirer

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

An unusually large audience was attracted to the Elmwood Music hall last evening, the occasion being the annual concert in Buffalo of the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of the famous Dr. Karl Muck. Never before was the musical ability of this organization better demonstrated than last evening, and the appreciation of the large audience was manifest with a whole-heartedness that was good to see. In the brilliant crowd that attended last night's concert there were few who were not capable of understanding the higher order of things musical. It was a most critical audience, and the fact that every number rendered by the orchestra was given a stirring, impulsive recognition, is a tribute not to be overlooked.

When one hears this wonderful organization of musical artists it is easy to comprehend why it has risen to the ranks of fame as perhaps the greatest orchestra in America. All those qualities of perfection, which have been reached only through years of hard labor, consistent effort and untiring eradication of all that did not come up to the highest ideals of the master artist, were present last evening. The mellow wood winds, the loveliness of the strings, the true, ringing, yet muffled tender, tone of the brasses—not one detail was lacking to mar the stamp of perfection.

An excellent programme was offered last evening. Brahms' No. 1 in C minor was one of the features of the entertainment. This number appealed deeply to the soul of the artist through the masterful interpretation of the musicians.

Nothing short of absolute individual perfection of each player could produce the wonderful result reached by the orchestra in this number. Wagner's "A Faust Overture," a tone picture of Goethe's hero, was another number that aroused unusual sentiment. Both of these pieces are rich in melody and dramatic development. Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" also was a wonderfully beautiful piece of work. The programme was brought to a close with a brilliant performance of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

The next concert in the series given by Mai Davis Smith will take place on February 16. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Mme. van Endert, soprano, will be the stars.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City

Date________________________

BOSTON TO SEND ORCHESTRA WEST

For First Time Famous Symphony Aggregation Will Be Heard on Pacific Coast.

WILL MAKE START IN MAY

Agreement With Panama-Pacific Exposition Prohibits Concerts on the Way.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Feb. 6.

For the first time in its thirty-four years of existence the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be heard next May on the Pacific Coast. Several weeks ago the management of the Panama-Pacific Exposition at San Francisco proposed to Maj. Henry L. Higginson that the orchestra should undertake twelve concerts at the fair in May. Although no contracts have yet been signed the management has decided to authorize the trip.

The Boston concerts will end May 8, and immediately thereafter the band, with full ranks and with Dr. Muck at its head, will leave for San Francisco. There will be no stops for concerts, either going or coming; in fact, the proposal from the fair management stipulates that there shall be no other performances. At San Francisco the concerts will take place at Festival Hall at the exhibition grounds. They will be given on twelve consecutive days and the programme will include classical, modern and ultra-modern music.

The Boston "pops" will be deferred until Monday, May 31, and the usual eight or nine weeks will be cut to four or five. The last appearance of the Symphony players at a fair was at Chicago in 1893, when Mr. Kneisel was conductor.

[116]

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date FEB 3 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FOURTH CONCERT

Large Audience Gathers at Infantry Hall for Event.

FRIEDA HEMPEL IS SOLOIST

Assistant Conductor, Mr. Schmidt, Occupies Leader's Desk in Absence of Dr. Muck.—Programme Somewhat Shorter Than Usual, but Mostly of Classical Nature.

With Frieda Hempel, the brilliant coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert of the season last evening in Infantry Hall, which was nearly filled with the customary large and appreciative audience.

As the concert was about to begin announcement was made that owing to the absence of the conductor, Dr. Muck, his place would be taken by the assistant conductor, Mr. Schmidt. It was the first time this season that Dr. Muck has been absent from the conductor's desk at the concerts in this city and some curiosity was felt concerning his substitute.

Mr. Schmidt assumed and carried on his office with dignity, apparently perfectly at home at his task, with which he seemed amply able to cope. Without undue muscular exertion he led the orchestra through the intricacies of the programme, which was arranged in the following order:

Haydn..Symphony in G-major, "The Surprise" (B. & H. No. 6)
  I. Adagio: Vivace assai.
  II. Andante.
  III. Menuetto.
  IV. Allegro di molto.
Mozart..Air, "Martern aller Arten," from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail," Act II., No. 11.
J. S. Bach..Symphony (Shepherds' Music) from the Christmas Oratorio.
Liszt..March of the Three Holy Kings, from the Oratorio, "Christus."
Gounod..."O legere hirondelle," from the Opera "Mireille," Act I.
Weber..Overture to the Opera, "Der Freischuetz."

While the programme was made up of more than the usual number of selections, in point of time, it was rather less instead of more than usual length, and contained no ultra modern compositions to puzzle over. Instead, it was largely of a classical nature, covering a range of a century and a half, and from Bach to Liszt offering as great a diversity in style.

It is a good many years since Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, with which the concert opened, was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but it is perennially fresh, and never fails to impress the listener with Haydn's aim toward perfection in his art. As the themes weave in and out, taken up in turn by the different instruments, one feels his command of melody and harmony, and all the elements of music, and is moved to admiration for the quality of his compositions, so removed from the later influences of noise and novelty.

And yet it was noise and novelty that gave the "surprise" to the symphony, and as the familiar air of the second movement, so gracefully played, and so daintily repeated, was punctuated by the startling drumstroke, a ripple of gentle laughter swept over the audience like a summer breeze. After over a century Haydn still has his little joke on "the ladies."

The menuetto, so like a rustic dance, was as distinctively played, while the full beauty of the first and last movements was well brought out.

Bach's music is not often incorporated into the Symphony programmes here and the beautiful shepherd's music from the Christmas Oratorio was heard with interest. Its simplicity was effectively contrasted with the brilliant intricacy of Liszt's "March of the Three Holy Kings" from the oratorio of "Christus," which followed; and from the standpoint of sentiment the two seemed appropriately connected. It is almost superfluous to state that each in its way was beautifully played, and illustrated the wide range covered by Christmas music.

It was Miss Hempel's first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but the cordiality manifested, alike by orchestra and audience, could have left her no doubt of the feeling she inspired.

As the singer came forward for her first solo she looked very young to be assigned to the task of upholding the best traditions of the art of vocal bravura, but the beauty and range of her voice and the fluency with which she scaled the heights of the florid passages left no doubt that she had a "nimble throat," such as Katharina Cavalieri, to display whose vocal "agility" Mozart wrote the air, "Martern aller Aeten," which Miss Hempel gave with dramatic fervor.

The waltz song of "Mireille," "O legere hirondelle," was aother solo also written to please a soprano who had a desire to shine in florid song, and Miss Hempel gave it with a brilliant daintiness that won her recall after recall, as had her previous number.

The concluding number on the programme, Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz," was a brilliant performance. The overture which is so symmetrical in form embraces practically all the airs in the opera, selections of which have been popular on Symphony programmes here. Most of Weber's overtures have also been played here from time to time by the orchestra, but few more acceptably than that which closed the programme last evening.

The fifth concert in the series will be given on Tuesday evening, March 2, when the soloist will be Anton Witek, the concert master of the organization, who, with Mme. Witek, is still pleasantly remembered for the recital given before. The

---

Cleveland Town Topics
2/6/15

The Concert by The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The rapidly written review which appears the next morning certainly has a freshness not possible to that in a weekly paper, but compensation comes from the consensus of opinion gathered during the week from those in the audience, and in respect to the concert by the Boston Orchestra there is but one opinion, which is, that the last concert, given on January twenty-ninth, under Doctor Karl Muck, was finer than any remembered concert of our whole Symphony series. Granted that the work of the Boston Orchestra shines with superlative beauty in the classic compositions requiring perfection of finish and polish, such as is only possible to orchestras of long continued existence, there is certainly a tide in the affairs of orchestras, as well as of men, which, taken at its flood, leads on to fortunate performance. Never has the tone produced by the marvelously beautiful instruments of this band sung clearer notes of sweetness and power. One had no thought for the imperfections of brass instruments, or the vagaries of woodwinds, or the effect of atmosphere upon strings, all were at a point of ideal perfection. The artistry of individual players seldom is more keenly felt than when Concertmeister Witek rushed forward into the stirring phrases of ornamentation woven by Brahms about the theme of Haydn's. The program made its own appeal of fine symmetry. The Mozart Symphony in C, known as the one with the fugue finale, the "Jupiter," is of compelling charm; the Weber overture to "Euryanthe" has much spirit, and the Richard Strauss tone-poem, "Don Juan," painted with a wealth of color, only to be compared to the riot of rainbow-tints in a Venetian picture. And what a rest to eyes and sensibilities it is to have a conductor who knows how to stand still.

One admits the unconsciousness of the excitement in which a young, emotional conductor enacts before his audience the passion of highly complex modern music, but there certainly is satisfaction in seeing with one's eyes, and hearing with one's ears, that after all it is a small factor in the public performance, for no coldness was perceptible in the dramatic Strauss music played by the men, while their conductor kept his head, and with quiet gesture controlled the forces working under him. Doubtless, too, Doctor Muck knows his orchestral scores by heart, but he makes no theatrical display of the fact by dispensing with them upon his conductor's desk. Cleveland is glad to unite with the other cities of their tour, in thanks to Boston for according permission to this world-famous orchestra to make its annual visit.

During the past month there has been issued by the Houghton-Mifflin Company a book entitled the "Boston Symphony Orchestra," in which there is a most interesting sketch of its founder, that may well be quoted in this connection. Mr. Higginson entered Harvard at seventeen, and left two years later on account of poor health. For several years he was in business in Boston, but in 1856 went to Europe, where he stayed four years, devoting himself chiefly to the study of music, at Vienna. Writing to his father in regard to his studies, he says: "What is to come of it all if successful? I do not know. But this is clear. I have improved my own powers, which is every man's duty. I have a resource to which I can always turn with delight, however the world may go with me. * * * It is carrying out the idea of making an imperishable capital in education." It is interesting to note that strain due to over-practice with an arm weakened by the old-fashioned operation of bleeding, compelled him to abandon the hope of becoming a pianist. When he returned to Boston about the end of 1860, he had the broad apprehension of what music might mean to an individual and to a community, even to a nation. The outbreak of the war between the states called him into the field, and later into great business operations, which formed the basis of the ample means which enabled him to found and support the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Cleveland Plain Dealer

SYMPHONY CONCERT

he annual Cleveland concert of the ston Symphony orchestra took ce last night at the Grays armory under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. The audience was one of the largest of this season's symphony series. In conformity with the custom of previous years, no soloist appeared.

A distinguished English lady once said to Col. Higginson, founder and financial supporter of the Boston Symphony orchestra, that "life in the United States is hard and dry. Your country is a great cornfield. See that you plant flowers in it."

It was a remark that Col. Higginson never forgot. Partly as a result of this remark and partly of Col. Higginson's own conception of life's philosophy, the Boston Symphony orchestra grew from a small but carefully nursed little flower into the most magnificent orchestral plant on earth.

"How does the Boston Symphony compare with the Philharmonie in Berlin or the Leipzig Gewandhaus orchestra or the other great orchestras of the European capitals of the present day?"

The writer put this question to Dr. Muck last night during the short intermission. Here is Dr. Muck's answer:

"I take it that you mean, of course, before the outbreak of the war. I have conducted not only orchestras of great opera houses, but symphony orchestras as well. I speak positively in stating that the Boston Symphony orchestra has no rivals anywhere in Europe. It is the greatest body of orchestral players in the world today."

It was an entire German program which Dr. Muck presented at the armory last night. The intelligent and discriminating applause of the large audience rose to an ovation after the playing of Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan." The large majority of those present must undoubtedly have considered it a special privilege to listen to this program of Mozart, Weber, Brahms, Strauss and

The magnificent interpretations of the greatest body of orchestral players in the world and the quiet but forceful personality of the man whose dignity of conception of the reading of the different scores of Germany's master minds of music, made their understanding illuminative and, proportionally speaking, simple.

The reading of the Mozart "Jupiter" symphony demonstrated that the conductor is sure of himself, of his orchestra of artists and of the results. True, without the help of splendid instruments such wonderfully vibrating and scintillating strings would not be possible.

But the men in whose hands these instruments rest have the training and artistic conception to bring out the hidden beauties of a Mozart symphony in their fullest glory, their "calm, god-like beauty." The tonal effects of the strings were golden.

Throughout the playing of the symphony the precision of the strings possessed the unity and individuality of a string quartet.

Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, in Dr. Muck's hands, became revivified. The time-honored overture which, to use a common phrase, has been "played to death" for half a century, was molded again into a living, breathing thing, full of beauty and full of life. The opening bars of Brahms' "Variations on a Haydn Theme" brought the full resources of the wonderful wind section of the orchestra into magnificent action and the variations themselves the different solo voices in their individual beauty. The enormous technic of the full orchestra came to its fullest display in Strauss' "Don Juan" tone poem. The climaxes were magnificent. The audience fully rose to the occasion and raised the volume of applause to the proportions of an ovation that only ended with the orchestra's rising. Beethoven's "Egmont" overture brought the concert to a fitting close.

Americans are indeed fortunate in possessing such an organization as the Boston Symphony orchestra. More than any other orchestra, with the possible exception of the old

AND LEADER, SATURDAY,

JANUARY 30, 1915.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT DE LUXE

Musical Event of Season, With Conductor Karl Mock Wielding the Baton.

BY ARCHIE BELL.

Three things contributed to the concert at Grays' Armory, last evening, to stamp it as the musical affair de luxe of the season: first, it was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; second, the orchestra was conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, and third, the program was one devised by a master-builder, ranging all the way from the "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart to the Richard Strauss "Don Juan" tone poem, and calculated to show the technical capacity of any instrumental organization and the wisdom of its conductor.

Like Christmas, the Bostonians come but once a year, and then sometimes it has happened that Christmas came without Santa Claus, for Dr. Muck has been known to remain in Boston when the orchestra went on tours. The management said he was ill; the disappointed music-lovers said that he disliked to travel.

But last night he stood in his pulpit and preached the gospel of music according to Mozart, Weber, Brahms, Strauss and Beethoven. With the exception of the "Euryanthe" overture and the flaming "Don Juan" number, it was a cold, almost philosophical program, but one of flawless coldness, absolute severity and a perfection that went beyond the ensemble playing to the choirs of various instruments, and to the individuals who played those instruments. It would be carping to attempt to suggest that any phrase of any number could have been improved upon.

Even in those passages for the brasses, where one has become so accustomed to "fumbling" important passages that he almost expects it, the splendid brass choir sounded forth as clear and certain as that solo violin passage played by Herr Wittek in "Don Juan." Dr. Muck has the most dependable band in America.

And it is not exaggeration to add that the orchestra has in some respects the most dependable conductor. What an example it is for the little fellows who believe that they are "conductors" to observe a man like Dr. Muck. He has practiced his gymnastics at rehearsal. He stands almost as still as a statue, with the slightest indication of the beat from his baton. He unbends himself scarcely more than this when he acknowledges the applause of his audience. He is a pinched, narrow little fellow, but he has the flight of an eagle (also its facial characteristics) and communicates by sheer intelligence and musical wisdom what he desires to convey to an audience through his men.

In many places he is now considered the greatest living conductor of Mozart, having been selected to conduct the dedication performance at the Salzburd Mozart Temple last season—which never took place on account of the war. He gave a vigorous reading of the symphony last night, revealed too frequently hidden beauties in Weber, while he wrestled nobly with the intricate Brahms variations on Haydn's "St. Anthony" theme, and attacked Strauss as a man with a great message, and he the chosen bearer of it.

Last night's was what a symphony concert should be. There was no soloist, excepting the man who stood at the desk with the stick.

Wächter und Anzeiger,

Samstag, den 30. Januar 1915.

Die Boſtoner.

Geſtriges Symphonie-Konzert.—Karl Muck als Interpret.

Was Goethe der Welt mit dem Zauber ſeiner Worte, verkündet Mozart mit der Schönheit ſeiner Töne. Die ruhige Klarheit und die ſchlichte Schönheit ſind es, die uns bei Goethe wie bei Mozart feſſeln. Wenn nun Mozart, dieſer Kaiſer im Reiche der Schönheit, einen Botſchafter findet wie Karl Muck, dann wird der Welt etwas verkündet, was ſie in Freude aufjauchzen läßt. Und geſtern [illegible] man aus dieſen Tönen die Botſchaft, daß das Volk, das ſolche Schönheit ſchuf, nicht von engliſchem Neid und ruſſiſcher Gier in Feſſeln geſchlagen [illegible]en kann. Der Trotz des Prometheus [illegible] Himmel, Zeus, mit Wolkendunſt, und übe dem Knaben gleich, der Diſteln köpft, an Eichen dich und Bergeshöhen — mußt mir meine Erde doch laſſen ſtehen und meine Hütte, die du nicht gebaut, und meinen Herd, um deſſen Glück du mich beneideſt,"

So ſprach man mit dem großen Goethe, nachdem man Mozarts Jupiter-Symphonie gehört, und ging beruhigt und zuverſichtlich nach Hauſe und noch dem Träumer wiegte der vibrierende Klang der Geigen frohe Zuverſicht zu.

Ja, dieſer deutſche Mozart iſt ein ſo großer Menſch, wie es nach ihm nur wenige gleich große gegeben hat. Alles in dieſer Muſik iſt Leben, Wahrheit und Kraft; durch das Band der Schönheit ſind Wirklichkeit und Ideal zu einem Ganzen verſchmolzen; alle Erdenſchwere iſt abgeſtreift, alle Widerſprüche löſen ſich im Wohllaute ſeiner Melodie und Harmonie auf, und Weltfreudigkeit, Friede und Beglückung ergreifen den Hörer.

Die Jupiter-Symphonie wurde von einem Orcheſter vorgetragen, das ebenſo wie Mozart, wenige ſeinesgleichen auf der bewohnten Erde hat. Und an der Spitze ſteht ein Dirigent, der mit Mozarts Schönheitsdrang Goethes olympiſche Ruhe verbindet.

„Dem Adler gleich, der über Fichtenhöhen ſchwebt" (das Bild paßt auch auf die Geſichtszüge Karl Mucks), ſo ſchwebt dieſer Dirigent über ſeinem Orcheſter. Ein Bild vollendeter Ruhe und Souveränität. Mit ſeinem Blick, mit ſeinem Intellekt beherrſcht er alles. Den inneren Einblick, die Intelligenz, ſein Genie können ihm andere Dirigenten freilich nicht abgucken, aber von ſeinem äußeren Auftreten könnte mancher Dirigent etwas lernen.

Dr. Muck bot geſtern ein ganz deutſches Programm. Auf Mozart folgten Weber, Brahms, Richard Strauß und Beethoven. Und bei jedem erhielt der Hörer ein ſcharf gezeichnetes Charakterbild. Es iſt die ſchlichte Klarheit, die das Weſen der Interpretation Karl Mucks ausmacht. Die vorgetragene Muſik erſcheint ſo ſelbſtverſtändlich, drückt etwas aus, was wir ſelbſt in unſerem Innern längſt empfunden haben, ihm nur nicht Ausdruck zu geben wußten. Das iſt das Weſen des Genius, nicht nur des ſchaffenden Geiſtes, ſondern auch des interpretierenden, der von Neuem aus ſich heraus ſchafft. So iſt Karl Muck. Er iſt der Soliſt ſeines glänzenden Orcheſters, in dem Geiger und Bläſer ſitzen, wie ſie kein Orcheſter in Amerika aufzuweiſen hat, und deshalb braucht er keine Soliſten neben ſich.

Das geſtrige Konzert war eines der bedeutendſten und ſchönſten, das wir hier gehört.

W. H.

---

iter Abendpoſt, Sonntag, den 31. Januar 1915.

Aus dem Konzertſaal

Konzert der Boſtoner unter Muck's Leitung. — Die Komniſtin H. H. A. Beach. Tuday Muſicale. Kunſtmuſe

Geſtern abend war das Boſ Symphonieorcheſter unter der tung von Dr. Karl Muck beim troiter Orcheſterverein zu Gaſte u abſolvierte in der Light Guard W fenhalle das vierte Symphoniek zert der Saiſon. Geſpielt wurd Schumann, Ouverture zu Genofe Ropartz, 4. Symphonie, C-D Brahms, Variation über ein The von Haydn; Bruch, Violinkonzert N 1, G-Moll; Weber, Ouverture Freiſchütz.

Die Boſtoner ſpielen zu hören u Dr. Muck dirigieren zu ſehen iſt im mer ein Genuß. Geſtern waren d Boſtoner ganz beſonders in Stim mung und ſpielten beſſer als je. Od war es nur, daß ſie beſſer ſchiene weil man ſie ſchon ſo lange nicht ge hört hat? Was Dr. Muck's Stabführung betrifft, ſo könnten ſie all von ihm lernen, die da meinen, d ganze Körper müßte mitarbeiten, wenn das Orcheſter dem Dirigenten folgen ſoll. Er dirigiert ſozuſagen nur mit einer Hand und mit den Augen. Der Stab, den er in der Hand hat, iſt nur die Verlängerung des Zeigefingers. Und mit dieſem Zeigefinger und den Augen hält er das ganze große Orcheſter mit der unbeſchränkten Gewalt des abſoluten Monarchen in ſeinem Bann.

Das Programm weiſt in den beiden erſten Nummern für Detroit zwei Novitäten auf. Auch die Genoveva-Ouverture iſt nämlich für Detroit eine Novität, ſo alt ſie ſchon iſt. Die liebe, gute ehrliche Muſik Schumans. Auf die Bekanntſchaft mit Ropartz's 4. Symphonie, deren Sätze, obgleich ſie deutlich auseinandergehalten ſind, ohne Unterbrechung geſpielt werden, als wäre es nur ein Satz, hätte man füglich verzichten können, ohne viel wirkliche Muſik verloren zu haben. Stellenweiſe Effekte, ſtellenweiſe Effekthaſcherei durch eigenartige Inſtrumentierung, ganz merkwürdige Verwendung der Harfe, aus der beſondere Wirkungen hervorgeholt werden. „Schöne Augen, ſchöne Zähne, ſchönes Kinn, ſchöne Naſe", flüſterte ich einer Nachbarin zu und in ſofortigem Verſtehen ergänzte ſie: „Und doch kein ſchönes Geſicht."

Die geiſtreiche Variation, die Brahms über ein kleines Choralthema Haydns erdacht und geſchrieben hat, und wie ſie die Boſtoner geſtern ſpielten, waren mit die allerbeſten, was man in der letzten Zeit an Muſik in Detroit gehört hat.

Das Bruch'ſche Violinkonzert, das Paradepferd aller guten Züge, wurde von Meiſter Witek, dem Soliſten des Abends, bravourös und mit herrlichem Ton geſpielt und ebenſo bravourös brachten die Boſtoner die uralte und doch ewig jugendfriſche Freiſchützouverture heraus.

Wohl überflüſſig zu ſagen, daß die Boſtoner ein geſteckt volles Haus und rauſchenden Beifall fanden.

Eine der bedeutendſten unter den weiblichen Komponiſten, Frau H. H. A. Beach, wird am 3. Februar um 8.15 Uhr abend im Saale des Hotel Pontchartrain ein Konzert eigener Kompoſitionen veranſtalten. Frl. Myra Schalow, ein lyriſcher Sopran von anerkanntem Ruf, wird ausſchließlich Lieder der genannten Tonſetzerin vortragen.

Frau Beach begann ihre Laufbahn als Pianiſtin. Daß ſie als ſolche ſehr bedeutend war, kann daraus erſehen werden, daß ſie ſchon vor 14 Jahren als Soliſtin mit dem Londoner Symphonieorcheſter auftrat. Sie wuchs immer mehr, erzielte große Erfolge in Berlin, Wien, Hamburg und Leipzig und wandte ſich, da ſie den Kopf immer voll von Melodien hatte, ſchließlich ganz der Kompoſition zu. Ihre Interpretin iſt ein hoch hochangeſehenes Mitglied der Boſtoner Opernbühne.

Nach dem Konzert wird der konzertgebende Verein, Tuesday Muſicale, zu Ehren der Komponiſtin im großen Saale des Hotel Pontchartrai einen Empfang veranſtalten.

* * * * *

Das ſechſte diesjährige Vormittagskonzert des Tuesday Muſicale wird nächſten Dienstag, 2. Februar. um 10.30 Uhr im Gebäude des Twentieth Century Club, Ecke Columbia- und Witherellſtraße, abgehalten werden:

Liederzyklus. Frauenliebe und Leben .... Schumann
1. Seit ich ihn geſehen
2. Er, der Herrlichſte von Allen
3. Ich kann's nicht faſſen
4. Du Ring an meinem Finger
5. Helft mir, ihr Schweſtern
6. Süßer Freund, du blickeſt
7. An meinem Herzen
8. Nun haſt du mir den erſten Schmerz getan

Frau Krolik

Romanze .... Rubinſtein
Schön Rosmarin .... Kreisler

Frl. Haggerty

[illegible]ſſi d'arte aus La Tosca .... Puccini
Un doux lien .... Delbruck
Ar[illegible]te .... Vidal

Frau H. Cleland Allſon

Nove[illegible]tte Op. 21 No. 1 .... Schumann
Roma[illegible]e Op. 28 .... Schumann
Rhapſo[illegible] Op. 119 .... Brahms

[illegible] Gertrude Lloyd Clark

Am Klav[illegible] Frau Heberlein, Frau Wieſt und Frau Bentley.

Den muſikaliſchen Teil des heutigen Nachmittag im Kunſtmuſeum werden zwei Sänger, die Herren Floyd A. Campbell und Wirt C. Rowland, beſtreiten. Die Klavierbegleitung wird Fräulein Pearl Williams beſorgen.

An den muſikaliſchen Teil ſchließt ſich ein Vortrag des Profeſſors Roſſiter Howard an, der mit Erläuterungen durch Stereoptikonbilder über „Die Gemälde Rembrandts" ſprechen wird.

DETROIT NEWS TRIBUNE,

JANUARY 31,

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Sways Audience

The audience which assembled in the armory Saturday night to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra, swayed by the baton of Dr. Karl Muck, found itself in a mood of complete gratification over the selections of tried and true caliber. For sheer tonal wonders this orchestra is never surpassed and the audience voiced its approval with applause that should warm the heart of any director or the hearts of any orchestra.

The audience heard a wonderfully satisfying evening of classic music. The bi[illegible] number was the Symphony No. 4, [illegible] major (Ropartz), the first time t[illegible] work has been presented in Det[illegible] Taken as a whole, as it was played without a pause, it is a heavy thing to concentrate on, but the assemblage seemed to be in a mood to desire the brilliant and technical number. The insistent and ever recurring theme bandied about by woods, winds and strings possesses a curiously phrased mysticism that is striking. The intonation in the andante pianissimo passages was well up to the Boston standard.

The variations on a theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56A, (Brahms) introduced a number full of melody of the simpler sort and much Haydenesque, the ecclesiastical color predominant. The theme was taken from an unpublished divertimenti for wind instruments and rewritten by Brahms for string and wind, as was played by Dr. Muck. The piece holds much of beauty in tone coloring. Schuman's Overture to "Genoveva," op. 81, opened the program and Weber's Overture to the opera, "Der Freischutz," was the concluding offering. The horns play a beautiful part song of churchly hearing in the opening bars, which soon gives way to vivace passages of brilliancy. The strings did excellent work in this number. The tonal qualities were of a warm and rich sonority.

Anton Witek concert master of the orchestra, played Max Bruch's Concerto for violin No. 1 in G minor, Op. 26, with full orchestra accompaniment. He received an ovation at the conclusion of the two movements. His upper tones rang with clarity and confidence, and the number was played with a dignity that was admirable.

DETROIT FREE PRESS:

JANUARY 31, 1915.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES

So Many Features No Particular Number Can Be Praised Over Others.

HERR ANTON WITEK IS MASTERFUL VIOLINIST

Ropartz Symphony is Given to Most Eloquent and Absorbing Discourse.

So much excellence centered in the concert given in the armory Saturday evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra that it is not easy to pick and choose and say that this or that was the feature of peculiar interest.

The appearance of the band itself is always an event of especial moment in this city. The organization comes only annually, and Detroit generally is its extreme western point. So the concert-goers of this city are properly grateful for the favor granted them by the incomparable among orchestras.

Generally, too, the Boston orchestra has something intrinsically very much worth while to offer. Last evening it presented for its principal number the Fourth symphony in C major of Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz, and by way of solo attraction, the great Bruch G minor concerto for violin, the performing artist being

AND LEADER, SATURDAY,

JANUARY 30, 1915.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT DE LUXE

Musical Event of Season, With Conductor Karl Mock Wielding the Baton.

BY ARCHIE BELL.

Three things contributed to the concert at Grays' Armory, last evening, to stamp it as the musical affair de luxe of the season: first, it was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; second, the orchestra was conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, and third, the program was one devised by a master-builder, ranging all the way from the "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart to the Richard Strauss "Don Juan" tone poem, and calculated to show the technical capacity of any instrumental organization and the wisdom of its conductor.

Like Christmas, the Bostonians come but once a year, and then sometimes it has happened that Christmas came without Santa Claus, for Dr. Muck has been known to remain in Boston when the orchestra went on tours. The management said he was ill; the disappointed music-lovers said that he disliked to travel.

But last night he stood in his pulpit and preached the gospel of music according to Mozart, Weber, Brahms, Strauss and Beethoven. With the exception of the "Euryanthe" overture and the flaming "Don Juan" number, it was a cold, almost philosophical program, but one of flawless coldness, absolute severity and a perfection that went beyond the ensemble playing to the choirs of various instruments, and to the individuals who played those instruments. It would be carping to attempt to suggest that any phrase of any number could have been improved upon.

Even in those passages for the brasses, where one has become so accustomed to "fumbling" important passages that he almost expects it, the splendid brass choir sounded forth as clear and certain as that solo violin passage played by Herr Wittek in "Don Juan." Dr. Muck has the most dependable band in America.

And it is not exaggeration to add that the orchestra has in some respects the most dependable conductor. What an example it is for the little fellows who believe that they are "conductors" to observe a man like Dr. Muck. He has practiced his gymnastics at rehearsal. He stands almost as still as a statue, with the slightest indication of the beat from his baton. He unbends himself scarcely more than this when he acknowledges the applause of his audience. He is a pinched, narrow little fellow, but he has the flight of an eagle (also its facial characteristics) and communicates by sheer intelligence and musical wisdom what he desires to convey to an audience through his men.

In many places he is now considered the greatest living conductor of Mozart, having been selected to conduct the dedication performance at the Salzburd Mozart Temple last season—which never took place on account of the war. He gave a vigorous reading of the symphony last night, revealed too frequently hidden beauties in Weber, while he wrestled nobly with the intricate Brahms variations on Haydn's "St. Anthony" theme, and attacked Strauss as a man with a great message, and he the chosen bearer of it.

Last night's was what a symphony concert should be. There was no soloist, excepting the man who stood at the desk with the stick.

Wächter und Anzeiger,

Samstag, den 30. Januar 1915.

Die Boſtoner.

Geſtriges Symphonie-Konzert.—Karl Muck als Interpret.

Was Goethe der Welt mit dem Zauber ſeiner Worte, verkündet Mozart mit der Schönheit ſeiner Töne. Die ruhige Klarheit und die ſchlichte Schönheit ſind es, die uns bei Goethe wie bei Mozart feſſeln. Wenn nun Mozart, dieſer Kaiſer im Reiche der Schönheit, einen Botſchafter findet wie Karl Muck, dann wird der Welt etwas verkündet, was ſie in Freude aufjauchzen läßt. Und geſtern [illegible] man aus dieſen Tönen die Botſchaft daß das Volk, das ſolche Schönheit ſchuf, nicht von engliſchem Neid und ruſſiſcher Gier in Feſſeln geſchlagen [illegible]en kann. Der Trotz des Prome-

Himmel, Zeus, mit Wolkendunſt, und übe dem Knaben gleich, der Diſteln köpft, an Eichen dich und Bergeshöhen — mußt mir meine Erde doch laſſen ſtehen und meine Hütte, die du nicht gebaut, und meinen Herd, um deſſen Glück du mich beneideſt."

So ſprach man mit dem großen Goethe, nachdem man Mozarts Jupiter-Symphonie gehört, und ging beruhigt und zuverſichtlich nach Hauſe und noch dem Träumer wiegte der vibrierende Klang der Geigen frohe Zuverſicht zu.

Ja, dieſer deutſche Mozart iſt ein ſo großer Menſch, wie es nach ihm nur wenige gleich große gegeben hat. Alles in dieſer Muſik iſt Leben, Wahrheit und Kraft; durch das Band der Schönheit ſind Wirklichkeit und Ideal zu einem Ganzen verſchmolzen; alle Erdenſchwere iſt abgeſtreift, alle Widerſprüche löſen ſich im Wohllaute ſeiner Melodie und Harmonie auf, und Weltfreudigkeit, Friede und Beglückung ergreifen den Hörer.

Die Jupiter-Symphonie wurde von einem Orcheſter vorgetragen, das ebenſo wie Mozart, wenige ſeinesgleichen auf der bewohnten Erde hat. Und an der Spitze ſteht ein Dirigent, der mit Mozarts Schönheitsdrang Goethes olympiſche Ruhe verbindet.

„Dem Adler gleich, der über Fichtenhöhen ſchwebt" (das Bild paßt auch auf die Geſichtszüge Karl Mucks), ſo ſchwebt dieſer Dirigent über ſeinem Orcheſter. Ein Bild vollendeter Ruhe und Souveränität. Mit ſeinem Blick, mit ſeinem Intellekt beherrſcht er alles. Den inneren Einblick, die Intelligenz, ſein Genie können ihm andere Dirigenten freilich nicht abgucken, aber von ſeinem äußeren Auftreten könnte mancher Dirigent etwas lernen.

Dr. Muck bot geſtern ein ganz deutſches Programm. Auf Mozart folgten Weber, Brahms, Richard Strauß und Beethoven. Und bei jedem erhielt der Hörer ein ſcharf gezeichnetes Charakterbild. Es iſt die ſchlichte Klarheit, die das Weſen der Interpretation Karl Mucks ausmacht. Die vorgetragene Muſik erſcheint ſo ſelbſtverſtändlich, drückt etwas aus, was wir ſelbſt in unſerem Innern längſt empfunden haben, ihm nur nicht Ausdruck zu geben wußten. Das iſt das Weſen des Genius, nicht nur des ſchaffenden Geiſtes, ſondern auch des interpretierenden, der von Neuem aus ſich heraus ſchafft. So iſt Karl Muck. Er iſt der Soliſt ſeines glänzenden Orcheſters, in dem Geiger und Bläſer ſitzen, wie ſie kein Orcheſter in Amerika aufzuweiſen hat, und deshalb braucht er keine Soliſten neben ſich.

Das geſtrige Konzert war eines der bedeutendſten und ſchönſten, das wir hier gehört.

W. H.

---

iter Abendpoſt, Sonntag, den 31. Januar 1915.

Aus dem Konzertſaal

Konzert der Boſtoner unter Muck's Leitung. — Die Kom niſtin H. H. A. Beach. Tu day Muſicale. Kunſtmuſe

Geſtern abend war das Boſ
Symphonieorcheſter unter der tung von Dr. Karl Muck beim troiter Orcheſterverein zu Gaſte u abſolvierte in der Light Guard W fenhalle das vierte Symphoniek
zert der Saiſon. Geſpielt wurde
Schumann, Ouverture zu Genofe
Ropartz, 4. Symphonie, C-Dr
Brahms. Variation über ein Ther von Haydn; Bruch, Violinkonzert N
1. G-Moll; Weber, Ouverture
Freiſchütz.

Die Boſtoner ſpielen zu hören u
Dr. Muck dirigieren zu ſehen iſt i mer ein Genuß. Geſtern waren d
Boſtoner ganz beſonders in Stim mung und ſpielten beſſer als je. Ode war es nur, daß ſie beſſer ſchienen weil man ſie ſchon ſo lange nicht ge hört hat? Was Dr. Muck's Stab führung betrifft, ſo könnten ſie all von ihm lernen, die da meinen, da ganze Körper müßte mitarbeiten, wenn das Orcheſter dem Dirigenten folgen ſoll. Er dirigiert ſozuſagen nur mit einer Hand und mit den Augen. Der Stab, den er in der Hand hat, iſt nur die Verlängerung des Zeigefingers. Und mit dieſem Zeigefinger und den Augen hält er das ganze große Orcheſter mit der unbeſchränkten Gewalt des abſoluten Monarchen in ſeinem Bann.

Das Programm weiſt in den beiden erſten Nummern für Detroit zwei Novitäten auf. Auch die Genoveva-Ouverture iſt nämlich für Detroit eine Novität, ſo alt ſie ſchon iſt. Die liebe, gute ehrliche Muſik Schumans. Auf die Bekanntſchaft mit Ropartz's 4. Symphonie, deren Sätze, obgleich ſie deutlich auseinandergehalten ſind, ohne Unterbrechung geſpielt werden, als wäre es nur ein Satz, hätte man füglich verzichten können, ohne viel wirkliche Muſik verloren zu haben. Stellenweiſe Effekte, ſtellenweiſe Effektehaſcherei durch eigenartige Inſtrumentierung, ganz merkwürdige Verwendung der Harfe, aus der beſondere Wirkungen hervorgeholt werden. „Schöne Augen, ſchöne Zähne, ſchönes Kinn, ſchöne Naſe", flüſterte ich einer Nachbarin zu und in ſofortigem Verſtehen ergänzte ſie: „Und doch kein ſchönes Geſicht."

Die geiſtreiche Variation, die Brahms über ein kleines Choralthema Haydns erdacht und geſchrieben hat, und wie ſie die Boſtoner geſtern ſpielten, waren mit die allerbeſten, was man in der letzten Zeit an Muſik in Detroit gehört hat.

Das Bruch'ſche Violinkonzert, das Paradepferd aller guten Züge, wurde von Meiſter Witek, dem Soliſten des Abends, bravourös und mit herrlichem Ton geſpielt und ebenſo bravourös brachten die Boſtoner die uralte und doch ewig jugendfriſche Freiſchützouverture heraus.

Wohl überflüſſig zu ſagen, daß die Boſtoner ein geſteckt volles Haus und rauſchenden Beifall fanden.

Eine der bedeutendſten unter den weiblichen Komponiſten, Frau H. H. A. Beach, wird am 5. Februar um 8.15 Uhr abend im Saale des Hotel Pontchartrain ein Konzert eigener Kompoſitionen veranſtalten. Frl. Myra Schalow, ein lyriſcher Sopran von anerkanntem Ruf, wird ausſchließlich Lieder der genannten Tonſetzerin vortragen.

Frau Beach begann ihre Laufbahn als Pianiſtin. Daß ſie als ſolche ſehr bedeutend war, kann daraus erſehen werden, daß ſie ſchon vor 11 Jahren als Soliſtin mit dem Londoner Symphonieorcheſter auftrat. Sie wuchs immer mehr, erzielte große Erfolge in Berlin, Wien, Hamburg und Leipzig und wandte ſich, da ſie den Kopf immer voll von Melodien hatte, ſchließlich ganz der Kompoſition zu. Ihre Interpretin iſt ein hoch hochangeſehenes Mitglied der Boſtoner Opernbühne.

Nach dem Konzert wird der konzertgebende Verein, Tuesday Muſicale, zu Ehren der Komponiſtin im großen Saale des Hotel Pontchartrai einen Empfang veranſtalten.

* * * *

Das ſechſte diesjährige Vormittagskonzert des Tuesday Muſicale wird nächſten Dienstag, 2. Februar, um 10.30 Uhr im Gebäude des Twentieth Century Club, Ecke Columbia- und Witherellſtraße, abgehalten werden:

Liederzyklus. Frauenliebe und Leben ....Schumann
1. Seit ich ihn geſehen
2. Er, der Herrlichſte von Allen
3. Ich kann's nicht faſſen
4. Du Ring an meinem Finger
5. Helft mir, ihr Schweſtern
6. Süßer Freund, du blickeſt
7. An meinem Herzen
8. Nun haſt du mir den erſten Schmerz getan

Frau Krolik

Romanze ....Rubinſtein
Schön Rosmarin ....Kreisler

Frl. Haggerty

Viſſi d'arte aus La Toſca ....Puccini
Un doux lien ....Delbruck
Ariette ....Vidal

Frau H. Cleland Alliſon

Novelette Op. 21 No. 1....Schumann
Romanze Op. 28 ....Schumann
Rhapſodie Op. 119 ....Brahms

Frau Gertrude Lloyd Clark

Am Klavier: Frau Heberlein, Frau Wieſt und Frau Bentley.

Den muſikaliſchen Teil des heutigen Nachmittag im Kunſtmuſeum werden zwei Sänger, die Herren Floyd A. Campbell und Wirt C. Rowland, beſtreiten. Die Klavierbegleitung, wird Fräulein Pearl Williams beſorgen.

An den muſikaliſchen Teil ſchließt ſich ein Vortrag des Profeſſors Roſſiter Howard an, der mit Erläuterungen durch Stereoptikonbilder über „Die Gemälde Rembrandts" ſprechen wird.

DETROIT NEWS TRIBUNE,

JANUARY 31,

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Sways Audience

The audience which assembled in the armory Saturday night to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra, swayed by the baton of Dr. Karl Muck, found itself in a mood of complete gratification over the selections of tried and true caliber. For sheer tonal wonders this orchestra is never surpassed and the audience voiced its approval with applause that should warm the heart of any director or the hearts of any orchestra.

The audience heard a wonderfully satisfying evening of classic music. The first numeer was the Symphony No. 4, C major (Ropartz), the first time the work has been presented in Detroit. Taken as a whole, as it was played without a pause, it is a heavy thing to concentrate on, but the assemblage seemed to be in a mood to desire the brilliant and technical number. The insistent and ever recurring theme bandied about by woods, winds and strings possesses a curiously phrased mysticism that is striking. The intonation in the andante pianissimo passages was well up to the Boston standard.

The variations on a theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56A, (Brahms) introduced a number full of melody of the simpler sort and much Haydenesque, tho ecclesiastical color predominant. The theme was taken from an unpublished divertimenti for wind instruments and rewritten by Brahms for string and wind, as was played by Dr. Muck. The piece holds much of beauty in tone coloring. Schuman's Overture to "Genoveva," op. 81, opened the program and Weber's Overture to the opera, "Der Freischutz," was the concluding offering. The horns play a beautiful part song of churchly hearing in the opening bars, which soon gives way to vivace passages of brilliancy. The strings did excellent work in this number. The tonal qualities were of a warm and rich sonority.

Anton Witek concert master of the orchestra, played Max Bruch's Concerto for violin No. 1 in G minor, Op. 26, with full orchestra accompaniment. He received an ovation at the conclusion of the two movements. His upper tones rang with clarity and confidence, and the number was played with a dignity that was admirable.

DETROIT FREE PRESS:

JANUARY 31, 1915.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES

So Many Features No Particular Number Can Be Praised Over Others.

HERR ANTON WITEK IS MASTERFUL VIOLINIST

Ropartz Symphony is Given to Most Eloquent and Absorbing Discourse.

So much excellence centered in the concert given in the armory Saturday evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra that it is not easy to pick and choose and say that this or that was the feature of peculiar interest.

The appearance of the band itself is always an event of especial moment in this city. The organization comes only annually, and Detroit generally is its extreme western point. So the concert-goers of this city are properly grateful for the favor granted them by the incomparable among orchestras.

Generally, too, the Boston orchestra has something intrinsically very much worth while to offer. Last evening it presented for its principal number the Fourth symphony in C major of Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz, and by way of solo attraction, the great Bruch G minor concerto for violin, the performing artist being

AND LEADER, SATURDAY,

JANUARY 30, 1915.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT DE LUXE

Musical Event of Season, With Conductor Karl Mock Wielding the Baton.

BY ARCHIE BELL.

Three things contributed to the concert at Grays' Armory, last evening, to stamp it as the musical affair de luxe of the season: first, it was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; second, the orchestra was conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, and third, the program was one devised by a master-builder, ranging all the way from the "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart to the Richard Strauss "Don Juan" tone poem, and calculated to show the technical capacity of any instrumental organization and the wisdom of its conductor.

Like Christmas, the Bostonians come but once a year, and then sometimes it has happened that Christmas came without Santa Claus, for Dr. Muck has been known to remain in Boston when the orchestra went on tours. The management said he was ill; the disappointed music-lovers said that he disliked to travel.

But last night he stood in his pulpit and preached the gospel of music according to Mozart, Weber, Brahms, Strauss and Beethoven. With the exception of the "Euryanthe" overture and the flaming "Don Juan" number, it was a cold, almost philosophical program, but one of flawless coldness, absolute severity and a perfection that went beyond the ensemble playing to the choirs of various instruments, and to the individuals who played those instruments. It would be carping to attempt to suggest that any phrase of any number could have been improved upon.

Even in those passages for the brasses, where one has become so accustomed to "fumbling" important passages that he almost expects it, the splendid brass choir sounded forth as clear and certain as that solo violin passage played by Herr Wittek in "Don Juan." Dr. Muck has the most dependable band in America.

And it is not exaggeration to add that the orchestra has in some respects the most dependable conductor. What an example it is for the little fellows who believe that they are "conductors" to observe a man like Dr. Muck. He has practiced his gymnastics at rehearsal. He stands almost as still as a statue, with the slightest indication of the beat from his baton. He unbends himself scarcely more than this when he acknowledges the applause of his audience. He is a pinched, narrow little fellow, but he has the flight of an eagle (also its facial characteristics) and communicates by sheer intelligence and musical wisdom what he desires to convey to an audience through his men.

In many places he is now considered the greatest living conductor of Mozart, having been selected to conduct the dedication performance at the Salzburd Mozart Temple last season—which never took place on account of the war. He gave a vigorous reading of the symphony last night, revealed too frequently hidden beauties in Weber, while he wrestled nobly with the intricate Brahms variations on Haydn's "St. Anthony" theme, and attacked Strauss as a man with a great message, and he the chosen bearer of it.

Last night's was what a symphony concert should be. There was no soloist, excepting the man who stood at the desk with the stick.

Wächter und Anzeiger,

Samſtag, den 30. Januar 1915.

Die Boſtoner.

Geſtriges Symphonie-Konzert.—Karl Muck als Interpret.

Was Goethe der Welt mit dem Zauber ſeiner Worte, verkündet Mozart mit der Schönheit ſeiner Töne. Die ruhige Klarheit und die ſchlichte Schönheit ſind es, die uns bei Goethe wie bei Mozart feſſeln. Wenn nun Mozart, dieſer Kaiſer im Reiche der Schönheit, einen Botſchafter findet wie Karl Muck, dann wird der Welt etwas verkündet, was ſie in Fre[illegible] aufjauchzen läßt. Und geſtern [illegible] man aus dieſen Tönen die Botſchaft, daß das Volk, das ſolche Schönheit ſchuf, nicht von engliſchem Neid und ruſſiſcher Gier in Feſſeln geſchlagen [illegible]en kann. Der Trotz des Prome-

Himmel, Zeus, mit Wolkendunſt, und übe dem Knaben gleich, der Diſteln köpft, an Eichen dich und Bergeshöhn — mußt mir meine Erde doch laſſen ſtehen und meine Hütte, die du nicht gebaut, und meinen Herd, um deſſen Glück du mich beneideſt."

So ſprach man mit dem großen Goethe, nachdem man Mozarts Jupiter-Symphonie gehört, und ging beruhigt und zuverſichtlich nach Hauſe und noch dem Träumer wiegte der vibrierende Klang der Geigen frohe Zuverſicht zu.

Ja, dieſer deutſche Mozart iſt ein ſo großer Menſch, wie es nach ihm nur wenige gleich große gegeben hat. Alles in dieſer Muſik iſt Leben, Wahrheit und Kraft; durch das Band der Schönheit ſind Wirklichkeit und Ideal zu einem Ganzen verſchmolzen; alle Erdenſchwere iſt abgeſtreift, alle Widerſprüche löſen ſich im Wohllaute ſeiner Melodie und Harmonie auf, und Weltfreudigkeit, Friede und Beglückung ergreifen den Hörer.

Die Jupiter-Symphonie wurde von einem Orcheſter vorgetragen, das ebenſo wie Mozart, wenige ſeinesgleichen auf der bewohnten Erde hat. Und an der Spitze ſteht ein Dirigent, der mit Mozarts Schönheitsdrang Goethes olympiſche Ruhe verbindet.

„Dem Adler gleich, der über Fichtenhöhen ſchwebt" (das Bild paßt auch auf die Geſichtszüge Karl Mucks), ſo ſchwebt dieſer Dirigent über ſeinem Orcheſter. Ein Bild vollendeter Ruhe und Souveränität. Mit ſeinem Blick, mit ſeinem Intellekt beherrſcht er alles. Den inneren Einblick, die Intelligenz, ſein Genie können ihm andere Dirigenten freilich nicht abgucken, aber von ſeinem äußeren Auftreten könnte mancher Dirigent etwas lernen.

Dr. Muck bot geſtern ein ganz deutſches Programm. Auf Mozart folgten Weber, Brahms, Richard Strauß und Beethoven. Und bei jedem erhielt der Hörer ein ſcharf gezeichnetes Charakterbild. Es iſt die ſchlichte Klarheit, die das Weſen der Interpretation Karl Mucks ausmacht. Die vorgetragene Muſik erſcheint ſo ſelbſtverſtändlich, drückt etwas aus, was wir ſelbſt in unſerem Innern längſt empfunden haben, ihm nur nicht Ausdruck zu geben wußten. Das iſt das Weſen des Genius, nicht nur des ſchaffenden Geiſtes, ſondern auch des interpretierenden, der von Neuem aus ſich heraus ſchafft. So iſt Karl Muck. Er iſt der Soliſt ſeines glänzenden Orcheſters, in dem Geiger und Bläſer ſitzen, wie ſie kein Orcheſter in Amerika aufzuweiſen hat, und deshalb braucht er keine Soliſten neben ſich.

Das geſtrige Konzert war eines der bedeutendſten und ſchönſten, das wir hier gehört.

W. H.

---

iter Abendpoſt, Sonntag, den 31. Januar 1915.

Aus dem Konzertſaal

Konzert der Boſtoner unter Muck's Leitung. — Die Kom niſtin H. H. A. Beach. Tu day Muſicale. Kunſtmuſe

Geſtern abend war das Boſ Symphonieorcheſter unter der tung von Dr. Karl Muck beim troiter Orcheſterverein zu Gaſte u abſolvierte in der Light Guard W fenhalle das vierte Symphoniek zert der Saiſon. Geſpielt wurde Schumann, Ouverture zu Genofe Ropartz, 4. Symphonie, C-Dr Brahms. Variation über ein Ther von Haydn; Bruch, Violinkonzert N 1. G-Moll; Weber, Ouverture Freiſchütz.

Die Boſtoner ſpielen zu hören un Dr. Muck dirigieren zu ſehen iſt immer ein Genuß. Geſtern waren di Boſtoner ganz beſonders in Stimmung und ſpielten beſſer als je. Oder war es nur, daß ſie beſſer ſchienen, weil man ſie ſchon ſo lange nicht gehört hat? Was Dr. Muck's Stabführung betrifft, ſo könnten ſie alle von ihm lernen, die da meinen, der ganze Körper müßte mitarbeiten, wenn das Orcheſter dem Dirigenten folgen ſoll. Er dirigiert ſozuſagen nur mit einer Hand und mit den Augen. Der Stab, den er in der Hand hat, iſt nur die Verlängerung des Zeigefingers. Und mit dieſem Zeigefinger und den Augen hält er das ganze große Orcheſter mit der unbeſchränkten Gewalt des abſoluten Monarchen in ſeinem Bann.

Das Programm weiſt in den beiden erſten Nummern für Detroit zwei Novitäten auf. Auch die Genoveva-Ouverture iſt nämlich für Detroit eine Novität, ſo alt ſie ſchon iſt. Die liebe, gute ehrliche Muſik Schumans. Auf die Bekanntſchaft mit Ropartz's 4. Symphonie, deren Sätze, obgleich ſie deutlich auseinandergehalten ſind, ohne Unterbrechung geſpielt werden, als wäre es nur ein Satz, hätte man füglich verzichten können, ohne viel wirkliche Muſik verloren zu haben. Stellenweiſe Effekte, ſtellenweiſe Effekthaſcherei durch eigenartige Inſtrumentierung, ganz merkwürdige Verwendung der Harfe, aus der beſondere Wirkungen hervorgeholt werden. „Schöne Augen, ſchöne Zähne, ſchönes Kinn, ſchöne Naſe", flüſterte ich einer Nachbarin zu und in ſofortigem Verſtehen ergänzte ſie: „Und doch kein ſchönes Geſicht."

Die geiſtreiche Variation, die Brahms über ein kleines Choralthema Haydns erdacht und geſchrieben hat, und wie ſie die Boſtoner geſtern ſpielten, waren mit die allerbeſten, was man in der letzten Zeit an Muſik in Detroit gehört hat.

Das Bruch'ſche Violinkonzert, das Paradepferd aller guten Züge, wurde von Meiſter Witek, dem Soliſten des Abends, bravourös und mit herrlichem Ton geſpielt und ebenſo bravourös brachten die Boſtoner die uralte und doch ewig jugendfriſche Freiſchützouverture heraus.

Wohl überflüſſig zu ſagen, daß die Boſtoner ein geſteckt volles Haus und rauſchenden Beifall fanden.

Eine der bedeutendſten unter den weiblichen Komponiſten, Frau H. H. A. Beach, wird am 5. Februar um 8.15 Uhr abend im Saale des Hotel Pontchartrain ein Konzert eigener Kompoſitionen veranſtalten. Frl. Myra Schalow, ein lyriſcher Sopran von anerkanntem Ruf, wird ausſchließlich Lieder der genannten Tonſetzerin vortragen.

Frau Beach begann ihre Laufbahn als Pianiſtin. Daß ſie als ſolche ſehr bedeutend war, kann daraus erſehen werden, daß ſie ſchon vor 14 Jahren als Soliſtin mit dem Londoner Symphonieorcheſter auftrat. Sie wuchs immer mehr, erzielte große Erfolge in Berlin, Wien, Hamburg und Leipzig und wandte ſich, da ſie den Kopf immer voll von Melodien hatte, ſchließlich ganz der Kompoſition zu. Ihre Interpretin iſt ein hoch hochangeſehenes Mitglied der Boſtoner Opernbühne.

Nach dem Konzert wird der konzertgebende Verein, Tuesday Muſicale, zu Ehren der Komponiſtin im großen Saale des Hotel Pontchartrai einen Empfang veranſtalten.

* * * *

Das ſechſte diesjährige Vormittagskonzert des Tuesday Muſicale wird nächſten Dienstag, 2. Februar, um 10.30 Uhr im Gebäude des Twentieth Century Club, Ecke Columbia- und Witherellſtraße, abgehalten werden:

Liederzyklus. Frauenliebe und Leben ....Schumann
1. Seit ich ihn geſehen
2. Er, der Herrlichſte von Allen
3. Ich kann's nicht faſſen
4. Du Ring an meinem Finger
5. Helft mir, ihr Schweſtern
6. Süßer Freund, du blickeſt
7. An meinem Herzen
8. Nun haſt du mir den erſten Schmerz getan

Frau Krolik

Romanze ....Rubinſtein
Schön Rosmarin ....Kreisler

Frl. Haggerty

Viſſi d'arte aus La Toſca ....Puccini
[illegible]dour lien ....Delbruck
[illegible] ....Vidal

[illegible]au H. Cleland Alliſon

[illegible] 21 No. 1....Schumann
[illegible] 28 ....Schumann
[illegible]p. 119 ....Brahms

Gertrude Lloyd Clark

Am Kla[illegible] Frau Heberlein, Frau Wieſt [illegible]d Frau Bentley.

Den mu[illegible]liſchen Teil des heutigen Nachm[illegible]g im Kunſtmuſeum werden zwei Sänger, die Herren Floyd A. Campbell und Wirt C. Rowland, beſtreiten. Die Klavierbegleitung, wird Fräulein Pearl Williams beſorgen.

An den muſikaliſchen Teil ſchließt ſich ein Vortrag des Profeſſors Roſſiter Howard an, der mit Erläuterungen durch Stereoptikonbilder über „Die Gemälde Rembrandts" ſprechen wird.

DETROIT NEWS TRIBUNE,

, JANUARY 31,

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Sways Audience

The audience which assembled in the armory Saturday night to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra, swayed by the baton of Dr. Karl Muck, found itself in a mood of complete gratification over the selections of tried and true caliber. For sheer tonal wonders this orchestra is never surpassed and the audience voiced its approval with applause that should warm the heart of any director or the hearts of any orchestra.

The audience heard a wonderfully satisfying evening of classic music. The [illegible] number was the Symphony No. 4, [illegible] major (Ropartz), the first time t[illegible] work has been presented in Det[illegible] Taken as a whole, as it was play[illegible]d without a pause, it is a heavy thing to concentrate on, but the assemblage seemed to be in a mood to desire the brilliant and technical number. The insistent and ever recurring theme bandied about by woods, winds and strings possesses a curiously phrased mysticism that is striking. The intonation in the andante pianissimo passages was well up to the Boston standard.

The variations on a theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56A, (Brahms) introduced a number full of melody of the simpler sort and much Haydenesque, tho ecclesiastical color predominant. The theme was taken from an unpublished divertimenti for wind instruments and rewritten by Brahms for string and wind, as was played by Dr. Muck. The piece holds much of beauty in tone coloring. Schuman's Overture to "Genoveva," op. 81, opened the program and Weber's Overture to the opera, "Der Freischutz," was the concluding offering. The horns play a beautiful part song of churchly hearing in the opening bars, which soon gives way to vivace passages of brilliancy. The strings did excellent work in this number. The tonal qualities were of a warm and rich sonority.

Anton Witek concert master of the orchestra, played Max Bruch's Concerto for violin No. 1 in G minor, Op. 26, with full orchestra accompaniment. He received an ovation at the conclusion of the two movements. His upper tones rang with clarity and confidence, and the number was played with a dignity that was admirable.

DETROIT FREE PRESS:

JANUARY 31, 1915.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES

So Many Features No Particular Number Can Be Praised Over Others.

HERR ANTON WITEK IS MASTERFUL VIOLINIST

Ropartz Symphony is Given to Most Eloquent and Absorbing Discourse.

So much excellence centered in the concert given in the armory Saturday evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra that it is not easy to pick and choose and say that this or that was the feature of peculiar interest.

The appearance of the band itself is always an event of especial moment in this city. The organization comes only annually, and Detroit generally is its extreme western point. So the concert-goers of this city are properly grateful for the favor granted them by the incomparable among orchestras.

Generally, too, the Boston orchestra has something intrinsically very much worth while to offer. Last evening it presented for its principal number the Fourth symphony in C major of Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz, and by way of solo attraction, the great Bruch G minor concerto for violin, the performing artist being Witek, concert master of the band and a violinist of no mean standing among the great ones of the time. Besides this the orchestra played the overture to Schumann's "Genoveva," Brahm's melodious and sparkling variations on a Haydn theme, and finally the never old overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz." How Dr. Muck expanded the famous horn theme at the opening of this overture, expanded it until the familiar and venerable glories shone out in a wholly new luster. And what vitality, what directness and sincerity stood out from the whole length and breadth of the work. How true it rang, how its melodies and its portents caught the imagination even under the shadow of the complexities and emotions of the Ropartz symphony.

This Ropartz symphony is given to most eloquent and absorbing discourse. Philip Hale says it is cyclic. It might also be termed rhapsodic, if a rhapsody can have narrative. It runs through a full half hour of uninterrupted playing and in that time it presents a panorama of moods that carries one from the mountains to the seas, from the sublimity of the wide open spaces to the calm of the scheme pastoral, even to the humorous. There is no set program. The composer has not told the world his inner thought, but a program is unnecessary to the enlivened imagination. A program would turn poetry to prose. The atmospheres of the symphony are electrically charged. Its tonal colorings are varied, but not with rainbow hues, rather with the manifold graduations between the primaries. Now and anon it bursts out in shadings that are astonishing. All of which might be summed up in one sentence: The work is modern. It is modern not with the primitive passion of the Russian school, but with the intricate sophistication of the French school at its higher levels. Being this it is thoroughly acceptable to the modern musical palate.

Herr Witek has been heard here before. Last evening he possessed a vehicle worthy of his skill and he played the mighty concerto with authority, and happily to an irreproachable and inspired accompaniment from the band.

HE DETROIT TIMES,

FEBRUARY 1, 1915.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Perfection, As Usual

For the majority of music-lovers the climax of the local musical season was reached in the visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Saturday evening, when that incomparable organization gave its annual concert in the armory, under the auspices of the Detroit Orchestral association. Dr. Karl Muck, the director, had 100 players on the platform. The audience was the largest of the season—appreciative, enthusiastic, representative. The millionaire brushed coats with the workman who deprived himself of necessities, perhaps, to find the price of a standing room ticket that he might listen to the greatest symphonic body the world knows, not even excepting the wonderful orchestras of Europe.

The program presented the Symphony in C major by Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz, director of the Conservatoire in Nancy, France, and one of the most ultra-modern of the French school. The symphony was first performed in Paris, in 1911, from manuscript composed a year previous, and was introduced to America by Dr. Muck and the Boston orchestra. It is played continuously, requiring about 35 minutes to perform. The work is one of remarkable tonal magnitude and clever use of the instruments of the orchestra. The explanatory note on the program states that Ropartz is a pupil of Caesar Franck, and that the influence of this master is clearly shown in the symphony. It would seem also that Ropartz, thoroughly French as he is, was influenced also by Wagner and Strauss, for the work is remindful of these great German musical dramatists.

Schumann's overture to the opera "Genoveva," Weber's overture to the opera "Der Freischutz," and Brahms' Variations on a theme by Haydn, were the other offerings of the orchestra.

There never is any criticism to be made of the Boston orchestra, either in what it plays, or the manner in which it plays. Perfection has become synonymous for its name. There is only one symphonic body of its kind, with its exquisite, velvety tone, its wonderful precision, its magic grasp of every composition whose beauties it reveals to the hearers, its array of gifted, experienced players whose work is that of one man. The orchestra has seldom been heard to greater advantage in Detroit than on Saturday evening, although, perhaps on previous visits, it has offered programs that have found readier response from the audience.

Anton Witek, the concertmeister of the orchestra, repeated the success he achieved on a former appearance as solo artist. He played Bruch's concerto for violin in G minor, magnificently. Mr. Witek is a violinist whose name should stand high in the list of the masters of this instrument. His tone is virile, pure, warm, and lovely, and he produced effects of color that a painter with a palette and brush might have envied. The orchestral accompaniment rounded out a presentation that will remain long in grateful memory of all privileged to hear it.

ELLA MAE HAWTHORNE.

From NEWS
Address Providence, R. I.
Date FEB 3 1915

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Frieda Hempel, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera company, was the soloist at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra given last evening in Infantry hall, before the usual large audience.

The concert last evening was led by Assitant Conductor Schmidt, as Dr. Muck the conductor was unable to attend. This was the first time this season that the able leader of the symphony has been absent. His assistant, however, performed his duties in an efficient and accomplished manner.

Last night's program was for the most part of a classic nature, the selections covering a period of more than a century and a half, from Bach to Liszt.

Especially pleasing was Hayden's symphony "The Surprise," which while not heard in this city in many years, was nevertheless well received and thoroughly enjoyed by those who were privileged to hear it as given by the Boston orchestra last evening. The symphony offers a field for well developed ability and such was shown by the Boston musicians last evening.

The other numbers on the program were given with the same pleasing effect, the beautiful shepherd's music from Bach's Christmas Oratorio and Lists's "March of the Three Holy Kings" being appreciated about as much as any of the other numbers.

Frieda Hampel showed her ability as a soprano accustomed to carrying out the higher notes with sweetness of tone and expression, "Marten aller Arten" bringing forth many recalls. Such was also the case when she sang "Mireille."

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony will be given on March 2, at which time Anton Witek, the concert master of the symphony will be the soloist.

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 16 1915

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Heard in Its Fourth Concert for the Season at the Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in its fourth concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening, when, under the direction of Dr Karl Muck, it presented a program which had Sibelius' symphony in E minor as its principal feature. Sibelius is better known to concert-goers by his "Swan of Tuonela" and his "Valse Tristo" than by his symphonies, which have not achieved any very great degree of popularity. Of the four which he has written the one that was played last night is unquestionably the most sympathetic and immediately effective. It is saturated no less than the other three with the national sentiment and its predominant tone is therefore sombre and sorrowful, but there is so much melodic beauty in the themes which it employs and they are developed with so much ability and power that no intelligent listener can fail to be interested and impressed.

It was wonderfully well done, with the utmost brilliancy and refinement of execution, with an admirable quality of tone and with an extraordinary poignancy of expression, and the audience showed by the heartiness of its applause how greatly it had been pleased. Other orchestral numbers on an especially attractive program were Brahms' amazingly skillful variations on a theme by Haydn and the "Carneval" overture of Dvorak. The assisting artists were Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack, whose very artistic performance of Bach's seldom heard double concerto for two violins and string orchestra was a pleasant and notable incident of the occasion. The fifth and last of these concerts will take place on Monday evening, March 15. The series has been most successful and last night's audience once more filled the house.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT THE ACADEMY

Bach Concerto for Two Violins Played by Witek and Noack.

PROGRAM

Sibelius..........First Symphony, E Minor
Bach.......Concerto, D Minor, for two violins and string orchestra
Brahms..........Variations on a Haydn Theme
Dvorak....................."Carnival" overture

From the fourth of the five local opportunities accorded this season to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the audience that filled the Academy to its capacity last evening carried away the renewed impression of the singular richness and purity of the unified tonal volume of the strings, and the undemonstrative yet demonstrated genius of Doctor Muck's leadership.

The weather was far from propitious for the revelation of the qualities that were made manifest in brilliant defiance of the atmospheric conditions. A constraining lyric impetus was felt throughout the temperamental work of Sibelius, with its vitalizing pulse-beat of patriotic

---

The violins sang with one golden voice through the first movement; the interwoven flute notes of the Andante, the sublime clod-hopping of the kettle drums in the ponderous dancing rhythm of the Allegro, the gradual upbuilding of the crescendo to a towering climax in the fugato passage of the finale, and the skilful obligato of the harp in many episodes were details inseparable in the hearing from the firm, coherent texture of a stirring interpretation. The work of the clarinet throughout the evening was distinguished, and especially in the symphony its rich tone-color told for its full and plaintive value. The work was played January 6 and 7, 1911, by our own Orchestra, when it made a deep impression.

With the retirement of the brasses from the scene, the strings outdid themselves in the Concerto, and the delicious dialogue of the violins of Mr. Witek and Mr. Noack, associates at the first desk of the violins, was so exquisite an alternation that it was hard to tell when the leadership shifted from one to the other. Mr. Witek's tone at the very first was a trifle forced and rasping. In the Largo the commingled sound of the two instruments was almost the last word of beautiful refinement and sonority.

A satisfying aspect of the concert was that the orchestra itself was the virtuoso, and the absence of a "soloist" was welcome rather than regrettable, by way of variety.

The Brahms Variations, not unfamiliar to our audiences, proved again their inspired and melodious comprehension of the spirit of their text, hand in hand with a sheer delight in the exuberance of polyphonic invention on Brahms' own part. The Dvorak "Carnival" made a rousing ultimatum, in which the clear precision of accent on the part of the first violins was particularly noteworthy in an ensemble of inspiriting animation.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 16 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Sibelius, Bach and Brahms Figure on Fourth Program.

A program of decided interest though of somewhat unusual quality was that chosen by Dr. Karl Muck for the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy last night. There was no doubt about the excellence of the numbers presented; nor was there any questioning of the capable manner in which they were interpreted by Doctor Muck's musicians, though perhaps a more distinctive and less familiar selection than Dvorak's "Carnival" overture as the final piece might have been found without great difficulty.

Jan Sibelius' Symphony No. 1 in E minor gained hearty recognition, the orchestra handling the startling effects in which the Finnish composer's intricate work abounds, with exceeding grace, developing to the full its striking modulations and often prankish fancies.

From the outset the consummate finish and balance of the ensemble were apparent as was the artistry with which Doctor Muck displayed the remarkable tonal qualities of his band.

Mr. Witek, concert-master, and Mr. Noack, assistant concert-master, exhibited what approached perfection in the rendition of Bach's Concerto in D minor for two violins and orchestra. The work of the principals in the intricate passages of Father Bach was well co-ordinated and charmingly displayed upon the sonorous background of string obligato furnished by the conservative and restrained co-operation of violins, violas, 'cellos and basses.

Delicacy and elegance marked the playing of Brahms' "Variations on a Haydn Theme," a composition that puts a conductor on his mettle to weave comprehensively the ingenious ramifications of the complex, though agile, elaborations of the musical text.

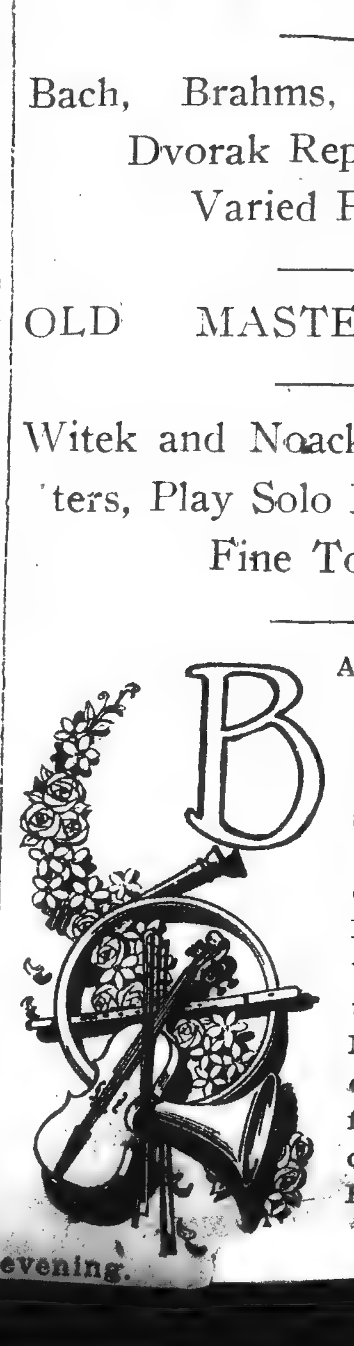
From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 16 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINE MIXED CONCERT

Bach, Brahms, Sibelius and Dvorak Represented in Varied Program

OLD MASTERS APPEAL

Witek and Noack, Concert Masters, Play Solo Passages With Fine Tonality



BACH and Brahms in somewhat fantastic vein, with Jan Sibelius' stormy, wailing E minor symphony and Dvorak's Bohemian "Carneval" overture—this was Doctor Muck's musical offering at the fourth academy concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening.

The Finnish composer's work was placed first on the program—for the excellent reason that its thunderous crashes would have quite obliterated all gracious memory of the Bach concerto for two violins and string orchestra, as well as of Brahm's ingenious and highly enjoyable variations on a Haydn theme—a chorale, or song without words, originally written for woodwind and horns.

This latter number afforded ample scope for the peculiar orchestral virtuosity of Doctor Muck's band of musicians—the exigent Brahms, who wrote into it about all the technical difficulties imaginable, could scarcely have conceived a more perfect rendering of his complex score.

The Bach music was the real "piece de resistance" of the evening—the inexhaustible melodic invention of the old master still appeals to jaded ears as something wonderful and rare, even amid the torrential pyrotechnics of modern musical reo-impressionists.

The orchestra's duo of concert masters, Messrs. Witek and Noack, played Bach's solo passages with fine tonality and unobtrusive proficiency. Herr Noack has a violin of rare concert quality—it boomed through the house like a big Strad.

There was a crowded house, despite inclement weather, and applause after the fantastic close of the symphony and after the lovely slow movement of the Bach concerto was unusually vociferous and prolonged.

HIGH SCHOOL PREPARES

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date FEB 13 1915

Why Baltimore Does Not Support The Philharmonic.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EVENING SUN:

Sir—I read with much interest in THE EVENING SUN of Wednesday the answer of Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory, to the criticism of the city's musical taste by Josef Stransky, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Stransky had complained especially of the small audience of Monday night.

Mr. Stransky forgot, or possibly was woefully ignorant, that there were two large theatre parties, each followed by a supper, that same night. He certainly could not expect such a small affair as a Philharmonic concert, with only Gabrilowitsch as soloist, playing the simple little concerto in E minor by Chopin, to interfere with such delectable entertainments. He may ask "Why give theatre parties on the night of the concert? They would not be given on a Boston Symphony night." Certainly not; but remember that the Boston Symphony is the fad and the New York Philharmonic is not.

You need not tell us that as a rule the programs of Mr. Stransky are far more attractive than those of Mr. Muck; that does not count against a fashion. Let the Philharmonic give a concert for the benefit of the Belgians, the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals or any other such charity if it wants a crowd. Or since the concert is over by 10.30 o'clock, why not have dancing afterward? There really should be something more to attract the public than a program such as we had last Monday night, played by such an orchestra in such a manner.

MRS. O. N. B.

Baltimore, Feb. 12.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 16 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Sibelius Work as a Feature of Concert Program

With the Sibelius Symphony in E minor as the most important offering on the program, the Boston Orchestra aroused the large audience in the Academy of Music last night to a keen appreciation of the fine intellect possessed by the man who led this monumental symphony in so clear and finished a style that it appealed to all. The Sibelius work has been heard here before, but never in such a manner as it was given last night. Dr. Muck has the rare faculty of making every page of so involved a work seem simple and easy of comprehension. Passages that seemed confused and muddled stood forth as clear and fine as music much simpler in form and construction would appear. It is a glorious work that was beautifully played and wonderfully interpreted.

The double concerto in D Minor of Bach, played by Witek and Noack had a potent charm for those who revel in the classic form, and displayed the admirable style possessed by both artists. The accompaniment by the strings of the orchestra gave just the proper degree of support, and was an enjoyable feature. The Brahms' variations on the Haydn Theme, commonly known as the "Chorale St. Antoni," although the theme is evidently of German folk-song origin, were interestingly played, but were as tiresome, as variations usually are. The brilliant, but at no time noisy, "Carnival" Overture of Dvorak, completed the program.

[illegible] Witek, concert master of the band and a violinist of no mean standing among the great ones of the time. Besides this the orchestra played the overture to Schumann's "Genoveva," Brahm's melodious and sparkling variations on a Haydn theme, and finally the never old overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz." How Dr. Muck expanded the famous horn theme at the opening of this overture, expanded it until the familiar and venerable glories shone out in a wholly new luster. And what vitality, what directness and sincerity stood out from the whole length and breadth of the work. How true it rang, how its melodies and its portents caught the imagination even under the shadow of the complexities and emotions of the Ropartz symphony.

This Ropartz symphony is given to most eloquent and absorbing discourse. Philip Hale says it is cyclic. It might also be termed rhapsodic, if a rhapsody can have narrative. It runs through a full half hour of uninterrupted playing and in that time it presents a panorama of moods that carries one from the mountains to the seas, from the sublimity of the wide open spaces to the calm of the scheme pastoral, even to the humorous. There is no set program. The composer has not told the world his inner thought, but a program is unnecessary to the enlivened imagination. A program would turn poetry to prose. The atmospheres of the symphony are electrically charged. Its tonal colorings are varied, but not with rainbow hues, rather with the manifold graduations between the primaries Now and anon it bursts out in shadings that are astonishing. All of which might be summed up in one sentence: The work is modern. It is modern not with the primitive passion of the Russian school, but with the intricate sophistication of the French school at its higher levels. Being this it is thoroughly acceptable to the modern musical palate.

Herr Witek has been heard here before. Last evening he possessed a vehicle worthy of his skill and he played the mighty concerto with authority, and happily to an irreproachable and inspired accompaniment from the band.

'HE DETROIT TIMES,

FEBRUARY 1, 1915.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Perfection, As Usual

For the majority of music-lovers the climax of the local musical season was reached in the visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Saturday evening, when that incomparable organization gave its annual concert in the armory, under the auspices of the Detroit Orchestral association. Dr. Karl Muck, the director, had 100 players on the platform. The audience was the largest of the season—appreciative, enthusiastic, representative. The millionaire brushed coats with the workman who deprived himself of necessities, perhaps, to find the price of a standing room ticket that he might listen to the greatest symphonic body the world knows, not even excepting the wonderful orchestras of Europe.

The program presented the Symphony in C major by Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz, director of the Conservatoire in Nancy, France, and one of the most ultra-modern of the French school. The symphony was first performed in Paris, in 1911, from manuscript composed a year previous, and was introduced to America by Dr. Muck and the Boston orchestra. It is played continuously, requiring about 35 minutes to perform. The work is one of remarkable tonal magnitude and clever use of the instruments of the orchestra. The explanatory note on the program states that Ropartz is a pupil of Caesar Franck, and that the influence of this master is clearly shown in the symphony. It would seem also that Ropartz, thoroughly French as he is, was influenced also by Wagner and Strauss, for the work is remindful of these great German musical dramatists.

Schumann's overture to the opera "Genoveva," Weber's overture to the opera "Der Freischutz," and Brahms' Variations on a theme by Haydn, were the other offerings of the orchestra.

There never is any criticism to be made of the Boston orchestra, either in what it plays, or the manner in which it plays. Perfection has become synonymous for its name. There is only one symphonic body of its kind, with its exquisite, velvety tone, its wonderful precision, its magic grasp of every composition whose beauties it reveals to the hearers, its array of gifted, experienced players whose work is that of one man. The orchestra has seldom been heard to greater advantage in Detroit than on Saturday evening, although, perhaps on previous visits, it has offered programs that have found readier response from the audience.

Anton Witek, the concertmeister of the orchestra, repeated the success he achieved on a former appearance as solo artist. He played Bruch's concerto for violin in G minor, magnificently. Mr. Witek is a violinist whose name should stand high in the list of the masters of this instrument. His tone is virile, pure, warm, and lovely, and he produced effects of color that a painter with a palette and brush might have envied. The orchestral accompaniment rounded out a presentation that will remain long in grateful memory of all privileged to hear it.

ELLA MAE HAWTHORNE.

From NEWS

Address Providence, R. I.

Date FEB 3 1915

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Frieda Hempel, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera company, was the soloist at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra given last evening in Infantry hall, before the usual large audience.

The concert last evening was led by Assitant Conductor Schmidt, as Dr. Muck the conductor was unable to attend. This was the first time this season that the able leader of the symphony has been absent. His assistant, however, performed his duties in an efficient and accomplished manner.

Last night's program was for the most part of a classic nature, the selections covering a period of more than a century and a half, from Bach to Liszt.

Especially pleasing was Hayden's symphony "The Surprise," which while not heard in this city in many years, was nevertheless well received and thoroughly enjoyed by those who were privileged to hear it as given by the Boston orchestra last evening. The symphony offers a field for well developed ability and such was shown by the Boston musicians last evening.

The other numbers on the program were given with the same pleasing effect, the beautiful shepherd's music from Bach's Christmas Oratorio and Lists's "March of the Three Holy Kings" being appreciated about as much as any of the other numbers.

Frieda Hampel showed her ability as a soprano accustomed to carrying out the higher notes with sweetness of tone and expression, "Marten aller Arten" bringing forth many recalls. Such was also the case when she sang "Mireille."

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony will be given on March 2, at which time Anton Witek, the concert master of the symphony will be the soloist.

From INQUIRER

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date FEB 16 1915

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Heard in Its Fourth Concert for the Season at the Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in its fourth concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening, when, under the direction of Dr Karl Muck, it presented a program which had Sibelius' symphony in E minor as its principal feature. Sibelius is better known to concert-goers by his "Swan of Tuonela" and his "Valse Tristo" than by his symphonies, which have not achieved any very great degree of popularity. Of the four which he has written the one that was played last night is unquestionably the most sympathetic and immediately effective. It is saturated no less than the other three with the national sentiment and its predominant tone is therefore sombre and sorrowful, but there is so much melodic beauty in the themes which it employs and they are developed with so much ability and power that no intelligent listener can fail to be interested and impressed.

It was wonderfully well done, with the utmost brilliancy and refinement of execution, with an admirable quality of tone and with an extraordinary poignancy of expression, and the audience showed by the heartiness of its applause how greatly it had been pleased. Other orchestral numbers on an especially attractive program were Brahms' amazingly skillful variations on a theme by Haydn and the "Carneval" overture of Dvorak. The assisting artists were Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack, whose very artistic performance of Bach's seldom heard double concerto for two violins and string orchestra was a pleasant and notable incident of the occasion. The fifth and last of these concerts will take place on Monday evening, March 15. The series has been most successful and last night's audience once more filled the house.

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT THE ACADEMY

Bach Concerto for Two Violins Played by Witek and Noack.

PROGRAM

Sibelius..............First Symphony, E Minor
Bach.......Concerto, D Minor, for two violins and string orchestra.
Brahms.........Variations on a Haydn Theme
Dvorak..........................."Carnival" overture

From the fourth of the five local opportunities accorded this season to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the audience that filled the Academy to its capacity last evening carried away the renewed impression of the singular richness and purity of the unified tonal volume of the strings, and the undemonstrative yet demonstrated genius of Doctor Muck's leadership.

The weather was far from propitious for the revelation of the qualities that were made manifest in brilliant defiance of the atmospheric conditions. A constraining lyric impetus was felt throughout the temperamental work of Sibelius, with its vitalizing pulse-beat of patriotic feeling.

The violins sang with one golden voice through the first movement; the interwoven flute notes of the Andante, the sublime clod-hopping of the kettle drums in the ponderous dancing rhythm of the Allegro, the gradual upbuilding of the crescendo to a towering climax in the fugato passage of the finals, and the skilful obligato of the harp in many episodes were details inseparable in the hearing from the firm, coherent texture of a stirring interpretation. The work of the clarinet throughout the evening was distinguished, and especially in the symphony its rich tone-color told for its full and plaintive value. The work was played January 6 and 7, 1911, by our own Orchestra, when it made a deep impression.

With the retirement of the brasses from the scene, the strings outdid themselves in the Concerto, and the delicious dialogue of the violins of Mr. Witek and Mr. Noack, associates at the first desk of the violins, was so exquisite an alternation that it was hard to tell when the leadership shifted from one to the other. Mr. Witek's tone at the very first was a trifle forced and rasping. In the Largo the commingled sound of the two instruments was almost the last word of beautiful refinement and sonority.

A satisfying aspect of the concert was that the orchestra itself was the virtuoso, and the absence of a "soloist" was welcome rather than regrettable, by way of variety.

The Brahms Variations, not unfamiliar to our audiences, proved again their inspired and melodious comprehension of the spirit of their text, hand in hand with a sheer delight in the exuberance of polyphonic invention on Brahms' own part. The Dvorak "Carnival" made a rousing ultimatum, in which the clear precision of accent on the part of the first violins was particularly noteworthy in an ensemble of inspiriting animation.

From EVENING TELEGRAM

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 6 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Sibelius, Bach and Brahms Figure on Fourth Program.

A program of decided interest though of somewhat unusual quality was that chosen by Dr. Karl Muck for the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy last night. There was no doubt about the excellence of the numbers presented; nor was there any questioning of the capable manner in which they were interpreted by Doctor Muck's musicians, though perhaps a more distinctive and less familiar selection than Dvorak's "Carnival" overture as the final piece might have been found without great difficulty.

Jan Sibelius' Symphony No. 1 in E minor gained hearty recognition, the orchestra handling the startling effects in which the Finnish composer's intricate work abounds, with exceeding grace, developing to the full its striking modulations and often prankish fancies.

From the outset the consummate finish and balance of the ensemble were apparent as was the artistry with which Doctor Muck displayed the remarkable tonal qualities of his band.

Mr. Witek, concert-master, and Mr. Noack, assistant concert-master, exhibited what approached perfection in the rendition of Bach's Concerto in D minor for two violins and orchestra. The work of the principals in the intricate passages of Father Bach was well co-ordinated and charmingly displayed upon the sonorous background of string obligato furnished by the conservative and restrained co-operation of violins, violas, 'cellos and basses.

Delicacy and elegance marked the playing of Brahms' "Variations on a Haydn Theme," a composition that puts a conductor on his mettle to weave comprehensively the ingenious ramifications of the complex, though agile, elaborations of the musical text.

From NORTH AMERICAN

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

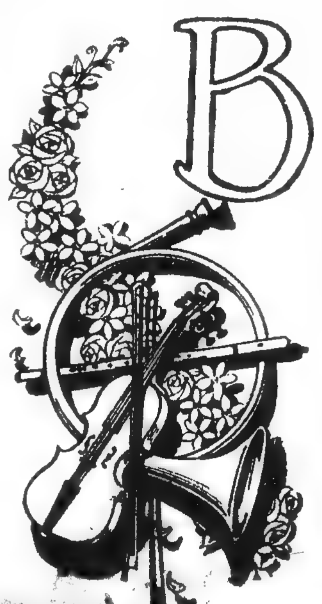
Date FEB 16 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINE MIXED CONCERT

Bach, Brahms, Sibelius and Dvorak Represented in Varied Program

OLD MASTERS APPEAL

Witek and Noack, Concert Masters, Play Solo Passages With Fine Tonality



BACH and Brahms in somewhat fantastic vein, with Jan Sibelius' stormy, wailing E minor symphony and Dvorak's Bohemian "Carneval" overture—this was Doctor Muck's musical offering at the fourth academy concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening.

The Finnish composer's work was placed first on the program—for the excellent reason that its thunderous crashes would have quite obliterated all gracious memory of the Bach concerto for two violins and string orchestra, as well as of Brahm's ingenious and highly enjoyable variations on a Haydn theme—a chorale, or song without words, originally written for woodwind and horns.

This latter number afforded ample scope for the peculiar orchestral virtuosity of Doctor Muck's band of musicians—the exigent Brahms, who wrote into it about all the technical difficulties imaginable, could scarcely have conceived a more perfect rendering of his complex score.

The Bach music was the real "piece de resistance" of the evening—the inexhaustible melodic invention of the old master still appeals to jaded ears as something wonderful and rare, even amid the torrential pyrotechnics of modern musical reo-impressionists.

The orchestra's duo of concert masters, Messrs. Witek and Noack, played Bach's solo passages with fine tonality and unobtrusive proficiency. Herr Noack has a violin of rare concert quality—it boomed through the house like a big Strad.

There was a crowded house, despite inclement weather, and applause after the fantastic close of the symphony and after the lovely slow movement of the Bach concerto was unusually vociferous and prolonged.

HIGH SCHOOL PREPARES

From EVENING SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date FEB 13 15

Why Baltimore Does Not Support The Philharmonic.

To THE EDITOR OF THE EVENING SUN:

Sir—I read with much interest in THE EVENING SUN of Wednesday the answer of Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory, to the criticism of the city's musical taste by Josef Stransky, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Stransky had complained especially of the small audience of Monday night.

Mr. Stransky forgot, or possibly was woefully ignorant, that there were two large theatre parties, each followed by a supper, that same night. He certainly could not expect such a small affair as a Philharmonic concert, with only Gabrilowitsch as soloist, playing the simple little concerto in E minor by Chopin, to interfere with such delectable entertainments. He may ask "Why give theatre parties on the night of the concert? They would not be given on a Boston Symphony night." Certainly not; but remember that the Boston Symphony is the fad and the New York Philharmonic is not.

You need not tell us that as a rule the programs of Mr. Stransky are far more attractive than those of Mr. Muck; that does not count against a fashion. Let the Philharmonic give a concert for the benefit of the Belgians, the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals or any other such charity if it wants a crowd. Or since the concert is over by 10.30 o'clock, why not have dancing afterward? There really should be something more to attract the public than a program such as we had last Monday night, played by such an orchestra in such a manner.

MRS. O. N. B.

Baltimore, Feb. 12.

From RECORD

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date FEB 16 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Sibelius Work as a Feature of Concert Program.

With the Sibelius Symphony in E minor as the most important offering on the program, the Boston Orchestra aroused the large audience in the Academy of Music last night to a keen appreciation of the fine intellect possessed by the man who led this monumental symphony in so clear and finished a style that it appealed to all. The Sibelius work has been heard here before, but never in such a manner as it was given last night. Dr. Muck has the rare faculty of making every page of so involved a work seem simple and easy of comprehension. Passages that seemed confused and muddled stood forth as clear and fine as music much simpler in form and construction would appear. It is a glorious work that was beautifully played and wonderfully intepreted.

The double concerto in D Minor of Bach, played by Witek and Noack had a potent charm for those who revel in the classic form, and displayed the admirable style possessed by both artists. The accompaniment by the strings of the orchestra gave just the proper degree of support, and was an enjoyable feature. The Brahms' variations on the Haydn Theme, commonly known as the "Chorale St. Antoni," although the theme is evidently of German folk-song origin, were interestingly played, but were as tiresome, as variations usually are. The brilliant, but at no time noisy, "Carnival" Overture of Dvorak, completed the program.

14

From HERALD

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date FEB

MOZART AND STRAUSS WORK CONTRASTED

Boston Symphony Orchestra Presents Compositions of Two in Program at National Theater.

Estal 184

The Boston Symphony Orchestra program at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon contained two works of the type that come under the broad general description of formal. These were the "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart and Bach's Suite in B minor for flute and strings. The strict contrapuntal lines of the suite lends an austerity of character in contrast with the genial Mozart Symphony. The close-knit strength of the Bach also is in contrast with the lightness and grace of the Mozart melodies. The Badinerie of this suite is one of those bits that leap over succeeding generations and vie with modern music for freshness and moderness.

Dr. Muck's pre-eminence in Germany as a reader of Mozart is well known, and concert-goers yesterday were prepared to hear of outline, shading, phrasing, and perspective that could not be bettered in imagination, and the highest expectation was fully realized.

The last half of the program was made up of Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" and Dvorak's "Carnival." One kind of musical beauty in this program was set over against another; the grace and symmetry of Mozart against the vitality of sharp contracts and the pungent vigor of a prevalence of dissonances in the Strauss work. A taste for Strauss, acquired or otherwise, means that your intelligence is up with the times; that you are capable of seeing a rapid succession of picturesque musical situations. Those who profess not to care for Mozart say he is too highly polished, that he has sacrificed depth to formal refinement. The Mozartean, on the other hand is entitled to feel exclusive, as guardian and encourager of the sublime, the lovely, the exquisite. The "Carnival" of Dvorak was a fine closing number, full of fire and vigor.

G. S. W.

From POST

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date FEB

DR. MUCK IN FINE FORM.

Reveals Many Sidedness in Excellent Symphony Orchestra Program.

Establish

Dr. Muck was heard in the all-orchestral concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon in a program that revealed not only his masterly work as a conductor, but a greater temperamental breadth than any one of his programs have given us before this season. He was supreme as the classicist in Mozart and Bach, and again in the Strauss and Dvorak numbers he was the dramatist and spiritedly forceful. Mr. Andre Maquarre, the first flute player of the orchestra, as soloist, played not only with exceptional beauty, but also with a gratifying understanding of ensemble that further showed his artistry.

The Mozart "Jupiter" symphony, C major, is full of beautiful melody and rhythm that was given with truly exquisite flow and fineness. There were many moments of sheer perfection in it, the crescendo in the andante and its finale, the rare playing and intonation of the minuetto, and the wind trio, and again the beauty of the figures in the fugue, in which Dr. Muck was supreme master.

The Bach B minor suite, No. 2, for flute and strings, with its seven gems in its seven sections, was a progressive climax for the solo instrument, which Mr. Maquarre handled with warmth of tone and a mellow beauty in all his themes, vitalizing the "Sarabande" with romantic feeling in its sadness; working up through true beauty in the "Polonaise;" embellishing the "Minuet;" until in the "Badinerie" he gave free virtuosity. This suite shows the greatness of Bach; its orchestral richness of voices, with the vitality and sweep of full orchestra, however, are from the Hans von Bulow arrangement, and Dr. Muck painted them in warm colors and great variety.

It was a model program, for the intermission separated the classics from the dramatic story of "Don Juan" told in all the fullness of the modern orchestra of Richard Strauss, with sweeping beauty and exalted soaring of the strings with the harp, vigor and sentiment being contrasted, though sometimes a sentiment that is sentimental, with a few Strauss eccentricities. The hushed finale was set apart with rare skill, feeling, and color.

In the brilliant, episodic "Carnival" overture of Dvorak, one was tempted to say "Those gypsies!" It was an inspiriting and delightful close to a broad and masterly concert.

J. MacB.

From AMERICAN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date FEB

DISCUSSES PROGRAM.

Director Harold Randolph made the coming Boston Symphony Orchestra program the subject of his lecture yesterday afternoon, laying special stress on the Brahms Symphony, which is the concert's principal feature. With the assistance of Messrs. Van Hulsteyn and Kahn he illustrated the Bach Concerto for two violins and orchestra.

Est 1884

The twentieth Peabody concert was given yesterday afternoon by pupils of Hulsteyn, Bochau and

---

From TIMES

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date FE

— ✤ —

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the National Theater yesterday afternoon as usual attracted a large and distinguished audience. Among the guests of the German ambassador, who occupied a box, were the Austro-Hungarian Ambassador and Madame Dumba, Madame Hauge, and Prince and Princess von Hatzfeldt.

Est 1884

Mrs. Marshall Field had a box and with her were Mrs. Patterson and Mrs. McCormick.

Mrs. Calderon Carlisle had with her Miss McMullen, Mrs. Sheridan, Mrs. Walter Andrews, and Mrs. Carlisle.

Mrs. William Crozier entertained at a box party. Mrs. Preston Gibson had in her box Mrs. Norman Williams, Mrs. Henry May, Mrs. Pitney, Miss Patten, and Mrs. Raymond Rodgers.

Mr. and Mrs. I. T. Mann had a box and with them were Dr. Anderson, of China; Mrs. Claude Swanson, and the Rev. Dr. Wallace Radcliffe.

Mr. and Mrs. Lisner had in their box Mrs. La Salle Pickett, Mrs. Ross Barnard, Mrs. Fred Stegmeyer, and Miss Hoffmann.

Mrs. De Loss Blodgett was in a box and with her was Mrs. Matthew T. Scott. Others in the audience were the Italian Ambassador and Countess Cellere, the Swiss Minister and Mme. Ritter, the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane, Mrs. Houston, Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Mrs. David Jayne Hill, Mrs. Albert L. Mills, Mrs. Kauffmann, Mrs. Joseph Sanger, Gen. and Mrs. Robert Shaw Oliver, Mrs. Frank Noyes, Miss Frances Noyes, Newbold Noyes, Mrs. Richardson Clover, the Misses Clover, Mrs. S. B. Williamson, Mrs. George Howard, Miss Margaret Perin, Viscountess de Sibour, Mrs. Clarence Moore, Miss Frances Moore, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hague, Lady Spring-Rice, Mrs. E. E. Rapley, Mrs. McKinney, the Swedish Minister and Mme. Ekengren, Mr. and Mrs. Larz Anderson, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Thomas Macdonald, Mrs. Amy Talbot, Mrs. Charles Wilson, Mrs. Hennen Jennings, Mrs. Chauncey Hackett, the Rev. F. Ward Denys, and the Misses Denys, Miss Elizabeth Hickey, Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Sothern, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, Mrs. Henry Sharpe, Mrs. Dodge, Samuel Pilson, Capt. and Mrs. John Gibbons, and Mrs. Ely.

— ✤ —

From PRESS

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date FEB 1 6 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS SIBELIUS

The Finnish Composer's First Big Work Received with Enthusiasm.

Est 1884

PROGRAM.

Sibelius..Symphony No. 1, in E minor, Op. 39.
Bach..Concerto in D minor, for two violins and orchestra of strings.
Brahms..Variations on a theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56a.
Dvorak....Overture, "Carnival," Op. 92
Conductor ....Dr. Karl Muck
Witek and Noack Play Concert.

The Boston Symphony gave the fourth concert of their present season at the Academy of Music last evening. There being no soloist, the audience was not as large as usual, but to those present this made no difference whatever, for instead Dr. Muck had arranged a most delightful program and utilized the two best violinists of the orchestra, Messrs. Witek and Noack, to play a concerto for two violins, assisted by an orchestra of strings. This was the second number on the program and was somewhat of a novelty. The concerto was written by Bach. It is not a very inspiring composition, in spite of the fact that the three movements were played with absolute command and finish, and it was listened to with marked attention and there was an enthusiasm at its finish which bespoke a full appreciation.

The program, as a whole, was presented without a flaw and in all four numbers there were opportunities in which most every choir of the large body was brought into prominence, even to a fine exhibition of the trumpets in the Brahms movement and considerable fine work for the harpist in the symphony.

Sibelius' Work Coherent.

The Sibelius Symphony No. 1 is modern and is quite familiar to recent concertgoers. It has won a firm place among the great works, for it combines all the elements that have rapidly brought the Finnish composer to the front rank. Sibelius is never misunderstood or incomprehensible. Every bar of this big work is closely connected with what precedes and what follows, in spite of the fact that in the four movements a great variety is presented. The third, the allegro movement, is short but most dainty and captivating through its fantastical themes. The big feature is the finale, although both movements, while distinctly different from the first part of the work, nevertheless shows a carefully woven idea that makes the entire composition coherent.

Orchestra Responds Nobly.

Dr. Muck's reading of the symphony had individuality about it, but most striking was the perfect response of the entire body to the dictates of baton that held absolute command. There was a dash and brilliancy even in the andante movements, which Dr. Muck never allowed to drag, as is not infrequently apparent in the slow deliberation with which some conductors feel disposed to treat these movements. The Brahms Variations is a fine and masterly effort, but Bach and Brahms present too little variety in the compositions given to please the average patrons, but the Dvorak Overture "Carnival," which closed the concert, was happily chosen to dispel any feeling of monotony which may have been created, and the spirited reading given this delightful overture was a happy ending of a concert that was deeply musical, even if not at all times sufficiently varied.

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony's present season will take place on Monday evening, [illegible]ch 15.

From POST

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date FEB

A smart audience as usual filled the National Theater yesterday afternoon for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. The German Ambassador occupied a box and among his guests were the Austro-Hungarian Ambassador and Mme. Dumba, Mme. Hauge and Prince and Princess von Hatzfeldt.

Es 884

Mrs. Marshall Field had a box and with her were Mrs. Patterson and Mrs. McCormick.

Mrs. Calderon Carlisle had a box and with her were Miss McMullen, Mrs. Sheridan, Mrs. Walter Andrews, and Mrs. Carlisle.

Mrs. William Crozier entertained at a box party. Mrs. Preston Gibson had in her box Mrs. Norman Williams, Mrs. Henry May, Mrs. Pitney, Miss Patten, and Mrs. Raymond Rodgers.

Mr. and Mrs. I. T. Mann had a box and with them were Dr. Anderson, of China; Mrs. Claude Swanson, and the Rev. Dr. Wallace Radcliffe.

Mr. and Mrs. Lisner had in their box Mrs. La Salle Pickett, Mrs. Ross Barnard, Mrs. Fred Stegmeyer, and Miss Hoffmann.

Mrs. De Loss Blodgett was in a box and with her was Mrs. Matthew T. Scott. Others in the audience were the Italian Ambassador and Countess Cellere, the Swiss Minister and Mme. Ritter, the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane, Mrs. Houston, Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Mrs. David Jayne Hill, Mrs. Albert L. Mills, Mrs. Kauffman, Mrs. Joseph Sanger, Gen. and Mrs. Robert Shaw Oliver, Mrs. Frank Noyes, Miss Frances Noyes, Mr. Newbold Noyes, Mrs. Richardson Clover, the Misses Clover, Mrs. S. B. Williamson, Mrs. George Howard, Miss Margaret Perin, Viscountess de Sibour, Mrs. Clarence Moore, Miss Frances Moore, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Hague, Lady Spring-Rice, Mrs. E. E. Rapley, Mrs. McKinney, the Swedish Minister and Mme. Ekengren, Mr. and Mrs. Larz Anderson, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Thomas Macdonald, Mrs. Amy Talbot, Mrs. Charles Wilson, Mrs. Hennen Jennings, Mrs. Chauncey Hackett, the Rev. Mr. Denys and the Misses Denys, Miss Elizabeth Hickey, Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Sothern, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, Mrs. Henry Sharpe, Mrs. Dodge, Mr. Samuel Pilson, Capt. and Mrs. John Gibbons, and Mrs. Ely.

From RECORD

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date FEB 1 4 1915

* * *

Sibelius, Bach, Brahms and Dvorak are the four composers represented on the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at its fourth Philadelphia concert in the Academy of Music, tomorrow evening. The first place on the program will be given to the great Finnish composer, whose first symphony, in E minor, will be played. Of the four symphonies that he has given to the world, the first seems to

rk, 1884

ANTON WITEK.

sound the highest note, melodically and emotionally. The second is rather more finished in workmanship, but lacks much of the strength of its predecessor. The third, from all accounts, is a failure. It was played at one of the English festivals a few years ago, and has not been heard of since. The fourth is an extraordinary effort which seems to show that Sibelius is seeking a new mode of expression, and by the same token shows that he has not yet found it. The first symphony which will be played here is ragged and wild, much after the fashion of some of his earlier tone-poems. By many it is regarded as the finest modern work in symphonic form.

Bach's Double Concerto for two violin and string orchestra, which will open the second part of the program, will enlist the services of solo violinists of Anton Witek, concert-master of the orchestra, and Sylvain Noack, second concert-master. Both of them are artists well skilled in the best traditions of Bach playing. Witek has appeared in the past in Philadelphia, as soloist with the orchestra.

The other two selections will be Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn (Chorale St. Antoni). No composer is more skilled in this form of composition and this set of variations shows Brahms at his best. The final offering will be the joful overture, "Carnival," of the Bohemian, Antonin Dvorak.

* * *

From EVENING TELEGRAM

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date FEB 2

MR. KREISLER'S RECITAL

Distinguished Austrian Violinist Attracts Crowded House.

Establis

If there be anything in the enlivening influence upon an artist of an audience appreciative and responsive, Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished Austrian violinist, who made his fifth appearance of the local season at the Academy yesterday afternoon, must surely have felt it. Certain it is that he played admirably, and not even his early season appearance with the Boston Orchestra, when he fairly accomplished the feat of taking first honors from Dr. Muck's band of virtuosi, did he display firmer command of his instrument or warmer or more sympathetic interpretation.

So numerous was the audience that several hundred could only find accomodation on the stage, and so enthusiastic that Mr. Kreisler was obliged to repeat several numbers and also to give encores. Yet, granting the stimulus of such an audience on the artist, the effect of Mr. Kreisler's art upon his hearers was equally decided.

His program was what a year ago would have seemed a typical choice for him to make: That Vivaldi concerto, which he has in a sense made his own: the Pugnani Prelude and Allegro, six short pieces, including a Bach Prelude and a Gavotte; Couperine's plaintive "Chanson Louis XIII" and its sequent, daintily mischievous "Pavanne" (the latter was demanded and played twice), Mr. Kreisler's own Introduction and Scherzo, two Slavonic dances of Dvorak in Mr. Kreisler's arrangement and, as a finale, his own "Tamoubourin Chinois." Such was his choice, and he played it as its generally delicate structure demanded, lightly, gladsomely and appealingly. His earlier appearances have been given over to music of more serious cast. It was said that the war from which he had so recently returned had so depressed him that lighter music had become repugnant. However that may be, his mood of yesterday, at least as he showed it to his audience, was without trace of despondency, and he communicated the sprightliness of the music to his hearers in no uncertain way. With the exception of the Dvorak Slavonic dance in G major, there was no number of the list without its playful, individual appeal.

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date FEB 1915

The feature of the fifth Boston Symphony Concert in Providence which will be given in Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening, March 2, will be the first appearance as soloists in Providence of Anton Witek, the eminent violinist, who is concert master of the orchestra. Mr. Witek is one of the world's greatest violinists and his appearances as soloist with the orchestra in Boston are always among the most notable events of the season. It is a rather curious fact that he has not appeared as soloist in Providence, but it has been due to a series of circumstances over which the management had no control.

Est

The programme comprises the First Symphony of the Finnish composer, Sibelius, Bruch's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in G-minor, No. 1, Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl" and Dvorak's "Carnaval" Overture.

From SUN
Address: New York City
FEB 21 1
Date

York, 18

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Programme of Good Music Played Admirably.

The fourth matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The seats and boxes were all occupied and the standing room was not left empty. The programme was one of no special importance. In fact, it was so unimportant as to suggest most pertinently the question why it was so. A Boston Symphony matinee audience is capable of absorbing matters of larger significance than some of those offered yesterday by Dr. Muck.

The first number was the E minor symphony, No. 1, of Sibelius. The other contributions were Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture (which had been played at the Metropolitan Opera House the previous evening), Haydn's G major ("Surprise") symphony, and Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture. It is hardly necessary to attempt any comment on a Boston orchestra performance of such a list. It was an afternoon of good music

---

From ~~DAILY PEOPLE~~ SUN
Address: New York City
FEB 19 1915
Date

Es 1884

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN BRAHMS MUSIC

First Symphony Played With Much Dignity and Tonal Beauty.

BACH CONCERTO ENJOYED

The February visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be remembered for the sake of last evening's concert at Carnegie Hall, even if tomorrow's matinee should prove to be much less interesting. The programme consisted of Brahms's C minor symphony, Beethoven's "Corrolan" overture, Bach's concerto for two violins and orchestra of strings, and Beethoven's "Leonore," No. 3, overture. The first and second concert masters, Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack, played the solo parts in the Bach number.

A concert such as this raises many questions, which, for the sake of peace, must be left unanswered. A long discussion of readings of the first symphony of Brahms, which has been read variously and amazingly in this patient town, might possibly interest a few, anger many, and do no jot of good to any. Yet something must be said here to commemorate a performance so filled with the spirit of the composer and so glowing with the life blood of pure musical beauty that it must have left every hearer of sensibility with nerves tingling and heart throbbing.

Dr. Muck accomplished his ends by the use of means simple in themselves, yet apparently beyond the reach of too many conductors. Avoiding the rash impetuosity of those who suppose temperament to be a raging and devouring thing, he took his tempi at a deliberate yet not loitering pace, and was thus able to make the developments of his light and shade with clarity and on such large lines that no ear could lose their effect.

Thus, too, he freed the long flowing phrases of the music, especially in the last movement, from that angularity which haste invariably imparts to them. And how pure and rare was the whole tonal atmosphere, rich in manifold delicate tints, glorified by flashes of splendid light, and finding its moments of repose in finely measured pianissimi which always sang.

Perfection of balance, exquisite finesse in the diminuendi and crescendi, military precision in attack and an indescribable elastic accuracy of unanimity in the progress of each phrase were the technical means which Dr. Muck applied to an unerring pursuit of the melos through every voice part and through every combination of instruments. That the reading possessed in an uncommon degree the lofty style of Brahms and that it published convincingly and eloquently the poetic moods of this extraordinary work of genius must have been clear to every hearer. The slow movement, which is excelled by perhaps only one other slow movement in all music, namely, that of Beethoven's ninth symphony, was sung with matchless eloquence.

The Bach double concerto has not been heard here since it was played at a Kneisel Quartet concert in Mendelssohn Hall by Messrs. Kneisel and Roentgen on February 23, 1909. The composition (in the opinion of at least one hearer) loses much by being played in so large an auditorium as that of Carnegie Hall.

It was not conceived as music for 3,000 hearers, but for intimate acquaintance of a few. For this reason the work is heard to better advantage when played as Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Roentgen played it; but it should not be inferred that last evening's performance was wanting in solid merit.

Mr. Witek and Mr. Noack are good violinists and they love Bach. Possibly a more marked contrast in the quality of tone of the two players would have made the performance more piquant in certain places, but its general spirit was sound and it gave pleas-

---

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
FEB 18 1915
Date

Es 1884

CRITIC PLEADS FOR LESS DUPLICATION

Sameness of Boston Orchestra Programs Here Matter for Regret.

Exceedingly familiar music by German composers only, was presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, at its fourth Baltimore concert of the season, at the Lyric last night. Lent having begun, it might well be imagined that musical Baltimore attended in such large numbers as voluntary penance a concert at which Brahms' first symphony and Beethoven's No. 3 Leonore overture were played again.

It should be said at once that the works played and the performances of the orchestra were excellent; and that the program contained two works by J. S. Bach rarely, indeed, heard played in this city by orchestras—the Shepherds' Music, from his Christmas oratorio, and the concerto in D minor, for two violins and string orchestra, the solos of which were played well by Messrs. Witek and Noack. But, allowing everything for the Bach pieces, their constitution of the smaller portion of the program and old atmosphere were anything except sufficient to contrast pleasingly — except in a purely academic way, in the present day — with compositions which are "played to death," relatively speaking, in this city by visiting orchestras, without reason.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays other programs in other cities. Why not in Baltimore? The Boston Symphony Orchestra includes more composition of the present age in its programs in other cities. Why not in Baltimore? The Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the greatest of the world's orchestras. Why is it that it plays in Baltimore such a small percentage of the thoroughly good orchestral literature? Why does it play here so many of the same pieces over and over again—stock pieces that all good orchestras play and to which orchestras of smaller caliber aspire? It is perfectly possible and easy for the managements of traveling orchestras not to duplicate to great extent one another's programs. Why is there so much duplication in Baltimore?

J. N. H.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
FEB 21 1915
Date

Est 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Orchestra Gives a Diverse Programme in Carnegie Hall.

At its concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra's programme brought forward Sibelius's Symphony No. 1 in E minor, a work which, though composed in 1899 and published in 1902, has only been heard here a few times. It is different in conception from the same composer's fourth symphony, played by Dr. Muck at a recent concert in Carnegie Hall, for the fourth has the atmosphere of "advance" about it, while the first concerns itself with conventional, if entirely modern, form and method.

As it was played yesterday, the first movement seemed the most interesting, for its emotional content was the most impressive and the rhythmic scheme was closer knit and "carried" more easily than was the case with other portions of the work. The whole symphony is pervaded with a melancholy tone, there is frequent use of phrases and harmonic groups distributed among the lower and less brilliant ranges of the wood-wind instruments, and the same idea is evident in all the melodic and harmonic tendencies of the composition. It is not tremendously subtle or elusive, but there is a good deal of interest about it.

Presumably as an attempt at contrast to this work, the second part of the programme was made up of the overture to "The Magic Flute," by Mozart, Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, and the overture to "Der Freischuetz," by Weber. These numbers all belong to the "old war horse" group of concert compositions, which are very frequently heard. It is difficult to see why Dr. Muck should have put all of them on the programme at once. Their threefold presence tended to make the latter half of the programme conventional and unexciting, even though they were not played in anything approaching a casual style. One would have liked to see the efforts of the great orchestra directed toward something whose total represented a little more variety and substance than the second part of the programme did.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
FEB 19 191
Date

Dr. Muck's Men Charm Hearers as Never Before

For all of the harsh modern novelties which among other things Dr. Karl Muck, the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has presented during the earlier concerts of his organization in this city he atoned last evening at the concert in Carnegie Hall by playing the first symphony of Brahms, which taken all in all was the most impressive piece of work heard at any orchestra concert this season. It took the audience by storm, and seldom have the men from Boston received such whole hearted applause. Most beautiful was the slow movement, but when it came to the climax of the last, which was played without a pause after the third, the effect was tremendous.

After the thrilling symphony the second part of the programme, made up of music of the two great predecessors of Brahms, whose names also begin with "B"—Beethoven and Bach—seemed like an anti-climax. The symphony left its impress on the hearers, and the mood for shorter works was wanting.

Two overtures of Beethoven were played—the overture to Collin's tragedy "Coriolanus" and at the end the "Leonore" overture No. 3.

The Bach number was the concerto in D minor for two violins and string orchestra, a seldom heard work. Messrs. Anton Witek and Sylvian Noack, who occupy the two first chairs in the orchestra, played the solo parts. Both are excellent Bach players and interesting soloists. Particularly noticeable was the full, round tone which came from the solo instruments. There was the usual large audience with

---

From DAILY PEOPLE
Address: New York City
FEB 19
Date

Est 1884

BOSTON ORCHESTRA GIVES THREE "B'S"

Brahms, Bach and Beethoven on the Programme of Symphony Players.

On the second visit of the Boston Orchestra to New York this season Dr. Muck gave its patrons considerably more music of the ultra modern sort than they were desirous, or capable, of assimilating. Last night, when the admirable band came back again to Carnegie Hall, it played nothing but familiar compositions—"familiar as the rose in spring and the crop in summer."

The symphony was Brahms's first, in C minor, and there were two overtures by Beethoven—that to "Coriolan" and the third of the "Leonore" set. Between the overtures came Bach's concerto for two violins, played by Anton Witek, the leader of the orchestra's violins, and Sylvester Noack, his assistant.

No one of experience would be tempted to call this a well chosen or well arranged programme. It was probably meant as a sign of appreciation of Dr. von Bülow's artistic trinity, the three B's; but that appreciation to all but one of the compositions was given by the music lovers of New York many years before Dr. Muck was born. So there remains nothing to say beyond an expression of admiration for the manner in which the beautiful pieces were played—all of them—the concert master and his assistant showing as much understanding of the style of the Bach period as they did devotion to the double concerto and appreciation of its ever-fresh beauty.

If there were any danger that music like the slow movement of this concerto could ever grow stale, the fact would reconcile an old amateur with his approaching end and even make him wish that his dissolution might precede the passing away of the people's love and understanding of its strains. It is a great pity that the enjoyment of the orchestra's playing, especially in the symphony, should have been clouded by the reflection that with just as good individual musicians in New York in orchestras bolstered up by million dollar endowments and $100,000 annual guarantees, we must wait for such artistic playing upon the visitors from the farther East.

H. E. K.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City
Date

Est 884

Again a chorus of praise arose from the most critical musical audience in this city after listening to Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. It was a strictly classical or academic programme, with Brahms' First Symphony at the opening and Beethoven's Third Overture to Leonore at the close. Bach's concerto for two violins was the chief delight of the evening, with Messrs. Witek and Noack, of the orchestra, as soloists.

From PRESS
Address: New York City
FEB 19 1915
Date

Es 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY RETURNS TO N. Y.

Carnegie Hall Audience Delighted by Dr. Muck's Programme.

BRAHMS PROMINENT

Two Overtures Also Are Given a Rendition Which Is Impressive.

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Carnegie Hall last night, after their midwinter absence, with a programme to which no true lover of music could have taken exception.

Brahms's Symphony in C minor, Beethoven's "Corolianus" and "Lenore" No 3 overtures, and between those two immortal compositions Bach's Concerto in D minor, for two violins and string orchestra, made up the list, and the treatment each work received by the musicians from the Hub under the stimulating baton of their leader gave unalloyed delight to a large and brilliant gathering.

As an interpreter of Brahms Dr. Muck won his first triumphs in this city. It was hardly surprising, therefore that the finely balanced, clear-cut and poetic reading he gave yesterday of the First Symphony evoked so much enthusiasm that the conductor asked his men to acknowledge the demonstration by rising in a body.

Impressive, too, were the performances of the two overtures, though a little more dramatic emphasis and rhythmical incisiveness would have heightened the effect of the "Leonore" No. 3—which was taken at a far more deliberate tempo than in the Metropolitan Opera Company's revival of "Fidelio"—without injuring the beautiful transparency and sharp definition of the instrumental picture.

But the concerto by Bach, with Anton Witek, the accomplished concert master of the orchestra, and S. Noack, his deskmate, playing the solo parts in a manner well-nigh flawless, proved to be decidedly one of the most enjoyable features of an evening that Boston Symphony subscribers are likely to treasure among their precious memories.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 20 1915
Date

Esta 84

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE

Concert at the Academy Delights Big Audience.

The fourth in a series of five Philharmonic Concerts, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Carl Muck, was given last night at the Academy of Music, before a very large and appreciative audience.

The programme included no single soloist last night, nor is one necessary at concerts by this organization, as the marvelous playing of the orchestra as a whole, the control and precision, the complete understanding of the compositions and the technical ability of the members make every number a delight.

Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," was the first number, followed by Ropartz's Fourth Symphony in C major, the two parts being played through without pause; Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan," Opus 20, and the concert closed with Beethoven's overture, "Leonore" No. 3.

The audience gave evidence of its appreciation by the rapturous applause that followed each number, and Dr. Muck had to acknowledge many times, even after having the orchestra rise and share the plaudits with him.

From SUN
Address: New York City
FEB 21
Date

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Programme of Good Music Played Admirably.

The fourth matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The seats and boxes were all occupied and the standing room was not left empty. The programme was one of no special importance. In fact, it was so unimportant as to suggest most pertinently the question why it was so. A Boston Symphony matinee audience is capable of absorbing matters of larger significance than some of those offered yesterday by Dr. Muck.

The first number was the E minor symphony, No. 1, of Sibelius. The other contributions were Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture (which had been played at the Metropolitan Opera House the previous evening), Haydn's G major ("Surprise") symphony, and Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture. It is hardly necessary to attempt any comment on a Boston orchestra performance of such a list. It was an afternoon of good music

York, 18

From ~~DAILY PEOPLE~~ SUN
Address: New York City
FEB 19 1915
Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN BRAHMS MUSIC

Es 1884

First Symphony Played With Much Dignity and Tonal Beauty.

BACH CONCERTO ENJOYED

The February visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be remembered for the sake of last evening's concert at Carnegie Hall, even if tomorrow's matinee should prove to be much less interesting. The programme consisted of Brahms's C minor symphony, Beethoven's "Corrolan" overture, Bach's concerto for two violins and orchestra of strings, and Beethoven's "Leonore," No. 3, overture. The first and second concert masters, Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack, played the solo parts in the Bach number.

A concert such as this raises many questions, which, for the sake of peace, must be left unanswered. A long discussion of readings of the first symphony of Brahms, which has been read variously and amazingly in this patient town, might possibly interest a few, anger many, and do no jot of good to any. Yet something must be said here to commemorate a performance so filled with the spirit of the composer and so glowing with the life blood of pure musical beauty that it must have left every hearer of sensibility with nerves tingling and heart throbbing.

Dr. Muck accomplished his ends by the use of means simple in themselves, yet apparently beyond the reach of too many conductors. Avoiding the rash impetuosity of those who suppose temperament to be a raging and devouring thing, he took his tempi at a deliberate yet not loitering pace, and was thus able to make the developments of his light and shade with clarity and on such large lines that no ear could lose their effect.

Thus, too, he freed the long flowing phrases of the music, especially in the last movement, from that angularity which haste invariably imparts to them. And how pure and rare was the whole tonal atmosphere, rich in manifold delicate tints, glorified by flashes of splendid light, and finding its moments of repose in finely measured pianissimi which always sang.

Perfection of balance, exquisite finesse in the diminuendi and crescendi, military precision in attack and an indescribable elastic accuracy of unanimity in the progress of each phrase were the technical means which Dr. Muck applied to an unerring pursuit of the melos through every voice part and through every combination of instruments. That the reading possessed in an uncommon degree the lofty style of Brahms and that it published convincingly and eloquently the poetic moods of this extraordinary work of genius must have been clear to every hearer. The slow movement, which is excelled by perhaps only one other slow movement in all music, namely, that of Beethoven's ninth symphony, was sung with matchless eloquence.

The Bach double concerto has not been heard here since it was played at a Kneisel Quartet concert in Mendelssohn Hall by Messrs. Kneisel and Roentgen on February 23, 1909. The composition (in the opinion of at least one hearer) loses much by being played in so large an auditorium as that of Carnegie Hall.

It was not conceived as music for 3,000 hearers, but for intimate acquaintance of a few. For this reason the work is heard to better advantage when played as Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Roentgen played it; but it should not be inferred that last evening's performance was wanting in solid merit.

Mr. Witek and Mr. Noack are good violinists and they love Bach. Possibly a more marked contrast in the quality of tone of the two players would have made the performance more piquant in certain places, but its general spirit was sound and it gave pleas-

---

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
FEB 18 1915
Date

CRITIC PLEADS FOR LESS DUPLICATION

Es 1884

Sameness of Boston Orchestra Programs Here Matter for Regret.

Exceedingly familiar music by German composers only, was presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, at its fourth Baltimore concert of the season, at the Lyric last night. Lent having begun, it might well be imagined that musical Baltimore attended in such large numbers as voluntary penance a concert at which Brahms' first symphony and Beethoven's No. 3 Leonore overture were played again.

It should be said at once that the works played and the performances of the orchestra were excellent; and that the program contained two works by J. S. Bach rarely, indeed, heard played in this city by orchestras—the Shepherds' Music, from his Christmas oratorio, and the concerto in D minor, for two violins and string orchestra, the solos of which were played well by Messrs. Witek and Noack. But, allowing everything for the Bach pieces, their constitution of the smaller portion of the program and old atmosphere were anything except sufficient to contrast pleasingly—except in a purely academic way, in the present day—with compositions which are "played to death," relatively speaking, in this city by visiting orchestras, without reason.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays other programs in other cities. Why not in Baltimore? The Boston Symphony Orchestra includes more composition of the present age in its programs in other cities. Why not in Baltimore? The Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the greatest of the world's orchestras. Why is it that it plays in Baltimore such a small percentage of the thoroughly good orchestral literature? Why does it play here so many of the same pieces over and over again—stock pieces that all good orchestras play and to which orchestras of smaller caliber aspire? It is perfectly possible and easy for the managements of traveling orchestras not to duplicate to great extent one another's programs. Why is there so much duplication in Baltimore?

J. N. H.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
FEB 21 1915
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Orchestra Gives a Diverse Programme in Carnegie Hall.

Est 1884

At its concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra's programme brought forward Sibelius's Symphony No. 1 in E minor, a work which, though composed in 1899 and published in 1902, has only been heard here a few times. It is different in conception from the same composer's fourth symphony, played by Dr. Muck at a recent concert in Carnegie Hall, for the fourth has the atmosphere of "advance" about it, while the first concerns itself with conventional, if entirely modern, form and method.

As it was played yesterday, the first movement seemed the most interesting, for its emotional content was the most impressive and the rhythmic scheme was closer knit and "carried" more easily than was the case with other portions of the work. The whole symphony is pervaded with a melancholy tone, there is frequent use of phrases and harmonic groups distributed among the lower and less brilliant ranges of the wood-wind instruments, and the same idea is evident in all the melodic and harmonic tendencies of the composition. It is not tremendously subtle or elusive, but there is a good deal of interest about it.

Presumably as an attempt at contrast to this work, the second part of the programme was made up of the overture to "The Magic Flute," by Mozart, Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, and the overture to "Der Freischuetz," by Weber. These numbers all belong to the "old war horse" group of concert compositions, which are very frequently heard. It is difficult to see why Dr. Muck should have put all of them on the programme at once. Their threefold presence tended to make the latter half of the programme conventional and unexciting, even though they were not played in anything approaching a casual style. One would have liked to see the efforts of the great orchestra directed toward something whose total represented a little more variety and substance than the second part of the programme did.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date

Dr. Muck's Men Charm Hearers as Never Before

188

For all of the harsh modern novelties which among other things Dr. Karl Muck, the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has presented during the earlier concerts of his organization in this city he atoned last evening at the concert in Carnegie Hall by playing the first symphony of Brahms, which taken all in all was the most impressive piece of work heard at any orchestra concert this season. It took the audience by storm, and seldom have the men from Boston received such whole hearted applause. Most beautiful was the slow movement, but when it came to the climax of the last, which was played without a pause after the third, the effect was tremendous.

After the thrilling symphony the second part of the programme, made up of music of the two great predecessors of Brahms, whose names also begin with "B"—Beethoven and Bach—seemed like an anti-climax. The symphony left its impress on the hearers, and the mood for shorter works was wanting.

Two overtures of Beethoven were played—the overture to Collin's tragedy "Coriolanus" and at the end the "Leonore" overture No. 3.

The Bach number was the concerto in D minor for two violins and string orchestra, a seldom heard work. Messrs. Anton Witek and Sylvian Noack, who occupy the two first chairs in the orchestra, played the solo parts. Both are excellent Bach players and interesting soloists. Particularly noticeable was the full, round tone which came from the solo instruments. There was the usual large audience with

---

From DAILY PEOPLE
Address: New York City
Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA GIVES THREE "B'S"

Brahms, Bach and Beethoven on the Programme of Symphony Players.

Est 1884

On the second visit of the Boston Orchestra to New York this season Dr. Muck gave its patrons considerably more music of the ultra modern sort than they were desirous, or capable, of assimilating. Last night, when the admirable band came back again to Carnegie Hall, it played nothing but familiar compositions—"familiar as the rose in spring and the crop in summer."

The symphony was Brahms's first, in C minor, and there were two overtures by Beethoven—that to "Coriolan" and the third of the "Leonore" set. Between the overtures came Bach's concerto for two violins, played by Anton Witek, the leader of the orchestra's violins, and Sylvester Noack, his assistant.

No one of experience would be tempted to call this a well chosen or well arranged programme. It was probably meant as a sign of appreciation of Dr. von Bülow's artistic trinity, the three B's; but that appreciation to all but one of the compositions was given by the music lovers of New York many years before Dr. Muck was born. So there remains nothing to say beyond an expression of admiration for the manner in which the beautiful pieces were played—all of them—the concert master and his assistant showing as much understanding of the style of the Bach period as they did devotion to the double concerto and appreciation of its ever-fresh beauty.

If there were any danger that music like the slow movement of this concerto could ever grow stale, the fact would reconcile an old amateur with his approaching end and even make him wish that his dissolution might precede the passing away of the people's love and understanding of its strains. It is a great pity that the enjoyment of the orchestra's playing, especially in the symphony, should have been clouded by the reflection that with just as good individual musicians in New York in orchestras bolstered up by million dollar endowments and $100,000 annual guarantees, we must wait for such artistic playing upon the visitors from the farther East.

H. E. K.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City
Date

Again a chorus of praise arose from the most critical musical audience in this city after listening to Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. It was a strictly classical or academic programme, with Brahms' First Symphony at the opening and Beethoven's Third Overture to Leonore at the close. Bach's concerto for two violins was the chief delight of the evening, with Messrs. Witek and Noack, of the orchestra, as soloists.

Est 884

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date FEB 19 19
Es , 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY RETURNS TO N. Y.

Carnegie Hall Audience Delighted by Dr. Muck's Programme.

BRAHMS PROMINENT

Two Overtures Also Are Given a Rendition Which Is Impressive.

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Carnegie Hall last night, after their midwinter absence, with a programme to which no true lover of music could have taken exception.

Brahms's Symphony in C minor, Beethoven's "Corolianus" and "Lenore" No 3 overtures, and between those two immortal compositions Bach's Concerto in D minor, for two violins and string orchestra, made up the list, and the treatment each work received by the musicians from the Hub under the stimulating baton of their leader gave unalloyed delight to a large and brilliant gathering.

As an interpreter of Brahms Dr. Muck won his first triumphs in this city. It was hardly surprising, therefore that the finely balanced, clear-cut and poetic reading he gave yesterday of the First Symphony evoked so much enthusiasm that the conductor asked his men to acknowledge the demonstration by rising in a body.

Impressive, too, were the performances of the two overtures, though a little more dramatic emphasis and rhythmical incisiveness would have heightened the effect of the "Leonore" No. 3—which was taken at a far more deliberate tempo than in the Metropolitan Opera Company's revival of "Fidelio"—without injuring the beautiful transparency and sharp definition of the instrumental picture.

But the concerto by Bach, with Anton Witek, the accomplished concert master of the orchestra, and S. Noack, his deskmate, playing the solo parts in a manner well-nigh flawless, proved to be decidedly one of the most enjoyable features of an evening that Boston Symphony subscribers are likely to treasure among their precious memories.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 20 1915
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE

Esta 84

Concert at the Academy Delights Big Audience.

The fourth in a series of five Philharmonic Concerts, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Carl Muck, was given last night at the Academy of Music, before a very large and appreciative audience.

The programme included no single soloist last night, nor is one necessary at concerts by this organization, as the marvelous playing of the orchestra as a whole, the control and precision, the complete understanding of the compositions and the technical ability of the members make every number a delight.

Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," was the first number, followed by Ropartz's Fourth Symphony in C major, the two parts being played through without pause; Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan," Opus 20, and the concert closed with Beethoven's overture, "Leonore" No. 3.

The audience gave evidence of its appreciation by the rapturous applause that followed each number, and Dr. Muck had to acknowledge many times, even after having the orchestra rise and share the plaudits with him.

From SUN
Address: New York City
FEB 21
Date

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Programme of Good Music Played Admirably.

York,

The fourth matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The seats and boxes were all occupied and the standing room was not left empty. The programme was one of no special importance. In fact, it was so unimportant as to suggest most pertinently the question why it was so. A Boston Symphony matinee audience is capable of absorbing matters of larger significance than some of those offered yesterday by Dr. Muck.

The first number was the E minor symphony, No. 1, of Sibelius. The other contributions were Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture (which had been played at the Metropolitan Opera House the previous evening), Haydn's G major ("Surprise") symphony, and Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture. It is hardly necessary to attempt any comment on a Boston orchestra performance of such a list. It was an afternoon of good music

---

From ~~DAILY PEOPLE~~ SUN
Address: New York City
FEB 19 1915
Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN BRAHMS MUSIC

Es

First Symphony Played With Much Dignity and Tonal Beauty.

BACH CONCERTO ENJOYED

The February visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be remembered for the sake of last evening's concert at Carnegie Hall, even if tomorrow's matinee should prove to be much less interesting. The programme consisted of Brahms's C minor symphony, Beethoven's "Corrolan" overture, Bach's concerto for two violins and orchestra of strings, and Beethoven's "Leonore," No. 3, overture. The first and second concert masters, Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack, played the solo parts in the Bach number.

A concert such as this raises many questions, which, for the sake of peace, must be left unanswered. A long discussion of readings of the first symphony of Brahms, which has been read variously and amazingly in this patient town, might possibly interest a few, anger many, and do no jot of good to any. Yet something must be said here to commemorate a performance so filled with the spirit of the composer and so glowing with the life blood of pure musical beauty that it must have left every hearer of sensibility with nerves tingling and heart throbbing.

Dr. Muck accomplished his ends by the use of means simple in themselves, yet apparently beyond the reach of too many conductors. Avoiding the rash impetuosity of those who suppose temperament to be a raging and devouring thing, he took his tempi at a deliberate yet not loitering pace, and was thus able to make the developments of his light and shade with clarity and on such large lines that no ear could lose their effect.

Thus, too, he freed the long flowing phrases of the music, especially in the last movement, from that angularity which haste invariably imparts to them. And how pure and rare was the whole tonal atmosphere, rich in manifold delicate tints, glorified by flashes of splendid light, and finding its moments of repose in finely measured pianissimi which always sang.

Perfection of balance, exquisite finesse in the diminuendi and crescendi, military precision in attack and an indescribable elastic accuracy of unanimity in the progress of each phrase were the technical means which Dr. Muck applied to an unerring pursuit of the melos through every voice part and through every combination of instruments. That the reading possessed in an uncommon degree the lofty style of Brahms and that it published convincingly and eloquently the poetic moods of this extraordinary work of genius must have been clear to every hearer. The slow movement, which is excelled by perhaps only one other slow movement in all music, namely, that of Beethoven's ninth symphony, was sung with matchless eloquence.

The Bach double concerto has not been heard here since it was played at a Kneisel Quartet concert in Mendelssohn Hall by Messrs. Kneisel and Roentgen on February 23, 1909. The composition (in the opinion of at least one hearer) loses much by being played in so large an auditorium as that of Carnegie Hall.

It was not conceived as music for 3,000 hearers, but for intimate acquaintance of a few. For this reason the work is heard to better advantage when played as Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Roentgen played it; but it should not be inferred that last evening's performance was wanting in solid merit.

Mr. Witek and Mr. Noack are good violinists and they love Bach. Possibly a more marked contrast in the quality of tone of the two players would have made the performance more piquant in certain places, but its general spirit was sound and it gave pleas-

---

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, M
FEB
Date

CRITIC PLEADS FOR LESS DUPLICATION

Es , 18

Sameness of Boston Orchestra Programs Here Matter for Regret.

Exceedingly familiar music by German composers only, was presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, at its fourth Baltimore concert of the season, at the Lyric last night. Lent having begun, it might well be imagined that musical Baltimore attended in such large numbers as voluntary penance a concert at which Brahms' first symphony and Beethoven's No. 3 Leonore overture were played again.

It should be said at once that the works played and the performances of the orchestra were excellent; and that the program contained two works by J. S. Bach rarely, indeed, heard played in this city by orchestras—the Shepherds' Music, from his Christmas oratorio, and the concerto in D minor, for two violins and string orchestra, the solos of which were played well by Messrs. Witek and Noack. But, allowing everything for the Bach pieces, their constitution of the smaller portion of the program and old atmosphere were anything except sufficient to contrast pleasingly — except in a purely academic way, in the present day — with compositions which are "played to death," relatively speaking, in this city by visiting orchestras, without reason.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays other programs in other cities. Why not in Baltimore? The Boston Symphony Orchestra includes more composition of the present age in its programs in other cities. Why not in Baltimore? The Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the greatest of the world's orchestras. Why is it that it plays in Baltimore such a small percentage of the thoroughly good orchestral literature? Why does it play here so many of the same pieces over and over again—stock pieces that all good orchestras play and to which orchestras of smaller caliber aspire? It is perfectly possible and easy for the managements of traveling orchestras not to duplicate to great extent one another's programs. Why is there so much duplication in Baltimore?

J. N. H.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
FEB 21 1915
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Orchestra Gives a Diverse Programme in Carnegie Hall.

Est 1884

At its concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra's programme brought forward Sibelius's Symphony No. 1 in E minor, a work which, though composed in 1899 and published in 1902, has only been heard here a few times. It is different in conception from the same composer's fourth symphony, played by Dr. Muck at a recent concert in Carnegie Hall, for the fourth has the atmosphere of "advance" about it, while the first concerns itself with conventional, if entirely modern, form and method.

As it was played yesterday, the first movement seemed the most interesting, for its emotional content was the most impressive and the rhythmic scheme was closer knit and "carried" more easily than was the case with other portions of the work. The whole symphony is pervaded with a melancholy tone, there is frequent use of phrases and harmonic groups distributed among the lower and less brilliant ranges of the wood-wind instruments, and the same idea is evident in all the melodic and harmonic tendencies of the composition. It is not tremendously subtle or elusive, but there is a good deal of interest about it.

Presumably as an attempt at contrast to this work, the second part of the programme was made up of the overture to "The Magic Flute," by Mozart, Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, and the overture to "Der Freischuetz," by Weber. These numbers all belong to the "old war horse" group of concert compositions, which are very frequently heard. It is difficult to see why Dr. Muck should have put all of them on the programme at once. Their threefold presence tended to make the latter half of the programme conventional and unexciting, even though they were not played in anything approaching a casual style. One would have liked to see the efforts of the great orchestra directed toward something whose total represented a little more variety and substance than the second part of the programme did.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date

Dr. Muck's Men Charm Hearers as Never Before

Est 1884

For all of the harsh modern novelties which among other things Dr. Karl Muck, the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has presented during the earlier concerts of his organization in this city he atoned last evening at the concert in Carnegie Hall by playing the first symphony of Brahms, which taken all in all was the most impressive piece of work heard at any orchestra concert this season. It took the audience by storm, and seldom have the men from Boston received such whole hearted applause. Most beautiful was the slow movement, but when it came to the climax of the last, which was played without a pause after the third, the effect was tremendous.

After the thrilling symphony the second part of the programme, made up of music of the two great predecessors of Brahms, whose names also begin with "B"—Beethoven and Bach—seemed like an anti-climax. The symphony left its impress on the hearers, and the mood for shorter works was wanting.

Two overtures of Beethoven were played—the overture to Collin's tragedy "Coriolanus" and at the end the "Leonore" overture No. 3.

The Bach number was the concerto in D minor for two violins and string orchestra, a seldom heard work, Messrs. Anton Witek and Sylvian Noack, who occupy the two first chairs in the orchestra, played the solo parts. Both are excellent Bach players and interesting soloists. Particularly noticeable was the full, round tone which came from the solo instruments. There was the usual large audience, with its many prominent musical personages.

Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA GIVES THREE "B'S"

Est 1884

Brahms, Bach and Beethoven on the Programme of Symphony Players.

On the second visit of the Boston Orchestra to New York this season Dr. Muck gave its patrons considerably more music of the ultra modern sort than they were desirous, or capable, of assimilating. Last night, when the admirable band came back again to Carnegie Hall, it played nothing but familiar compositions—"familiar as the rose in spring and the crop in summer."

The symphony was Brahms's first, in C minor, and there were two overtures by Beethoven—that to "Coriolan" and the third of the "Leonore" set. Between the overtures came Bach's concerto for two violins, played by Anton Witek, the leader of the orchestra's violins, and Sylvester Noack, his assistant.

No one of experience would be tempted to call this a well chosen or well arranged programme. It was probably meant as a sign of appreciation of Dr. von Bülow's artistic trinity, the three B's; but that appreciation to all but one of the compositions was given by the music lovers of New York many years before Dr. Muck was born. So there remains nothing to say beyond an expression of admiration for the manner in which the beautiful pieces were played—all of them—the concert master and his assistant showing as much understanding of the style of the Bach period as they did devotion to the double concerto and appreciation of its ever-fresh beauty.

If there were any danger that music like the slow movement of this concerto could ever grow stale, the fact would reconcile an old amateur with his approaching end and even make him wish that his dissolution might precede the passing away of the people's love and understanding of its strains. It is a great pity that the enjoyment of the orchestra's playing, especially in the symphony, should have been clouded by the reflection that with just as good individual musicians in New York in orchestras bolstered up by million dollar endowments and $100,000 annual guarantees, we must wait for such artistic playing upon the visitors from the farther East.

H. E. K.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City
Date

Est 884

Again a chorus of praise arose from the most critical musical audience in this city after listening to Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. It was a strictly classical or academic programme, with Brahms' First Symphony at the opening and Beethoven's Third Overture to Leonore at the close. Bach's concerto for two violins was the chief delight of the evening, with Messrs. Witek and Noack, of the orchestra, as soloists.

From PRESS
Address: New York City
FEB 19 19
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY RETURNS TO N. Y.

, 1884

Carnegie Hall Audience Delighted by Dr. Muck's Programme.

BRAHMS PROMINENT

Two Overtures Also Are Given a Rendition Which Is Impressive.

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Carnegie Hall last night, after their midwinter absence, with a programme to which no true lover of music could have taken exception.

Brahms's Symphony in C minor, Beethoven's "Corolianus" and "Lenore" No 3 overtures, and between those two immortal compositions Bach's Concerto in D minor, for two violins and string orchestra, made up the list, and the treatment each work received by the musicians from the Hub under the stimulating baton of their leader gave unalloyed delight to a large and brilliant gathering.

As an interpreter of Brahms Dr. Muck won his first triumphs in this city. It was hardly surprising, therefore that the finely balanced, clear-cut and poetic reading he gave yesterday of the First Symphony evoked so much enthusiasm that the conductor asked his men to acknowledge the demonstration by rising in a body.

Impressive, too, were the performances of the two overtures, though a little more dramatic emphasis and rhythmical incisiveness would have heightened the effect of the "Leonore" No. 3—which was taken at a far more deliberate tempo than in the Metropolitan Opera Company's revival of "Fidelio"—without injuring the beautiful transparency and sharp definition of the instrumental picture.

But the concerto by Bach, with Anton Witek, the accomplished concert master of the orchestra, and S. Noack, his deskmate, playing the solo parts in a manner well-nigh flawless, proved to be decidedly one of the most enjoyable features of an evening that Boston Symphony subscribers are likely to treasure among their precious memories.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 20 1915
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE

Esta 84

Concert at the Academy Delights Big Audience.

The fourth in a series of five Philharmonic Concerts, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Carl Muck, was given last night at the Academy of Music, before a very large and appreciative audience.

The programme included no single soloist last night, nor is one necessary at concerts by this organization, as the marvelous playing of the orchestra as a whole, the control and precision, the complete understanding of the compositions and the technical ability of the members make every number a delight.

Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," was the first number, followed by Ropartz's Fourth Symphony in C major, the two parts being played through without pause; Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan," Opus 20, and the concert closed with Beethoven's overture, "Leonore" No. 3.

The audience gave evidence of its appreciation by the rapturous applause that followed each number, and Dr. Muck had to acknowledge many times, even after having the orchestra rise and share the plaudits with him.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City 1915
FEB 2
Date

k, 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the Boston Symphony Concert in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon Dr. Muck opened the programme with Jean Sibelius's First Symphony. This work is not heard often, but it deserves to be played occasionally if only for its hauntingly beautiful slow movement. When one movement of a symphony is so superior to ally the others, why should it not be heard sometimes by itself? One might as well consign to oblivion Schubert's B minor symphony because the last two movements are missing. The whole symphony, however, is interesting; the third movement has a good deal of Sibelius's individuality in it. Dr. Muck deserves thanks for bringing it forward. That it was well played goes without saying. The other numbers on the programme were the overtures to Mozart's

---

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 1 6 1915
Date

1884

Boston Symphony

Fourth Concert of Season With an Entirely Orchestral Program

THE fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Academy of Music last evening, when this famous organization, which has been making annual appearances in Philadelphia for the past thirty years, was greeted by the usual large and appreciative audiences. The program was entirely of an orchestral nature, the only semblance to a solo feature being the playing of the first and second concertmasters, A. Witek and S. Noack, in Bach's Concerto in D minor, for two violins and orchestra of strings. This composition is strictly in the Bach style, particularly in the accompaniment, or background, furnished by the other string instruments for the duetting violins, which are given considerable freedom and sing in melodious unison, though for the most part independently of each other. The largo is one of the most beautiful movements in any of Bach's works, and its charm was made potent last evening by the artistic playing of Messrs. Witek and Noack. In fact, the work was given an interpretation of the highest merit throughout, and at its conclusion the two violinists were compelled several times to rise and acknowledge the applause.

The symphony was that of Jean Sibelius, No. 1, in E minor, which was played by the Philadelphia Orchestra, under Carl Pohlig, in January, 1911, while the second symphony of the Finnish composer, in D major, was given under Mr. Stokowski's direction, season before last. Sibelius, who is best known here through his folk song legend, "The Swan of Tuonela," and who is now living in his native country, at the age of fifty, is one of the most "nationalistic" of modern composers. His works, particularly the larger ones, are essentially "of the soil," and his first symphony, heard last evening, has the racial feeling strongly presented. The work is built upon rugged lines, and developed in a manner which at times is strangely free and open. It seems fairly to breathe the inspiration which must have moved the composer when he wrote it, for there is a peculiar element of individuality that persists in making itself felt. One knows that Sibelius loves his land with ardent spirit, and is telling of that love with patriotic fervor.

The first movement, after a quietly poetic opening, develops a full rhapsody of thrilling intensity, which is repeated near the close of the work. The andante seems to be founded upon pure folk melody, interwoven with something of complicated effect, and there is again the racial feeling, presented with a rugged lack of mere "tunefulness," in the scherzo. The instrumentation is at times in the profuse "modern" style, but betokens throughout a poetic sense, a vivid imagination, and the skilful use of varied tonal colorings. The interpretation was magnificent. Dr. Muck conducted with his characteristic sedateness, seeming at times not be conducting at all, so free is he from any suggestion of excessive gesture, though invariably getting from his musicians the results that prove the master hand.

A third delightful number consisted of Brahms's Variations on a Theme of Haydn, in which a few comparatively simple strains are interwoven with embellishments that make up a pretentious work. Especially enjoyable were the sixth division, the grazioso, and the seventh, all ni pianissimo, while hte finale is an elaborate summing up of the different variations in which the instruments harmoniously unite, with the silver-clear triangle tinkling through the final measures. As a fitting and brilliant climax to the program came the spirited "Carnival" of Dvork, in which the orchestra had an opportunity to disclose with impressive effect the full splendor of its combined forces. The fifth and last concert of the series will be given on Monday evening, March 15.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. FEB 2 0 1915
Date

Establi

1884

BOSTONSYMPHONY CONCERT

No Soloist but a Symphony by New French Composer.

Wagner was not on the programme of the Boston symphony concert at the Academy of Music last night, but he was suggested almost as strongly as if his music had been played. The first suggestion was by contrast. The concert opened with the overture to Schumann's one opera, "Genoveva," written out of the composer's late-born enthusiasm for German opera. It was written, too, just when the German opera houses were having their first struggle with Wagner's revolutionary "Flying Dutchman." Like that early work by Wagner, "Genoveva" was romantic, but one could not help speculating last night what the future of German opera might have been had Wagner died then and Schumann lived for twenty years more and carried on his campaign.

The overture is, bluntly, dull; well enough to be played occasionally in concerts of historical music, such as Dr. Muck sometimes gives, but it is about the last thing with which to rouse an audience as an opening number. It was especially unfortunately placed last night, because it preceded the evening's novelty, the fourth symphony by a French composer, Ropartz, who was a pupil of Cesar Franck, and between the two there was no such contrast of style as tends to hold or fix the attention. Franck is conspicuous among the French composers of the last part of the Nineteenth Century as the man who put his brains into his music. Ropartz bettered his master's instruction in that respect because he put in not only his own brains but those of other men, more especially Wagner.

It would be foolish to insist upon the importance of such resemblances on merely a single hearing of the work, but such a hearing gives plainly enough suggestions of the Valkyries, and there were even listeners last night who felt that if there had been no "Ring" there could never have been this symphony of the young Frenchman. The conspicuous point at which the resemblance failed, however, was that Ropartz' music lacked the "punch" that is never long absent from a Wagner score.

There are beautiful moments in the work, but as a whole it is music which closely demands interest, but fails to command it. If you listen closely you are rewarded, but if your attention flags you have to bring it back yourself; the music will not.

Then came a real contrast in Strauss' "Don Juan," which, whatever its shortcomings may be, does not lack vividness or color or life. Last night it was more welcome than the flowers that bloom in the spring, because it gave the auditor something to which he must listen, whether he would or no. Its sharp contrasts and its audacities of instrumentation kept the attention constantly alert and, to a large degree, satisfied it. And at the close came a greater contrast still, Beethoven's immortal "Leonore No. 3" overture, which lifted the audience into the realm of great music and satisfied longings which the earlier part of the programme had left unfulfilled. The overture was played recently both in Manhattan and Brooklyn by the Metropolitan Orchestra as a part of "Fidelio." Last night the performance served to emphasize both the beauty of tone of the Boston band and the exquisite finish, delicacy and variety of Dr. Muck's leading. If Dr. Muck could only make programmes as well as he can lead them, what a fine world this might be!

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. FEB 2 0 1915
Da

Est

1884

BOSTONIANS PLAY FOURTH CONCERT

Perfection of Tone and Technique in Another Poorly Constructed Programme.

AUDIENCE IS APATHETIC.

New Ropartz Symphony a Work Well Worth Hearing.

Another Boston Symphony Orchestra concert was given last night at the Academy of Music, the fourth in the series of five. As usual, there was a large audience, although the standees were conspicuous by their absence, probably because there was viewpoint there was no loss in absence of an "assisting artist"—rather a gain, because there was nothing to distract attention from the playing of the orchestra.

The symphony was a work new to Brooklyn, the fourth symphony of J. Guy Ropartz, a French teacher of music at the Nancy Conservatory. There were three other numbers, all German—Schumann's overture to his almost forgotten opera, "Genoveva;" Strauss' early tone poem, "Don Juan," and Beethoven's "Leonore Overture No. 3," which was heard here earlier in the week as an intermezzo in the Metropolitan Opera Company's performance of "Fidelio."

As at the three earlier concerts this season, the playing of the orchestra failed to arouse more than the most perfunctory display of enthusiasm. An attitude almost of indifference marked the attitude of the audience. This is remarkable, inasmuch as the Brooklyn audiences at the Philharmonic and Symphony Society of New York's concerts have all season been aroused to high pitches of excitement, and the make-up of those orchestras is admittedly inferior to that of the Boston Symphony.

Appeal Strictly Intellectual.

The playing last night had that same superb quality of tone and technical perfection that have always characterized its work under Dr. Karl Muck, but it was not the sort of playing to touch the hearts of the hearers. The appeal was rather to their intellects.

There is in Dr. Muck an aristocratic indifference to popular clamor. He refuses to yield to the demand for "well built" programmes, usually putting a number of compositions together without regard for the effect of continuity and piling up anti-climaxes in a distressing manner. Of emotional appeal there is practically nothing. Instead of the fire and feeling of Stransky and the broad humanity of Damrosch, both laboring with inferior instruments, there is the unbending purity of a musician, whose appeal is only to listeners who have reached a stage of sophistication near akin to his own.

Plays "Leonore" Overture.

Even the playing of the great Metropolitan orchestra under Hertz in the "Leonore" overture on Tuesday night here sounded rather crude in comparison to that given by Muck last night. The brasses were exceptionally beautiful, and the famous trumpet call, played in the distance behind the scenes, was exquisitely done.

The new symphony was well worth playing. It is a work that shows clearly the influence of Cesar Franck, who was Ropartz' teacher. It opens with a passionate theme that is reminiscent of Puccini in "Butterfly," but this gives way to a broad sustained melody that is developed throughout the work.

The composer does away with the standard four movements and has his work played all in one movement. It is not too weighty to make the task of hearing all at once without taking breath a hard one.

Muck reached his anti-climactic point by playing Beethoven after Strauss.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
FEB 2 1 1915
Dat

Es

, 1884

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AGAIN HEARD HERE

Sibelius's First Symphony Is Feature of Finely Played Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth matinee concert yesterday at Carnegie Hall, and once again the huge audience had both cause to marvel at the impeccable beauty of the great band's playing and the extraordinary choice of the music that it played. Sibelius's First Symphony, which opened the afternoon, was one thing, for this work possesses great and characteristic merits, and is not often heard in our concert halls; the second part of the programme was altogether another matter. Why Dr. Muck should have thought it fitting to place the overture to "The Magic Flue" and "Der Freischütz" and Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony upon the same programme before an audience of the type of the one which gathers at the Boston concerts is altogether inexplicable. But then, Dr. Muck's ideas of programme making are his own. Needless to say, the band played these three numbers as they should be played, but the public which looks forward to the few concerts of Major Higginson's orchestra with positive hunger surely deserves other fare than that which is too often served it.

The Sibelius symphony, however, was as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land, and the superb reading Dr. Muck gave of it brought out its beauties to the utmost. It has in it much of its composer's native Finland, especially in its rhythms, rhythms which have sprung from Finnish soil. It is a far cry indeed from the same composer's Fourth Symphony, with which Dr. Muck regaled [illegible] at his previous visit, but there are some of us who would be unwilling to concede that Sibelius has advanced over his former work.

The first [illegible] a work of real melodic inspiration, informed with color, powerfully constructed, and always sincerely expressed.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date FEB 2 1 1

Est

1884

Matinee Concert by Boston Symphony

The fourth matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The customary "capacity" audience attended.

The programme consisted of two symphonies—Sibelius' No. 1 and Haydn's "Surprise"—and two overtures—Mozart's to "The Magic Flute" and Weber's to "Der Freischutz."

Dr. Muck's reading of the Sibelius number was scholarly and lucid. Its melodies were presented in untrammelled manner; its mysterious melancholy, admirably expressed.

An interesting contrast was furnished by the gracious, buoyant, lighthearted Haydn work.

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date FEB 2 19

Es

k, 1884

GLINT OF SPRING IN SYMPHONY MUSIC

Concert Programme Holds to Better Known Roads.

ONE SIBELIUS WORK

For the Rest, Haydn, Mozart and Weber Hold the Stage.

There was a presage of spring in the programme which the Boston Symphony played at the second of its fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Climbing down from the lonely heights of programmes devoted only to Sibelius and hitherto unheard composers, Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, yesterday led his men over the sunny meadows of the Haydn "Surprise" symphony, along the well-kept road of the overture of the Mozart "Magic Flute" and into the garden-like paths of Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

Sibelius's first symphony, in E minor, was the first number, and effectively ontrasted with those which followed. This symphony is not entirely characteristic of the Finnish composer. In it e has not yet broken away from the raditional lines of melody. Although the restless, dissatisfied spirit which comes out so markedly in his fourth symphony, for instance, creeps into the music, it is not yielded to altogether; it is kept in abeyance before the more conventional method of expression. It is hardly necessary to say that Dr. Muck, whose predilection for Sibelius is well known, gave it a thoroughly satisfactory reading.

No less pleasing, in entirely different mood, were the Haydn, Mozart and Weber numbers, played with that fine intelligence which is the complement of all adequate musical expression.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
EB 2 0 191
Date

E

, 1884

Following to-day's Boston Symphony for the classes and to-night's People's Symphony for the masses at Carnegie Hall there is a third Russian Symphony concert up at the Century to-morrow evening, with Gabrilowitsch. The usual Philharmonic Sunday matinee has a Brahms symphony and a star soloist, Kreisler.

Amato makes his first concert appearances this season with the Philharmonic next Thursday and Friday in an air from "William Tell." The Damrosch Symphony men return Friday with Busoni in one Beethoven concerto, and Saturday with Hofmann in another. Both these bands have been recently on tour.

Arens to-night gives the People's audience a brief Goldmark memorial, then a Tschaikowsky concerto for Laeta Hartley, Wagner's "Valkyries' Ride" and his Hans Sachs and Wotan airs for Hinshaw.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City 1915
Date

rk, 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the Boston Symphony Concert in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon Dr. Muck opened the programme with Jean Sibelius's First Symphony. This work is not heard often, but it deserves to be played occasionally if only for its hauntingly beautiful slow movement. When one movement of a symphony is so superior to ally the others, why should it not be heard sometimes by itself? One might as well consign to oblivion Schubert's B minor symphony because the last two movements are missing. The whole symphony, however, is interesting; the third movement has a good deal of Sibelius's individuality in it. Dr. Muck deserves thanks for bringing it forward. That it was well played goes without saying. The other numbers on the programme were the overtures to Mozart's

---

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadel, Pa.
Date FEB 1 6 1915

Boston Symphony

Fourth Concert of Season With an Entirely Orchestral Program

1884

THE fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Academy of Music last evening, when this famous organization, which has been making annual appearances in Philadelphia for the past thirty years, was greeted by the usual large and appreciative audiences. The program was entirely of an orchestral nature, the only semblance to a solo feature being the playing of the first and second concertmasters, A. Witek and S. Noack, in Bach's Concerto in D minor, for two violins and orchestra of strings. This composition is strictly in the Bach style, particularly in the accompaniment, or background, furnished by the other string instruments for the duetting violins, which are given considerable freedom and sing in melodious unison, though for the most part independently of each other. The largo is one of the most beautiful movements in any of Bach's works, and its charm was made potent last evening by the artistic playing of Messrs. Witek and Noack. In fact, the work was given an interpretation of the highest merit throughout, and at its conclusion the two violinists were compelled several times to rise and acknowledge the applause.

The symphony was that of Jean Sibelius, No. 1, in E minor, which was played by the Philadelphia Orchestra, under Carl Pohlig, in January, 1911, while the second symphony of the Finnish composer, in D major, was given under Mr. Stokowski's direction, season before last. Sibelius, who is best known here through his folk song legend, "The Swan of Tuonela," and who is now living in his native country, at the age of fifty, is one of the most "nationalistic" of modern composers. His works, particularly the larger ones, are essentially "of the soil," and his first symphony, heard last evening, has the racial feeling strongly presented. The work is built upon rugged lines, and developed in a manner which at times is strangely free and open. It seems fairly to breathe the inspiration which must have moved the composer when he wrote it, for there is a peculiar element of individuality that persists in making itself felt. One knows that Sibelius loves his land with ardent spirit, and is telling of that love with patriotic fervor.

The first movement, after a quietly poetic opening, develops a full rhapsody of thrilling intensity, which is repeated near the close of the work. The andante seems to be founded upon pure folk melody, interwoven with something of complicated effect, and there is again the racial feeling, presented with a rugged lack of mere "tunefulness," in the scherzo. The instrumentation is at times in the profuse "modern" style, but betokens throughout a poetic sense, a vivid imagination, and the skilful use of varied tonal colorings. The interpretation was magnificent. Dr. Muck conducted with his characteristic sedateness, seeming at times not be conducting at all, so free is he from any suggestion of excessive gesture, though invariably getting from his musicians the results that prove the master hand.

A third delightful number consisted of Brahms's Variations on a Theme of Haydn, in which a few comparatively simple strains are interwoven with embellishments that make up a pretentious work. Especially enjoyable were the sixth division, the grazioso, and the seventh, all ni pianissimo, while hte finale is an elaborate summing up of the different variations in which the instruments harmoniously unite, with the silver-clear triangle tinkling through the final measures. As a fitting and brilliant climax to the program came the spirited "Carnival" of Dvork, in which the orchestra had an opportunity to disclose with impressive effect the full splendor of its combined forces. The fifth and last concert of the series will be given on Monday evening, March 15.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. FEB 0 1915
Date

Establi

BOSTONSYMPHONY CONCERT

No Soloist but a Symphony by New French Composer.

Wagner was not on the programme of the Boston symphony concert at the Academy of Music last night, but he was suggested almost as strongly as if his music had been played. The first suggestion was by contrast. The concert opened with the overture to Schumann's one opera, "Genoveva," written out of the composer's late-born enthusiasm for German opera. It was written, too, just when the German opera houses were having their first struggle with Wagner's revolutionary "Flying Dutchman." Like that early work by Wagner, "Genoveva" was romantic, but one could not help speculating last night what the future of German opera might have been had Wagner died then and Schumann lived for twenty years more and carried on his campaign.

The overture is, bluntly, dull; well enough to be played occasionally in concerts of historical music, such as Dr. Muck sometimes gives, but it is about the last thing with which to rouse an audience as an opening number. It was especially unfortunately placed last night, because it preceded the evening's novelty, the fourth symphony by a French composer, Ropartz, who was a pupil of Cesar Franck, and between the two there was no such contrast of style as tends to hold or fix the attention. Franck is conspicuous among the French composers of the last part of the Nineteenth Century as the man who put his brains into his music. Ropartz bettered his master's instruction in that respect because he put in not only his own brains but those of other men, more especially Wagner.

It would be foolish to insist upon the importance of such resemblances on merely a single hearing of the work, but such a hearing gives plainly enough suggestions of the Valkyries, and there were even listeners last night who felt that if there had been no "Ring" there could never have been this symphony of the young Frenchman. The conspicuous point at which the resemblance failed, however, was that Ropartz' music lacked the "punch" that is never long absent from a Wagner score.

There are beautiful moments in the work, but as a whole it is music which closely demands interest, but fails to command it. If you listen closely you are rewarded, but if your attention flags you have to bring it back yourself; the music will not.

Then came a real contrast in Strauss' "Don Juan," which, whatever its shortcomings may be, does not lack vividness or color or life. Last night it was more welcome than the flowers that bloom in the spring, because it gave the auditor something to which he must listen, whether he would or no. Its sharp contrasts and its audacities of instrumentation kept the attention constantly alert and, to a large degree, satisfied it. And at the close came a greater contrast still, Beethoven's immortal "Leonore No. 3" overture, which lifted the audience into the realm of great music and satisfied longings which the earlier part of the programme had left unfulfilled. The overture was played recently both in Manhattan and Brooklyn by the Metropolitan Orchestra as a part of "Fidelio." Last night the performance served to emphasize both the beauty of tone of the Boston band and the exquisite finish, delicacy and variety of Dr. Muck's leading. If Dr. Muck could only make programmes as well as he can lead them, what a fine world this might be!

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. FEB 2 0 1915
Da

Est 1884

BOSTONIANS PLAY FOURTH CONCERT

Perfection of Tone and Technique in Another Poorly Constructed Programme.

AUDIENCE IS APATHETIC.

New Ropartz Symphony a Work Well Worth Hearing.

Another Boston Symphony Orchestra concert was given last night at the Academy of Music, the fourth in the series of five. As usual, there was a large audience, although the standees were conspicuous by their absence, probably because there was [illegible] from an artistic viewpoint there was no loss in absence of an "assisting artist"—rather a gain, because there was nothing to distract attention from the playing of the orchestra.

The symphony was a work new to Brooklyn, the fourth symphony of J. Guy Ropartz, a French teacher of music at the Nancy Conservatory. There were three other numbers, all German—Schumann's overture to his almost forgotten opera, "Genoveva;" Strauss' early tone poem, "Don Juan," and Beethoven's "Leonore Overture No. 3," which was heard here earlier in the week as an intermezzo in the Metropolitan Opera Company's performance of "Fidelio."

As at the three earlier concerts this season, the playing of the orchestra failed to arouse more than the most perfunctory display of enthusiasm. An attitude almost of indifference marked the attitude of the audience. This is remarkable, inasmuch as the Brooklyn audiences at the Philharmonic and Symphony Society of New York's concerts have all season been aroused to high pitches of excitement, and the make-up of those orchestras is admittedly inferior to that of the Boston Symphony.

Appeal Strictly Intellectual.

The playing last night had that same superb quality of tone and technical perfection that have always characterized its work under Dr. Karl Muck, but it was not the sort of playing to touch the hearts of the hearers. The appeal was rather to their intellects.

There is in Dr. Muck an aristocratic indifference to popular clamor. He refuses to yield to the demand for "well built" programmes, usually putting a number of compositions together without regard for the effect of continuity and piling up anti-climaxes in a distressing manner. Of emotional appeal there is practically nothing. Instead of the fire and feeling of Stransky and the broad humanity of Damrosch, both laboring with inferior instruments, there is the unbending purity of a musician, whose appeal is only to listeners who have reached a stage of sophistication near akin to his own.

Plays "Leonore" Overture.

Even the playing of the great Metropolitan orchestra under Hertz in the "Leonore" overture on Tuesday night here sounded rather crude in comparison to that given by Muck last night. The brasses were exceptionally beautiful, and the famous trumpet call, played in the distance behind the scenes, was exquisitely done.

The new symphony was well worth playing. It is a work that shows clearly the influence of Cesar Franck, who was Ropartz' teacher. It opens with a passionate theme that is reminiscent of Puccini in "Butterfly," but this gives way to a broad sustained melody that is developed throughout the work.

The composer does away with the standard four movements and has his work played all in one movement. It is not too weighty to make the task of hearing all at once without taking breath a hard one.

Muck reached his anti-climactic point by playing Beethoven after Strauss.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City FEB 2 1 1915
Dat

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AGAIN HEARD HERE

Sibelius's First Symphony Is Feature of Finely Played Programme.

Es , 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth matinee concert yesterday at Carnegie Hall, and once again the huge audience had both cause to marvel at the impeccable beauty of the great band's playing and the extraordinary choice of the music that it played. Sibelius's First Symphony, which opened the afternoon, was one thing, for this work possesses great and characteristic merits, and is not often heard in our concert halls; the second part of the programme was altogether another matter. Why Dr. Muck should have thought it fitting to place the overture to "The Magic Flue" and "Der Freischütz" and Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony upon the same programme before an audience of the type of the one which gathers at the Boston concerts is altogether inexplicable. But then, Dr. Muck's ideas of programme making are his own. Needless to say, the band played these three numbers as they should be played, but the public which looks forward to the few concerts of Major Higginson's orchestra with positive hunger surely deserves other fare than that which is too often served it.

The Sibelius symphony, however, was as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land, and the superb reading Dr. Muck gave of it brought out its beauties to the utmost. It has in it much of its composer's native Finland, especially in its rhythms, rhythms which have sprung from Finnish soil. It is a far cry indeed from the same composer's Fourth Symphony, with which Dr. Muck regaled us at his previous visit, but there are some of us who would be unwilling to concede that Sibelius has advanced over his former work.

The first is a work of real melodic inspiration, informed with color, powerfully constructed, and always sincerely expressed.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date

Matinee Concert by Boston Symphony

Est 1884

The fourth matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The customary "capacity" audience attended.

The programme consisted of two symphonies—Sibelius' No. 1 and Haydn's "Surprise"—and two overtures—Mozart's to "The Magic Flute" and Weber's to "Der Freischutz."

Dr. Muck's reading of the Sibelius number was scholarly and lucid. Its melodies were presented in untrammelled manner; its mysterious melancholy, admirably expressed.

An interesting contrast was furnished by the gracious, buoyant, lighthearted Haydn work.

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date

GLINT OF SPRING IN SYMPHONY MUSIC

Es k, 1884

Concert Programme Holds to Better Known Roads.

ONE SIBELIUS WORK

For the Rest, Haydn, Mozart and Weber Hold the Stage.

There was a presage of spring in the programme which the Boston Symphony played at the second of its fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Climbing down from the lonely heights of programmes devoted only to Sibelius and hitherto unheard composers, Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, yesterday led his men over the sunny meadows of the Haydn "Surprise" symphony, along the well-kept road of the overture of the Mozart "Magic Flute" and into the garden-like paths of Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

Sibelius's first symphony, in E minor, was the first number, and effectively contrasted with those which followed. This symphony is not entirely characteristic of the Finnish composer. In it he has not yet broken away from the traditional lines of melody. Although the restless, dissatisfied spirit which comes out so markedly in his fourth symphony, for instance, creeps into the music, it is not yielded to altogether; it is kept in abeyance before the more conventional method of expression. It is hardly necessary to say that Dr. Muck, whose predilection for Sibelius is well known, gave it a thoroughly satisfactory reading.

No less pleasing, in entirely different mood, were the Haydn, Mozart and Weber numbers, played with that fine intelligence which is the complement of all adequate musical expression.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City 2 2
Date

E , 1884

Following to-day's Boston Symphony for the classes and to-night's People's Symphony for the masses at Carnegie Hall there is a third Russian Symphony concert up at the Century to-morrow evening, with Gabrilowitsch. The usual Philharmonic Sunday matinee has a Brahms symphony and a star soloist, Kreisler.

Amato makes his first concert appearances this season with the Philharmonic next Thursday and Friday in an aria from "William Tell." The Damrosch Symphony men return Friday with Busoni in one Beethoven concerto, and Saturday with Hofmann in another. Both these bands have been recently on tour.

Arens to-night gives the People's audience a brief Goldmark memorial, then a Tschaikowsky concerto for Laeta Hartley, Wagner's "Valkyries' Ride" and his Hans Sachs and Wotan airs for Hinshaw.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City 1915
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the Boston Symphony Concert in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon Dr. Muck opened the programme with Jean Sibelius's First Symphony. This work is not heard often, but it deserves to be played occasionally if only for its hauntingly beautiful slow movement. When one movement of a symphony is so superior to ally the others, why should it not be heard sometimes by itself? One might as well consign to oblivion Schubert's B minor symphony because the last two movements are missing. The whole symphony, however, is interesting; the third movement has a good deal of Sibelius's individuality in it. Dr. Muck deserves thanks for bringing it forward. That it was well played goes without saying. The other numbers on the programme were the overtures to Mozart's "Magic Flute" and Weber's "Freischütz," and Haydn's "Surprise" symphony—a title which is certainly not justifiable

rk, 1884

phia

Boston Symphony

Fourth Concert of Season With an Entirely Orchestral Program

THE fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Academy of Music last evening, when this famous organization, which has been making annual appearances in Philadelphia for the past thirty years, was greeted by the usual large and appreciative audiences. The program was entirely of an orchestral nature, the only semblance to a solo feature being the playing of the first and second concertmasters, A. Witek and S. Noack, in Bach's Concerto in D minor, for two violins and orchestra of strings. This composition is strictly in the Bach style, particularly in the accompaniment, or background, furnished by the other string instruments for the duetting violins, which are given considerable freedom and sing in melodious unison, though for the most part independently of each other. The largo is one of the most beautiful movements in any of Bach's works, and its charm was made potent last evening by the artistic playing of Messrs. Witek and Noack. In fact, the work was given an interpretation of the highest merit throughout, and at its conclusion the two violinists were compelled several times to rise and acknowledge the applause.

The symphony was that of Jean Sibelius, No. 1, in E minor, which was played by the Philadelphia Orchestra, under Carl Pohlig, in January, 1911, while the second symphony of the Finnish composer, in D major, was given under Mr. Stokowski's direction, season before last. Sibelius, who is best known here through his folk song legend, "The Swan of Tuonela," and who is now living in his native country, at the age of fifty, is one of the most "nationalistic" of modern composers. His works, particularly the larger ones, are essentially "of the soil," and his first symphony, heard last evening, has the racial feeling strongly presented. The work is built upon rugged lines, and developed in a manner which at times is strangely free and open. It seems fairly to breathe the inspiration which must have moved the composer when he wrote it, for there is a peculiar element of individuality that persists in making itself felt. One knows that Sibelius loves his land with ardent spirit, and is telling of that love with patriotic fervor.

The first movement, after a quietly poetic opening, develops a full rhapsody of thrilling intensity, which is repeated near the close of the work. The andante seems to be founded upon pure folk melody, interwoven with something of complicated effect, and there is again the racial feeling, presented with a rugged lack of mere "tunefulness," in the scherzo. The instrumentation is at times in the profuse "modern" style, but betokens throughout a poetic sense, a vivid imagination, and the skilful use of varied tonal colorings. The interpretation was magnificent. Dr. Muck conducted with his characteristic sedateness, seeming at times not be conducting at all, so free is he from any suggestion of excessive gesture, though invariably getting from his musicians the results that prove the master hand.

A third delightful number consisted of Brahms's Variations on a Theme of Haydn, in which a few comparatively simple strains are interwoven with embellishments that make up a pretentious work. Especially enjoyable were the sixth division, the grazioso, and the seventh, all ni pianissimo, while hte finale is an elaborate summing up of the different variations in which the instruments harmoniously unite, with the silver-clear triangle tinkling through the final measures. As a fitting and brilliant climax to the program came the spirited "Carnival" of Dvork, in which the orchestra had an opportunity to disclose with impressive effect the full splendor of its combined forces. The fifth and last concert of the series will be given on Monday evening, March 15.

1884

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. FEB 20 1915
Date

Establi

BOSTONSYMPHONY CONCERT

No Soloist but a Symphony by New French Composer.

Wagner was not on the programme of the Boston symphony concert at the Academy of Music last night, but he was suggested almost as strongly as if his music had been played. The first suggestion was by contrast. The concert opened with the overture to Schumann's one opera, "Genoveva," written out of the composer's late-born enthusiasm for German opera. It was written, too, just when the German opera houses were having their first struggle with Wagner's revolutionary "Flying Dutchman." Like that early work by Wagner, "Genoveva" was romantic, but one could not help speculating last night what the future of German opera might have been had Wagner died then and Schumann lived for twenty years more and carried on his campaign.

The overture is, bluntly, dull; well enough to be played occasionally in concerts of historical music, such as Dr. Muck sometimes gives, but it is about the last thing with which to rouse an audience as an opening number. It was especially unfortunately placed last night, because it preceded the evening's novelty, the fourth symphony by a French composer, Ropartz, who was a pupil of Cesar Franck, and between the two there was no such contrast of style as tends to hold or fix the attention. Franck is conspicuous among the French composers of the last part of the Nineteenth Century as the man who put his brains into his music. Ropartz bettered his master's instruction in that respect because he put in not only his own brains but those of other men, more especially Wagner.

It would be foolish to insist upon the importance of such resemblances on merely a single hearing of the work, but such a hearing gives plainly enough suggestions of the Valkyries, and there were even listeners last night who felt that if there had been no "Ring" there could never have been this symphony of the young Frenchman. The conspicuous point at which the resemblance failed, however, was that Ropartz' music lacked the "punch" that is never long absent from a Wagner score.

There are beautiful moments in the work, but as a whole it is music which closely demands interest, but fails to command it. If you listen closely you are rewarded, but if your attention flags you have to bring it back yourself; the music will not.

Then came a real contrast in Strauss' "Don Juan," which, whatever its shortcomings may be, does not lack vividness or color or life. Last night it was more welcome than the flowers that bloom in the spring, because it gave the auditor something to which he must listen, whether he would or no. Its sharp contrasts and its audacities of instrumentation kept the attention constantly alert and, to a large degree, satisfied it. And at the close came a greater contrast still, Beethoven's immortal "Leonore No. 3" overture, which lifted the audience into the realm of great music and satisfied longings which the earlier part of the programme had left unfulfilled. The overture was played recently both in Manhattan and Brooklyn by the Metropolitan Orchestra as a part of "Fidelio." Last night the performance served to emphasize both the beauty of tone of the Boston band and the exquisite finish, delicacy and variety of Dr. Muck's leading. If Dr. Muck could only make programmes as well as he can lead them, what a fine world this might be!

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. FEB 20 1915
Da

Est 1884

BOSTONIANS PLAY FOURTH CONCERT

Perfection of Tone and Technique in Another Poorly Constructed Programme.

AUDIENCE IS APATHETIC.

New Ropartz Symphony a Work Well Worth Hearing.

Another Boston Symphony Orchestra concert was given last night at the Academy of Music, the fourth in the series of five. As usual, there was a large audience, although the standees were conspicuous by their absence, probably because there was [illegible] From an artistic viewpoint there was no loss in absence of an "assisting artist"—rather a gain, because there was nothing to distract attention from the playing of the orchestra.

The symphony was a work new to Brooklyn, the fourth symphony of J. Guy Ropartz, a French teacher of music at the Nancy Conservatory. There were three other numbers, all German—Schumann's overture to his almost forgotten opera, "Genoveva;" Strauss' early tone poem, "Don Juan," and Beethoven's "Leonore Overture No. 3," which was heard here earlier in the week as an intermezzo in the Metropolitan Opera Company's performance of "Fidelio."

As at the three earlier concerts this season, the playing of the orchestra failed to arouse more than the most perfunctory display of enthusiasm. An attitude almost of indifference marked the attitude of the audience. This is remarkable, inasmuch as the Brooklyn audiences at the Philharmonic and Symphony Society of New York's concerts have all season been aroused to high pitches of excitement, and the make-up of those orchestras is admittedly inferior to that of the Boston Symphony.

Appeal Strictly Intellectual.

The playing last night had that same superb quality of tone and technical perfection that have always characterized its work under Dr. Karl Muck, but it was not the sort of playing to touch the hearts of the hearers. The appeal was rather to their intellects.

There is in Dr. Muck an aristocratic indifference to popular clamor. He refuses to yield to the demand for "well built" programmes, usually putting a number of compositions together without regard for the effect of continuity and piling up anti-climaxes in a distressing manner. Of emotional appeal there is practically nothing. Instead of the fire and feeling of Stransky and the broad humanity of Damrosch, both laboring with inferior instruments, there is the unbending purity of a musician, whose appeal is only to listeners who have reached a stage of sophistication near akin to his own.

Plays "Leonore" Overture.

Even the playing of the great Metropolitan orchestra under Hertz in the "Leonore" overture on Tuesday night here sounded rather crude in comparison to that given by Muck last night. The brasses were exceptionally beautiful, and the famous trumpet call, played in the distance behind the scenes, was exquisitely done.

The new symphony was well worth playing. It is a work that shows clearly the influence of Cesar Franck, who was Ropartz' teacher. It opens with a passionate theme that is reminiscent of Puccini in "Butterfly," but this gives way to a broad sustained melody that is developed throughout the work.

The composer does away with the standard four movements and has his work played all in one movement. It is not too weighty to make the task of hearing all at once without taking breath a hard one.

Muck reached his anti-climactic point by playing Beethoven after Strauss.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
FEB 21
Dat

Es

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AGAIN HEARD HERE

Sibelius's First Symphony Is Feature of Finely Played Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth matinee concert yesterday at Carnegie Hall, and once again the huge audience had both cause to marvel at the impeccable beauty of the great band's playing and the extraordinary choice of the music that it played. Sibelius's First Symphony, which opened the afternoon, was one thing, for this work possesses great and characteristic merits, and is not often heard in our concert halls; the second part of the programme was altogether another matter. Why Dr. Muck should have thought it fitting to place the overture to "The Magic Flue" and "Der Freischütz" and Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony upon the same programme before an audience of the type of the one which gathers at the Boston concerts is altogether inexplicable. But then, Dr. Muck's ideas of programme making are his own. Needless to say, the band played these three numbers as they should be played, but the public which looks forward to the few concerts of Major Higginson's orchestra with positive hunger surely deserves other fare than that which is too often served it.

The Sibelius symphony, however, was as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land, and the superb reading Dr. Muck gave of it brought out its beauties to the utmost. It has in it much of its composer's native Finland, especially in its rhythms, rhythms which have sprung from Finnish soil. It is a far cry indeed from the same composer's Fourth Symphony, with which Dr. Muck regaled [illegible] at his previous visit, but there are some of us who would be unwilling to concede that Sibelius has advanced over his former work.

The first [illegible] a work of real melodic inspiration, informed with color, powerfully constructed, and always sincerely expressed.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date

Est 1884

Matinee Concert by Boston Symphony

The fourth matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The customary "capacity" audience attended.

The programme consisted of two symphonies—Sibelius' No. 1 and Haydn's "Surprise"—and two overtures—Mozart's to "The Magic Flute" and Weber's to "Der Freischutz."

Dr. Muck's reading of the Sibelius number was scholarly and lucid. Its melodies were presented in untrammelled manner; its mysterious melancholy, admirably expressed.

An interesting contrast was furnished by the gracious, buoyant, lighthearted Haydn work.

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date

Es k, 1884

GLINT OF SPRING IN SYMPHONY MUSIC

Concert Programme Holds to Better Known Roads.

ONE SIBELIUS WORK

For the Rest, Haydn, Mozart and Weber Hold the Stage.

There was a presage of spring in the programme which the Boston Symphony played at the second of its fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Climbing down from the lonely heights of programmes devoted only to Sibelius and hitherto unheard composers, Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, yesterday led his men over the sunny meadows of the Haydn "Surprise" symphony, along the well-kept road of the overture of the Mozart "Magic Flute" and into the garden-like paths of Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

Sibelius's first symphony, in E minor, was the first number, and effectively contrasted with those which followed. This symphony is not entirely characteristic of the Finnish composer. In it he has not yet broken away from the traditional lines of melody. Although the restless, dissatisfied spirit which comes out so markedly in his fourth symphony, for instance, creeps into the music, it is not yielded to altogether; it is kept in abeyance before the more conventional method of expression. It is hardly necessary to say that Dr. Muck, whose predilection for Sibelius is well known, gave it a thoroughly satisfactory reading.

No less pleasing, in entirely different mood, were the Haydn, Mozart and Weber numbers, played with that fine intelligence which is the complement of all adequate musical expression.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
FEB 2
Date

E 1884

Following to-day's Boston Symphony for the classes and to-night's People's Symphony for the masses at Carnegie Hall there is a third Russian Symphony concert up at the Century to-morrow evening, with Gabrilowitsch. The usual Philharmonic Sunday matinee has a Brahms symphony and a [illegible] soloist, Kreisler.

Amato makes his first concert appearances this season with the Philharmonic next Thursday and Friday in an [illegible] from "William Tell." The Damrosch Symphony men return Friday with Busoni in one Beethoven concerto, and Saturday with Hofmann in another. Both these bands have been [illegible] on tour.

Arens to-night gives the People's audience a brief Goldmark memorial, then a Tschaikowsky concerto for Laeta Hartley, Wagner's "Valkyries' Ride" and his Hans Sachs and Wotan airs for Hinshaw.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York
Date

For the last time but o flight to San Francisco a in the month of May, the phony Orchestra came night. As usual Carneg packed, and Fifty-sev
jammed with limousines
hundred men played w
Leader Muck, in chasten
sented no vexed proble
"the three B's," and a p
made the band stand
Brahms's fine First symphony, with the Alp horn "afterglow," while between Beethoven overtures to "Coriolanus" and "Leonore" No. 3 they were equally cordial to rare old Bach.

This "magnum of Bach," to paraphrase the famous "bottle" of Brahms's joke, took the form of a resounding old concerto for two violins, vigorously played in the hearty Bach way by Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack. To-night in Brooklyn the orchestra have Schumann's "Genoveva," a symphony of Ropartz, the Strauss "Don Juan" and again Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3.

From Brooklyn they return to Carnegie Hall to-morrow in Sibelius's interesting First symphony and Haydn's called "Surprise," the latter sandwiched with Mozart's "Magic Flute" and Weber's "Freischuetz" overtures.

E

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md. FEB
Date
Established: Lon

compiishment, as they have before nov had occasion to show, and they entere derstand complet
s to stra pa compani
rtion wit

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date 9 1915
rk, 1884

Large Audience Hears Symphony

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, with a programme of works by the three great B's—Beethoven, Bach and Brahms—was the delightful offering in Carnegie Hall last evening.

Brahms's Symphony No. 1, in C minor, occupied the principal place on the programme; Bach's Concerto in D minor brought forward two solo violins—Mr. Witek, concertmaster, and Mr. Noack, second first violin. The Beethoven numbers consisted of the overture "Coriolanus" and the "Lenore," No. 3 overture.

Mr. Muck conducted the symphony with vigor and enthusiasm.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date 21 1915
E 884

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Dr. Muck's Organization Heard Again in Carnegie Hall.

With a programme made up for the greater part of music of the old school, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gave a concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. As it always is when that musical organization appears here, the audience was large, and its expressions of appreciation of the work of Dr. Muck and his men were frequent and warm.

All of the numbers played have been played here before by the same orchestra, but they lost nothing in repetition. They were Sibelius' symphony No. 1, in E minor, op. No. 39; the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute," Haydn's "Surprise" symphony and the overture to Weber's opera, "Der Freischütz." Each served to show again the virtuosity of the orchestra and the absolute control which Dr. Muck has over his men.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date FEB 1 0 1915
Establis

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

A Programme of Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is on its fourth visit to New York this season, and gave its first concert last evening in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Muck's programme presented orchestral pieces that are most familiar—Brahms's first symphony and two overtures by Beethoven—that known as "Leonore" No. 3 and the overture to "Coriolanus."

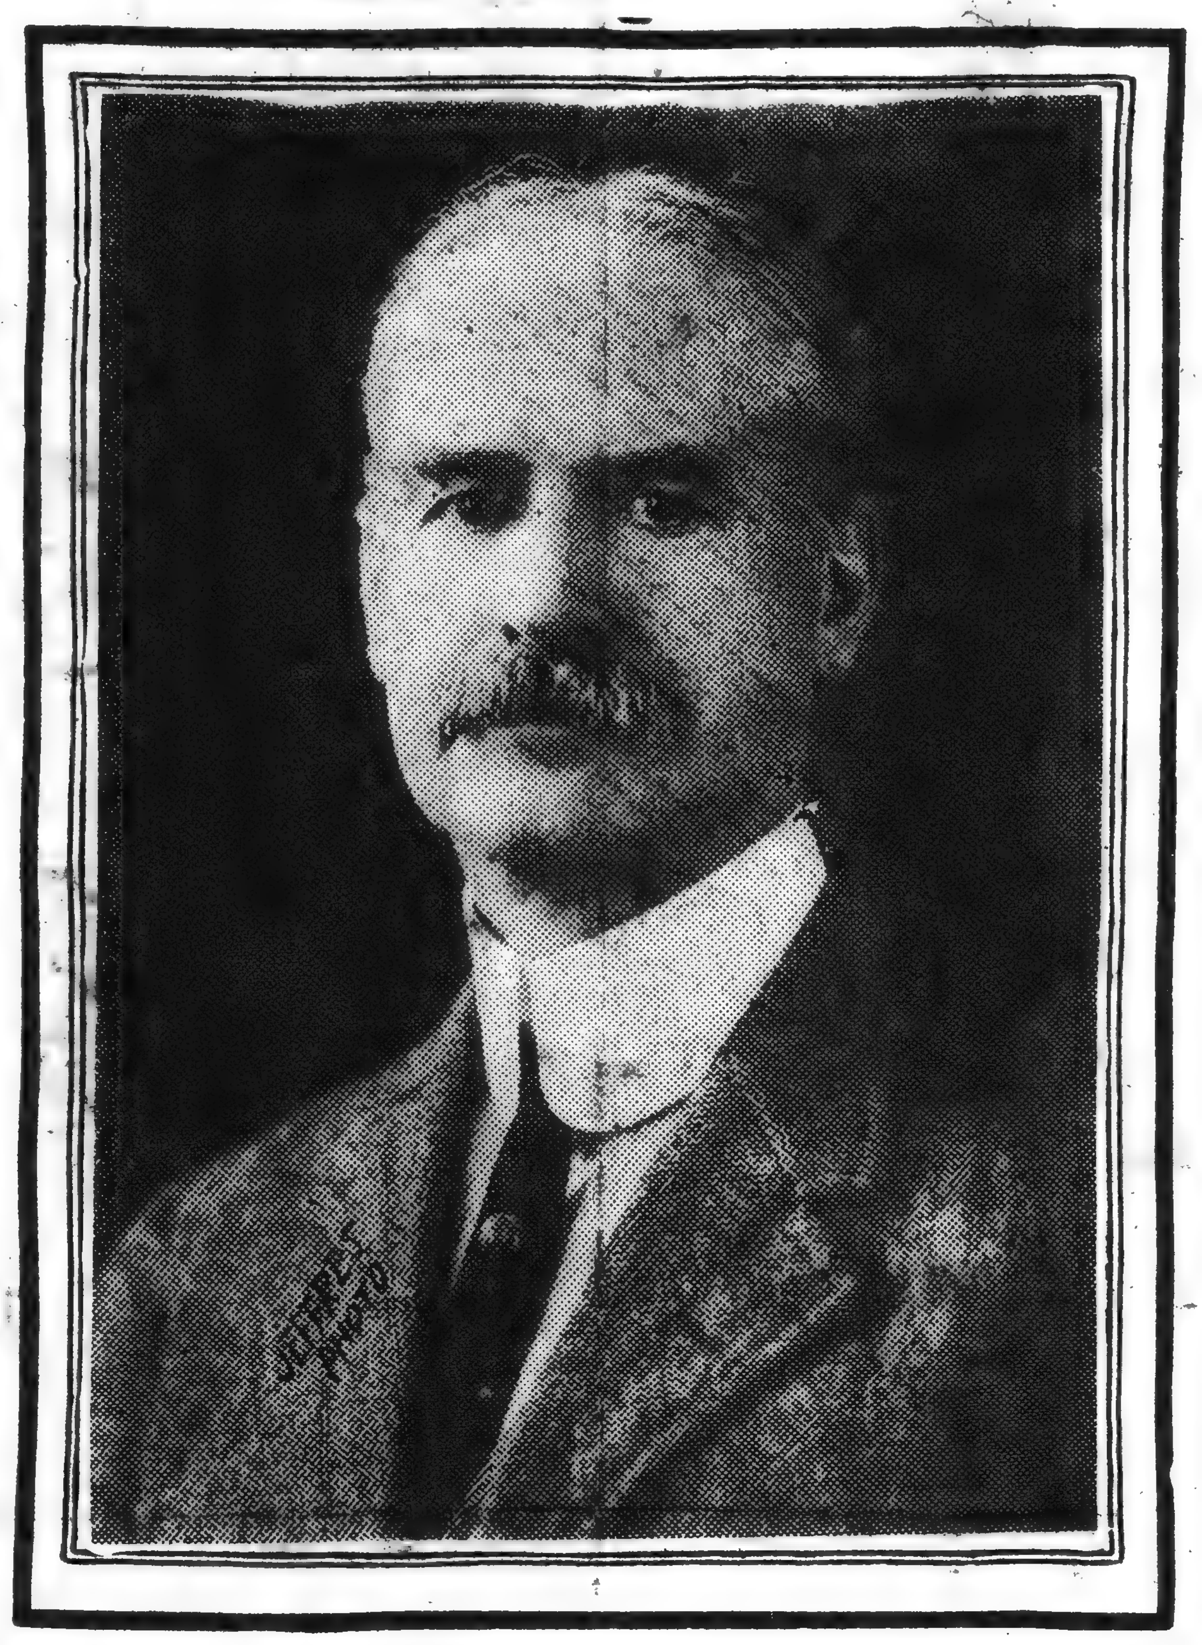
The Symphony and the "Leonore" overture have several times been played here this season. It is not necessary to suppose that comparisons were invited by the repetition of them by Dr. Muck. All that need be said is that the performance of the symphony, especially, was of marvelous beauty and euphony, a marvelous recapturing of the whole spirit and significance of the work in its larger outlines, its noblest proportions, and in the minutest details of the composer's thought. It was a performance of grandiose power and poignant beauty. The listeners gave abundant evidence of its thrilling and uplifting effect by the rapturous applause with which it was greeted; it deeply stirred them, and Dr. Muck was time and again made to acknowledge the enthusiasm and gratitude offered him, even after he had caused his men to rise and share them with him.

There was no single soloist, but Bach's concerto for two violins in D minor was played by Messrs. Anton Witek, the concert master, and Sylvain Noack, his colleague at the first desk of the violins, who rose from their places in the orchestra to play it. It was a performance of splendid vigor and deeply musical spirit, as far as possible from

---

ANSWERS CRITICISM OF CITY'S MUSICAL TASTE

Harold Randolph Disagrees With Stransky On Some Points, But Says Baltimore Lacks Public Spirit. Calls Boston Symphony Fashionable.



HAROLD RANDOLPH

1884

Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory of Music, said this morning that he could quite understand and sympathize with the discouragement expressed in an interview in THE EVENING SUN yesterday by Josef Stransky, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, over the lack of support given to that organization by Baltimoreans. He could understand how Mr. Stransky might recommend to the directors of the organization the abandonment of its concerts here. And he thought it would be very humiliating to Baltimore if such action were taken.

"I disagree with Mr. Stransky when he says that Baltimore is not a music loving community," said Mr. Randolph. "There is as much love of music in Baltimore as there is in any city of its size in the country. The fault in Baltimore is that it has no public spirit, that it feels no sense of obligation to support such an organization as Mr. Stransky's when they are willing to give concerts here and to lose money for a time with the hope of eventually establishing themselves. If Baltimoreans are in a mood for music, they will go to concerts. If they are not, they will not go. They feel no sense of responsibilitty. In this they differ from other cities of their size and character."

Waves Dancing Remarks Aside.

Mr. Stransky's comment to the effect that Baltimoreans cared for nothing but their cards and their dancing Mr. Randolph waved away without words as something the conductor had said because he did not understand this city and in which the discouragement he felt at the time of speaking was an element.

"I cannot understand Mr. Stransky, however," Mr. Randolph resumed, "when he says that he would rather play to 50 people who love and understand music than to an enormous audience that cares nothing about it. Certainly he cannot say that the audience on Monday night was not appreciative. It was extremely appreciative.

"Mr. Stransky says that the attendance has actually decreased since the concerts by the New York Philharmonic four years ago. I do not know whether that is exactly true or not. But it is strange that the attendance at these should be so small while the attendance at the Boston Symphony concerts are so large.

Hates To Call Rival Fashionable.

"I hate to say it, but it seems to be true that the Boston Symphony has become fashionable. It does seem that people go to their concerts because that is so. And no organization which comes here gives more pleasing programs than the New York Philharmonic.

"The difference between the two orchestras is such that only an expert on symphony music could detect the difference. Sometimes I think the Boston Symphony is too classical. It has become the thing to go to the Boston Symphony.

"There is something in the American people which makes them willing to pay $15 for a seat to hear Caruso because he is the greatest living tenor, when they would not pay $2 to hear one who is so nearly as good that it is almost impossible to detect the difference.

"I can understand how Mr. Stransky can wish to recommend the abandonment of the concerts in Baltimore, and I think it would be extremely humiliating to Baltimore if that were done.

"There is undoubtedly a lack of public spirit in such things in Baltimore. Other cities of its size and character have their own orchestras. If Baltimore felt the proper pride it would have its organization. In Boston, where there is probably more public spirit than in any other city in the country, the concerts of the Boston Symphony are crowded.

"In Philadelphia they sup
certs a season
tra, five by D
Boston Symph
supports 50 c
public spirit w
tras of St. Lou

"It is true tha
times the popu
has, and ten tim pare their 60
five by the Bost
the Philharmon
by the Philadel
cago, which is of America, is th
try where the ported by the mu

"When the Ne
first came here there was an organ
tion of women who formed an auxil to make its concerts a success, bu has not been active lately. When
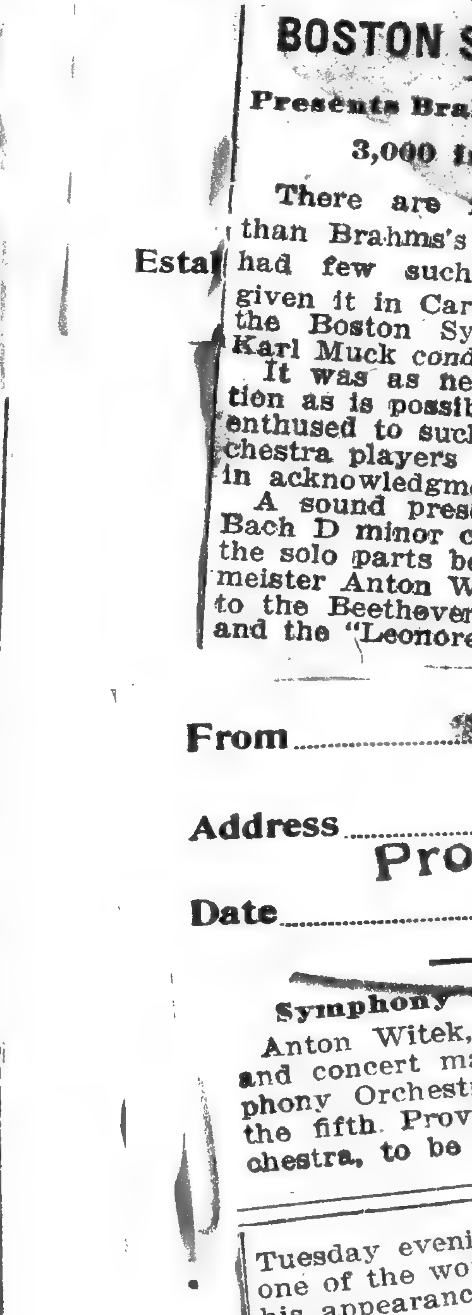
Boston Symphony first began to c
here a guarantee was provided for th
but they have become established
now they are sold out far in advan

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md. FEB 1 3 19
Date
Established



SYLVAN NOACK
LYRIC, FEB. 17TH
PHOTO. MARCEAU

Boston Symphony

Bach, Beethoven and Brahms will monopolize the program which Dr. Karl Muck has arranged for the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, February 17, at 8.15 o'clock. The program comprises the C minor symphony of Brahms, the Shepherds' music from the "Christmas Oratorio" of Bach; Bach's double concerto for two violins and string orchestra in D minor, and Beethoven's "Leonora III." overture.

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. FEB 2 0 1915
Date
rk, 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS OLD AND NEW WORKS.

The Boston Symphony Society presented a modern novelty in Joseph Guy Marie Ropartz' Symphony No. 4 in C major, at the Academy of Music last night. The composition in one movement was produced by the Director of Music at Nancy three years ago, and was played last evening for the first time in Brooklyn. Ropartz was taught by Cesar Franck, and the symphony shows in its melody and harmony that the organist of St. Clotilde wielded a powerful influence over his pupil. The work is bizarre in places, and cloying, but brilliant throughout.

Schumann's "Genoveva" Overture, Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3, and Strauss' one poem, "Don Juan," were the other numbers on the programme. All three have been heard frequently by Brooklyn concert-goers, but never have they been played in more masterful fashion than by Dr. Muck's men. In the Schumann overture, the audience followed the unhappy noblewoman's career, from court to wilderness, visualized her agony, and thrilled at her final triumph. The work was wonderfully well done.

Many of the audience had heard the third "Leonore" overture at the opera earlier in the week, as interpreted by Toscanini, but this added rather than subtracted interest in the beautiful work. The overture is really a tone poem, following closely the story of "Fidelio," from the descent of Florestan into the dungeon to the trumpet call that heralds salvation. "Don Juan" was played with all the passion and color of the story itself, the contrasted motifs of the hero as a lecherous adventurer and as an amorous idealist being brought out vividly. The swift reaction from affection to disgust and the tragedy in which the poem culminates were realistically played. The entire programme was rendered with the solidarity and precision and intelligence that makes the work of the Boston musicians so consistently close to orchestral perfection.

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 1 9 1915
Estal 884

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Presents Brahms's C Minor Work to 3,000 in Carnegie Hall.

There are few greater symphonies than Brahms's in C minor, and it has had few such performances as that given it in Carnegie Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conducting.

It was as near a perfect interpretation as is possible, and the 3,000 people enthused to such an extent that the orchestra players were called on to stand in acknowledgment.

A sound presentation was given the Bach D minor concerto for two violins, the solo parts being played by Concertmeister Anton Witek and S. Noack, and to the Beethoven "Coriolanus" overture and the "Leonore" overture No. 3.

From BULLETIN
Address Providence, R. I.
Date FEB 2 0 1915
1884

Symphony Concert Programme.

Anton Witek, the well-known violinist and concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the fifth Providence concert of the orchestra, to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, March 2. Mr. Witek is one of the world's greatest violinists, and his appearance as soloist is a feature of ts. The programme for the Bosto
les the First Symphony
er Sibelius; Bruch's
nestra and violin in G
"A Siegfried Idyl," and al" overture.

[118]

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York
Date

For the last time but on flight to San Francisco and in the month of May, the phony Orchestra came night. As usual Carneg
packed, and Fifty-sev
jammed with limousines hundred men played wi
Leader Muck, in chasten
sented no vexed problem
"the three B's," and a p
made the band stand

Brahms's fine First symphony, with the Alp horn "afterglow," while between Beethoven overtures to "Coriolanus" and "Leonore" No. 3 they were equally cordial to rare old Bach.

This "magnum of Bach," to paraphrase the famous "bottle" of Brahms's joke, took the form of a resounding old concerto for two violins, vigorously played in the hearty Bach way by Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack. To-night in Brooklyn the orchestra have Schumann's "Genoveva," a symphony of Ropartz, the Strauss "Don Juan" and again Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3.

From Brooklyn they return to Carnegie Hall to-morrow in Sibelius's interesting First symphony and Haydn's called "Surprise," the latter sandwiched with Mozart's "Magic Flute" and Weber's "Freischuetz" overtures.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City

1915

Large Audience Hears Symphony

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, with a programme of works by the three great B's—Beethoven, Bach and Brahms—was the delightful offering in Carnegie Hall last evening.

Brahms's Symphony No. 1, in C minor, occupied the principal place on the programme; Bach's Concerto in D minor brought forward two solo violins—Mr. Witek, concertmaster, and Mr. Noack, second first violin. The Beethoven numbers consisted of the overture "Coriolanus" and the "Lenore," No. 3 overture.

Mr. Muck conducted the symphony with vigor and enthusiasm.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Dr. Muck's Organization Heard Again in Carnegie Hall.

With a programme made up for the greater part of music of the old school, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gave a concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. As it always is when that musical organization appears here, the audience was large, and its expressions of appreciation of the work of Dr. Muck and his men were frequent and warm.

All of the numbers played have been played here before by the same orchestra, but they lost nothing in repetition. They were Sibelius' symphony No. 1, in E minor, op. No. 39; the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute," Haydn's "Surprise" symphony and the overture to Weber's opera, "Der Freischütz." Each served to show again the virtuosity of the orchestra and the absolute control which Dr. Muck has over his men.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date FEB 1 0 1915

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

A Programme of Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is on its fourth visit to New York this season, and gave its first concert last evening in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Muck's programme presented orchestral pieces that are most familiar—Brahms's first symphony and two overtures by Beethoven—that known as "Leonore" No. 3 and the overture to "Coriolanus."

The Symphony and the "Leonore" overture have several times been played here this season. It is not necessary to suppose that comparisons were invited by the repetition of them by Dr. Muck. All that need be said is that the performance of the symphony, especially, was of marvelous beauty and euphony, a marvelous recapturing of the whole spirit and significance of the work in its larger outlines, its noblest proportions, and in the minutest details of the composer's thought. It was a performance of grandiose power and poignant beauty. The listeners gave abundant evidence of its thrilling and uplifting effect by the rapturous applause with which it was greeted; it deeply stirred them, and Dr. Muck was time and again made to acknowledge the enthusiasm and gratitude offered him, even after he had caused his men to rise and share them with him.

There was no single soloist, but Bach's concerto for two violins in D minor was played by Messrs. Anton Witek, the concert master, and Sylvain Noack, his colleague at the first desk of the violins, who rose from their places in the orchestra to play it. It was a performance of splendid vigor and deeply musical spirit, as far as possible from ... virtuosoship.

---

compliment, as they have before now had occasion to show, and they entered erstand-
complete as to it estra par ccompani rtion with

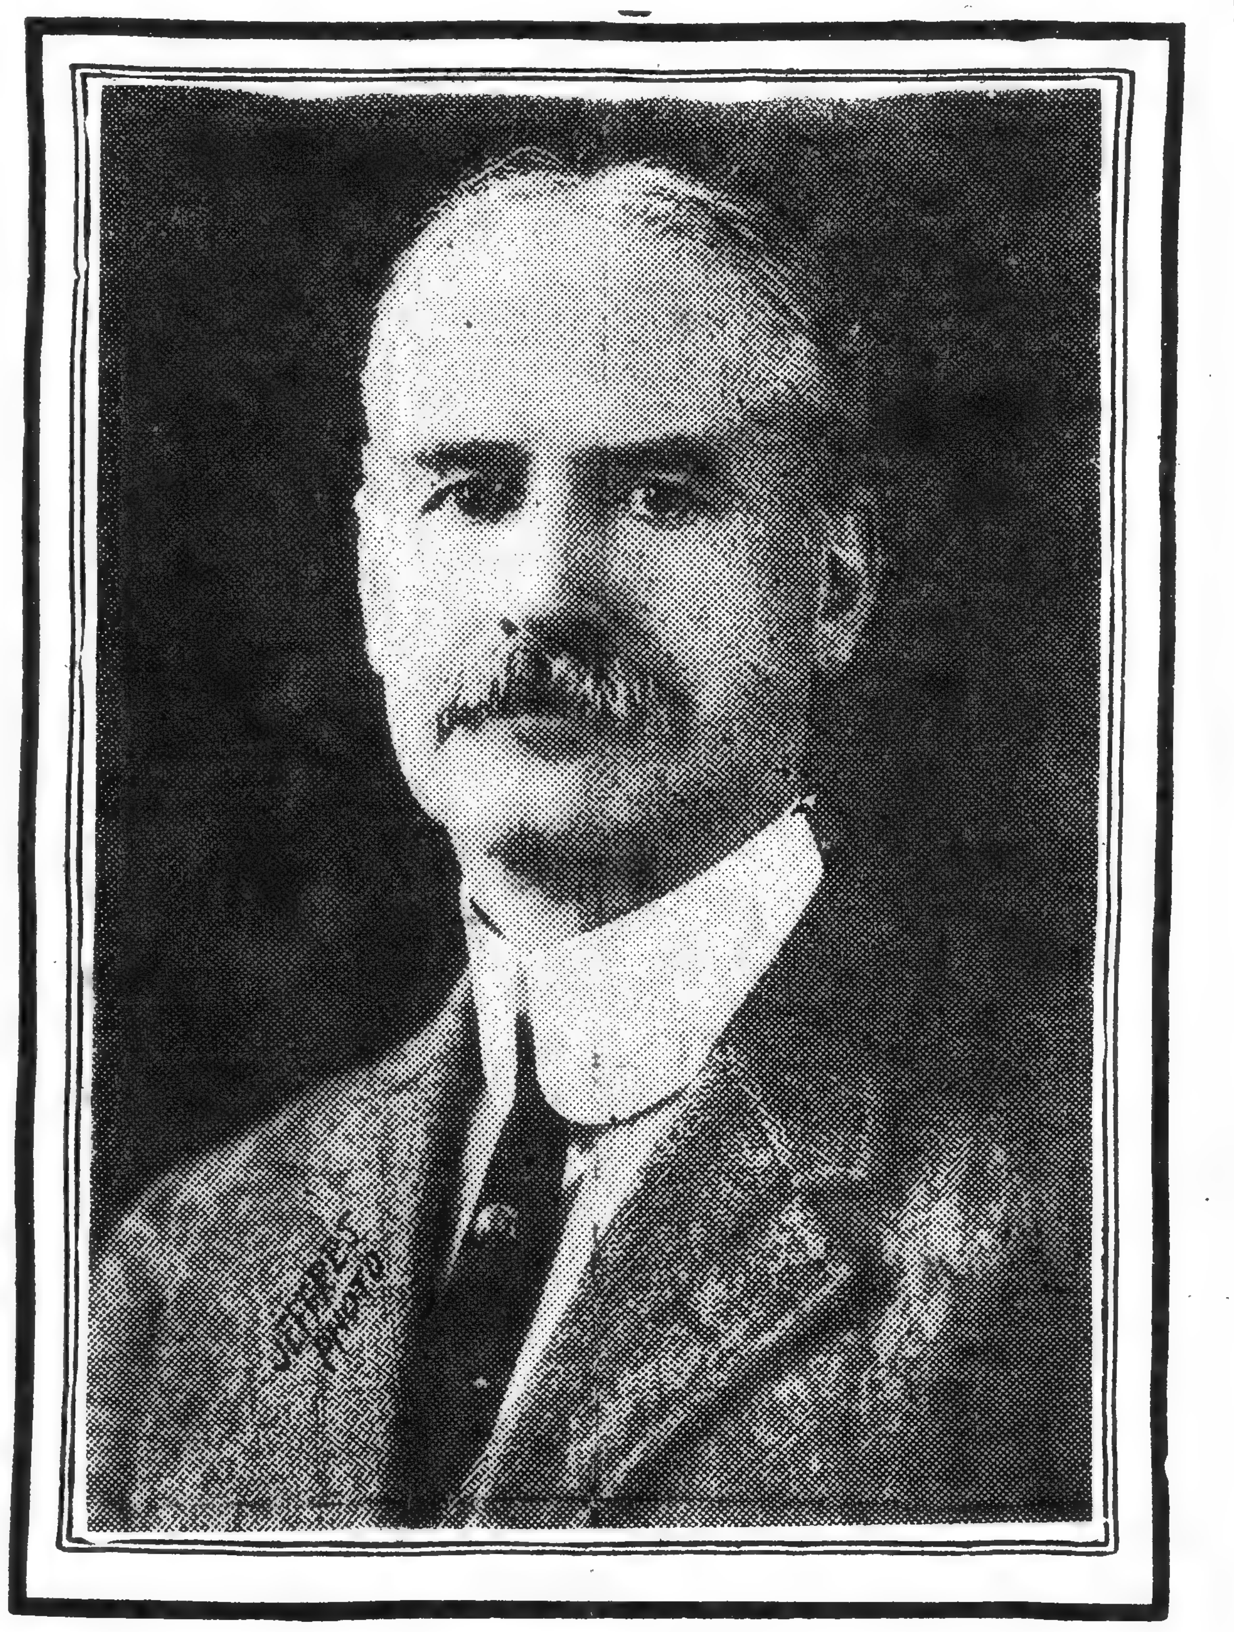
From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date
Established: Lon

ANSWERS CRITICISM OF CITY'S MUSICAL TASTE

Harold Randolph Disagrees With Stransky On Some Points, But Says Baltimore Lacks Public Spirit. Calls Boston Symphony Fashionable.



HAROLD RANDOLPH

Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory of Music, said this morning that he could quite understand and sympathize with the discouragement expressed in an interview in THE EVENING SUN yesterday by Josef Stransky, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, over the lack of support given to that organization by Baltimoreans. He could understand how Mr. Stransky might recommend to the directors of the organization the abandonment of its concerts here. And he thought it would be very humiliating to Baltimore if such action were taken.

"I disagree with Mr. Stransky when he says that Baltimore is not a music-loving community," said Mr. Randolph. "There is as much love of music in Baltimore as there is in any city of its size in the country. The fault in Baltimore is that it has no public spirit, that it feels no sense of obligation to support such an organization as Mr. Stransky's when they are willing to give concerts here and to lose money for a time with the hope of eventually establishing themselves. If Baltimoreans are in a mood for music, they will go to concerts. If they are not, they will not go. They feel no sense of responsibilitty. In this they differ from other cities of their size and character."

Waves Dancing Remarks Aside.

Mr. Stransky's comment to the effect that Baltimoreans cared for nothing but their cards and their dancing Mr. Randolph waved away without words as something the conductor had said because he did not understand this city and in which the discouragement he felt at the time of speaking was an element.

"I cannot understand Mr. Stransky, however," Mr. Randolph resumed, "when he says that he would rather play to 50 people who love and understand music than to an enormous audience that cares nothing about it. Certainly he cannot say that the audience on Monday night was not appreciative. It was extremely appreciative.

"Mr. Stransky says that the attendance has actually decreased since the concerts by the New York Philharmonic four years ago. I do not know whether that is exactly true or not. But it is strange that the attendance at these should be so small while the attendance at the Boston Symphony concerts are so large.

Hates To Call Rival Fashionable.

"I hate to say it, but it seems to be true that the Boston Symphony has become fashionable. It does seem that people go to their concerts because that is so. And no organization which comes here gives more pleasing programs than the New York Philharmonic.

"The difference between the two orchestras is such that only an expert on symphony music could detect the difference. Sometimes I think the Boston Symphony is too classical. It has become the thing to go to the Boston Symphony.

"There is something in the American people which makes them willing to pay $15 for a seat to hear Caruso because he is the greatest living tenor, when they would not pay $2 to hear one who is so nearly as good that it is almost impossible to detect the difference.

"I can understand how Mr. Stransky can wish to recommend the abandonment of the concerts in Baltimore, and I think it would be extremely humiliating to Baltimore if that were done.

"There is undoubtedly a lack of public spirit in such things in Baltimore. Other cities of its size and character have their own orchestras. If Baltimore felt the proper pride it would have its organization. In Boston, where there is probably more public spirit than in any other city in the country, the concerts of the Boston Symphony are crowded.

"In Philadelphia they suppo
certs a season
tra, five by D
Boston Symph
supports 50 c
public spirit wh
tras of St. Lou

"It is true tha times the popul
has, and ten tim pare their 60 c
five by the Bosto
the Philharmoni
by the Philadel
cago, which is n
of America, is th
try where the o
ported by the mu

"When the New first came here there was an organ
tion of women who formed an auxili
to make its concerts a success, bu
has not been active lately. When
Boston Symphony first began to c
here a guarantee was provided for th
but they have become established
now they are sold out far in advan

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. FEB 2 0 1915
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS OLD AND NEW WORKS.

The Boston Symphony Society presented a modern novelty in Joseph Guy, Marie Ropartz' Symphony No. 4 in C major, at the Academy of Music last night. The composition in one movement was produced by the Director of Music at Nancy three years ago, and was played last evening for the first time in Brooklyn. Ropartz was taught by Cesar Franck, and the symphony shows in its melody and harmony that the organist of St. Clotilde wielded a powerful influence over his pupil. The work is bizarre in places, and cloying, but brilliant throughout.

Schumann's "Genoveva" Overture, Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3, and Strauss' one poem, "Don Juan," were the other numbers on the programme. All three have been heard frequently by Brooklyn concert-goers, but never have they been played in more masterful fashion than by Dr. Muck's men. In the Schumann overture, the audience followed the unhappy noblewoman's career, from court to wilderness, visualized her agony, and thrilled at her final triumph. The work was wonderfully well done.

Many of the audience had heard the third "Leonore" overture at the opera earlier in the week, as interpreted by Toscanini, but this added rather than subtracted interest in the beautiful work. The overture is really a tone poem, following closely the story of "Fidelio," from the descent of Florestan into the dungeon to the trumpet call that heralds salvation. "Don Juan" was played with all the passion and color of the story itself, the contrasted motifs of the hero as a lecherous adventurer and as an amorous idealist being brought out vividly. The swift reaction from affection to disgust and the tragedy in which the poem culminates were realistically played. The entire programme was rendered with the solidarity and precision and intelligence that makes the work of the Boston musicians so consistently close to orchestral perfection.

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 1 0 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Presents Brahms's C Minor Work to 3,000 in Carnegie Hall.

There are few greater symphonies than Brahms's in C minor, and it has had few such performances as that given it in Carnegie Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conducting.

It was as near a perfect interpretation as is possible, and the 3,000 people enthused to such an extent that the orchestra players were called on to stand in acknowledgment.

A sound presentation was given the Bach D minor concerto for two violins, the solo parts being played by Concertmeister Anton Witek and S. Noack, and to the Beethoven "Coriolanus" overture and the "Leonore" overture No. 3.

From BULLETIN
Address Providence, R. I.
Date FEB 2 0

Symphony Concert Programme.

Anton Witek, the well-known violinist and concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the fifth Providence concert of the orchestra, to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, March 2. Mr. Witek is one of the world's greatest violinists, and his appearance as soloist is a feature of the Boston concerts. The programme for les the First Symphony
ser Sibelius; Bruch's estra and violin in G
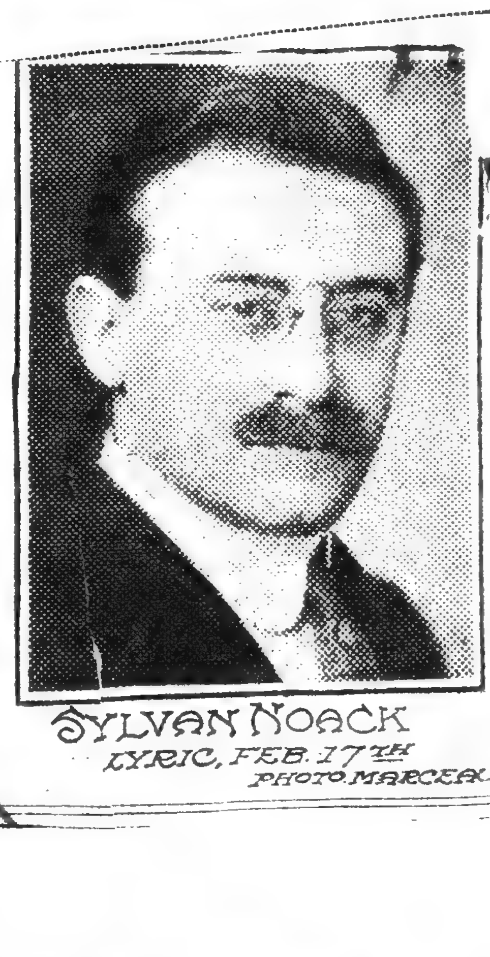
"A Siegfried Idyl," and
al" overture.

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date
Established



SYLVAN NOACK
LYRIC, FEB. 17TH
PHOTO MARCEAU

Boston Symphony

Bach, Beethoven and Brahms will monopolize the program which Dr. Karl Muck has arranged for the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, February 17, at 8.15 o'clock. The program comprises the C minor symphony of Brahms, the Shepherds' music from the "Christmas Oratorio" of Bach; Bach's double concerto for two violins and string orchestra in D minor, and Bethoven's "Leonora III." overture.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date

For the last time but one before its flight to San Francisco and back within the month of May, the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to town last night. As usual Carnegie Hall was packed, and Fifty-seventh street jammed with limousines, though the hundred men played without a star. Leader Muck, in chastened mood, presented no vexed problems. He gave "the three B's," and a pleased house made the band stand up after Brahms's fine First symphony, with the Alp horn "afterglow," while between Beethoven overtures to "Coriolanus" and "Leonore" No. 3 they were equally cordial to rare old Bach.

This "magnum of Bach," to paraphrase the famous "bottle" of Brahms's joke, took the form of a resounding old concerto for two violins, vigorously played in the hearty Bach way by Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack. To-night in Brooklyn the orchestra have Schumann's "Genoveva," a symphony of Ropartz, the Strauss "Don Juan" and again Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3.

From Brooklyn they return to Carnegie Hall to-morrow in Sibelius's interesting First symphony and Haydn's called "Surprise," the latter sandwiched with Mozart's "Magic Flute" and Weber's "Freischuetz" overtures.

1884

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City

Large Audience Hears Symphony

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, with a programme of works by the three great B's—Beethoven, Bach and Brahms—was the delightful offering in Carnegie Hall last evening.

Brahms's Symphony No. 1, in C minor, occupied the principal place on the programme; Bach's Concerto in D minor brought forward two solo violins—Mr. Witek, concertmaster, and Mr. Noack, second first violin. The Beethoven numbers consisted of the overture "Coriolanus" and the "Lenore," No. 3 overture.

Mr. Muck conducted the symphony with vigor and enthusiasm.

rk, 188

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Dr. Muck's Organization Heard Again in Carnegie Hall.

With a programme made up for the greater part of music of the old school, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gave a concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. As it always is when that musical organization appears here, the audience was large, and its expressions of appreciation of the work of Dr. Muck and his men were frequent and warm.

All of the numbers played have been played here before by the same orchestra, but they lost nothing in repetition. They were Sibelius' symphony No. 1, in E minor, op. No. 39; the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute," Haydn's "Surprise" symphony and the overture to Weber's opera, "Der Freischütz." Each served to show again the virtuosity of the orchestra and the absolute control which Dr. Muck has over his men.

1884

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date FEB 10 1915

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

A Programme of Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms.

Establis

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is on its fourth visit to New York this season, and gave its first concert last evening in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Muck's programme presented orchestral pieces that are most familiar—Brahms's first symphony and two overtures by Beethoven—that known as "Leonore" No. 3 and the overture to "Coriolanus."

The Symphony and the "Leonore" overture have several times been played here this season. It is not necessary to suppose that comparisons were invited by the repetition of them by Dr. Muck. All that need be said is that the performance of the symphony, especially, was of marvelous beauty and euphony, a marvelous recapturing of the whole spirit and significance of the work in its larger outlines, its noblest proportions, and in the minutest details of the composer's thought. It was a performance of grandiose power and poignant beauty. The listeners gave abundant evidence of its thrilling and uplifting effect by the rapturous applause with which it was greeted; it deeply stirred them, and Dr. Muck was time and again made to acknowledge the enthusiasm and gratitude offered him, even after he had caused his men to rise and share them with him.

There was no single soloist, but Bach's concerto for two violins in D minor was played by Messrs. Anton Witek, the concert master, and Sylvain Noack, his colleague at the first desk of the violins, who rose from their places in the orchestra to play it. It was a performance of splendid vigor and deeply musical spirit, as far as possible from compiishment, as they have before now had occasion to show, and they entered upon this task with a full understanding of the composition and a complete agreement with each other as to its significance. The string orchestra par in it was not so much an accompaniment as a sympathetic co-opertion with the two solo players.

---

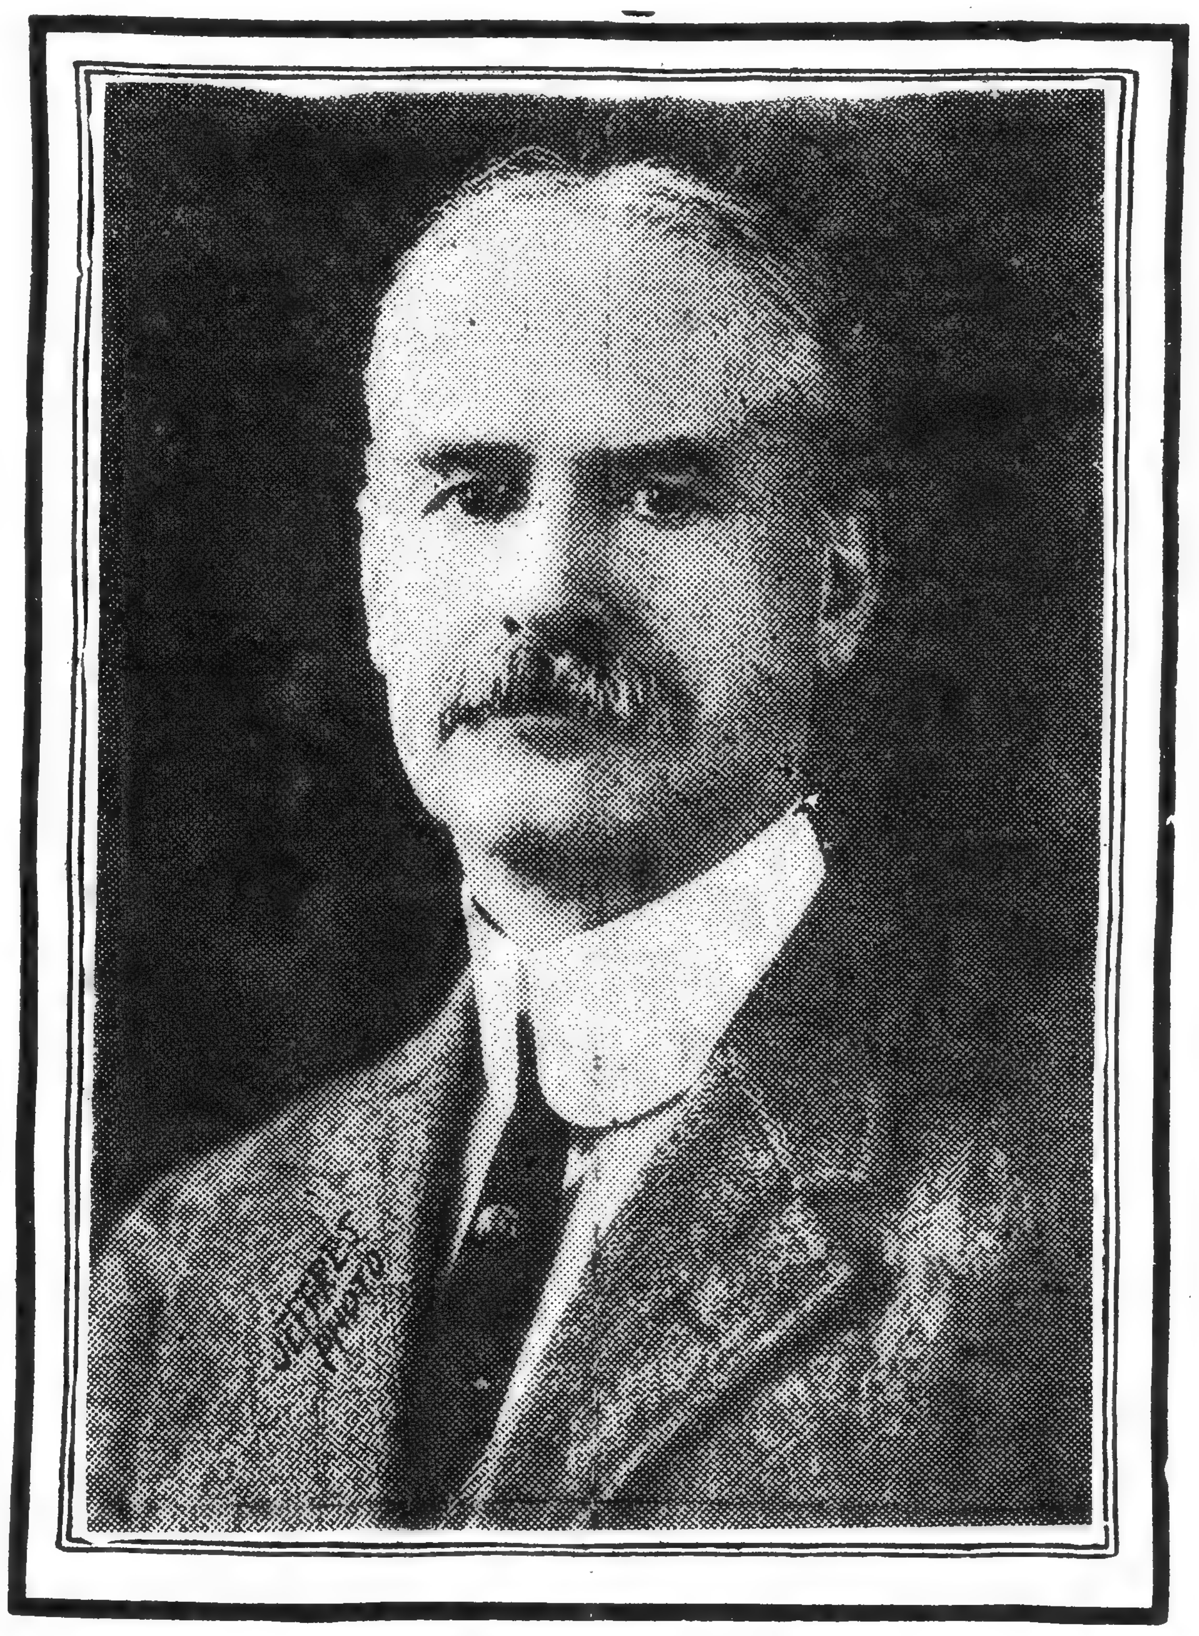
RITICISM OF 'S MUSICAL TASTE

Harold Randolph Disagrees With Stransky On Some Points, But Says Baltimore Lacks Public Spirit. Calls Boston Symphony Fashionable.



HAROLD RANDOLPH

Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory of Music, said this morning that he could quite understand and sympathize with the discouragement expressed in an interview in THE EVENING SUN yesterday by Josef Stransky, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, over the lack of support given to that organization by Baltimoreans. He could understand how Mr. Stransky might recommend to the directors of the organization the abandonment of its concerts here. And he thought it would be very humiliating to Baltimore if such action were taken.

"I disagree with Mr. Stransky when he says that Baltimore is not a music-loving community," said Mr. Randolph. "There is as much love of music in Baltimore as there is in any city of its size in the country. The fault in Baltimore is that it has no public spirit, that it feels no sense of obligation to support such an organization as Mr. Stransky's when they are willing to give concerts here and to lose money for a time with the hope of eventually establishing themselves. If Baltimoreans are in a mood for music, they will go to concerts. If they are not, they will not go. They feel no sense of responsibilitty. In this they differ from other cities of their size and character."

Waves Dancing Remarks Aside.

Mr. Stransky's comment to the effect that Baltimoreans cared for nothing but their cards and their dancing Mr. Randolph waved away without words as something the conductor had said because he did not understand this city and in which the discouragement he felt at the time of speaking was an element.

"I cannot understand Mr. Stransky, however," Mr. Randolph resumed, "when he says that he would rather play to 50 people who love and understand music than to an enormous audience that cares nothing about it. Certainly he cannot say that the audience on Monday night was not appreciative. It was extremely appreciative.

"Mr. Stransky says that the attendance has actually decreased since the concerts by the New York Philharmonic four years ago. I do not know whether that is exactly true or not. But it is strange that the attendance at these should be so small while the attendance at the Boston Symphony concerts are so large.

Hates To Call Rival Fashionable.

"I hate to say it, but it seems to be true that the Boston Symphony has become fashionable. It does seem that people go to their concerts because that is so. And no organization which comes here gives more pleasing programs than the New York Philharmonic.

"The difference between the two orchestras is such that only an expert on symphony music could detect the difference. Sometimes I think the Boston Symphony is too classical. It has become the thing to go to the Boston Symphony.

"There is something in the American people which makes them willing to pay $15 for a seat to hear Caruso because he is the greatest living tenor, when they would not pay $2 to hear one who is so nearly as good that it is almost impossible to detect the difference.

"I can understand how Mr. Stransky can wish to recommend the abandonment of the concerts in Baltimore, and I think it would be extremely humiliating to Baltimore if that were done.

"There is undoubtedly a lack of public spirit in such things in Baltimore. Other cities of its size and character have their own orchestras. If Baltimore felt the proper pride it would have its organization. In Boston, where there is probably more public spirit than in any other city in the country, the concerts of the Boston Symphony are crowded.

"In Philadelphia they support 60 concerts a season, 50 by their own orchestra, five by Damrosch and five by the Boston Symphony. Even Minneapolis supports 50 concerts a season. It is public spirit which supports the orchestras of St. Louis and Cincinnati.

"It is true that Philadelphia has three times the population which Baltimore has, and ten times the money, but compare their 60 concerts with our 12—five by the Boston Symphony, three by the Philharmonic Orchestra, and one by the Philadelphia Orchestra. Chicago, which is really the music centre of America, is the only city in the country where the organizations are supported by the music lovers alone.

"When the New York Philharmonic first came here there was an organization of women who formed an auxiliary to make its concerts a success, but it has not been active lately. When the Boston Symphony first began to come here a guarantee was provided for them, but they have become established and now they are sold out far in advance."

---

nt at mail where ensable pical of ndicated impass-
ails now
o points with a e is not

AN NOACK
UC, FEB. 17TH
PHOTO MARCEAU

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. FEB 20 1915
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS OLD AND NEW WORKS.

The Boston Symphony Society presented a modern novelty in Joseph Guy, Marie Ropartz' Symphony No. 4 in C major, at the Academy of Music last night. The composition in one movement was produced by the Director of Music at Nancy three years ago, and was played last evening for the first time in Brooklyn. Ropartz was taught by Cesar Franck, and the symphony shows in its melody and harmony that the organist of St. Clotilde wielded a powerful influence over his pupil. The work is bizarre in places, and cloying, but brilliant throughout.

Schumann's "Genoveva" Overture, Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3, and Strauss' one poem, "Don Juan," were the other numbers on the programme. All three have been heard frequently by Brooklyn concert-goers, but never have they been played in more masterful fashion than by Dr. Muck's men. In the Schumann overture, the audience followed the unhappy noblewoman's career, from court to wilderness, visualized her agony, and thrilled at her final triumph. The work was wonderfully well done.

Many of the audience had heard the third "Leonore" overture at the opera earlier in the week, as interpreted by Toscanini, but this added rather than subtracted interest in the beautiful work. The overture is really a tone poem, following closely the story of "Fidelio," from the descent of Florestan into the dungeon to the trumpet call that heralds salvation. "Don Juan" was played with all the passion and color of the story itself, the contrasted motifs of the hero as a lecherous adventurer and as an amorous idealist being brought out vividly. The swift reaction from affection to disgust and the tragedy in which the poem culminates were realistically played. The entire programme was rendered with the solidarity and precision and intelligence that makes the work of the Boston musicians so consistently close to orchestral perfection.

rk, 1884

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 19 191

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Presents Brahms's C Minor Work to 3,000 in Carnegie Hall.

There are few greater symphonies than Brahms's in C minor, and it has had few such performances as that given it in Carnegie Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conducting.

It was as near a perfect interpretation as is possible, and the 3,000 people enthused to such an extent that the orchestra players were called on to stand in acknowledgment.

A sound presentation was given the Bach D minor concerto for two violins, the solo parts being played by Concertmeister Anton Witek and S. Noack, and to the Beethoven "Coriolanus" overture and the "Leonore" overture No. 3.

Estal 884

From BULLETIN
Address Providence, R. I.
Date FEB 20

Symphony Concert Programme.

Anton Witek, the well-known violinist and concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the fifth Providence concert of the orchestra, to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, March 2. Mr. Witek is one of the world's greatest violinists, and his appearance as soloist is a feature of the Boston concerts. The programme for the concert includes the First Symphony of the composer Sibelius; Bruch's concerto for orchestra and violin in G minor; Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl," and Dvorak's "Carnaval" overture.

1884

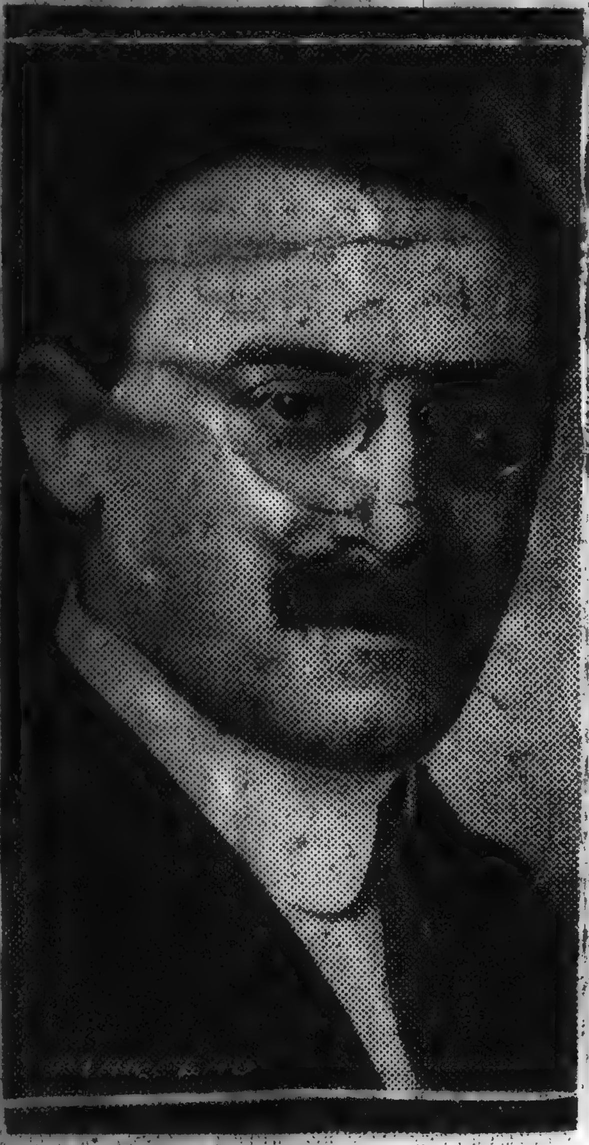
Boston Symphony

Bach, Beethoven and Brahms will monopolize the program which Dr. Karl Muck has arranged for the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, February 17, at 8.15 o'clock. The program comprises the C minor symphony of Brahms, the Shepherds' music from the "Christmas Oratorio" of Bach; Bach's double concerto for two violins and string orchestra in D minor, and Bethoven's "Leonora III." overture.

FEB 17 1915

lished:

Soloists At Symphony



SYLVAIN NOACK

ANTON WITEK

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theatre tonight. The program is one of the best that Dr. Muck has ever arranged for this city, comprising four masterpieces by three of the greatest composers. The works are Brahms' First Symphony in C minor, Bach's Shepherds' Music from the Christmas Oratorio, Bach's double concerto for two violins in D minor and finally Beethoven's overture "Leonora" No. 3. The solo violins in the double concerto will be played by Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack, respectively, concertmaster and assistant concertmaster of the orchestra. … time in Baltimore.

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 14 1915

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Sibelius, Bach, Brahms and Dvorak are the four composers represented on the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at its fourth Philadelphia concert in the Academy of Music, tomorrow evening, at 8.15 o'clock. The first place on the program will be given to the great Finnish composer whose first symphony, in E minor, will be played. Of the four symphonies that he has given to the world, the first seems to sound the highest note, melodically and emotionally. The second is rather more finished in workmanship, but lacks much of the strength of its predecessor. The third from all accounts is a failure.

Bach's very interesting double concerto for two violins and string orchestra, which will open the second part of the program will enlist the services as solo violinists of Ashton Witek, concert-master of the orchestra, and Sylvain Hesck, second concert-master. Both of them are admirable artists, well skilled in the best traditions of Bach playing. Mr. Witek has appeared in the past in Philadelphia, as soloist with the orchestra.

The other two numbers will be Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn (Chorale St. Antoni). No composer is more skilled in this form of composition and this set of variations shows Brahms at his best. The final number will be the joyful overture, "Carnival" of the Bohemian Antonin Dvorak.

Esta … 384

PHOTO BY MARCEAU, BOSTON.

SYLVAIN NOACK
Assisting Artist at Boston Symphony Concert

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date FEB 19 1915

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Ueber das geſtrige Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert, das unter Leitung von Dr. Muck eines der genußreichſten und künſtleriſch vollendetſten Darbietungen unter Leitung dieſes Dirigenten bedeutete, folgt eine ausführliche Beſprechung im morgigen

Esta … 884

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date …B 20 1915

Symphony Concert Programme.

Anton Witek, the well-known violinist and concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the fifth Providence concert of the orchestra, to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, March 2. Mr. Witek is one of the world's greatest violinists, and his appearance as soloist is a feature of the Boston concerts. The programme for the concert includes the First Symphony of the composer Sibelius; Bruch's concerto for orchestra and violin in G minor; Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl," and Dvorak's "Carnaval" overture.

E … 1884

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date FEB 18 1915

Established: Londo

DR. MUCK FINDS THAT WE DO ENJOY MUSIC

Declares Stransky Must Have Had A 'Gray Day' When He Cast Aspersion Upon Baltimore's Ability To Appreciate Notable Orchestral Efforts.

"In all the years that I have been visiting Baltimore I recall no incident that has led me to suppose that Baltimoreans have anything to learn when it comes to appreciating music," said Dr. Karl Muck last evening.

But I am anticipating. I was anxious to ask Dr. Muck, the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whether or not he found us a musical community, because with many of us Mr. Stransky's aspersion on Baltimore's receptivity is still rankling.

It is not quite so easy as one might suppose, however, to get a word with this particular maestro, as he is not to be found half an hour before a concert pacing about his dressing room. Inde it was not until the intermission tha was able to have a minute's chat w him.

I must confess that I approached h with some trepidation, for I had be warned that I would find him mu changed, depressed, because the Eu pean war is a deep sorrow to him, a grave and thoughtful.

In High Spirits.

But, as a matter of fact, he was very high spirits. He was smoking o of those remarkable cigarettes that a made for him alone and which one m not buy—I think I told you about the two years ago—and his eyes were twinkling merrily as he greeted me. It w while I was debating how best to introduce the subject I had come to seek formation about that he really gave the answer to the question in the ba of my mind. Looking back on the incident, it seems quite curious.

"I always delight in my visits to B timore," he told me, "because of all halls in which the orchestra plays know of none that seems to me so ab lutely perfect, acoustically, as the Lyr It is a wonderful pleasure to play he but more than that I feel that I am entirely en rapport with the audien here in Baltimore. I do not know exa ly how to express it, but I feel th 'with me.' There is a sympathy betw us. It comes right up to me from house and envelopes me, and I enjoy ing here as much as anywhere that orchestra goes on its travels."

All this sounds a bit "psychic," to ure, but if Dr. Muck thinks that Baltiore audiences create a musical atmoshere in which he bathes while he is nducting, the question as to whether e are musical or not seems to be anvered beyond cavil.

One Of Stransky's "Gray Days."

It was then that I told him what Mr. transky had said about us, and he eemed quite amazed.

"Stransky must have been having a ray day," he told me, and finished by aking the statement quoted in the pening sentence of this little remiiscence.

Time was pressing and I could hear he orchestra tuning up for the Bach "symphony." I was about to take my leave when Dr. Muck looked at me a moment and then said: "Where have I met you before?"

"Two years ago," I answered, "at the Stafford, when you told me all about Schoenberg's music. Yet in all that time I have never heard any of it, for when the Flonzaley quartet came here it changed its program and played a classic quartet instead."

Schoenberg? "Dreadful!"

The thought of Schoenberg seemed to cause the famous director a great deal of amusement.

"I did five things of his in Boston," he told me, "and some of the people in the music hall laughed aloud, others hissed. Such music!" He threw up his hands. "It's dreadful!"

"If I had time," I said, "I would get you to tell me about Korngold."

"I have not played that symphony yet," said Dr. Muck, "but I am going to. Stransky bought the rights for the first performance in America. But I shall give it next year. Stransky is always buying the rights for first performances. You see what it is to have all that Pulitzer money back of you. Later on I may play some Korngold here."

Before I left him I asked if he had made any plans for the next concert.

"I am not sure," he told me, "but I rather fancy that we will play the big Schubert C major symphony."

A happy thought, truly. I hope that he will not change his mind in the meantime.

J. O. L.

DR. KRL MUCK

FEB 17 1915

ished:

Soloists At Symphony

SYLVAIN NOACK

ANTON WITEK

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theatre tonight. The program is one of the best that Dr. Muck has ever arranged for this city, comprising four masterpieces by three of the greatest composers. The works are Brahms' First Symphony in C minor, Bach's Shepherds' Music from the Christmas Oratorio, Bach's double concerto for two violins in D minor and finally Beethoven's overture "Leonora" No. 3. The solo violins in the double concerto will be played by Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack respectively, concertmaster and assistant concertmaster of the orchestra. time in Baltimore.

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 14 1915

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Sibelius, Bach, Brahms and Dvorak are the four composers represented on the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at its fourth Philadelphia concert in the Academy of Music, tomorrow evening, at 8.15 o'clock. The first place on the program will be given to the great Finnish composer whose first symphony, in E minor, will be played. Of the four symphonies that he has given to the world, the first seems to sound the highest note, melodically and emotionally. The second is rather more finished in workmanship, but lacks much of the strength of its predecessor. The third from all accounts is a failure.

Bach's very interesting double concerto for two violins and string orchestra, which will open the second part of the program will enlist the services as solo violinists of Ashton Witek, concert-master of the orchestra, and Sylvain Hesck, second concert-master. Both of them are admirable artists, well skilled in the best traditions of Bach playing. Mr. Witek has appeared in the past in Philadelphia, as soloist with the orchestra.

The other two numbers will be Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn (Chorale St. Antoni). No composer is more skilled in this form of composition and this set of variations shows Brahms at his best. The final number will be the joyful overture, "Carnival" of the Bohemian, Antonin Dvorak.

Esta 884

PHOTO BY MARCEAU, BOSTON.

SYLVAIN NOACK
Assisting Artist at Boston Symphony Concert

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Ueber das geſtrige Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert, das unter Leitung von Dr. Muck eines der genußreichſten und künſtleriſch vollendetſten Darbietungen unter Leitung dieſes Dirigenten bedeutete, folgt eine ausführliche Beſprechung im morgigen

Esta 884

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date B 2

Symphony Concert Programme.

Anton Witek, the well-known violinist and concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the fifth Providence concert of the orchestra, to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, March 2. Mr. Witek is one of the world's greatest violinists, and his appearance as soloist is a feature of the Boston concerts. The programme for the concert includes the First Symphony of the composer Sibelius; Bruch's concerto for orchestra and violin in G minor; Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl," and Dvorak's "Carnaval" overture.

E , 1884

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date FEB 18 1915

Established: Londo

DR. MUCK FINDS THAT WE DO ENJOY MUSIC

Declares Stransky Must ave Had A 'Gray Day' When He Cast Aspersion U on Baltimore's Ability To Appreciate Notable O chestral Efforts.

"In all the years that I have been visiting Baltimore I recall no incident that has led me to suppose that Baltimoreans have anything to learn when it comes to appreciating music," said Dr. Karl Muck last evening.

But I am anticipating. I was anxious to ask Dr. Muck, the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whether or not he found us a musical community, because with many of us Mr. Stransky's aspersion on Baltimore's receptivity is still rankling.

It is not quite so easy as one might suppose, however, to get a word with this particular maestro, as he is not to be found half an hour before a concert pacing about his dressing room. Inde it was not until the intermission tha was able to have a minute's chat w him.

I must confess that I approached h with some trepidation, for I had b warned that I would find him mu changed, depressed, because the Eu pean war is a deep sorrow to him, a grave and thoughtful.

DR. K RL MUCK

In High Spirits.

But, as a matter of fact, he was very high spirits. He was smoking o of those remarkable cigarettes that a made for him alone and which one m not buy—I think I told you about th two years ago—and his eyes were tw kling merrily as he greeted me. It w while I was debating how best to int duce the subject I had come to seek formation about that he really gave the answer to the question in the ba of my mind. Looking back on the in dent, it seems quite curious.

"I always delight in my visits to B timore," he told me, "because of all halls in which the orchestra plays know of none that seems to me so ab lutely perfect, acoustically, as the Lyr It is a wonderful pleasure to play he but more than that I feel that I am entirely en rapport with the audien here in Baltimore. I do not know exa ly how to express it, but I feel th 'with me.' There is a sympathy betw us. It comes right up to me from house and envelopes me, and I enjoy ing here as much as anywhere that orchestra goes on its travels."

All this sounds a bit "psychic," to ure, but if Dr. Muck thinks that Baltiore audiences create a musical atmoshere in which he bathes while he is onducting, the question as to whether e are musical or not seems to be anvered beyond cavil.

One Of Stransky's "Gray Days."

It was then that I told him what Mr. transky had said about us, and he eemed quite amazed.

"Stransky must have been having a ray day," he told me, and finished by aking the statement quoted in the pening sentence of this little remiiscence.

Time was pressing and I could hear e orchestra tuning up for the Bach "symphony." I was about to take my leave when Dr. Muck looked at me a moment and then said: "Where have I met you before?"

"Two years ago," I answered, "at the Stafford, when you told me all about Schoenberg's music. Yet in all that time I have never heard any of it, for when the Flonzaley quartet came here it changed its program and played a classic quartet instead."

Schoenberg? "Dreadful!"

The thought of Schoenberg seemed to cause the famous director a great deal of amusement.

"I did five things of his in Boston," he told me, "and some of the people in the music hall laughed aloud, others hissed. Such music!" He threw up his hands. "It's dreadful!"

"If I had time," I said, "I would get you to tell me about Korngold."

"I have not played that symphony yet," said Dr. Muck, "but I am going to. Stransky bought the rights for the first performance in America. But I shall give it next year. Stransky is always buying the rights for first performances. You see what it is to have all that Pulitzer money back of you. Later on I may play some Korngold here."

Before I left him I asked if he had made any plans for the next concert.

"I am not sure," he told me, "but I rather fancy that we will play the big Schubert C major symphony."

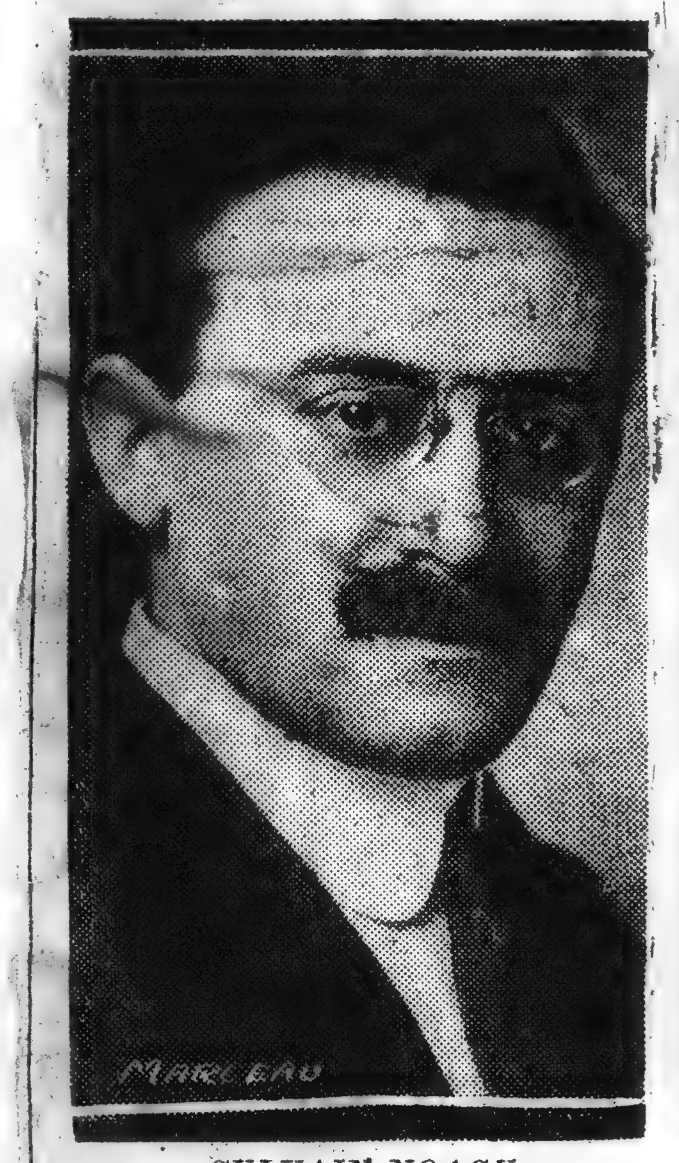
A happy thought, truly. I hope that he will not change his mind in the meantime.

J. O. L.

FEB 17 1915

ished:

Soloists At Symphony



SYLVAIN NOACK

ANTON WITEK

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theatre tonight. The program is one of the best that Dr. Muck has ever arranged for this city, comprising four masterpieces by three of the greatest composers. The works are Brahms' First Symphony in C minor, Bach's Shepherds' Music from the Christmas Oratorio, Bach's double concerto for two violins in D minor and finally Beethoven's overture "Leonora" No. 3. The solo violins in the double concerto will be played by Anton Witek and Sylvain Noack, respectively concertmaster and assistant concertmaster of the orchestra. Mr. Noack will [illegible] soloist for the first time in Baltimore.

---

elphia,

FEB 14 19

Esta 884

Symphony Orchestra

ach, Brahms and Dvorak are the four composers represented on the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at its fourth Philadelphia concert in the Academy of Music, tomorrow evening, at 8.15 o'clock. The first place on the program will be given to the great Finnish composer whose first symphony, in E minor, will be played. Of the four symphonies that he has given to the world, the first seems to sound the highest note, melodically and emotionally. The second is rather more finished in workmanship, but lacks much of the strength of its predecessor. The third from all accounts is a failure.

Bach's very interesting double concerto for two violins and string orchestra, which will open the second part of the program will enlist the services as solo violinists of Ashton Witek, concert-master of the orchestra, and Sylvain Hesck, second concert-master. Both of them are admirable artists, well skilled in the best traditions of Bach playing. Mr. Witek has appeared in the past in Philadelphia, as soloist with the orchestra.

The other two numbers will be Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn (Chorale St. Antoni). No composer is more skilled in this form of composition and this set of variations shows Brahms at his best. The final number will be the joyful overture, "Carnival" of the Bohemian, Antonin Dvorak.

PHOTO BY MARCEAU, BOSTON.

SYLVAIN NOACK

Assisting Artist at Boston Symphony Concert

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City

Date FEB [illegible] 1915

Esta 884

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Ueber das geſtrige Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert, das unter Leitung von Dr. Muck eines der genußreichſten und künſtleriſch vollendetſten Darbietungen unter Leitung dieſes Dirigenten bedeutete, folgt eine ausführliche Beſprechung im morgigen Blatt.

---

ie Janitor's Views o

entable tale of the most abused i etween the owner of a building a ty in impressing upon the min
he is something more than

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date FEB 18 1915

Established: Londo

DR. MUCK FINDS THAT WE DO ENJOY MUSIC

Declares Stransky Must Have Had A 'Gray Day' When He Cast Aspersion Upon Baltimore's Ability To Appreciate Notable Orchestral Efforts.

"In all the years that I have been visiting Baltimore I recall no incident that has led me to suppose that Baltimoreans have anything to learn when it comes to appreciating music," said Dr. Karl Muck last evening.

But I am anticipating. I was anxious to ask Dr. Muck, the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whether or not he found us a musical community, because with many of us Mr. Stransky's aspersion on Baltimore's receptivity is still rankling.

It is not quite so easy as one might suppose, however, to get a word with this particular maestro, as he is not to be found half an hour before a concert pacing about his dressing room. Indeed it was not until the intermission that I was able to have a minute's chat with him.

I must confess that I approached him with some trepidation, for I had been warned that I would find him much changed, depressed, because the European war is a deep sorrow to him, and grave and thoughtful.

In High Spirits.

But, as a matter of fact, he was in very high spirits. He was smoking one of those remarkable cigarettes that are made for him alone and which one may not buy—I think I told you about them two years ago—and his eyes were twinkling merrily as he greeted me. It was while I was debating how best to introduce the subject I had come to seek information about that he really gave me the answer to the question in the back of my mind. Looking back on the incident, it seems quite curious.

"I always delight in my visits to Baltimore," he told me, "because of all the halls in which the orchestra plays I know of none that seems to me so absolutely perfect, acoustically, as the Lyric. It is a wonderful pleasure to play here, but more than that I feel that I am entirely en rapport with the audiences here in Baltimore. I do not know exactly how to express it, but I feel them 'with me.' There is a sympathy between us. It comes right up to me from the house and envelopes me, and I enjoy playing here as much as anywhere that the orchestra goes on its travels."

All this sounds a bit "psychic," to be sure, but if Dr. Muck thinks that Baltimore audiences create a musical atmosphere in which he bathes while he is conducting, the question as to whether we are musical or not seems to be answered beyond cavil.

One Of Stransky's "Gray Days."

It was then that I told him what Mr. Stransky had said about us, and he seemed quite amazed.

"Stransky must have been having a gray day," he told me, and finished by making the statement quoted in the opening sentence of this little reminiscence.

Time was pressing and I could hear the orchestra tuning up for the Bach "symphony." I was about to take my leave when Dr. Muck looked at me a moment and then said: "Where have I met you before?"

"Two years ago," I answered, "at the Stafford, when you told me all about Schoenberg's music. Yet in all that time I have never heard any of it, for when the Flonzaley quartet came here it changed its program and played a classic quartet instead."

Schoenberg? "Dreadful!"

The thought of Schoenberg seemed to cause the famous director a great deal of amusement.

"I did five things of his in Boston," he told me, "and some of the people in the music hall laughed aloud, others hissed. Such music!" He threw up his hands. "It's dreadful!"

"If I had time," I said, "I would get you to tell me about Korngold."

"I have not played that symphony yet," said Dr. Muck, "but I am going to. Stransky bought the rights for the first performance in America. But I shall give it next year. Stransky is always buying the rights for first performances. You see what it is to have all that Pulitzer money back of you. Later on I may play some Korngold here."

Before I left him I asked if he had made any plans for the next concert.

"I am not sure," he told me, "but I rather fancy that we will play the big Schubert C major symphony."

A happy thought, truly. I hope that he will not change his mind in the meantime.

J. O. L.

DR. KARL MUCK

WHEELING INTELLIGENCER

JANUARY 29,

GREAT MUSICAL TREAT IS GIVEN

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLEASED LARGE AUDIENCE LAST NIGHT.

Was One of Most Pleasing Numbers of the University Club Winter Program.

Music lovers filled the Court Theater Thursday evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was here, under the auspices of the University Club. The entertainment was the most artistic of the kind ever presented in this city, and every artist was finished. Individually and collectively the musicians were perfect and the instruments well blended. The various themes chosen for the program last evening were evidence of the great ability on the part of each artist. The conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, is an artist of rare ability, and has his musicians under perfect control at all times.

Especially beautiful was "The Swan of Tuonela," a legend from the Finnish folk-ep c "Kalevala" and "Finlandia," a poem for the orchestra by Sibelius. A Faust overture by Wagner, and "A Siegfried Idyll" were perfectly rendered. The hundred or more pieces were so combined to produce a perfect effect. The Beethoven Symphony No. 8, F major, op. 93, was well understood and appreciated by all. Following each number repeated encores were given.

The University Club is to be congratulated upon having brought to the city such a rare musical treat. The patrons of the Court Theater are anxiously looking forward to the next event, if it is to be as rare and artistic as the one last evening.

WHEELING DAILY NEWS.

JANUARY 29, 1915.

FOURTH CLUB CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

By DR. CLARA SULLIVAN.

When we look at this splendid aggregation of musicians and listen to the wonderful music they are capable of giving us, and then let our minds go back to the beginning of things musical in this country, we feel that unusual progress has been made. One hundred and twenty-nine years ago—in 1786—Andrew Adgate established free "singing classes" in Philadelphia. This was no doubt just an ordinary sight-singing class. However, in 1786 they gave a festival of singing and at this festival an orchestra of 50 took part. This was no doubt America's first pretentious orchestra. In 1790 an orchestra of ten gave open air concerts in "Gray's Garden," Philadelphia. The first Philharmonic Society of New York was organized in 1799, and the second Philharmonic in 1842. In 1840 the Boston Academy Orchestra came into existence, with George J. Webb as its conductor. He was the first conductor to introduce the us eof the baton in this country.

A visiting orchestra that did much to elevate musical taste in this country was the Germania Orchestra. This orchestra received its best recognition in the south. There was a reason for this: The south was not settled by Puritans; they were a pleasure-loving people. They also had money and leisure much more abundantly than the north. It requires money and leisure for the arts to thrive. This should be remembered by all who are inclined to either be discouraged or to sneer at things musical in America. Our great-grandfathers had more vital things to cope with than the arts. The arts are necessary for the soul of man, but a body is necessary for the soul—and food must be had for that body.

This wonderful orchestra heard last night is a far cry from that meager orchestra of the Boston Academy, but it is the result of the efforts of all the real music lovers along the long line from 1786 until 1915.

We are constrained to not leave this subject until we give credit to Theodore Thomas, who certainly worked for the upbuilding of things musical in this country when that work was up-hill business. He never failed us and did more than any one man to disseminate a cultivated musical taste in this new country.

Last night we listened with intense interest to the Boston Orchestra, the equal of any in the world.

One can see at a glance that Dr. Muck has the qualities necessary to make him a leader of men. He has perfect control of all that body. He gets wonderful effects from his men and all is done in a very quiet manner. It is like "carrying coals to Newcastle" to praise the Boston Symphony, but the precision, the flexibility and the wonderful tone of this orchestra is just about as perfect as human-kind can give us.

The Beethoven symphony was captivating in its beauty, and surely no one could fail to respond to the second movement. The whole symphony is full of hopefulness and good cheer.

The Fause Overture is a wonderful tone-picture of "Faust," and Wagner is the great master of tone pictures. The tone-color this orchestra brings out of this work is truly gorgeous in its effect.

The "Seigfried Idyl" is a most beautiful composition, full of real melody and great tenderness.

We were glad indeed to have the opportunity of hearing the two numbers by Sibelius. He is one of the modern composers, and uses modern methods, but these compositions, after a few hearings, we grow to love and appreciate as much as we do the old classical style.

From an artistic standpoint it was a perfect evening, but we "of the provinces" would have gone home happier if Dr. Muck had seen fit to give us an encore. It probably is not the custom of the Boston Symphony. We have been spoiled, in all probability, by an orchestra that comes "out of the west," formerly known as the Theodore Thomas Orchestra. However, we hope to have this matchless orchestra, with its distinguished conductor, with us again.

WHEELING REGISTER,

JANUARY 29,

NINTH CONCERT A MUSICAL TREAT

Large Audience at Court Theatre Enraptured With Playing of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Whether or not the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra last night deserves to rank as the greatest of the University club series depends largely upon whether one is partial to vocal or instrumental music. Certain it is that no greater artistic treat has ever been provided for the music lovers of this city than the playing of the one hundred skilled and trained musicians under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, a leader of international reputation. Three composers were represented on the program, which embraced but five selections. The enthusiasm of the audience spoke eloquently of a desire for more, but the rule that precious gifts come in small parcels seems to govern Dr. Muck, who graciously bowed his acknowledgments after each number and once caused the orchestra to rise in a body to express its appreciation of applause, but who could not be induced to add another selection to the program.

The composers selected by Dr. Muck were Beethoven, Wagner and Sibelius, the last named a present day genius, born in Finland and now living at Helsingfors. The Beethoven number was the symphony No. 8, composed by the famous musical poet in 1812 and played for the first time in this country in Boston in 1844. For years it was considered beneath the standard of Beethoven's compositions, probably because it is different from his other work. Commentators have tried to read a program into it, but not, as far as known, upon the authority of Beethoven himself. The symphony is in four parts and was the first and longest of the orchestra's selections. It was exquisitely played and most enthusiastically received.

Of Richard Wagner's compositions two were selected—"A Faust Overture" and "A Siegfried Idyl." It was written in Paris when Wagner was living from hand to mouth, and the composer has said that he really intended it for the first section of a grand "Faust" symphony. Some of Wagner's biographers assert that when it was first tried at rehearsal some of the players threw up their hands in horror. Fortunately music lovers of a later day took a more enlightened view of the melodious composition, and among the number [illegible] "Siegfried Idyl," which is expressive [illegible] grace and gentle joy, was composed while Wagner was in one of his happiest moods. It was dedicated to his son by his second wife and was first played in their villa at Triebschen as a birthday gift to the composer's wife.

The two compositions of the Finnish composer were unfamiliar to the audience, but they were thoroughly enjoyed. "The Swan of Tuonela" is based on a Finnish legend, "Tuoneia" being the Finnish hades. It is majestic but intensely sad, terminating in magnificent 'cello phrases. "Finland" is a symphonic poem, appealing so strongly to national sentiment that during the last conflict between Russia and Finland its performance is said to have been prohibited. By many persons in the audience this was considered the gem of the program.

Wheeling may consider itself highly favored in being given the opportunity to see and hear one of the world's greatest musical organizations and one of the world's greatest leaders.

THE POST EXPRESS:

JANUARY 20,

SOME OF MUCK'S TRAITS AS LEADER

How the Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Works with His Organization.

Felix Weingartner, the German conductor, and for a number of years the colleague of Dr. Karl Muck of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Royal Opera, Berlin, made the remark in Boston last winter that in his opinion Muck is the most conscientious conductor he had ever known. The justice of this remark is, it is said, very apparent to the members of the orchestra—those who have served under many of the famous conductors of the world. Dr. Muck leaves absolutely nothing to chance or what is oft-times called "the inspiraton of the moment." When he appears at rehearsals on a Monday morning to read a new work for the first time, he not only knows every note in the work, but has mapped out his interpretation of it down to the finest detail.

Dr. Karl Muck.

The Boston Symphony, which is to be heard here next Monday night at Convention hall, has as a rule four rehearsals a week on the mornings of Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday. Now and then a rehearsal is called for Saturday morning. If a new work is to be done the string section and the wind section are first rehearsed separately. Then there are at least three rehearsals of the entire body.

Dr. Muck is unsparing of himself and in a sense is unsparing of his men so far as preparation is concerned. His rehearsals rarely last more than two and a half hours for he believes that men can not do justice to themselves under a longer strain though he himself in studying his scores works far into the night.

Conductors are supposed to have, and most of them have, a keen ear but, according to the men in the Boston Symphony orchestra, Muck's ear is little less than miraculous. He may be rehearsing a complicated modern score when suddenly he will stop and turn back four or five pages to show where one of the violins, violas or 'cellos played a wrong note.

ELLIS CONCERTS

CONVENTION HALL

NEXT MONDAY NIGHT

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

DR.
KARL MUCK
Conductor

SEATS TO-MORROW

Prices—$2, $1.50, $1, 50c.

Mail orders sent now to James E. Furlong,

Care Gibbons & Stone, 172 Main St. E., will be filled in order of receipt

---

ROCHESTER DEMOCRAT AND CHRONICLE,

JANUARY 20

DR. MUCK ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR OF GENIUS

Boston Symphony Is Great Instrument under Him.

DR. KARL MUCK.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will play here next Monday night in Convention Hall, is fortunate in having as its conductor Dr. Karl Muck, whom critics and connoisseurs unite in regarding as one of the foremost orchestral leaders in the world. This will be the fifth season in which he has had control of the artistic work of the orchestra.

Dr. Muck went to Boston in the fall of 1906 on a leave of absence of one year granted to him by the German Emperor. Up to that time he had been identified chiefly with operatic work, for he was the first conductor of the Berlin Royal Opera and for a number of years had conducted the performances of "Parsifal" at the Bayreuth festivals. Orchestral work had been his avocation rather than his vocation, and it had been limited largely to the Philharmonic Orchestra of Vienna and the Royal Orchestra of Berlin, which he conducted each season in several concerts.

The success of this remarkable musician in America was instantaneous. Under him the Boston Symphony Orchestra reached heights that before had seemed unattainable. As a distinguished critic, H. T. Parker, of Boston, expressed it, Dr. Muck found a most wonderful instrument, but one which needed the vivifying impulse of genius to make it perfect. This impulse Dr. Muck supplied.

Toward the end of his first season, representations were made through diplomatic circles direct to Emperor William to have his leave of absence extended for another year. This was accomplished and his second season was even more successful than his first but at the end of it he was recalled to Germany, leaving, however, with a promise to return as soon as his engagement was finished. He returned in the fall of 1912, and it is hoped by friends of the orchestra that his present engagement will last for many years.

WHEELING INTELLIGENCER

JANUARY 29,

GREAT MUSICAL TREAT IS GIVEN

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLEASED LARGE AUDIENCE LAST NIGHT.

Was One of Most Pleasing Numbers of the University Club Winter Program.

Music lovers filled the Court Theater Thursday evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was here, under the auspices of the University Club. The entertainment was the most artistic of the kind ever presented in this city, and every artist was finished. Individually and collectively the musicians were perfect and the instruments well blended. The various themes chosen for the program last evening were evidence of the great ability on the part of each artist. The conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, is an artist of rare ability, and has his musicians under perfect control at all times.

Especially beautiful was "The Swan of Tuonela," a legend from the Finnish folk-ep c "Kalevala" and "Finlandia," a poem for the orchestra by Sibelius. A Faust overture by Wagner, and "A Siegfried Idyll" were perfectly rendered. The hundred or more pieces were so combined to produce a perfect effect. The Beethoven Symphony No. 8, F major, op. 93, was well understood and appreciated by all. Following each number repeated encores were given.

The University Club is to be congratulated upon having brought to the city such a rare musical treat. The patrons of the Court Theater are anxiously looking forward to the next event, if it is to be as rare and artistic as the one last evening.

WHEELING DAILY NEWS.

JANUARY 29, 1915.

FOURTH CLUB CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

By DR. CLARA SULLIVAN.

When we look at this splendid aggregation of musicians and listen to the wonderful music they are capable of giving us, and then let our minds go back to the beginning of things musical in this country, we feel that unusual progress has been made. One hundred and twenty-nine years ago—in 1786—Andrew Adgate established free "singing classes" in Philadelphia. This was no doubt just an ordinary sight-singing class. However, in 1786 they gave a festival of singing and at this festival an orchestra of 50 took part. This was no doubt America's first pretentious orchestra. In 1790 an orchestra of ten gave open air concerts in "Gray's Garden," Philadelphia. The first Philharmonic Society of New York was organized in 1799, and the second Philharmonic in 1842. In 1840 the Boston Academy Orchestra came into existence, with George J. Webb as its conductor. He was the first conductor to introduce the us eof the baton in this country.

A visiting orchestra that did much to elevate musical taste in this country was the Germania Orchestra. This orchestra received its best recognition in the south. There was a reason for this: The south was not settled by Puritans; they were a pleasure-loving people. They also had money and leisure much more abundantly than the north. It requires money and leisure for the arts to thrive. This should be remembered by all who are inclined to either be discouraged or to sneer at things musical in America. Our great-grandfathers had more vital things to cope with than the arts. The arts are necessary for the soul of man, but a body is necessary for the soul—and food must be had for that body.

This wonderful orchestra heard last night is a far cry from that meager orchestra of the Boston Academy, but it is the result of the efforts of all the real music lovers along the long line from 1786 until 1915.

We are constrained to not leave this subject until we give credit to Theodore Thomas, who certainly worked for the upbuilding of things musical in this country when that work was up-hill business. He never failed us and did more than any one man to disseminate a cultivated musical taste in this new country.

Last night we listened with intense interest to the Boston Orchestra, the equal of any in the world.

One can see at a glance that Dr. Muck has the qualities necessary to make him a leader of men. He has perfect control of all that body. He gets wonderful effects from his men and all is done in a very quiet manner. It is like "carrying coals to Newcastle" to praise the Boston Symphony, but the precision, the flexibility and the wonderful tone of this orchestra is just about as perfect as human-kind can give us.

The Beethoven symphony was captivating in its beauty, and surely no one could fail to respond to the second movement. The whole symphony is full of hopefulness and good cheer.

The Fause Overture is a wonderful tone-picture of "Faust," and Wagner is the great master of tone pictures. The tone-color this orchestra brings out of this work is truly gorgeous in its effect.

The "Seigfried Idyl" is a most beautiful composition, full of real melody and great tenderness.

We were glad indeed to have the opportunity of hearing the two numbers by Sibelius. He is one of the modern composers, and uses modern methods, but these compositions, after a few hearings, we grow to love and appreciate as much as we do the old classical style.

From an artistic standpoint it was a perfect evening, but we "of the provinces" would have gone home happier if Dr. Muck had seen fit to give us an encore. It probably is not the custom of the Boston Symphony. We have been spoiled, in all probability, by an orchestra that comes "out of the west," formerly known as the Theodore Thomas Orchestra. However, we hope to have this matchless orchestra, with its distinguished conductor, with us again.

NG REGISTER,

JANUARY 29,

NINTH CONCERT A MUSICAL TREAT

Large Audience at Court Theatre Enraptured With Playing of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Whether or not the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra last night deserves to rank as the greatest of the University club series depends largely upon whether one is partial to vocal or instrumental music. Certain it is that no greater artistic treat has ever been provided for the music lovers of this city than the playing of the one hundred skilled and trained musicians under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, a leader of international reputation. Three composers were represented on the program, which embraced but five selections. The enthusiasm of the audience spoke eloquently of a desire for more, but the rule that precious gifts come in small parcels seems to govern Dr. Muck, who graciously bowed his acknowledgments after each number and once caused the orchestra to rise in a body to express its appreciation of applause, but who could not be induced to add another selection to the program.

The composers selected by Dr. Muck were Beethoven, Wagner and Sibelius, the last named a present day genius, born in Finland and now living at Helsingfors. The Beethoven number was the symphony No. 8, composed by the famous musical poet in 1812 and played for the first time in this country in Boston in 1844. For years it was considered beneath the standard of Beethoven's compositions, probably because it is different from his other work. Commentators have tried to read a program into it, but not, as far as known, upon the authority of Beethoven himself. The symphony is in four parts and was the first and longest of the orchestra's selections. It was exquisitely played and most enthusiastically received.

Of Richard Wagner's compositions two were selected—"A Faust Overture" and "A Siegfried Idyl." It was written in Paris when Wagner was living from hand to mouth, and the composer has said that he really intended it for the first section of a grand "Faust" symphony. Some of Wagner's biographers assert that when it was first tried at rehearsal some of the players threw up their hands in horror. Fortunately music lovers of a later day took a more enlightened view of the melodious composition, and among the number [illegible] Siegfried Idyl," which is expressive [illegible] grace and gentle joy, was composed while Wagner was in one of his happiest moods. It was dedicated to his son by his second wife and was first played in their villa at Triebschen as a birthday gift to the composer's wife.

The two compositions of the Finnish composer were unfamiliar to the audience, but they were thoroughly enjoyed. "The Swan of Tuonela" is based on a Finnish legend, "Tuoneia" being the Finnish hades. It is majestic but intensely sad, terminating in magnificent 'cello phrases. "Finland" is a symphonic poem, appealing so strongly to national sentiment that during the last conflict between Russia and Finland its performance is said to have been prohibited. By many persons in the audience this was considered the gem of the program.

Wheeling may consider itself highly favored in being given the opportunity to see and hear one of the world's greatest musical organizations and one of the world's greatest leaders.

THE POST EXPRESS:

JANUARY 20,

SOME OF MUCK'S TRAITS AS LEADER

How the Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Works with His Organization.

Felix Weingartner, the German conductor, and for a number of years the colleague of Dr. Karl Muck of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Royal Opera, Berlin, made the remark in Boston last winter that in his opinion Muck is the most conscientious conductor he had ever known. The justice of this remark is, it is said, very apparent to the members of the orchestra—those who have served under many of the famous conductors of the world. Dr. Muck leaves absolutely nothing to chance or what is oft-times called "the inspiraton of the moment." When he appears at rehearsals on a Monday morning to read a new work for the first time, he not only knows every note in the work, but has mapped out his interpretation of it down to the finest detail.

Dr. Karl Muck.

The Boston Symphony, which is to be heard here next Monday night at Convention hall, has as a rule four rehearsals a week on the mornings of Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday. Now and then a rehearsal is called for Saturday morning. If a new work is to be done the string section and the wind section are first rehearsed separately. Then there are at least three rehearsals of the entire body.

Dr. Muck is unsparing of himself and in a sense is unsparing of his men so far as preparation is concerned. His rehearsals rarely last more than two and a half hours for he believes that men can not do justice to themselves under a longer strain though he himself in studying his scores works far into the night.

Conductors are supposed to have, and most of them have, a keen ear but, according to the men in the Boston Symphony orchestra, Muck's ear is little less than miraculous. He may be rehearsing a complicated modern score when suddenly he will stop and turn back four or five pages to show where one of the violins, violas or 'cellos played a wrong note.

ELLIS' CONCERTS

CONVENTION HALL

NEXT MONDAY NIGHT

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

DR. KARL MUCK Conductor

SEATS TO-MORROW

Prices—$2, $1.50, $1, 50c.

Mail orders sent now to James E. Furlong,

Care Gibbons & Stone, 172 Main St. E., will be filled in order of receipt

---

ROCHESTER DEMOCRAT AND CHRONICLE,

JANUARY 20

DR. MUCK ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR OF GENIUS

Boston Symphony Is Great Instrument under Him.

DR. KARL MUCK.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will play here next Monday night in Convention Hall, is fortunate in having as its conductor Dr. Karl Muck, whom critics and connoisseurs unite in regarding as one of the foremost orchestral leaders in the world. This will be the fifth season in which he has had control of the artistic work of the orchestra.

Dr. Muck went to Boston in the fall of 1906 on a leave of absence of one year granted to him by the German Emperor. Up to that time he had been identified chiefly with operatic work, for he was the first conductor of the Berlin Royal Opera and for a number of years had conducted the performances of "Parsifal" at the Bayreuth festivals. Orchestral work had been his avocation rather than his vocation, and it had been limited largely to the Philharmonic Orchestra of Vienna and the Royal Orchestra of Berlin, which he conducted each season in several concerts.

The success of this remarkable musician in America was instantaneous. Under him the Boston Symphony Orchestra reached heights that before had seemed unattainable. As a distinguished critic, H. T. Parker, of Boston, expressed it, Dr. Muck found a most wonderful instrument, but one which needed the vivifying impulse of genius to make it perfect. This impulse Dr. Muck supplied.

Toward the end of his first season, representations were made through diplomatic circles direct to Emperor William to have his leave of absence extended for another year. This was accomplished and his second season was even more successful than his first but at the end of it he was recalled to Germany, leaving, however, with a promise to return as soon as his engagement was finished. He returned in the fall of 1912, and it is hoped by friends of the orchestra that his present engagement will last for many years.

ROCHESTER HERALD.

JANUARY 20.

Orchestra Conductor Has Brilliant Record

DR. KARL MUCK, conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Karl Muck, the renowned director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which visits Rochester next Monday evening, has for four years filled that post, generally regarded by musicians as one of the world's greatest prizes for conductors. He was in Boston during the seasons of 1906-07 and 1907-08, by special leave of absence granted him by the German Emperor, whom he was serving as principal conductor of the Royal Opera, Berlin. Ending his engagement in Berlin in 1912, he returned to America in September of that year under a long-term contract.

In Berlin Dr. Muck was speedily recognized as one of the great conductors of the world. In all the festivals of Bayreuth since 1901 he has been the conductor of "Parsifal." In 1904, 1905 and 1906 he shared with Felix Mottl the celebrated philharmonic concerts in Vienna. For ten years he was the conductor of the Schleswig music festival. As "guest" conductor he has appeared in St. Petersburg and Moscow, in Madrid and Barcelona, in Paris and London, in Brussels and Amsterdam, Hamburg, Bremen and Budapest. For one season he was conductor of the opera at the Covent Garden, London. Two years ago, although it was known that he was under contract to return to America, every effort was made through court circles to induce him to take first the intendantship of the Imperial Opera, Vienna, and then the same position in the Royal Opera, Munich.

Rochester Evening Times
Wednes... Jan. 20, 1915

DR. KARL MUCK, CONDUCTOR OF BOSTON ORCHESTRA

A long and varied professional career has been that of Dr. Karl Muck, the famous leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which Rochester will hear next Monday started with advantages that many lack, for not only was he a man of great intellectual force but he came from an important family of Bavaria and his father insisted that he go through the university at the same time he was studying his music. A first honor man of the Leipsic Conservatory of Music and a Doctor Juris from Leipsic University before he was 20, a pianist of great promise and already known as a young man of most uncommon intellectual force, his first position was as chorus master in an obscure provincial opera at a salary of $25 per month.

Here is where he had his first breaking in. He drilled choruses, coached the solo singers in their roles, gave lessons on the side to eke out his monthly income and now and then was allowed to conduct a performance of some light opera, but he did his work so well that before long he was called to be one of the conductors of the Opera House in Graz in Southern Austria. Here he conducted everything — Wagner, Verdi, Offenbach, Suppe, Gilbert & Sullivan, ballets and pantomimes. He was expected to be prepared to do anything and his career showed that he was always ready. At the same time he was getting his first experience as a concert conductor.

His great opportunity came while in Prague when Neumann organized an opera company to go to Russia and give performances of Wagner's music. Muck was the principal conductor and laid the foundation then for his present fame as the greatest living conductor of Wagner's works. His success on this tour was such that Madame Cosima Wagner summoned him to Bayreuth to assist at the Festivals there and for many years past he has been the sole conductor of the performances of "Parsifal."

In the spring of 1891 he went with Neumann's Opera Company for a series of "guest" performances in Berlin, conducting Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana" and he made such a profound impression that he was immediately engaged as one of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera, Berlin. This post he held until 1912, when he came to America.

Rochester
Union & Advertiser
Wed. Jan.

DR. MUCK IS DIFFERENT

Conductor of Boston Symphony Does Not Wear His Hair Long Nor is He Eccentric.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes for a concert next Monday night at Convention Hall, has neither the appearance nor character, according to the time-honored tradition, of a celebrated musician. He does not wear his hair long nor is he eccentric. When meeting him casually one would take him for anything but a musician and the first guess might be that he was an officer in the German army. He is a man of medium height, slender, well built and direct. His face, deeply marked with scars of student duels, is one which is not easily forgotten. Large, keen eyes, an eagle-like nose and a small, thin-lipped mouth above jaws which show any amount of determination, his face is certainly an index to his unusual personality.

5

A bit of a dandy in dress, his clothes always betray the fact that he has the most excellent tailor. He always gives the impression of enormous force under absolute control and in this case the impression is correct. Muck is decidedly a man of the world, although society, as such, has few charms for him. His title of Doctor was won after three years' hard work in the Universities of Heidelberg and Leipsic and he is the holder of the German degee of Doctor Juris. In his career in Europe he has been drawn into court circles and is a close personal friend of the German Emperor. As general music director of the Royal Theaters of Prussia, he is a member of the imperial court.

His interests are by no means confined to music although in his art he is an indefatigable worker. He takes a keen interest in current events and is thoroughly posted in literature and art.

Although he is really a most kindly, thoughtful and considerate man, there is a certain Satanic aspect about him which often misleads those who do not know him well. In his hours of ease he is a most delightful companion, but when there is work to be done he demands the utmost effort on the part of those under him, as he himself always gives his best. He is a stern disciplinarian, an untiring drillmaster and Felix Weingartner, the great German conductor, said in Boston last winter that Muck was absolutely the most conscientious man he had ever known.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

FEBRUARY 22.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE OLD DEBATE OVER DR. MUCK'S PROGRAMMES

Present Grumbling in New York and a Parallel or Two from Boston—Mr. McCormack's Concert—Mr. Busoni's "Indian Fantasy" Played—"Trovatore" and Toscanini — Reznicek's New Tone-Poem — Items and Announcements

EVEN as Boston in the first years of Dr. Muck's service as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra plunged into complaining controversy over his programmes, so now is New York in protesting debate over them. Two months ago, reviewers and auditors were clamoring against them because they contained too much contemporary, novel and "ultra-modern" music. The reviewers wrote as men who were either affronted or aggrieved and, in either alternative, as auditors who had a prescriptive right to hear what they wished to hear. Mere unofficial listeners addressed the conductor, the management or "the editor" in tones of disappointment or resentment. Protest and complaint still continue and in the same moving accents; but the conductor's sin is now of another cast. He is making his programme of pieces "that were familiar to the public of New York before he was born; "he is trotting out old 'war-horses'"; he is choosing pieces that are "conventional and unexciting" and so forth and so onward.

Hereabouts, if not in New York, all this has a familiar sound. Within easy recollection, those of this town who preferred "the old war-horses" declared that Dr. Muck kept them chained in their neatly labelled stalls; while those that pined for the music of their own day affirmed that the conductor was smothering his audiences with the classics. In these very columns the discussion ebbed and flowed until upon a day, a wearily prosaic mind, ridiculously embedded in fact and not "views," counted the classic and the modern pieces in the programmes of the year. As it happened they were very nearly equal in numbers. Suddenly the controversy was stilled, and never has it risen again.

As a mere matter of fact the statistics of the ten concerts that Dr. Muck and the orchestra give annually in New York usually show the same relative division between classic, semi-classic and familiar pieces and those which are new and strange. Perhaps this year he has leaned more than hitherto toward the old and the familiar in deference to the grumbling over Sibelius's fourth symphony, Strauss's "From Italy," Reznicek's "Schlemihl" and Ropartz's symphony. If he has done so, the reviewers and the audiences have only themselves to blame and present repining over overtures by Beethoven and Weber and symphonies by Brahms and Haydn does not in the least mend the matter. The truth is that Dr. Muck is two-fold victim; on one side of his own liking for "unified" programmes which group classic or contemporary pieces and so rouse latent resentments that one or two of either would not have stirred; and on the other of the short but natural view that takes each programme by itself for liking or disliking without reference to the sum of the music played in a whole series or a whole season of concerts. Dr. Muck's abilities as a conductor long since and even in New York ceased to be debatable; only his programmes are left for the grumbling without which human nature is starved. Yet we Bostonians in our provincial way have become fairly reconciled to them. Perhaps, with a becoming humility, we even suspect that we are only units in a public of many likings. Moreover, once upon a time the oldest symphony was as novel to every one of us as is the newest tone-poem.

H. T. P.

BOSTON POST,

FEBRUARY 27, 1915

NEW WORK BY STRUBE PERFORMED

Symphony Gives First Reading of His "Variations"

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Schubert C major symphony, variations on an original theme, by Gustave Strube, performed for the first time anywhere, and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, made the programme of the 15th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

There was interest in the work of Mr. Strube, for many years a member of the orchestra, a composer of high accomplishments, and now head of the department of theory and composition at the Peabody Conservatory of Music in Baltimore. Mr. Strube, some of his friends may insist, has gone a step backward instead of forward in his musical development in this latest composition, because he has forsaken, temporarily, the symphonic poem, and ultra-impressionistic methods, and written in the traditional variation form. But with these people we do not agree.

ON CHORALE-LIKE THEME

The theme which Mr. Strube has set down as his text is for us the most conventional page of the composition. This was probably deliberate on the part of the composer. It is a broad theme, chorale-like in its simple harmonies and its melodic line. But the theme is treated with a wealth of technical, resource and striking effects of color which were always characteristic of Mr. Strube's writing, but which have been especially cultivated of late years by his sympathy with recent French composition.

The fact that this piece has line as well as color is not to its disadvantage. In a well worn medium Mr. Strube keeps the interest of the hearer from the beginning to the end. The variations are free, but not so free that all trace of the original theme is lost. Most of them are in a poetical vein. One or two are brilliant and dramatic.

Schubert's Inspired Work

Schubert is possibly the only composer who approaches Mozart in the sheer power and rapture of his inspiration. The length of the C major symphony, with all its formality and repetitions according to rule, is still heavenly—at least when the symphony receives such a performance as Dr. Muck gave it yesterday. The instrumentation, which is here, with Schubert, as integral a part of the musical thought, as it was with Mozart or Wagner or any other great master of the orchestra, is also heavenly in its clearness and transparency.

The symphony is Dionysiac in its mood. In the symmetry of its phrase patterns and the vigor of its inner rhythmic life it is a striking reminder of the common origins of music and movement, yet Miss Osidora Duncan and others of her ilk ignore this work, which is as classic as it is inspired, and, of all symphonies, not even excepting the famous seventh of Beethoven, the most deserving of Wagner's phrase, "the apotheosis of the dance." It is as pure in its design and as unfettered in its joyous motion as the figures on a Greek vase. The precise place of Schubert, who is historically designated as one of those who came between the classics and the romantics of the late 18th and early 19th century, is still unsettled. Noting certain of his tendencies in harmony and in his treatment of form, he is seen to be a romantic, but fundamentally, at least in his instrumental works, he was surely a classic of classics, one who held sacred laws of proportion and design—rather one to whom symmetry and balance and beauty of form were inevitable and instinctive.

Goldmark's Oriental Music

Most impressive was the performance of Goldmark's overture. For once the theme marked "Andante assai" was taken slowly enough. It had true oriental languor and mystery. The music is music of legend, and of oriental legend. No composer but Goldmark could have penned the introduction and the theme for the clarinet. None but he would have dressed his themes in such purple and gold. Goldmark, in his more cosmopolitan pages—witness the "Spring" overture, the violin concerto, the E flat symphony—is already perishing, but as an orientalist he bids fair to last long. The performance of the "Sakuntala" overture is the only observance of the re-

MONITOR, BOSTON,

FEBRUARY 20.

MUSICIANS UNION OFFICIALS DISCUSS PROPOSED BOSTON SYMPHONY VISIT TO 1915 FAIR

It has been reported in San Francisco, New York and Boston that the Boston Symphony orchestra is to take part in the music of the Panama-Pacific International exposition early in the summer. No absolute verification of the report is forthcoming and no downright denial of it is obtainable either. In the course of making inquiries on the subject, a Monitor writer asked at the Boston headquarters of the American Federation of Musicians how the union orchestral players of the country would look on a project for a non-union orchestra to play at the exposition. Harold E. Brenton, the member of the national executive board of the federation representing New England, told the inquirer that the federation officials had not received word of any proposal for the Boston Symphony men to take part in the exposition music. He explained that according to agreements existing between the federation and the music director of the fair, notice of such a proposal would have to be given to the federation's national executive board; and the proposal would have to be sanctioned by the board before an engagement of the orchestra could become operative.

Orchestral performances at the Panama-Pacific International exposition, according to agreements long ago drawn up and signed, are to be given under the rules of the American Federation of Musicians. That was arranged between George W. Stewart, director of the exposition music, and Joseph N. Weber, the former federation president, in December, 1913. The agreement was to the effect that the rules of the federation, as they existed at that time, should govern all engagements of orchestral and band musicians at San Francisco. If an independent orchestra is to appear at the exposition, the question will have to be decided between the musical director and the federation, whether the rules would thereby be essentially violated.

Idea Favored

It is thought that the interpretation of the rules in regard to the proposed Boston Symphony orchestra visit will probably be left to the general convention of the federation, which will be held in San Francisco May 10. As Mr. Brenton notes the situation, no independent orchestra can now be definitely engaged to take part in the exposition music. It can at the most be asked to play and to make provisional arrangements. The San Francisco union of musicians has declared that it has no objections to the Boston Symphony men giving concerts, according to the announced plan; and the approval of the San Francisco union, in Mr. Brenton's view, would have much bearing on the attitude of the federation as a whole. But it would not decide the question. That, ordinarily, would be settled at a meeting of the national executive board. All the circumstances considered, however, a vote on it in the general convention is in his opinion the more likely proceeding.

Agreement Made

Under the agreement entered into by Mr. Stewart and Mr. Weber, any independent orchestra competing with federation orchestras on what is defined in its phraseology as an "unfair" basis would be excluded from playing at the exposition. "It is not a question of the Boston Symphony orchestra," said Mr. Brenton, "or of any other orchestra; it is just the idea that the federation has followed in everything, that we do not appear in concert for managers employing people whom we regard as 'unfair' to us. One kind of 'unfair' men would be those who had once belonged to the federation and had withdrawn from membership to work under other conditions. We consider them 'unfair' on the ground that they have not kept faith with the rules under which they joined us. Some of the men in the Boston Symphony orchestra are of this kind. Others once belonged —when they lived in Europe, to what is called there the confederation, with which we have an agreement. Both these kinds of musicians we regard as coming on certain occasions into antagonistic competition with us. This does not happen in the regular concerts of the orchestra in Boston, nor in the concerts of their tours. Such concerts are entirely of their own getting-up, and are in no way a subject of federation protest. But outside the concerts which the organization originates, some of the members compete with us for engagements of almost every class, except theater engagements. Here we admit that there is no 'unfairness' as to price; for often they receive, when playing in outside engagements, more than our minimum."

Protest Expected

The federation, in Mr. Brenton's view, will undoubtedly make a protest against the symphony orchestra appearing at San Francisco. "There is no likelihood," Mr. Brenton continued, "that the rules of the federation will be changed. San Francisco is unquestionably a competitive engagement. For the federation has orchestras that can take a stand with the Boston Symphony orchestra in artistic ability. There is the Chicago Symphony orchestra, for example. When work on exposition music began, an agreement was drawn up between Mr. Stewart, the director, and Mr. Weber, the federation president. It was signed in December, 1913. According to it, the rules of the federation then existing were to govern all engagements. Now the question of federation men being allowed to play where an organization composed of non-members is going to appear, is one which will have to be submitted to the national executive board. In any case, the appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra in San Francisco would have to be discussed and acted on, before the director of the exposition music could give a definite answer to the orchestra manager. And no such thing has yet been asked of the board."

Going into the more general bearings of the case, Mr. Brenton noted that it had been the intention of the exposition music director to bring an orchestra from Europe; and that since this is impossible, the idea may have occurred to him of substituting the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Brenton commented on the idea as not an inappropriate one. In whatever light the subject was presented, he declared, it is not likely that the federation will act until the general convention opens in San Francisco, May 10. Approval for the visit, which has been granted by the San Francisco union, would count, he said, for much. But he insisted that under the agreement between Mr. Stewart and Mr. Weber, the approval of the federation as a whole would be necessary.

Rules Explained

Speaking of the rules of the federation, Mr. Brenton pointed out that they applied only to players, not to conductors. For conductors are regarded as producers of music and as being in no way the cause of "unfair" competition. The same is held of choral society leaders and organists, when acting in their regular capacity. He remarked that the rules favor symphony music and opera music in every way possible and that they act to help the most talented artists get the highest positions. The rules do not allow one orchestra, either of the concert room or the opera house, to build itself up at the expense of another; and they forbid members to break their contracts with their managers. When the right man for a place is not available in America, the rules permit the needed artist to be brought from Europe. Freedom of action is accorded symphony societies in the engagement of players, because the kind that are wanted cannot be gathered in sufficient numbers from one locality. But theaters have to employ men living on the ground.

In the past 10 years, under the working of the federation rules, the American musician has had opportunities for advancement, Mr. Brenton noted, that he never had before. Once, he explained, native players could not even get a hearing, much less an engagement. Now they are found in leading positions everywhere in the country. Nine tenths of all the orchestra and band players in the United States and Canada, Mr. Brenton estimated, belong to the federation. The national executive board, of which he is the New England member, has a representative from each of the 11 federation districts. Nine of these districts are in the United States, two in Canada.

ADVERTISER.

FEBRUARY 27

SYMPHONY CONCERT IN PATHS OF MELODY

ORCHESTRAL PROGRAMME OF PLEASING NATURE

Schubert, Strube and Goldmark Composers Represented and Welcomed

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Schubert—Symphony in C major.
Strube—Orchestral Variations.
Goldmark—"Sakuntala" overture.

The concert of yesterday afternoon was chiefly in the paths of melody. Some of the old stagers may object that they have heard the Schubert Symphony and the Goldmark overture many times, but we must remember that there are many of the younger generation who ought to hear and study such a classic as the symphony, while the overture may be considered a species of "In Memoriam" to the recently deceased composer.

When Dvorak was in America he wrote an article on Schubert, in one of the great magazines, in which he said that he considered Schubert's instrumental works his chief contributions to Art. One cannot agree with this dictum. Schubert was essentially vocal, as Schumann was generally thinking of his piano. Therefore, the symphonies of the first are chiefly made up of beautiful song melodies, while those of the latter are piano works in disguise. This C major symphony by Schubert is full of song-themes, even though they are in finely dramatic contrast.

Dr. Muck did wisely in cutting out some of the repeats. The amount of literal repetition (by dots) which Schubert used is entirely opposed to the spirit of the present age, when all repeats are ruthlessly excised from the works of the masters. There is not much doubt but what Schubert was influenced by Beethoven's symphonies, in his composition of this work, and possibly also by the great violin concerto of that master. The massive development of a figure of the same note given with emphasis four times, is very close to the similar device of the first movement of the violin concerto of Beethoven, while the use of the trombones, in the coda of the first movement, was probably suggested by the great master's introduction of trombones in his fifth symphony, but it must be stated that Schubert makes much better use of these instruments than Beethoven did; in fact the splendid responses between tenor and bass trombones, in this coda, was the earliest masterly use of the instruments in symphony. The passage was played well, although we prefer it emphasized even a little more.

Entire Reading Direct

The entire reading of the symphony was direct and straight-forward, without any effort to read more into it than Schubert intended. The horn passage of the introduction was well played, and its return at the end of the first movement, as a sort of postlude, was sufficiently broad and noble. Oboes are to the front quite constantly in the second movement, with its gypsy-like theme. The wood-wind of our orchestra are of good artistic balance and in the Rondo they had good opportunities. The horns, in the Trio of the Scherzo, gave beauty to that theme which is a blood-relative to "We wont go Home till Morning." But that rather dissipated folk-song (which is very antique, by the way), has often appeared in great works. There is something suspiciously like it in Liszt's great "Les Preludes."

The wonderful shading of the Finale is another point of the performance which one would wish to speak of enthusiastically. One has the composer's warrant for going to extremes in this diminuendo and crescendo, and one may be sure that our orchestra made great effect with this feat of shading.

The audience seemed well satisfied to hear a direct and melodic symphony as a change from the fevered "Schlemihls", "Premonitions" and "Fireworks." Not but what Schubert, and Haydn, and Mozart, might become rather tepid if given as a steady diet, but there is serene enjoyment in their works heard in contrast with the frenzied ones. The second movement of the Schubert symphony seemed too long, but the finale was superb in every way and aroused great enthusiasm.

We welcomed a work by Gustav Strube again upon our symphony programmes. Such an eminent composer should not have been allowed to go from Boston to Baltimore. We sometimes find Mr. Strube's works somewhat too modern, but we are always obliged to recognize mastery of the modern orchestra, ingenious development and a good degree of originality in most of his many works that have been performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In these new variations we found a more direct style of melody and a less restless modulation than in some of Mr. Strube's works. The theme itself was a clear-cut, chorale-like, two-division song-form, and the variations were intelligible and ingenious.

Means Temptation

The general composer ought to pray "lead us not into variation," for variation generally means temptation to him—a temptation to go on and on so long as his ingenuity can squeeze out new combinations. This was not the case with Mr. Strube's composition. The work was not too long and was so finely contrasted as to be interesting all the way through. The second variation was a canon. It was not a Krupp 35 centimeter howitzer, but it served to show Mr. Strube's contrapuntal skill, as did also the 6th and 9th variations. Horn and oboe played excellently in the 7th variation, while the 8th was the most popular bit of the work. As there was plenty of counterpoint in the 2d, 6th and 9th variations, there was no need of a fugue as a finale, and the last movement was dainty and attractive. The whole work was fluent and skilful and it won much and well deserved applause.

Now that Goldmark is dead one may curiously watch what is going to become of his works. Is he going to fade like Gade and Raff? Is he going to subside more slowly like Dvorak? Is he going to hold his own with the romanticists, like Tschaikowsky? We imagine that it will be somewhat as with the last-named composer, or even better. Goldmark has Mendelssohnian grace and melody, but also a modern tone-coloring and he never goes beyond his depth, as many of the moderns have done.

It is always a pleasure to hear "Sakuntala," and we even hope that his simpler "Rustic Wedding" may not be shelved because of the desire for latter-day complexities. The reading of the overture was gloriously dramatic. The trumpets did some excellent playing in very difficult passages, the horns were beautifully shaded, the great climax of triumph at the end was nobly interpreted. The work aroused great enthusiasm. It convinced us that Goldmark is not likely to be evanescent. The grand outburst of song in the end of the overture is surprisingly effective, and this concert which began with melody also ended with it, and nobody seemed to regret the absence of the awful troubles and agonies which are associated with much of the modern music.

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date FEB 18 1915

Estab

Although the usual Lenten exodus of society to the variuos Southern resorts has been quite large, the audience last evening at the Lyric to hear the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony was a very representative one and the vacant seats in the large auditorium were few.

Some of those seen during the evening were Doctor and Mrs. Henry Barton Jacobs, Mr. Harold Randolph, Mr. and Mrs. N. Winslow Williams, Mrs. David L. Bartlett, Mrs. S. Sterett McKim, Mrs. Edward M. Vickery, Mr. and Mrs. Blanchard Randall, Miss Evelyn Barton Randall, Miss Elizabeth B. Randall, Miss Katharine Brune Randall, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Marburg, Mr. and Mrs. Spalding Lowe Jenkins, Mr. and Mrs. Nicholas G. Penniman, Mr. Edwin L. Turnbull and Mrs. Lawrence Turnbull.

Mrs. Benjamin F. Smith, Mr. Richard H. Thompson, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Francis E. Pegram, Doctor and Mrs. William Bullock Clark, Doctor and Mrs. William S. Thayer, Mrs. Cornelius D. Kenny, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Gottlieb, the Misses Fowler, Mrs. W. S. G. Williams, Mr. Joseph R. Walker, Miss Ellen Howard Bayard, Mr. Richard H. Bayard, Mr. Mortimer Duvall, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. McKeon, Mrs. William Cabell Bruce and Mr. William F. Lucas, Jr.

Mr. and Mrs. Elisha Dyer, of New York; Mrs. Charles Marshall, Doctor and Mrs. Roland B. Whitridge, Miss Mary Carroll Frick, Miss Nancy Howard Deford, Doctor and Mrs. Thomas S. Cullen, Miss Roberta Hempstone Rouse, Miss Clara V. Tyler, Mrs. Sidney Turner, Miss Augusta Heiskell, Miss Frances Olive Reeder, Miss Edith Reeder, Miss Katharine Powell Noland, Miss Ethel M. Miller, Miss Anne M. Steele, Mr. William B. Lucas and Mr. and Mrs. Nathan A. Middleton.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

FEBRUARY 20.

MUSICIANS UNION OFFICIALS DISCUSS PROPOSED BOSTON SYMPHONY VISIT TO 1915 FAIR

It has been reported in San Francisco, New York and Boston that the Boston Symphony orchestra is to take part in the music of the Panama-Pacific International exposition early in the summer. No absolute verification of the report is forthcoming and no downright denial of it is obtainable either. In the course of making inquiries on the subject, a Monitor writer asked at the Boston headquarters of the American Federation of Musicians how the union orchestral players of the country would look on a project for a non-union orchestra to play at the exposition. Harold E. Brenton, the member of the national executive board of the federation representing New England, told the inquirer that the federation officials had not received word of any proposal for the Boston Symphony men to take part in the exposition music. He explained that according to agreements existing between the federation and the music director of the fair, notice of such a proposal would have to be given to the federation's national executive board; and the proposal would have to be sanctioned by the board before an engagement of the orchestra could become operative.

Orchestral performances at the Panama-Pacific International exposition, according to agreements long ago drawn up and signed, are to be given under the rules of the American Federation of Musicians. That was arranged between George W. Stewart, director of the exposition music, and Joseph N. Weber, the former federation president, in December, 1913. The agreement was to the effect that the rules of the federation, as they existed at that time, should govern all engagements of orchestral and band musicians at San Francisco. If an independent orchestra is to appear at the exposition, the question will have to be decided between the musical director and the federation, whether the rules would thereby be essentially violated.

Idea Favored

It is thought that the interpretation of the rules in regard to the proposed Boston Symphony orchestra visit will probably be left to the general convention of the federation, which will be held in San Francisco May 10. As Mr. Brenton notes the situation, no independent orchestra can now be definitely engaged to take part in the exposition music. It can at the most be asked to play and to make provisional arrangements. The San Francisco union of musicians has declared that it has no objections to the Boston Symphony men giving concerts, according to the announced plan; and the approval of the San Francisco union, in Mr. Brenton's view, would have much bearing on the attitude of the federation as a whole. But it would not decide the question. That, ordinarily, would be settled at a meeting of the national executive board. All the circumstances considered, however, a vote on it in the general convention is in his opinion the more likely proceeding.

Agreement Made

Under the agreement entered into by Mr. Stewart and Mr. Weber, any independent orchestra competing with federation orchestras on what is defined in its phraseology as an "unfair" basis would be excluded from playing at the exposition. "It is not a question of the Boston Symphony orchestra," said Mr. Brenton, "or of any other orchestra; it is just the idea that the federation has followed in everything, that we do not appear in concert for managers employing people whom we regard as 'unfair' to us. One kind of 'unfair' men would be those who had once belonged to the federation and had withdrawn from membership to work under other conditions. We consider them 'unfair' on the ground that they have not kept faith with the rules under which they joined us. Some of the men in the Boston Symphony orchestra are of this kind. Others once belonged—when they lived in Europe, to what is called there the confederation, with which we have an agreement. Both these kinds of musicians we regard as coming on certain occasions into antagonistic competition with us. This does not happen in the regular concerts of the orchestra in Boston, nor in the concerts of their tours. Such concerts are entirely of their own getting-up, and are in no way a subject of federation protest. But outside the concerts which the organization originates, some of the members compete with us for engagements of almost every class, except theater engagements. Here we admit that there is no 'unfairness' as to price; for often they receive, when playing in outside engagements, more than our minimum."

Protest Expected

The federation, in Mr. Brenton's view, will undoubtedly make a protest against the symphony orchestra appearing at San Francisco. "There is no likelihood," Mr. Brenton continued, "that the rules of the federation will be changed. San Francisco is unquestionably a competitive engagement. For the federation has orchestras that can take a stand with the Boston Symphony orchestra in artistic ability. There is the Chicago Symphony orchestra, for example. When work on exposition music began, an agreement was drawn up between Mr. Stewart, the director, and Mr. Weber, the federation president. It was signed in December, 1913. According to it, the rules of the federation then existing were to govern all engagements. Now the question of federation men being allowed to play where an organization composed of non-members is going to appear, is one which will have to be submitted to the national executive board. In any case, the appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra in San Francisco would have to be discussed and acted on, before the director of the exposition music could give a definite answer to the orchestra manager. And no such thing has yet been asked of the board."

Going into the more general bearings of the case, Mr. Brenton noted that it had been the intention of the exposition music director to bring an orchestra from Europe; and that since this is impossible, the idea may have occurred to him of substituting the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Brenton commented on the idea as not an inappropriate one. In whatever light the subject was presented, he declared, it is not likely that the federation will act until the general convention opens in San Francisco, May 10. Approval for the visit, which has been granted by the San Francisco union, would count, he said, for much. But he insisted that under the agreement between Mr. Stewart and Mr. Weber, the approval of the federation as a whole would be necessary.

Rules Explained

Speaking of the rules of the federation, Mr. Brenton pointed out that they applied only to players, not to conductors. For conductors are regarded as producers of music and as being in no way the cause of "unfair" competition. The same is held of choral society leaders and organists, when acting in their regular capacity. He remarked that the rules favor symphony music and opera music in every way possible and that they act to help the most talented artists get the highest positions. The rules do not allow one orchestra, either of the concert room or the opera house, to build itself up at the expense of another; and they forbid members to break their contracts with their managers. When the right man for a place is not available in America, the rules permit the needed artist to be brought from Europe. Freedom of action is accorded symphony societies in the engagement of players, because the kind that are wanted cannot be gathered in sufficient numbers from one locality. But theaters have to employ men living on the ground.

In the past 10 years, under the working of the federation rules, the American musician has had opportunities for advancement, Mr. Brenton noted, that he never had before. Once, he explained, native players could not even get a hearing, much less an engagement. Now they are found in leading positions everywhere in the country. Nine tenths of all the orchestra and band players in the United States and Canada, Mr. Brenton estimated, belong to the federation. The national executive board, of which he is the New England member, has a representative from each of the 11 federation districts. Nine of these districts are in the United States, two in Canada.

ADVERTISER.

FEBRUARY 27

SYMPHONY CONCERT IN PATHS OF MELODY

ORCHESTRAL PROGRAMME OF PLEASING NATURE

Schubert, Strube and Goldmark Composers Represented and Welcomed

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Schubert—Symphony in C major.
Strube—Orchestral Variations.
Goldmark—"Sakuntala" overture.

The concert of yesterday afternoon was chiefly in the paths of melody. Some of the old stagers may object that they have heard the Schubert Symphony and the Goldmark overture many times, but we must remember that there are many of the younger generation who ought to hear and study such a classic as the symphony, while the overture may be considered a species of "In Memoriam" to the recently deceased composer.

When Dvorak was in America he wrote an article on Schubert, in one of the great magazines, in which he said that he considered Schubert's instrumental works his chief contributions to Art. One cannot agree with this dictum. Schubert was essentially vocal, as Schumann was generally thinking of his piano. Therefore, the symphonies of the first are chiefly made up of beautiful song melodies, while those of the latter are piano works in disguise. This C major symphony by Schubert is full of song-themes, even though they are in finely dramatic contrast.

Dr. Muck did wisely in cutting out some of the repeats. The amount of literal repetition (by dots) which Schubert used is entirely opposed to the spirit of the present age, when all repeats are ruthlessly excised from the works of the masters. There is not much doubt but what Schubert was influenced by Beethoven's symphonies, in his composition of this work, and possibly also by the great violin concerto of that master. The massive development of a figure of the same note given with emphasis four times, is very close to the similar device of the first movement of the violin concerto of Beethoven, while the use of the trombones, in the coda of the first movement, was probably suggested by the great master's introduction of trombones in his fifth symphony, but it must be stated that Schubert makes much better use of these instruments than Beethoven did; in fact the splendid responses between tenor and bass trombones, in this coda, was the earliest masterly use of the instruments in symphony. The passage was played well, although we prefer it emphasized even a little more.

Entire Reading Direct

The entire reading of the symphony was direct and straight-forward, without any effort to read more into it than Schubert intended. The horn passage of the introduction was well played, and its return at the end of the first movement, as a sort of postlude, was sufficiently broad and noble. Oboes are to the front quite constantly in the second movement, with its gypsy-like theme. The wood-wind of our orchestra are of good artistic balance and in the Rondo they had good opportunities. The horns, in the Trio of the Scherzo, gave beauty to that theme which is a blood-relative to "We wont go Home till Morning." But that rather dissipated folk-song (which is very antique, by the way), has often appeared in great works. There is something suspiciously like it in Liszt's great "Les Preludes."

The wonderful shading of the Finale is another point of the performance which one would wish to speak of enthusiastically. One has the composer's warrant for going to extremes in this diminuendo and crescendo, and one may be sure that our orchestra made great effect with this feat of shading.

The audience seemed well satisfied to hear a direct and melodic symphony as a change from the fevered "Schlemihl's", "Premonitions" and "Fireworks." Not but what Schubert, and Haydn, and Mozart, might become rather tepid if given as a steady diet, but there is serene enjoyment in their works heard in contrast with the frenzied ones. The second movement of the Schubert symphony seemed too long, but the finale was superb in every way and aroused great enthusiasm.

We welcomed a work by Gustav Strube again upon our symphony programmes. Such an eminent composer should not have been allowed to go from Boston to Baltimore. We sometimes find Mr. Strube's works somewhat too modern, but we are always obliged to recognize mastery of the modern orchestra, ingenious development and a good degree of originality in most of his many works that have been performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In these new variations we found a more direct style of melody and a less restless modulation than in some of Mr. Strube's works. The theme itself was a clear-cut, chorale-like, two-division song-form, and the variations were intelligible and ingenious.

Means Temptation

The general composer ought to pray "lead us not into variation," for variation generally means temptation to him—a temptation to go on and on so long as his ingenuity can squeeze out new combinations. This was not the case with Mr. Strube's composition. The work was not too long and was so finely contrasted as to be interesting all the way through. The second variation was a canon. It was not a Krupp 35 centimeter howitzer, but it served to show Mr. Strube's contrapuntal skill, as did also the 6th and 9th variations. Horn and oboe played excellently in the 7th variation, while the 8th was the most popular bit of the work. As there was plenty of counterpoint in the 2d, 6th and 9th variations, there was no need of a fugue as a finale, and the last movement was dainty and attractive. The whole work was fluent and skilful and it won much and well deserved applause.

Now that Goldmark is dead one may curiously watch what is going to become of his works. Is he going to fade like Gade and Raff? Is he going to subside more slowly like Dvorak? Is he going to hold his own with the romanticists, like Tschaikowsky? We imagine that it will be somewhat as with the last-named composer, or even better. Goldmark has Mendelssohnian grace and melody, but also a modern tone-coloring and he never goes beyond his depth, as many of the moderns have done.

It is always a pleasure to hear "Sakuntala," and we even hope that his simpler "Rustic Wedding" may not be shelved because of the desire for latter-day complexities. The reading of the overture was gloriously dramatic. The trumpets did some excellent playing in very difficult passages, the horns were beautifully shaded, the great climax of triumph at the end was nobly interpreted. The work aroused great enthusiasm. It convinced us that Goldmark is not likely to be evanescent. The grand outburst of song in the end of the overture is surprisingly effective, and this concert which began with melody also ended with it, and nobody seemed to regret the absence of the awful troubles and agonies which are associated with much of the modern music.

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date B 18 1915

Estab

Although the usual Lenten exodus of society to the variuos Southern resorts has been quite large, the audience last evening at the Lyric to hear the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony was a very representative one and the vacant seats in the large auditorium were few.

Some of those seen during the evening were Doctor and Mrs. Henry Barton Jacobs, Mr. Harold Randolph, Mr. and Mrs. N. Winslow Williams, Mrs. David L. Bartlett, Mrs. S. Sterett McKim, Mrs. Edward M. Vickery, Mr. and Mrs. Blanchard Randall, Miss Evelyn Barton Randall, Miss Elizabeth B. Randall, Miss Katharine Brune Randall, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Marburg, Mr. and Mrs. Spalding Lowe Jenkins, Mr. and Mrs. Nicholas G. Penniman, Mr. Edwin L. Turnbull and Mrs. Lawrence Turnbull.

Mrs. Benjamin F. Smith, Mr. Richard H. Thompson, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Francis E. Pegram, Doctor and Mrs. William Bullock Clark, Doctor and Mrs. William S. Thayer, Mrs. Cornelius D. Kenny, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Gottlieb, the Misses Fowler, Mrs. W. S. G. Williams, Mr. Joseph R. Walker, Miss Ellen Howard Bayard, Mr. Richard H. Bayard, Mr. Mortimer Duvall, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. McKeon, Mrs. William Cabell Bruce and Mr. William F. Lucas, Jr.

Mr. and Mrs. Elisha Dyer, of New York; Mrs. Charles Marshall, Doctor and Mrs. Roland B. Whitridge, Miss Mary Carroll Frick, Miss Nancy Howard Deford, Doctor and Mrs. Thomas S. Cullen, Miss Roberta Hempstone Rouse, Miss Clara V. Tyler, Mrs. Sidney Turner, Miss Augusta Heiskell, Miss Frances Olive Reeder, Miss Edith Reeder, Miss Katharine Powell Noland, Miss Ethel M. Miller, Miss Anne M. Steele, Mr. William B. Lucas and Mr. and Mrs. Nathan A. Middleton.

BOSTON GLOBE—
FEBRUARY 27.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Strube's Variations Given First Performance.

Schubert's Symphony in C Major Played in Romantic Vein.

Gustav Strube, now instructing musical youth in Baltimore, sometime conductor, violinist, teacher in this city, is an indefatigable musician. His compositions played at the Symphony concerts have denoted a steady assimilation. Not that they have lacked originality. Rather that they showed the absorption of more than one idiom. Mr Strube has not closed his ears to modern harmonic combinations. There have been times when they dimmed the clearness of his own individuality. Yesterday afternoon his "Variations on an Original Theme," played by Dr Muck for the first time anywhere, show Mr Strube more than a clever and skillful stylist. The work does not make large pretensions, but it pleases the ear by its contrast in color and often by the fancy in its invention.

The theme is a melody of true emotional character, simple and direct without being obvious, not overdressed harmonically, announced by the lower-voiced wind instruments and 'cellos, and treated somewhat in the folk song manner. Variations often seem an impertinence; a diabolical form of gymnastics in which the composer exercises his faculty before a yawning audience. Mr Strube does not perform evolutions in the air with the glib assurance of the acrobat who leaves no flight untried. Here are but 10 variations, a reasonable, considerate number, and they are of such character that the ear remains fresh.

There are many passages of ingenious, clever, fanciful orchestration, in the blending of timbres or in the contrasting of choirs. There is commendable economy of resources and contrast gains as the result. The slow movement with the romantic song first for horn, later for oboe, over the subdued strings of haunting beauty, is obviously to be enjoyed. There is distinct character in the others. The invention may not be sustained equally to the end, but there are pleasant surprises throughout. No idea is overworked. There is freshness, piquancy and, if there is no attempt at profound emotionalism, there is often charm.

Schubert's C major symphony, a model of clearness in orchestral writing as in musical thinking, was played in its true vein. Sunlight streamed through all, and none could have heard without sharing its communicating gladness, its serenity, its cheerful optimism. It is true Schubert developed his ideas with a patient deliberation for the man who listened literally, as in the melodic use of the trombones who speak here with a new tongue, but if there is prolixity to the modern ear, it is that of sweet sounds. The performance was one of incomparable euphony.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" called to mind the passing of an humble musician whose overtures have pleased a past generation and still have the power to please.

BOSTON TRAVELER,
FEBRUARY 27,

SYMPHONY PLAYS NEW STRUBE WORK

Former Boston Man's "Variations" Given Its First Presentation Here.

Simplicity characterized the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon from Schubert's seventh symphony, through Strube's "Variations" and Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala." There wasn't a puzzle picture on the program. All was music for music's sake. There was none of that unrest of those treading in uncertain paths.

One may search far and wide for a more interesting, more beautiful symphony than the Schubert work. As read by Dr. Muck and played by the orchestra it left very little to be desired. Many are the opportunities it affords to display the fine artistry of the players.

The appearance of a composition by Gustave Strube on a Symphony program always awakens interest, particularly so when the composition is given for the first time by the orchestra, as was the case yesterday afternoon with the "Variations on an Original Theme." It is in the composer's best vein, clear and interesting throughout and written by one who speaks with authority. Fortunate indeed is the composer who can have his compositions interpreted by such an orchestra.

Goldmark's overture, ever welcome, seemed to take on new beauties and provided a fitting close to one of the most enjoyable concerts of the current season.

Concerts and Recitals

Tomorrow afternoon's Symphony Hall concert promises a veritable tr

the opportunity to see and hear Pablo Casals, the world famous Spanish 'cellist and Harold Bauer, the eminent pianist. The program comprises two Sonatas for violoncello and piano and two solo numbers, one for Mr. Bauer and one for Mr. Casals. The first Sonata will be Beethoven's in A major and the second (and last number on the program) will be Brahms's in F major. Mr. Bauer will play Schumann's "Fantasiestucke." Opus 12, which comprises eight of Schumann's most delightful short pieces which are seldom heard in consecutive order. Mr. Casals will play Bach's Suite in C major for violoncello alone. This Suite is in six parts.

The third and final concert of the season of the Longy Club, comes Wednesday evening in Jordan Hall, with Miss Mary Fay, vocalist and Mr. Sand, clarinetist, as assisting artists. Mrs. Dudley T. Fitts will be the accompanist. Miss Fay will sing three French songs, Faure's "Apres un Reve," Gedalge's "Serenade," Busser's "Venus. Etoile du Soir." Mr. Sand will play Weber's Concertino for clarinet, Opus 26. There will be a Suite for flute, clarinet and piano by Amberg and Mozart's serenade for two oboes, two horns, two clarinets and two bassoons.

Miss Irma Seydel will give a violin recital in Jordan Hall, Monday afternoon, at three. Miss Sydel's program will include works by Handel, Spohr, Maquarre, Prutting, Strube, Ketten, Vieuxtemps, Beethoven, Mozart and Brahms.

The Sunday afternoon concert in Symphony Hall, March 7, will be a Pension Fund concert by the Symphony orchestra. The program will include Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony; and selections from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" and "The Ring."

Much interest is being shown in the concert to be given in Jordan Hall on Monday evening, March 8, by the Boston Quartet.

Elena Gerhardt, the popular singer, will be the artist at the Symphony Hall concert Sunday afternoon, March 14. Miss Gerhardt will be assisted by Beatrice Harrison, 'cellist.

The postponed recital of Emanuel Ondricek, violinist and Mrs. Ondricek, violinist, is now scheduled for Wednesday evening, March 10, in Jordan Hall.

The Flonzaleys will give their final concert of the season in Jordan Hall, on Thursday evening, March 11.

Percy Grainger, the Australian pianist composer, is to give a recital in Jordan Hall, Saturday afternoon, March 6.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
FEBRUARY 27,

NEW PIECE BY MR. STRUBE AT THE SYMPHONY

Variations on an Original Theme Performed First Time—Symphony in C Major by Schubert and Overture to "Sakuntala"

SYMPHONY HALL—Fifteenth rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck conducting, afternoon of Feb. 26. The program: Schubert, symphony in C major, No. 7; Strube, variations on an original theme (first performance); Goldmark, overture to "Sakuntala," op. 13.

The usual Friday afternoon audience sat stolidly through the rehearsal yesterday strangely apathetic to the program. Dr. Muck's welcome of handclapping was unusually parsimonious. Applause between the movements of the symphony was slight. Appreciation at the end was perfunctory. True, Dr. Muck was recalled and made the orchestra stand with him, but the tribute to the work of the men lacked spontaneity.

Because of this the audience wist not that it was hearing some of the best American music that has yet been written. At any rate the listeners did not rouse from the lethargy that attended the hearing of the rest of the program when Mr. Strube's excellent variations on an original theme were played. Only mild interest attended, only passive approval was given.

Doubtless for many years to come well-meaning individuals and organizations will continue their more or less impassioned and eloquent pleadings that the American composer be afforded a hearing. Doubtless, also, for an equal period, will there be discussion as to what characterizes truly American music. At this day those who work with negro themes and those who delve into the folk song of the Indian and who try to weave these melodies into songs are sometimes acclaimed as writing American music. Ragtime is dubbed the typical expression of the American spirit.

The search for the American music seems yet to have taken small account of what this America of ours is. Not until we are through fusing all the various elements that are going to make up our civilization so that culture will have a distinct aspect, an individuality among the groups of the world, can there be a distinctive American music.

from Africa and are therefore not American, can typify but a part of our life as a nation. The songs of the Indians, a people now a small minority on the continent, have nothing to express of our life of today. The Italians, the Greeks, the Slays and the other numerous peoples who come from the old world to find a home here are to be a part of our America, but they have their own national music, and it is not American. So by elimination we begin to get an idea of what our national musical expression must be when it comes. As our civilization, our nation, is a fusion of many elements of humanity, so must our music expression be a composite of many forms.

Mr. Strube, it would seem, realizes this, and writes his music in a fashion to indicate that he is bound by no special predilections for this or that composer's style. He is eclectic in the sense that whatever rhythm or method of getting a tone color appeals to him, he takes and makes his own. He is advanced without going beyond the conventions set down by many centuries of writers of music. He is a modern without breaking away from the style he was taught by his father when a boy. Some of his harmonies would probably shock that same father, were he to hear them, but in comparison with some we have heard this season they are rigidly conventional. Mr. Strube in his variations use muted trumpets for coloring as does Schoenberg, but with this difference: whereas Schoenberg is aiming solely at a color effect without regard for harmony or rhythm as we understand the terms, Mr. Strube is after color as an incidental embellishment to the pattern he is weaving. Herein he proves that he is writing good American music; he reaches out for something from another, and assimilates it in his own product without destroying his individuality.

Mr. Strube's variations considered from the strictly artistic standpoint may or may not have enduring quality. They are undeniably well written, they conform to rule, they have originality, they are clean cut and at times brilliant. The hand that penned the notes, however, was not lighted on its task by the spark of genius.

It is in their essential Americanism that their chief interest lies. They are the expression of the groping tendencies and aims and desires that are coming together to form the individuality of a nation. They are forerunners of American music. In composing them Mr. Strube has a share in the work of clarifying the musical ideas of this country, and whether they themselves last or not is beside the main point in their production.

Dr. Muck conceives the meaning of the Schubert C major symphony with wonderful appreciation of melodic, harmonic, rhythmic and colorful contrast. Was it the unfeelingness possessing the audience that extended also to the men on the stage that they were lax to respond to the demands of the conductor? Surely Dr. Muck would have read the slow movement of the symphony with

---

TRANSCRIPT,
FEBRUARY 27,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

SONGFUL, SENSUOUS AND ADEPT MUSIC

Schubert's Lyric Symphony in Mirror-Like Performance — Its Unique Place and Exactions—Goldmark Restored, and a Word About His "Orientalism"—Mr. Strube's New, Pleasurable and Well-Invented Variations

As the story goes, the leader of a long associated and expert orchestra in a German city was suddenly called away on the eve of one of its concerts. His assistant, who was to replace him, was asking his final counsel as to pieces and performance. One of them was Schubert's symphony of the "heavenly lengths." "And what shall I do with that?" asked the younger man. "Just let it run and trust the orchestra," returned his chief. Dr. Muck seems always to trust his band and yesterday beyond his wont he did sometimes let Schubert's symphony "run" of itself and of the familiarity and skill of the men with the music. In the scherzo, for example, even before the repetitions began, he barely beat the measure after he had once established the rhythm and merely "touched in" here and there, as the painters say, his suggestions of tonal shading. Yet, even so, he and the orchestra kept the mirror-like music undulating in gay little crescendi and diminuendi and opened its flowing song so that flutes or horns might sing the more freely, clearly and lightly their parts in it. Elsewhere, however, Dr. Muck let his divining sense of design, contrast and progression, of individuality and savor in music, of euphony and modulation play upon the symphony to the brightening or deepening of its lyric song and to the glamoring of its lyric beauty; but, as diviningly, he did these things more sparingly than usual; for it is true that Schubert's symphony, with such a band as ours on its mettle to play it, sings for

Perhaps, after all, the wonder and the delight of the music lies less in its inexhaustible fertility of sensuously lovely and lyrically stirring song than in the making of a whole symphony out of lyric melody that hardly once flags in its beauty of invention and charm of mood and suggestion. These are eighteenth-century symphonies that are pure pattern-weaving in tones; Mozart's symphonies are indeed songful; but the later of them contain passages that are neither pattern nor lyric, and that may be one of the sources which went forward to his own symphonies of thought and passion. Nowadays, of course, no one writes and no one perhaps could write a symphony of pure and unfettered song, making the form do its bidding as readily and susceptibly as the moderns bend musical structure to their delineative ends. Even Schubert himself wrote no more. In the "Unfinished Symphony" he is beginning to be psychological and introspective. So it is that the symphony in C major remains the unique symphony of lyric song that the world keeps, and so deserves the biennial repetition which is the custom of more symphony concerts than ours. Besides it delights its audiences.

From another angle Schubert's symphony may almost pass for a virtuoso piece for orchestra and conductor. On its surface, besides what are [illegible] of contemporary tone-poems, the symphony seems an innocent music. Yet by its transparency it reflects equally the smallest shortcoming and the smallest felicity of those that play it. The beauty of its song incessantly asks a like beauty of transmitting tone. Its loveliness of melting phrase taxes the euphonies [illegible] the wood-wind choir. Its freshness and [illegible]ness of voice asks much of the horns [illegible] Schubert [illegible] happy and adroit imagination [illegible] Time and again the strings [illegible] passages that seem to flow inexhaus[illegible] forward or point them with the shading of pace, accent, contrast and detail. Even the brass choir may make its sonorous contrasts or deepen the song with its mellow clang. In fine, it asks the rarest of virtuosity from the orchestra—the virtuosity that by mated technical resource and imaginative feeling gains loveliness of tone, sensitive euphonies and diversifying and detailing accents. In such virtuosity the orchestra yesterday played the symphony.

Even though the music [illegible] any and all circumstances speak for itself and, as the anecdote avers, may be safely left to run, it asks much of the discerning conductor. It is for him, after all, to measure the tone and mould the phrases and the euphonies of his band which he alone hears collectively and separates—to keep the horns, for example, as light as Dr. Muck kept them yesterday. It is for him to find the pace that will keep the beauty of the lyric song high, clear and characteristic and yet by diverse and unobtruded modulation save it from the monotony that is the pitfall of the fecund Schubert. As in the little diminuendi and crescendi, already cited, Dr. Muck on this score both imaginative and adroit yesterday. The vigor with which he flung the interruptions of the lyric song into the slow movement; the rhythmic excitement that he more than once wrought in it only made the pervading lyric sweetness tell the more. Akin was the sense of design with which he led the finale into more and more eager and expensive voice with crescendo rising in new stress from crescendo until the whole music rang with its own elation Yet—the crown of the work—the symptom with all this modulation and coloring and characterizing—seemed to run its free and ardent course as the instinctive music that welled out of Schubert. No conductor can "interpret" this symphony in C major; he can merely release its lyric loveliness to the fulness of it that is in it and him. And in the clear mirror of the music, he must let not one of his means be reflected and he must be discreet with each one of them. His discretion is the best of his divination. Dr. Muck met it.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
FEBRUARY 27.

NEW STRUBE WORK AT THE SYMPHONY

But What Audience Liked Best Was Schubert's Symphony.

A new work by Gustav Strube, "Variations on an Original Theme," was given its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday. It was gracefully performed, and, like Mr. Strube's previous works, it showed ingenuity and a modish style. It must have piqued the interest of music students, but it was caviare to the audience in general, and the applause was nothing more than courteous.

The most engaging variations were those somewhat after the style of the younger French composers. There were bits of picturesque atmosphere, bizarre harmonic turns and twists, suggestions of dreamy hours in the wildwood and a stop here and there at some dance-hall by the foot of the Pyrenees. These were the most imaginative and appealing phases of the composition. Dr. Muck and the orchestra warmed to the performance as if out of compliment to the former first violin, who now teaches music in one of the Baltimore colleges.

BOSTON GLOBE—
FEBRUARY 27.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Strube's Variations Given First Performance.

Schubert's Symphony in C Major Played in Romantic Vein.

Gustav Strube, now instructing musical youth in Baltimore, sometime conductor, violinist, teacher in this city, is an indefatigable musician. His compositions played at the Symphony concerts have denoted a steady assimilation. Not that they have lacked originality. Rather that they showed the absorption of more than one idiom. Mr Strube has not closed his ears to modern harmonic combinations. There have been times when they dimmed the clearness of his own individuality. Yesterday afternoon his "Variations on an Original Theme," played by Dr Muck for the first time anywhere, show Mr Strube more than a clever and skillful stylist. The work does not make large pretensions, but it pleases the ear by its contrast in color and often by the fancy in its invention.

The theme is a melody of true emotional character, simple and direct without being obvious, not overdressed harmonically, announced by the lower-voiced wind instruments and 'cellos, and treated somewhat in the folk song manner. Variations often seem an impertinence; a diabolical form of gymnastics in which the composer exercises his faculty before a yawning audience. Mr Strube does not perform evolutions in the air with the glib assurance of the acrobat who leaves no flight untried. Here are but 10 variations, a reasonable, considerate number, and they are of such character that the ear remains fresh.

There are many passages of ingenious, clever, fanciful orchestration, in the blending of timbres or in the contrasting of choirs. There is commendable economy of resources and contrast gains as the result. The slow movement with the romantic song first for horn, later for oboe, over the subdued strings of haunting beauty, is obviously to be enjoyed. There is distinct character in the others. The invention may not be sustained equally to the end, but there are pleasant surprises throughout. No idea is overworked. There is freshness, piquancy and, if there is no attempt at profound emotionalism, there is often charm.

Schubert's C major symphony, a model of clearness in orchestral writing as in musical thinking, was played in its true vein. Sunlight streamed through all, and none could have heard without sharing its communicating gladness, its serenity, its cheerful optimism. It is true Schubert developed his ideas with a patient deliberation for the man who listened literally, as in the melodic use of the trombones who speak here with a new tongue, but if there is prolixity to the modern ear, it is that of sweet sounds. The performance was one of incomparable euphony.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" called to mind the passing of an humble musician whose overtures have pleased a past generation and still have the power to please.

BOSTON TRAVELER,
FEBRUARY 27,

SYMPHONY PLAYS NEW STRUBE WORK

Former Boston Man's "Variations" Given Its First Presentation Here.

Simplicity characterized the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon from Schubert's seventh symphony, through Strube's "Variations" and Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala." There wasn't a puzzle picture on the program. All was music for music's sake. There was none of that unrest of those treading in uncertain paths.

One may search far and wide for a more interesting, more beautiful symphony than the Schubert work. As read by Dr. Muck and played by the orchestra it left very little to be desired. Many are the opportunities it affords to display the fine artistry of the players.

The appearance of a composition by Gustave Strube on a Symphony program always awakens interest, particularly so when the composition is given for the first time by the orchestra, as was the case yesterday afternoon with the "Variations on an Original Theme." It is in the composer's best vein, clear and interesting throughout and written by one who speaks with authority. Fortunate indeed is the composer who can have his compositions interpreted by such an orchestra.

Goldmark's overture, ever welcome, seemed to take on new beauties and provided a fitting close to one of the most enjoyable concerts of the current season.

Concerts and Recitals

Tomorrow afternoon's Symphony Hall concert promises a veritable treat in the opportunity to see and hear Pablo Casals, the world famous Spanish 'cellist and Harold Bauer, the eminent pianist. The program comprises two Sonatas for violoncello and piano and two solo numbers, one for Mr. Bauer and one for Mr. Casals. The first Sonata will be Beethoven's in A major and the second (and last number on the program) will be Brahms's in F major. Mr. Bauer will play Schumann's "Fantasiestucke." Opus 12, which comprises eight of Schumann's most delightful short pieces which are seldom heard in consecutive order. Mr. Casals will play Bach's Suite in C major for violoncello alone. This Suite is in six parts.

The third and final concert of the season of the Longy Club, comes Wednesday evening in Jordan Hall, with Miss Mary Fay, vocalist and Mr. Sand, clarinetist, as assisting artists. Mrs. Dudley T. Fitts will be the accompanist. Miss Fay will sing three French songs, Faure's "Apres un Reve," Gedalge's "Serenade," Busser's "Venus. Etoile du Soir." Mr. Sand will play Weber's Concertino for clarinet, Opus 26. There will be a Suite for flute, clarinet and piano by Amberg and Mozart's serenade for two oboes, two horns, two clarinets and two bassoons.

Miss Irma Seydel will give a violin recital in Jordan Hall, Monday afternoon, at three. Miss Sydel's program will include works by Handel, Spohr, Maquarre, Prutting, Strube, Ketten, Vieuxtemps, Beethoven, Mozart and Brahms.

The Sunday afternoon concert in Symphony Hall, March 7, will be a Pension Fund concert by the Symphony orchestra. The program will include Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony; and selections from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" and "The Ring."

Much interest is being shown in the concert to be given in Jordan Hall on Monday evening, March 8, by the Boston Quartet.

Elena Gerhardt, the popular singer, will be the artist at the Symphony Hall concert Sunday afternoon, March 14. Miss Gerhardt will be assisted by Beatrice Harrison, 'cellist.

The postponed recital of Emanuel Ondricek, violinist and Mrs. Ondricek, violinist, is now scheduled for Wednesday evening, March 10, in Jordan Hall.

The Flonzaleys will give their final concert of the season in Jordan Hall, on Thursday evening, March 11.

Percy Grainger, the Australian pianist composer, is to give a recital in Jordan Hall, Saturday afternoon, March 6.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
FEBRUARY 27,

NEW PIECE BY MR. STRUBE AT THE SYMPHONY

Variations on an Original Theme Performed First Time—Symphony in C Major by Schubert and Overture to "Sakuntala"

SYMPHONY HALL—Fifteenth rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck conducting, afternoon of Feb. 26. The program: Schubert, symphony in C major, No. 7; Strube, variations on an original theme (first performance); Goldmark, overture to "Sakuntala," op. 13.

The usual Friday afternoon audience sat stolidly through the rehearsal yesterday strangely apathetic to the program. Dr. Muck's welcome of handclapping was unusually parsimonious. Applause between the movements of the symphony was slight. Appreciation at the end was perfunctory. True, Dr. Muck was recalled and made the orchestra stand with him, but the tribute to the work of the men lacked spontaneity.

Because of this the audience wist not that it was hearing some of the best American music that has yet been written. At any rate the listeners did not rouse from the lethargy that attended the hearing of the rest of the program when Mr. Strube's excellent variations on an original theme were played. Only mild interest attended, only passive approval was given.

Doubtless for many years to come well-meaning individuals and organizations will continue their more or less impassioned and eloquent pleadings that the American composer be afforded a hearing. Doubtless, also, for an equal period, will there be discussion as to what characterizes truly American music. At this day those who work with negro themes and those who delve into the folk song of the Indian and who try to weave these melodies into songs are sometimes acclaimed as writing American music. Ragtime is dubbed the typical expression of the American spirit.

The search for the American music seems yet to have taken small account of what this America of ours is. Not until we are through fusing all the various elements that are going to make up our civilization so that culture will have a distinct aspect, an individuality among the groups of the world, can there be a distinctive American music.

from Africa and are therefore not American, can typify but a part of our life as a nation. The songs of the Indians, a people now a small minority on the continent, have nothing to express of our life of today. The Italians, the Greeks, the Slavs and the other numerous peoples who come from the old world to find a home here are to be a part of our America, but they have their own national music, and it is not American. So by elimination we begin to get an idea of what our national musical expression must be when it comes. As our civilization, our nation, is a fusion of many elements of humanity, so must our music expression be a composite of many forms.

Mr. Strube, it would seem, realizes this, and writes his music in a fashion to indicate that he is bound by no special predilections for this or that composer's style. He is eclectic in the sense that whatever rhythm or method of getting a tone color appeals to him, he takes and makes his own. He is advanced without going beyond the conventions set down by many centuries of writers of music. He is a modern without breaking away from the style he was taught by his father when a boy. Some of his harmonies would probably shock that same father, were he to hear them, but in comparison with some we have heard this season they are rigidly conventional. Mr. Strube in his variations use muted trumpets for coloring as does Schoenberg, but with this difference: whereas Schoenberg is aiming solely at a color effect without regard for harmony or rhythm as we understand the terms, Mr. Strube is after color as an incidental embellishment to the pattern he is weaving. Herein he proves that he is writing good American music; he reaches out for something from another, and assimilates it in his own product without destroying his individuality.

Mr. Strube's variations considered from the strictly artistic standpoint may or may not have enduring quality. They are undeniably well written, they conform to rule, they have originality, they are clean cut and at times brilliant. The hand that penned the notes, however, was not lighted on its task by the spark of genius.

It is in their essential Americanism that their chief interest lies. They are the expression of the groping tendencies and aims and desires that are coming together to form the individuality of a nation. They are forerunners of American music. In composing them Mr. Strube has a share in the work of clarifying the musical ideas of this country, and whether they themselves last or not is beside the main point in their production.

Dr. Muck conceives the meaning of the Schubert C major symphony with wonderful appreciation of melodic, harmonic, rhythmic and colorful contrast. Was it the unfeelingness possessing the audience that extended also to the men on the stage that they were lax to respond to the demands of the conductor? Surely Dr. Muck would have read the slow movement of the symphony with

---

TRANSCRIPT,
FEBRUARY 27,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

SONGFUL, SENSUOUS AND ADEPT MUSIC

Schubert's Lyric Symphony in Mirror-Like Performance — Its Unique Place and Exactions—Goldmark Restored, and a Word About His "Orientalism"—Mr. Strube's New, Pleasurable and Well-Invented Variations

As the story goes, the leader of a long associated and expert orchestra in a German city was suddenly called away on the eve of one of its concerts. His assistant, who was to replace him, was asking his final counsel as to pieces and performance. One of them was Schubert's symphony of the "heavenly lengths." "And what shall I do with that?" asked the younger man. "Just let it run and trust the orchestra," returned his chief. Dr. Muck seems always to trust his band and yesterday beyond his wont he did sometimes let Schubert's symphony "run" of itself and of the familiarity and skill of the men with the music. In the scherzo, for example, even before the repetitions began, he barely beat the measure after he had once established the rhythm and merely "touched in" here and there, as the painters say, his suggestions of tonal shading. Yet, even so, he and the orchestra kept the mirror-like music undulating in gay little crescendi and diminuendi and opened its flowing song so that flutes or horns might sing the more freely, clearly and lightly their parts in it. Elsewhere, however, Dr. Muck let his divining sense of design, contrast and progression, of individuality and savor in music, of euphony and modulation play upon the symphony to the brightening or deepening of its lyric song and to the glamoring of its lyric beauty; but, as divinely, he did these things more sparingly than usual; for it is true that Schubert's symphony, with such a band as ours on its mettle to play it, sings for

Perhaps, after all, the wonder and the delight of the music lies less in its inexhaustible fertility of sensuously lovely and lyrically stirring song than in the making of a whole symphony out of lyric melody that hardly once flags in its beauty of invention and charm of mood and suggestion. There are eighteenth-century symphonies that are pure pattern-weaving in tones; Mozart's symphonies are indeed songful; but the later of them contain passages that are neither pattern nor lyric, and that may be one of the sources which went forward to his own symphonies of thought and passion. Nowadays, of course, no one writes and no one perhaps could write a symphony of pure and unfettered song, making the form do its bidding as readily and susceptibly as the moderns bend musical structure to their delineative ends. Even Schubert himself wrote no more. In the "Unfinished Symphony" he is beginning to be psychological and introspective. So it is that the symphony in C major remains the unique symphony of lyric song that the world keeps, and so deserves the biennial repetition which is the custom of more symphony concerts than ours. Besides it delights audiences.

From another angle Schubert's symphony may almost pass for a virtuoso piece for orchestra and conductor. On its surface, besides what are [illegible] "[illegible]" of contemporary tone-poems, the symphony seems an innocent music. Yet by its transparency it reflects equally the smallest shortcoming and the smallest felicity of those that play it. The beauty of its song incessantly asks a like beauty of transmitting tone. Its loveliness of melting phrase taxes the euphonies [illegible] the wood-wind choir. Its freshness and [illegible]ness of voice asks much of the horns [illegible] Schubert h[illegible] happy and adroit imagination [illegible] th[illegible] Time and again the strings [illegible] passages that seem to flow inexhau[illegible] forward or point them with the shading of pace, accent, contrast and detail. Even the brass choir may make its sonorous contrasts or deepen the song with its mellow clang. In fine, it asks the rarest of virtuosity from the orchestra—the virtuosity that by mated technical resource and imaginative feeling gains loveliness of tone, sensitive euphonies and diversifying and detailing accents. In [illegible] virtuosity the orchestra yesterday played the symphony.

Even though the music [illegible] any and all circumstances speak for itself and, as the anecdote avers, may be safe left to run, it asks much of the discerning conductor. It is for him, after all, to measure the tone and mould the phrases and the euphonies of his band which he alone hears collectively and separates—to keep the horns, for example, as light as Dr. Muck kept them yesterday. It is for him to find the pace that will keep the beauty of the lyric song high, clear and characteristic and yet by diverse and unobtruded modulation save it from the monotony that is the pitfall of the fecund Schubert. As in the little diminuendi and crescendi, already cited, Dr. Muck on this score both imaginative and adroit yesterday. The vigor with which he flung the interruptions of the lyric song into the slow movement; the rhythmic excitement that he more than once wrought in it only made the pervading lyric sweetness tell the more. Akin was the sense of design with which he led the finale into more and more eager and expensive voice with crescendo rising in new stress from its own elation. Yet—the crown of the work—the symptom with all this modulation and coloring and characterizing—seemed to run its free and ardent course as the instinctive music that welled out of Schubert. No conductor can "interpret" this symphony in C major; he can merely release its lyric loveliness to the fulness of it that is in it and him. And in the clear mirror of the music, he must let not one of his means be reflected and he must be discreet with each one of them. His discretion is the best of his divination. Dr. Muck met it.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
FEBRUARY 27.

NEW STRUBE WORK AT THE SYMPHONY

But What Audience Liked Best Was Schubert's Symphony.

A new work by Gustav Strube, "Variations on an Original Theme," was given its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday. It was gracefully performed, and, like Mr. Strube's previous works, it showed ingenuity and a modish style. It must have piqued the interest of music students, but it was caviare to the audience in general, and the applause was nothing more than courteous.

The most engaging variations were those somewhat after the style of the younger French composers. There were bits of picturesque atmosphere, bizarre harmonic turns and twists, suggestions of dreamy hours in the wildwood and a stop here and there at some dance-hall by the foot of the Pyrenees. These were the most imaginative and appealing phases of the composition. Dr. Muck and the orchestra warmed to the performance as if out of compliment to the former first violin, who now teaches music in one of the Baltimore colleges.

The outstanding feature of the concert was the glowing performance of the great Schubert symphony in C major—the "heavenly, long-drawn-out symphony," as Schumann described it. The symphony comes first on the program, and this fact should be borne in mind by those who intend to go to tonight's concert. The first movement is one of the most charming portions of the symphony. The work contains a wealth of melody, which alone, aside from the classic beauty of the symphony as a whole, would insure its enduring fame. The orchestra was rewarded with an ovation for its fine performance.

There was also a brilliant performance of Goldmark's rich and rare "Sakuntala" overture.

Pablo Casals, the famous Spanish 'cellist, will be the soloist at next week's Symphony concerts. He will play the Lalo concerto in D minor. The orchestral numbers will be Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" fantasy, Mozart's symphony in G minor, and F. S. Converse's symphonic poem, "Ormazd."

BOSTON HERALD.

MARCH 6. 1915.

16TH PUBLIC SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Tschaikowsky Overture, "Romeo and Juliet," Feature of the Concert.

The 16th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Tschaikowsky, "Romeo and Juliet"; Converse, symphonic poem, "Ormazd"; Lalo, concerto for violoncello (Mr. Casals); Mozart, symphony in G minor.

Tschaikowsky's beautiful overture was a feature of the concert. There are themes which characterize Friar Lawrence, the street brawls, the amorous ecstasy of the lovers, passages in turn grave, brilliant, passionate, pages that glow with romantic and youthful ardor. The performance of the orchestra was admirable, the contrasting themes were brought out with rare skill, while beautiful effects succeeded each other.

Mr. Converse's piece was first played here three years ago. Descriptive music, its subject is the conflict between Ormazd and Ahriman, light and darkness, deified by the disciples of Zoroaster as the gods of good and evil.

This symphonic poem is planned on broad and imposing lines. It is sonorous, dramatic, with effective contrasts of color and striking harmonic progressions. It has, too, the imaginative quality, the elemental strength, the virility, which are characteristics of Mr. Converse's work.

The music, which describes Abriman, whirring and malignant, and the pictorial pages, which represent the clash and din of the spirits contending fiercely in battle, are on the whole less impressive than the musical characterization of Ormazd and the marching hosts of light. The song of the good souls, the Fravashis, before the battle, and afterwards triumphant, exulting in victory and adoring the conqueror, is significant and appeals to the emotions. Dr. Muck's reading was brilliant and gave full value to the score.

As was to be expected, Mr. Casals's performance of Lalo's concerto was masterly and polished. Again he excited admiration for the perfection of his art. He was repeatedly recalled.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows. Beethoven, andante from the Seventh Symphony, In Memoriam: John Chipman Gray; Berlioz, Symphony No. 3, "Harold in Italy," solo viola, Mr. Emile Ferir; d'Indy, Fantasy for oboe and orchestra, Mr. Georges Longy; Brahms, "Academic Festival" overture.

BOSTON POST,

MARCH 6, 1915

VIRTUOSO PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

Casals, 'Cellist, Proves Himself the Great Artist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Pablo Casals, the 'cellist, was soloist at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. He played the Lalo concerto for violoncello, which in spots is one of the best compositions of its kind. The first and second movements are entertaining music as well as stuff for a virtuoso's holiday. And how incomparably did Mr. Casals play this music!

CASALS A GREAT ARTIST

Last Monday the Post spoke at some length of the distinguishing characteristics of Mr. Casals' style. It is not necessary to go over the ground again, save to remark that the tone which was so wonderful in solo and ensemble performances last Sunday seemed, if anything, richer, more beautiful, more wonderfully controlled yesterday. There was again annihilation, oblivion of technical difficulties, and the superb balance of head and hand and heart that only the great of the great artists achieve.

Mr. Casals is a virtuoso among virtuosos, but how many virtuosos are such musicians as he? It was Dr. Muck's pleasure, in more ways than one, to provide him so admirable an accompaniment, for no orchestra of competent soloists could fail to respond to such a soloist and carry out his wishes to the last detail. Here is an artist who seems to unite the qualities of a Latin in his playing with other qualities, no less valuable, and not less substantial, of more northern races. Mr. Casals does indeed feel with his head and thinks with his heart; and is not the man who does that greater indeed than he who takes a city?

Ovation From Orchestra

For once a great artist received merited recognition. Mr. Casals — clean shaven, entirely unassuming, of rather serious mien, a little bent, as through a life spent over his instrument—came and went from the stage with only a trace of a smile at the ovation accorded him by orchestra as well as audience. He is surely a man to whom words mean little and accomplishment a great deal. The applause continued half through the intermission.

The orchestral pieces were Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture; Frederick S. Converse's symphonic poem, "Ormazd," after the drama of world redemption as described in the books of the Parsees, and Mozart's G minor symphony.

Tschaikowsky's overture serves well to illustrate Tschiakowsky's own remark about Balakireff, the founder of the so-called "neo-Russian" school, which is no longer "neo" but rather passe, and of which the most irregular talent—that of Moussorgsky—was also the most powerful. Tschaikowsky remarks in a letter to Mrs. von Meck that Balakireff, with all his enthusiasm and idealism in the cause of the national music of Russia, "did a great deal of harm." Had Balakireff been content to encourage Tschaikowsky to compose an overture after Shakspere's drama of "Romeo and Juliet," and then let the young composer alone, all might have been well. As it is we have alternated with some of the most sensuous and fatalistic love music of which we know the brutal noise and bombast by which Tschaikowsky felt it necessary to make a reference to the disputes of Montagues and Capulets.

Pleases, Nevertheless

Had this futile realism been cut out of the overture, what might not have come in its place? What might not the unutterable longing of the love music, the thought of predestined tragedy and of the end of youthful passion—to what might not this starting point have led the composer? But no! Mr. Balakireff must worry a man who had more music in his little finger than he in his whole career, and the unfortunate victim, forsooth, must pull himself about by the boot-straps at the bidding of the man who brought into being and then utterly failed to understand the ultimate possibilities of that which he had brought into being—a genuinely Russian art of composition.

But one listens to this overture, for all that, with rare pleasure. Not even the importunate and well-meaning Balakireff could stifle and distort all that Tschiakowsky had to say. When he discourses of love and death—not like Wagner or Maeterlinck, or any, but a simple man, with tortured sensibilities and a great heart—then it is time to remove the hat and listen. Here, indeed, is the romantic glow of Shakspere's play, and the tragedy of its end, as it is mirrored nowhere else in music except, perhaps, in the Romeo and Juliet symphony of one Hector Berlioz.

Justice Done Converse

There was another feature of this concert which was as great a credit to Dr. Muck as to the composer—the impressive performance of Mr. Converse's tone poem which describes the assembling of the hosts of light, the conflict with the power of darkness, the triumph of the ruler of heavens. Several season ago Ormazd was presented by another conductor at the Symphony concerts, without any remarkable success. It is now seen to be not one of the least, but one of the strongest of Mr. Converse's compositions. Occasionally, for us, this music falls passingly into a vein of melodic obviousness or of purely descriptive music, but as a whole the composition has a noble vision, which more than recompenses for momentary shortcomings.

A suggestion of d'Indy in the use of a certain persistent figure does not deprive the opening section of great beauty and eloquence, and imaginative power. A little of the battle music is noise, but most of it is battle music. The canvas is a big one, and is filled for the most part with grand images. The conclusion is not mere trumpeting. It is loftily triumphant. The orchestration is clear and full and brilliant in the best sense of the word throughout. The quality of tone is refined, without being [illegible] interesting and valuable work by a composer who has composed too little of late years, and Dr. Muck appeared to read the music with exceptional sympathy and imagination. We would like to hear more symphonic compositions from the pen of Mr. Converse.

Mozart's G minor symphony gave balance to the programme and brought the concert to an end.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

MARCH 4, 1915

NEWS OF MUSIC

MR. CASALS AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Requests That He Play Extra Pieces as Mr. Paderewski Does—Local Announcements—The Voluntary Bankruptcy of the Chicago Opera—Probable Reorganization—Morals from Extravagance

WHY should not Mr. Casals be permitted to play extra pieces for violoncello alone at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, even as Mr. Paderewski has done for many a year when he has appeared with the orchestra? Requests that he be permitted to do so have come in appreciable numbers to The Transcript, alike from regular frequenters of the concerts and from those whom the presence of Mr. Casals as "assisting artist" has attracted for a single afternoon or evening. It is true that no repetitions and no extra pieces have long been the standing rule of the Symphony Concerts; but for as long, Mr. Paderewski, whenever he has come as "soloist" to them has been free to play as many "additional numbers" for piano alone as the audiences asked and he chose to play. Presumably the reasons for this exception of Mr. Paderewski from rule and precedent are his unquestioned position as the most eminent of living pianists, the infrequency of his appearances at the Symphony Concerts; and the presence of many auditors who have come particularly to hear him and as much of him as possible.

Mr. Casals is in exactly a similar position. By general and unchallenged consent, he is the foremost of living violoncellists and as unique a man, musician and "personality" as Mr. Paderewski himself. He has visited Boston and he is likely to visit it very seldom; he has never before played at the Symphony Concerts. The usual audience that they assemble is eagerly curious to hear him; not a few who go seldom to the concerts have taken tickets that they may hear Mr. Casals. The concerto by Lalo that he is to play with the orchestra will leave many desires unsatisfied unless by justifiable exception, he is permitted to add solo pieces to them. A rearrangement of the order of the programme so as to bring Mr. Casals at the end would not be impossible. The management of the Symphony Concerts is dutifully considerate of its public, and it ought to be too fair-minded to withhold from it pleasures that it deserves from Mr. Casals—and for that matter from Mr. Kreisler—no less than it does from Mr. Paderewski. Moreover, the 'cellist and the violinist in themselves and in their position are equally worthy of them.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

MARCH 6, 1915.

CASALS SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

'Cello Virtuoso Brilliant in Performance of Lalo Number.

There was no lack of variety in the Symphony program yesterday afternoon. The chief interest centered in the appearance as soloist with the orchestra of Pablo Casals, who last Sunday, in his concert with Harold Bauer, set a new standard for 'cello playing.

Mr. Casals' performance of the Lalo concerto yesterday revealed again his powers not only as a virtuoso, but also, and primarily, as a creative artist of the highest type. Fritz Kreisler has been quoted as saying that Casals is the greatest musician living who draws a bow. It is the combination of exceptional interpretative genius with a perfect command of the art of 'cello playing in Casals which has undoubtedly drawn this high praise from his fellow artist.

The enthusiasm of the audience yesterday was extraordinary, and Mr. Casals was forced to come back and acknowledge the applause over and over again.

Much local interest was attached to the performance of Mr. Converse's symphonic poem, "Ormazd," which was given once before at these concerts in 1912. It was unfortunate that the Converse work was placed immediately after Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasia. The laboratory psychology of "Ormazd" was thus strangely contrasted with the passionate warmth of the "Romeo and Juliet" fantasy, with its glowing themes.

The Mozart symphony in G minor with which the concert ended was as fascinating as ever. Such music compels attention and impresses the image of its loveliness unconsciously on the listener's mind.

Emile Ferir, the first viola of the orchestra, and Georges Longy, the oboe leader, will be the soloists at the Symphony concerts next week. Mr. Ferir will play the solo in Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" and Mr. Longy will have the solo part in the performance of d'Indy's fantasy for oboe and orchestra. The orchestral numbers will be the Sinigaglia overture, "Le Baruffe Chiozzotte;" the "Academic Festival Overture," by Brahms, and the andante from Beethoven's seventh symphony, which will be played in memory of John Chipman Gray.

BOSTON GLOBE—

MARCH 6, 1915

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Casals Receives Ovation as 'Cello Soloist.

Mozart Symphony Played and Music by Converse and Tschaikowsky.

Dr Muck reversed the usual order of his program at the 16th Symphony rehearsal yesterday. The symphony, which was the G minor by Mozart, came last. Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" began the concert followed by Frederick Converse's symphonic poem "Ormazd," and finally by Pablo Casals, the cellist, in Lalo's concerto.

Both Tschaikowsky and Mr Converse undertook to portray a dramatic conflict. The chief contention in the first is not found in the weapons of the brawling houses of Montague and Capulet, but in the pursuing and ironic fate which denies life and happiness to the lovers. In the second it is the conflict held to have existed by ancient Persian mythology between Ormazd, who "controls the hosts of Heaven, sun and stars, as his army of light," and Ahriman, the ruler of the forces of darkness.

Tschaikowsky's music, now 45 years old, is not without vitality. It was written in the ardor and fancy of youth. True, it is not an immortal portrait of Shakspere's characters. There is not the hight of sustained passion of the second act of "Tristan and Isolda," nor in any comparable degree is one ushered into the presence of poetic truth, dramatically, poignantly uttered as in the second act of Montemezzi's "The Love of the Three Kings." Tschaikowsky's idiom now seems old-fashioned in tonality. Rhythm had less variety to exhaust than has the scale, and in the broken accentuation in the climaxes there is still illusion and dramatic vigor.

Mr Converse has resorted to traditional devices in his narration of the struggle between the forces of light and darkness. Sequences of ejaculatory chords in unvarying rhythm uttered by contrasting choirs of the orchestra, and wailing descending chromatics have served many a good purpose heretofore.

Lalo's concerto is strangely inconsistent. The first movement with its noisy and empty orchestra against the conventional recitative of the 'cello might have been written for a brass band. The intermezzo, while not of any depth of sentiment, has grace and charm. Its embellishments are not merely decorative and its melody is ingratiating.

Mr Casals, admirable and rare artist that he is, received a great demonstration. He began in a commonplace manner, as though sensible of the music's limitation. But his playing of the last two movements in particular revealed the exquisite articulation, the tonal beauty, the fine lyric sense in sustained song, the clarity and brilliance in rapid passages, which his appearance on Sunday had led one to expect from him.

There is a resultant sense of great commotion, even turmoil, but the prince of darkness does not appear as a commanding, fearful or sinister person. The god of light, "Ormazd," the principal subject of the composition, is quite another source of inspiration. Here Mr Converse has touched and maintains a high level of majesty and beauty. There are noble thoughts, woven in strands of impassioned tone, as heard yesterday, that make these pages characterizing, inspiriting and deeply emotional. It is not music to be generally enjoyed, nor are all parts of equal merit, but the reception yesterday was not what it deserved.

Dr Muck's conducting and the orchestral playing, sympathetic and brilliant, were mindful of the composer, his period and his style, as is habitual. The Mozart symphony may have suffered through following music in no way allied with its graceful architecture, but the procedure from present to past in the order of the program was of pleasing variety.

The program next week will be as follows: Andante from Beethoven's seventh symphony; In memoriam: John Chipman Gray; Berlioz, "Harold in Italy"; d'Indy, Fantasy for oboe and orchestra (Mr Longy); Brahms, Academic Festival overture.

BOSTON POST,
MARCH 13, 1915

SYMPHONY ARTISTS AS SOLOISTS

Ferir and Longy Show Virtuosity With Orchestra

BY OLIN DOWNES

Berlioz Childe Harold Symphony, with Mr. Ferir, first violist of the orchestra, for the solo viola part; a Fantasia on French folk tunes for oboe and orchestra by d'Indy, performed for the first time at these concerts, with Mr. Longy, first oboe of the orchestra, for the soloist, and Brahms "Academic" overture made the programme proper of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. As a prelude to this programme, and in memory of John Chipman Gray, the allegretto from Beethoven's seventh symphony was played.

OTHERS' DEBT TO BERLIOZ

A performance of a representative work of Berlioz is always interesting for many reasons. First of all, there was yesterday the youth and the glowing romanticism of this symphony after Byron, which is as youthful today, or more so, than the day when it was written. Then there is the remarkable sense which grows upon one as one listens and the pages of the score fly by—the sense of the thoughtlessness of Berlioz in anticipating so many well-meaning composers who were to come after him. How Tschaikowsky and nearly all of the Russians availed themselves of this music! How composers even so widely apart as Cesar Franck and Richard Strauss find themselves indebted to him! It is not always easy to distinguish the original from the imitation. The listener rubs his eyes, as old favorites, scarcely disguised, appears. "What! Thou too!"

Perhaps the most wonderful pages of the "Childe Harold" symphony are those which record impressions of nature. We do not know of anyone who has painted Italy in tones as Berlioz painted her more than half a century ago. One of the most delightful pages in all symphonic music is that in which Berlioz' mountaineer of the Abruzzi serenades his mistress. The composer has drawn Italy as remarkably and colorfully as d'Annunzio had drawn her in his poems and prose works. He has mirrored her imperishably in his score.

Berlioz strikes one afresh, even when he is most hampered by the conditions of his time. There is the vigor and apparent irregularity of his rhythms and phrase lengths. These irregularities of design—how cunningly they are ordered, how boldly and successfully do they avoid the obvious. Berlioz' instrumentation is too old a topic to discuss now. His harmony will yet yet be discussed for many a day. There are still many who claim as a part of his novelty his actual clumsiness in composition! Would that other composers might become tarred with the same pitch. Not only was Berlioz writing revolutionary progressions and dramatic recitative that had hardly been hitherto existent in the symphony; he was inventing what appears to have been absolutely new. His imagination and creative energy were unquenchable, and that imagination led him to strike off by dozens ideas that were surely unheard of before his time.

But after all, music is not a matter of chords, however interesting they may be; nor of instrumentation, however clever it may be. Musical content has as yet been uncaught by the scientist and analyst. It is an inner life, even finer than that of his music itself, which is the soul of Berlioz' compositions. You may write music according to any set of rules that you please. You may follow every rule on your sheet of paper. The result will not necessarily be music. You may violate all of these rules, and a motive which conforms to none of the standards of what is good and bad in melody writing will say something. It is the intense modernity of Berlioz' spirit, and his wonderfully sensative perceptions of beauty that keep him alive and will keep him alive for long.

Mr. Ferir's Solo Work

Much of the effect made by this music was due to Dr. Muck and Mr. Ferir. Dr. Muck read the work with an admirable appreciation for nuances of color and rhythm, and feeling for the delicate instrumental timbres in which Berlioz delights.

And for once the last movement was interpreted by a conductor who does not think that speed and noise insure a dramatic result. Dr. Muck's tempi in this movement were unusually moderate, but how much was said and what an epitome of irony and bombast and banality, deliberately contrived was this movement. The music is more than violent; it is, indeed, blasphemous. It is perhaps less subtle than, say, the "Mephistofeles" movement of Liszt's "Faust" symphony, but it is not less terrible.

Then there was Mr. Ferir's wonderful viola playing. It still haunts the ears. It would have made beautiful and memorable music of far less inherent worth than that which Berlioz has given his solo instrument. A performance beyond price or adequate praise. And there are those who claim that Berlioz was not a melodist! The first three movements of the Harold symphony are all melody of the most poetic cast and Mr. Ferir's viola playing was romanticism itself.

Mr. Longy, a master, not only of his instrument, but his art, was less fortunate than Mr. Ferir in his vehicle for interpretation. D'Indy's Fantasia is evidently not among his great works. The introduction, it is true, is beautiful and the first phrases intoned by Mr. Longy were enough to betray the great artist, but as a whole the Fantasia is uninteresting. Workmanship too often takes the place of inspiration. The composer is heard alternately as a gifted harmonist and a man who builds his musical, edifice with pain and labor. The flash of creative forces does not come. It is for the most part a dry love: the applause, which was prolonged, was for the player, not the composition.

The performance of Brahms' vigorous overture, which a collegian in America can understand as readily as his colleague in Europe, was as lusty as vigorous and wholesome as possible.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
MARCH 13, 1915.

SYMPHONY PLAYS FAMILIAR WORKS

Ferir and Longy, Members of the Orchestra, Win Much Applause.

This is a sort of reunion or old home week with the Symphony Orchestra. The program selected by Dr. Muck is made up of familiar acquaintances, such as Berlioz's Byronic symphony, "Harold in Italy," the fantasia for oboe and orchestra put forth back in the '80s by Paul Marie Theodore Vincent d'Indy, and Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture," which the rotund composer himself described as a "very jolly potpourri on students' songs a la Suppe." Besides these regular numbers, the andante from Beethoven's seventh symphony is offered as a memorial to John Chipman Gray.

The auld-lang-syne character of the program is emphasized by the appearance of two soloists chosen from the orchestra, Emile Ferir, the first viola, who plays the solo part—the Harold tone pictures—in the Berlioz work, and Georges Longy, who appears as soloist in the d'Indy number. Yesterday their playing was warmly applauded, and deservedly so, for it was stamped with the virtuosity for which Ferir and Longy have long been distinguished. Musicians such as these have done much to make the orchestra world-renowned.

The Berlioz symphony is "curiously picturesque," to quote the composer's own phrase, and full of Italian atmosphere sketched by one of the master tone-painters of the 19th century. The d'Indy fantasia is equally atmospheric with its basis of simple and rather plaintive folk themes and its clear reflection of sombre moods and of the barren mountains of the Cevennes. Mr. Longy's superb art magnified the work. There was long-continued applause for the soloist.

The orchestra will make its final Southern tour next week. The program for the concerts of March 26 and 27 comprises the Borodin symphony in B minor, Reger's new tone poems that were suggested by Boecklin, Weber's "Oberon" overture and songs by Beethoven and Brahms, which will be sung by Elena Gerhardt.

BOSTON HERALD,
MARCH 13, 1915.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Ferir and Longy in Generous Artistic Rivalry with the Viola and the Oboe.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 17th

on Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Iuck, conductor, took place yesterday fternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

eethoven,
Andante from the Seventh Symphony
In memoriam: John Chipman Gray.
erlioz.................."Harold in Italy"
Viola solo by Emile Ferir.
Indy....Fantasia for oboe and orchestra on French folk tunes. First time with orchestra in Boston.
Georges Longy, oboe.
Brahms.......Academic Festival Overture

Fortunate, thrice fortunate is the orchestra that numbers among its members such artists as Mr. Ferir and Mr. Longy! The two are masters of their instruments. Their technical skill serves in eloquent expression of the composer's thoughts. As was once said of a celebrated European virtuoso, they would "die for a phrase"; not in cold academic blood, but with soul aflame. It was a pleasure to hear them yesterday in generous rivalry, not contending in self-glorification, but for the perfect exposition of music that commanded their respect and affection.

Vincent d'Indy's Fantasia composed in 1888 was performed at the end of that year at a Lamoureux concert when Albert Weiss was the oboist. He was for two seasons a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Intending to return from Paris in the fall of 1898 he went down on the Bourgogne, outward bound from New York with his colleagues, Pourteau, the incomparable clarionetist, and Jacquet, the excellent flutist of the orchestra.

D'Indy's love of nature is well known. It has inspired several of his compositions. The mountains of the Cevennes, especially dear to him, are often barren and forbidding; hence probably a certain austerity in his mountain music, an austerity that goes hand in hand with the noble reserve found in other works by him. A collector of folk tunes, he has used in this Fantasia some that are characteristic, this one melancholy, another gay, with a gaiety that is not careless, reckless, but with the thought of the reaction that comes afterwards. Of the themes employed, the first has the most marked beauty, objective and subjective, and the treatment of it brings out the individuality and the finesse of the composer as harmonist and orchestrator. The treatment of the dance tune that follows is more common, no doubt designedly primitive, to portray in tones the rustic spirit. While the Fantasia is interesting and much more than a potpourri, it is not to be counted as a work of art among the leading works of the composer. The version for oboe and piano had already been played here by Messrs. Longy and Gebhard; also by Messrs. Longy and d'Indy.

It is doubtful whether the young in this country read "Childe Harold" today, or even "Don Juan." It would be well for them if they did. They would then the better understand the Romanticism of the Thirties and, incidentally, the music of Hector Berlioz before he became Virgilian in his compositions and a follower of Gluck. One reading his extravagant memoirs and hearing the "Fantastic" symphony and "Harold in Italy" may smile at the wildness of his ideas, but there is no doubt of the man's sincerity in his music. Henley spoke of the modern element in Romanticism that came from Byron as an "absurd and curious combination of vulgarity and terror, cynicism and passion, truculence and indecency." The brigands in their orgies were very real to Berlioz, but in 1915 "the mouths of brass" do not "seem to vomit forth curses and reply with blasphemies to entreating voices." We are less impressionable, perhaps. The greater the pity. Inferior as "Harold" is in strange imagination to the "Fantastic" symphony; inferior in beauty and nobility as it is to many pages of the "Romeo and Juliet" music, the symphony is nevertheless, now that it is over 80 years old, a singularly fascinating work. There are fine moments in the first movement, although one of the themes leads the hearer to suspect that Offenbach took his "Voici le Sabre" from it. The Pilgrim march, with hymn, still works its curious spell. Nor are the remaining pages without revelations of the towering genius of Berlioz.

Dr. Muck gave a supremely romantic reading of this romantic music, and led the performance of the "Academic" overture in a stirring fashion, as one remembering joyfully his university days and nights.

There will be no concerts next week. The program for March 26, 27 will include these orchestral works: Borodin, Symphony in B minor, No. 2; Reger, Four Tone Poems (after Boecklin's pictures); Weber, overture to "Oberon." Miss Elena Gerhardt will sing these songs with orchestra: Beethoven, Wonne der Wehmut, Freudvoll und Leidvoll, Die Himmel ruehmen des Ewigen Ehre; Brahms, Immerleiser wird mein Schlummer, Wir Wandelten, Auf dem Kirchhofe.

DAILY ADVERTISER.
MARCH 13 1915

ELSON'S REVIEW OF SYMPHONY CONCERT

LONGY AND FERIR IN OBBLIGATO SOLOS

Local Musicians Equal to Any of Those Who Have Come From Abroad

By Louis C. Elson

PROGRAMME

Beethoven—Andante from 7th Symphony.(?)
Berlioz—Childe Harold Symphony.
Emile Ferir, Viola soloist
d'Indy—Fantasie for Oboe and Orchestra.
M. Georges Longy, Oboe soloist
Brahms—Academic Festival Overture.

Although the general public will only rush to hear an imported soloist, the two local soloists who were heard in this programme were the equals of any that come to us from abroad. Familiarity ought not, in this case, to breed even indifference.

The Beethoven movement is a gem worth hearing for its own sake, but on this occasion it was played in memory of John Chipman Gray. Applause coming after this would be about like applauding a minister's remarks at a funeral (yet there was some hand-clapping), and criticism has nothing to do here either. Nevertheless we may state that it was earnestly and effectively played, and the consolation of the Trio made an excellent contrast with the first part of the work. Beethoven never gives himself wholly over to despair or morbidness. His was the truly virile nature in which hope springs eternal. To find an error in the programme is something entirely unusual. Yet we must state that there is no andante movement in the Seventh Symphony. Beethoven fussed a good deal about the tempo of this and finally called it "allegretto."

Of course Berlioz's two chief symphonies are his "Fantastique" and this "Childe Harold." While the latter has no such terrific tone-picture as the March to execution, the central theme of this work is intrinsically better than the love-theme which is the core of the "Fantastique." The viola is the instrument of melancholy, and only this instrument or the English horn could portray the morbid character of Byron's hero. Mr. Ferir made the most of this individualized theme and fully deserved the great applause that greeted him, both at the beginning and at the close. Especially graphic were the broken phrases of the finale, where the hero dies amid the revelry of the brigands.

The reading was sometimes a little over-refined. The monks marching to church, singing their Litany, was very effective, with the combination of harp and horn with which Berlioz managed to reproduce the tone of a great cathedral bell, and these instruments played excellently together.

Rustic Merriment

The scene of rustic merriment, with its dancing and its tambourine effects, was brought into vivid contrast with the profound melancholy of Childe Harold, who was among, but not of, the merry-makers. But the real excitement was in the orgie upon the Abruzzi, in the finale. Here Dr. Muck cried havoc and let loose the dogs of war. Judging by the frenzy portrayed this social function was by no means a five o'clock tea. It was one of those wild finales of which Berlioz was especially fond, and it was made a culminating "tour de force" on this occasion. A word of especial praise may be given to the entrance of the Childe Harold theme on flute and harp, in the first movement. Messrs. Ferir and Holy played this more expressively than we have ever heard it.

D'Indy's Fantasie for oboe was a revelation. We have heard it in Boston before, but never with its orchestral accompaniment. The orchestral guise of the work changed its effect greatly. It was no longer an oboe solo with accompaniment, but an orchestral work with a beautiful obbligato. The orchestral treatment fitted the popular themes charmingly. There was considerable brusquerie in some portions, the kettle-drum leading the hurly-burly. But this was qnite in place in the frankly pleasant music that beamed forth from some of the melodies. There was none of the asceticism of D'Indy in the composition; he seems to have been moved by a hearty love of his native folk-themes, and to have entered entirely into their spirit.

Was Perfection

And the solo part was perfection. It is scarcely necessary to reiterate that we believe M. Longy to be the peer of any oboe-player in the world. It is a most difficult instrument to play well. The player must hold back his breath so constantly that he fatigues very soon. But there seemed no trace of difficulty in the finished performance of M. Longy. And the rustic and pastoral character of this instrument, which may be called "the countryman of the orchestra," was quaintly present in every part of the solo work. Of course M. Longy was generously applauded, but we doubt if most auditors knew what a masterpiece of oboe-playing they had heard. Then the concert ended with Herr Brahms in an unusually genial mood. This composer is not celebrated for humor, but in his working up of three German college-songs, in the academic overture, he has certainly become more playful than in any other work. The bassoon played excellently in the theme, "Was kommt dort von der Hoeh'," and the entire overture made a genial conclusion to a concert which did not dip too deeply into modernity.

BOSTON GLOBE—
MARCH 13, 1915

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

"Harold in Italy" Played, With Mr Ferir Violist.

D'Indy's Fantasia on French Folk Tunes, With Mr Longy Soloist.

Following the andante from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony played yesterday afternoon by the orchestra at the 17th rehearsal in memory of John Chipman Gray, three numbers made up the program—Berlioz' "Harold in Italy," with Mr Ferir solo violist; d'Indy's fantasia for oboe on French Folk Tunes with Mr Longy and Brahms' Academic Festival Overture.

Considering that Berlioz' symphony was written 80 years ago, it is amazing music. None but an alternately madman and genius could have conceived have protested so intimate a relation between life and music in the year 1834; a realism which to the classicists must have been preposterous. Like Liszt, his great successor, Berlioz left autobiographical data on every page of his scores. How theatricalism, extravagance, morbidity, all phases of the new romanticism, beckoned to him. How easily he was obsessed with an idea, which grows tedious in its repetition, as in the episode, "The March of the Pilgrims." If there is emptiness of thought, as in the last movement, noisy instrumentation nevertheless shields it with variety and vivacity of sound. The orgies of the brigands could not have greatly endangered innocence.

Berlioz found a closer kinsman than a brother in Byron. The diary of the English poet in the spirit of some of its pages might have been his. Byron wrote: "I always wake in actual despair and despondency, in all respects, even of that which pleased me over night. In England, five years ago, I had the same kind of hypochondria, but accompanied with so violent a thirst that I have drank as many as 15 bottles of soda water in one night after going to bed, and been still thirsty . . . striking off the necks of bottles from mere impatience." Beyle, a shrewd observer, who lived with Byron for a time, says that "on certain days he was mad," at other times, "in the presence of beautiful things he became sublime."

Byron's poems possessed a reasonable attraction for Berlioz. His "Childe Harold" might have been a prophetic biography of the French musician, who was ever plunged in emotion, whether in melancholy or exuberance of spirit. The adagio, mourning theme of the solo viola (Harold), an instrument beloved by Berlioz, is one of genuine beauty; its song throughout is expressive. Barring the orchestral portion of the serenade of the mountaineer to his mistress, which

---

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date MAR - 19

Establi

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the current season at the Lyric on Wednesday evening, March 17, when the soloist will be Beatrice Harrison, the English violoncellist. She will play Tscahikowsky's "Variations On a Rococo Theme." The symphony will be the one in E minor, by Jan Sibelius. J. O. L.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C. MAR 7 1915
Date

Est 384

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, March 16. It will then present as soloist the young English 'cellist, Beatrice Harrison, who has had so remarkable a career in her chosen art. Miss Harrison first came to America a year ago. She was preceded by reports which were so glowing that they tended to rouse a certain amount of scepticism. It required, however, only one hearing to realize that Miss Harrison was a 'cellist of most unusual quality, perhaps comparable only to Casals himself.

Miss Harrison is an English girl in her early twenties. She was born in India where her father, Col. Harrison, of the Royal Engineers, was stationed In common with her two sisters she early developed remarkable musical gifts and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello.

Miss Harrison will play Tschaikowsky's charming variations on a Rococo theme. The symphony will be a novelty, the fourth in C Major by the French composer, J. Guy Ropartz.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 7 - 19
Established:

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season in the Academy of Music Monday evening, March 15. It will then present as soloist the young English 'cellist, Beatrice Harrison, who has had so remarkable a career in her chosen art. Miss Harrison first came to America a year ago. She was preceded by reports which were so glowing that they tended to rouse a certain amount of skepticism. It required, however, only one hearing to realize that Miss Harrison was a 'cellist of most unusual quality, perhaps comparable only to Casals himself.

Miss Harrison is an English girl in her early twenties. She was born in India, where her father, Colonel Harrison, of the Royal Engineers, was stationed. In common with her two sisters, she early developed remarkable musical gifts and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello. As a little child she went to the Royal College of Music in London, where, when she was ten years old, she received the gold medal which is in the senior competition and never before had been given to one so young. From there she went to Frankfort, where she became a pupil of the famous German 'cellist, Hugo Becker, and with him she studied until she was able to work for herself. At the age of seventeen she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin, which is the most sought after distinction a musical student can have. This will be Miss Harrison's first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Harrison will play Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme. The symphony will be Brahms' Symphony in C Minor.

* * *

The subscription series of concerts

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date MAR 7 - 1915
Est 34

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its last concert of the season in the Academy of Music Monday evening, March 15. It will then present as soloist the young English 'cellist, Beatrice Harrison, who has had so remarkable a career in her chosen art. Miss Harrison first came to America a year ago. She was preceded by reports which were so glowing that they tended to arouse a certain amount of skepticism. It required, however, only one hearing to realize that Miss Harrison was a 'cellist of most unusual quality, perhaps comparable only to Casals himself.

Miss Harrison is an English girl, in her early twenties. She was born in India, where her father, Colonel Harrison, of the Royal Engineers, was stationed. In common with her two sisters, she early developed remarkable musical gifts and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello. As a little child she went to the Royal College of Music, in London, where when she was ten years old she received the gold medal, which is in the senior competition and never before had been given to one so young. From there she went to Frankfort, where she became a pupil of the famous German 'cellist, Hugo Becker, and with him she studied until she was able to work for herself. At the age of 17 she received the Mendelssohn Prize in Berlin, which is the most-saught-after distinction a musical student can have. This will be Miss Harrison's first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Harrison will play Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme." The will be Brahms' Symphony in

---

From BULLETIN
Address Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 8 - 1915
Esta

FIFTH CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY PLEASES AUDIENCE

Anton Witek, Violin Soloist, Given Prolonged Applause After Playing Bruch's Concerto in G-Minor.—Sibelius, Wagner an Dvorak Represented.

That Dr. Muck aims to give to Providence in much the same measure tha which Boston hears at its symphony concerts, was clearly shown in last night programme for the fifth concert by th Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantr Hall, on which Sibelius, Wagner an Dvorak were represented by the san compositions which have been lately hea in Boston, while the assisting artist w Anton Witek, the virtuoso of the o chestra, who has found such favor a soloist in Boston that his appearanc in that capacity with the orchestra ha come to be a regular event of each season.

The first Sibelius symphony is not new to Providence audiences, which, like those of Boston, have just heard it for the third time, following a performance in 1912 and an earlier one under Dr. Muck in his first period in this country.

The composer, giving no programme as a clue to its meaning, has left the symphony to speak for itself in its message to each listener. In no uncertain tones, the sombre, rugged music paints pictures for each one, mostly full of mystery, at times exceedingly beautiful, and again turbulent, clashing and filled with strange dissonances.

Finland is to most of us an unknown country, and the music of Sibelius may easily be any expression of his national feeling, and yet there is a strange Oriental quality in the third movement that vaguely suggests a feeling for the Japanese.

Be that as it may, the music, romantic, emotional, with many passages of great beauty and dignity, was played last evening in such brilliant fashion as to make a deep impression and to call the audience lasting applause passionate climax came to an

Following the symphony came numbers on the programme, i lowing order:

Sibelius....Symphony No. 1, in E-min
I. Andante ma non troppo; Allegro
II. Andante, ma non troppo lento.
III. Allegro.
IV. Finale (Quasi una fantasia): Allegro molto.
Bruch..............................
Concerto for Violin, No. 1, G-minor
I. Vorspiel. Allegro moderato.
II. Adagio.
III. Finale: Allegro energico.
Wagner......................."A Siegfri
Dvorak...........Overture, "Carnival."

While it was Mr. Witek's first a ance in this city as soloist wit orchestra, he is still vividly remem by those who heard him five years ago, shortly after his arrival in this country, in a recital which he gave with Mme. Vita Witek, pianist, before The Listeners in Churchill House.

The beauty of his tone, the brilliancy of his technique and the artistic quality manifested on that occasion, placed him at once in the class with the virtuosi whose appearances in this country had made their names more familiar here.

Last evening he played Bruch's Concerto in G-minor with a mastery of his instrument that was soul-satisfying to a degree. Especially beautiful was the fluency of his tone in the first movement, although the variety of themes throughout were handled with such sureness as to call forth had not Mr. Witek modestly returned to the concert-master's desk, were given to him at the close of his performance, and he was forced to recognize the approval of the large audience by continued acknowledgment.

---

When the programme was ultimately resumed the orchestra gave a delightful presentation of the diverse numbers that completed the concert, the popular "Seigfried Idyl," which was given here less than two years ago, and the Bohemian "Carnival" of Dvorak, full of wild melody, with graceful interludes of a pastoral nature.

The contrast of these numbers completed the variety of a programme that seemed to please the vast majority; and one which added its individual note to the previous programme of the winter.

The sixth and last concert will be given on Tuesday evening, April 13, when Miss Florence Hinkle will be the soloist.

A. W. C.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
MAR 7 1915
Date

Est 384

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season at the National Tuesday afternoon, March 16. It will then present as soloist the young English cellist, Beatrice Harrison. Miss Harrison first came to America a year ago. She was preceded by reports which were so glowing that they tended to rouse a certain amount of skepticism. It required, however, only one hearing to realize that Miss Harrison was a cellist of most unusual quality.

Miss Harrison is an English girl in her early twenties. She was born in India, where her father, Col. Harrison, of the Royal Engineers was stationed. In common with her two sisters she early developed remarkable musical gifts, and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello. As a little child she went to the Royal College of Music in London, where, when she was 10 years old, she received the gold medal, which is in the senior competition, and never before had been given to one so young. From there she went to Frankfort, where she became a pupil of the famous German cellist, Hugo Becker, and with him she studied until she was able to work for herself. At the age of 17 she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin. This will be Miss Harrison's first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Harrison will play Tschaikowsky's charming variations on a Rococo theme. The symphony will be a novelty, the fourth in C major by the French composer, J. Guy Ropartz.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Esta 384

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season in the Academy of Music, Monday evening, March 15. It will then present as soloist the young English 'cellist, Beatrice Harrison, who has had a remarkable career in her chosen art. Miss Harrison first came to America a year ago. She is an English girl in her early twenties. She was born in India where her father, Colonel Harrison, of the Royal Engineers, was stationed. In common with her two sisters she early developed remarkable musical gifts and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello. As a little child she went to the Royal College of Music, in London where, when she was 10 years old, she received the gold medal which is in the senior competition and never before had been given to one so young. Thence she went to Frankfort, where she became a pupil of the famous German 'cellist, Hugo Becker, and with him she studied until she was able to work for herself. At the age of 17, she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin which is the most sought distinction a musical student can have. This will be Miss Harrison's first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Miss Harrison will play Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo theme. The symphony will be Brahms', in C Minor.

* * * *

---

orchestra, and the formation of a choral society is only one of them. Hitherto Mr. Stokowski has been compelled to draw upon various singing organizations in the city when he wanted to produce symphonic compositions that require choral assistance. While they have performed nobly, said Mr. Stokowski, there are serious objections on account of the type of training they have undergone.

Their vocal efforts have been largely devoted to oratorios. While it does not totally unfit them for singing such works as Mendelssohn's symphony-cantata, "Lobgesang," which Mr. Stokowski conducted in the Academy of Music on Thursday night, he believes the result could be vastly improved if such a body of singers could devote the major part of their time to studying them.

Last year the Philadelphia Orchestra was heard in Beethoven's famous Ninth Symphony; this year it gave the "Lobgesang," and next it will produce Mahler's Choral Symphony, a composition which will require a supreme vocal effort to make it a musical success. Because he wishes to make the Mahler symphony surpass all other efforts in that direction for artistic finish, Mr. Stokowski has decided to organize a choral society as a part of the Philadelphia Orchestra. He expects to make it a permanent institution, and will give it the benefit of all his knowledge and talents. In fact, Mr. Stokowski will probably train this body himself.

The young conductor wanted it understood that the proposed choral society would not be used for any other purpose than singing such symphonies as are named. In a few days he will issue a call for candidates. He will use the most rigorous selective process in choosing members; everything to be decided by the kind of voice the applicant has.

In the six years he is yet to stay with the Philadelphia Orchestra Mr. Stokowski will make many changes and improvements in that organization. He expressed his desire to enlarge it to 100 regular playing members, such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra has.

BOSTON TRAVELER,
MARCH 13,

SOLOS GIVEN BY SYMPHONY MEN

Mr. Ferir and Mr. Longy Heard with Pleasure in Fine Concert.

The music-lover who did not find exceptional pleasure in the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon must indeed be hard to satisfy. It was a particularly interesting program, played in the orchestra's best style; in fact, one may well be pardoned for doubting whether the orchestra has any other style, and in addition afforded the audience an opportunity of hearing two soloists, Mr. Ferir, viola, and Mr. Longy, oboe, both members of the orchestra.

The program opened with a movement from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, played in memory of the late John Chipman Gray. Then came the Childe Harold symphony of Berlioz, with Mr. Ferir as the soloist, a wonderfully beautiful work, with both orchestra and soloist acquitting themselves with the greatest credit.

Mr. Longy plays the oboe so easily and with such charming results that the average listener is apt to go away with the impression that it is a simple task and therefore with an inadequate idea of the great artistry of the player, who, it is safe to say, has no equal. Thanks to Mr. Longy's fine artistry and Dr. Muck's great reading, Boston's first hearing of D'Indy's Fantasia as played by its orchestra placed that composer before the audience most favorably. It is a beautiful work.

Brahms's Festival Overture was played in the spirit of the rest of the concert, which means it left nothing to be desired.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date MAR 7 - 1915
Established:

STOKOWSKI TELLS OF PLANS FOR FUTURE OF ORCHESTRA

Leader Will Organize Permanent Choral Society of 800 Voices to Aid in Symphonies—Wants Larger Organization.

A PERMANENT choral society of 800 voices for the purpose of assisting the Philadelphia Orchestra in the production of such symphonies as Beethoven's Ninth, and for that purpose alone, will be organized shortly in this city. An announcement to this effect was made yesterday by Leopold Stokowski, the conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, who has contracted to remain the leader of that body until 1921.

Many ambitious projects are being worked out for the development of the Musical realism in [illegible] could have projected so intimate a relation between life and music in the year 1834; a realism which to the classicists must have been preposterous. Like Liszt, his great successor, Berlioz left autobiographical data on every page of his scores. How theatricalism, extravagance, morbidity, all phases of the new romanticism, beckoned to him. How easily he was obsessed with an idea, which grows tedious in its repetition, as in the episode, "The March of the Pilgrims." If there is emptiness of thought, as in the last movement, noisy instrumentation nevertheless shields it with variety and vivacity of sound. The orgies of the brigands could not have greatly endangered innocence.

Berlioz found a closer kinsman than a brother in Byron. The diary of the English poet in the spirit of some of its pages might have been his. Byron wrote: "I always wake in actual despair and despondency, in all respects, even of that which pleased me over night. In England, five years ago, I had the same kind of hypochondria, but accompanied with so violent a thirst that I have drank as many as 15 bottles of soda water in one night after going to bed, and been still thirsty . . . striking off the necks of bottles from mere impatience." Beyle, a shrewd observer, who lived with Byron for a time, says that "on certain days he was mad," at other times, "in the presence of beautiful things he became sublime."

Byron's poems possessed a reasonable attraction for Berlioz. His "Childe Harold" might have been a prophetic biography of the French musician, who was ever plunged in emotion, whether in melancholy or exuberance of spirit. The adagio, mourning theme of the solo viola (Harold), an instrument beloved by Berlioz, is one of genuine beauty; its song throughout is expressive. Barring the orchestral portion of the serenade of the mountaineer to his mistress, which

---

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Establi

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the current season at the Lyric on Wednesday evening, March 17, when the soloist will be Beatrice Harrison, the English violoncellist. She will play Tscahikowsky's "Variations On a Rococo Theme." The symphony will be the one in E minor, by Jan Sibelius. J. O. L.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
MAR 7
Date

Est 384

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, March 16. It will then present as soloist the young English 'cellist, Beatrice Harrison, who has had so remarkable a career in her chosen art. Miss Harrison first came to America a year ago. She was preceded by reports which were so glowing that they tended to rouse a certain amount of scepticism. It required, however, only one hearing to realize that Miss Harrison was a 'cellist of most unusual quality, perhaps comparable only to Casals himself.

Miss Harrison is an English girl in her early twenties. She was born in India where her father, Col. Harrison, of the Royal Engineers, was stationed In common with her two sisters she early developed remarkable musical gifts and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello.

Miss Harrison will play Tschaikowsky's charming variations on a Rococo theme. The symphony will be a novelty, the fourth in C Major by the French composer, J. Guy Ropartz.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Established:

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season in the Academy of Music Monday evening. March 15. It will then present as soloist the young English 'cellist, Beatrice Harrison, who has had so remarkable a career in her chosen art. Miss Harrison first came to America a year ago. She was preceded by reports which were so glowing that they tended to rouse a certain amount of skepticism. It required, however, only one hearing to realize that Miss Harrison was a 'cellist of most unusual quality, perhaps comparable only to Casals himself.

Miss Harrison is an English girl in her early twenties. She was born in India, where her father, Colonel Harrison, of the Royal Engineers, was stationed. In common with her two sisters, she early developed remarkable musical gifts and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello. As a little child she went to the Royal College of Music in London, where, when she was ten years old, she received the gold medal which is in the senior competition and never before had been given to one so young. From there she went to Frankfort, where she became a pupil of the famous German 'cellist, Hugo Becker, and with him she studied until she was able to work for herself. At the age of seventeen she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin, which is the most sought after distinction a musical student can have. This will be Miss Harrison's first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Harrison will play Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme. The symphony will be Brahms' Symphony in C Minor.

* * *

The subscription series of concerts

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date

Est 34

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its last concert of the season in the Academy of Music Monday evening, March 15. It will then present as soloist the young English 'cellist, Beatrice Harrison, who has had so remarkable a career in her chosen art. Miss Harrison first came to America a year ago. She was preceded by reports which were so glowing that they tended to arouse a certain amount of skepticism. It required, however, only one hearing to realize that Miss Harrison was a 'cellist of most unusual quality, perhaps comparable only to Casals himself.

Miss Harrison is an English girl, in her early twenties. She was born in India, where her father, Colonel Harrison, of the Royal Engineers, was stationed. In common with her two sisters, she early developed remarkable musical gifts and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello. As a little child she went to the Royal College of Music, in London, where when she was ten years old she received the gold medal, which is in the senior competition and never before had been given to one so young. From there she went to Frankfort, where she became a pupil of the famous German 'cellist, Hugo Becker, and with him she studied until she was able to work for herself. At the age of 17 she received the Mendelssohn Prize in Berlin, which is the most-saught-after distinction a musical student can have. This will be Miss Harrison's first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Harrison will play Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme." The [illegible] will be Brahms' Symphony in

---

From BULLETIN
Address Providence, R. I.
Date

Estal

FIFTH CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY PLEASES AUDIENCE

Anton Witek, Violin Soloist, Given Prolonged Applause After Playing Bruch's Concerto in G-Minor.—Sibelius, Wagner and Dvorak Represented.

That Dr. Muck aims to give to Providence in much the same measure tha which Boston hears at its symphony concerts, was clearly shown in last night's programme for the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall, on which Sibelius, Wagner and Dvorak were represented by the same compositions which have been lately heard in Boston, while the assisting artist was Anton Witek, the virtuoso of the orchestra, who has found such favor as soloist in Boston that his appearance in that capacity with the orchestra has come to be a regular event of each season.

The first Sibelius symphony is not new to Providence audiences, which, like those of Boston, have just heard it for the third time, following a performance in 1912 and an earlier one under Dr. Muck in his first period in this country.

The composer, giving no programme as a clue to its meaning, has left the symphony to speak for itself in its message to each listener. In no uncertain tones, the sombre, rugged music paints pictures for each one, mostly full of mystery, at times exceedingly beautiful, and again turbulent, clashing and filled with strange dissonances.

Finland is to most of us an unknown country, and the music of Sibelius may easily be any expression of his national feeling, and yet there is a strange Oriental quality in the third movement that vaguely suggests a feeling for the Japanese.

Be that as it may, the music, romantic, emotional, with many passages of great beauty and dignity, was played last evening in such brilliant fashion as to make a deep impression and to call the audience lasting applause passionate climax came to an

Following the symphony came numbers on the programme, i lowing order:

Sibelius....Symphony No. 1. in E-min
I. Andante ma non troppo; Allegro
II. Andante, ma non troppo lento.
III. Allegro.
IV. Finale (Quasi una fantasia): Allegro molto.
Bruch..............................
Concerto for Violin, No. 1, G-minor,
I. Vorspiel. Allegro moderato.
II. Adagio.
III. Finale: Allegro energico.
Wagner......................"A Siegfrie
Dvorak...........Overture, "Carnival."

While it was Mr. Witek's first ap ance in this city as soloist with orchestra, he is still vividly rememb by those who heard him five years ago, shortly after his arrival in this country, in a recital which he gave with Mme. Vita Witek, pianist, before The Listeners in Churchill House.

The beauty of his tone, the brilliancy of his technique and the artistic quality manifested on that occasion, placed him at once in the class with the virtuosi whose appearances in this country had made their names more familiar here.

Last evening he played Bruch's Concerto in G-minor with a mastery of his instrument that was soul-satisfying to a degree. Especially beautiful was the fluency of his tone in the first movement, although the variety of themes throughout were handled with such sureness as to call forth

What would have been three [illegible] had not Mr. Witek modestly returned to the concert-master's desk, were given to him at the close of his performance, and he was forced to recognize the approval of the large audience by continued acknowledgment.

When the programme was ultimately resumed the orchestra gave a delightful presentation of the diverse numbers that completed the concert, the popular "Seigfried Idyl," which was given here less than two years ago, and the Bohemian "Carnival" of Dvorak, full of wild melody, with graceful interludes of a pastoral nature.

The contrast of these numbers completed the variety of a programme that seemed to please the vast majority; and one which added its individual note to the previous programme of the winter.

The sixth and last concert will be given on Tuesday evening, April 13, when Miss Florence Hinkle will be the soloist.

A. W. C.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
MAR 1915
Date

Est 384

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season at the National Tuesday afternoon, March 16. It will then present as soloist the young English cellist, Beatrice Harrison. Miss Harrison first came to America a year ago. She was preceded by reports which were so glowing that they tended to rouse a certain amount of skepticism. It required, however, only one hearing to realize that Miss Harrison was a cellist of most unusual quality.

Miss Harrison is an English girl in her early twenties. She was born in India, where her father, Col. Harrison, of the Royal Engineers was stationed. In common with her two sisters she early developed remarkable musical gifts, and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello. As a little child she went to the Royal College of Music in London, where, when she was 10 years old, she received the gold medal, which is in the senior competition, and never before had been given to one so young. From there she went to Frankfort, where she became a pupil of the famous German cellist, Hugo Becker, and with him she studied until she was able to work for herself. At the age of 17 she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin. This will be Miss Harrison's first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Harrison will play Tschaikowsky's charming variations on a Rococo theme. The symphony will be a novelty, the fourth in C major by the French composer, J. Guy Ropartz.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Estal 384

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season in the Academy of Music, Monday evening, March 15. It will then present as soloist the young English 'cellist, Beatrice Harrison, who has had a remarkable career in her chosen art. Miss Harrison first came to America a year ago. She is an English girl in her early twenties. She was born in India where her father, Colonel Harrison, of the Royal Engineers, was stationed. In common with her two sisters she early developed remarkable musical gifts and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello. As a little child she went to the Royal College of Music, in London where, when she was 10 years old, she received the gold medal which is in the senior competition and never before had been given to one so young. Thence she went to Frankfort, where she became a pupil of the famous German 'cellist, Hugo Becker, and with him she studied until she was able to work for herself. At the age of 17, she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin which is the most sought distinction a musical student can have. This will be Miss Harrison's first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Miss Harrison will play Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo theme. The symphony will be Brahms', in C Minor.

* * *

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
MAR 7
Date

Established:

STOKOWSKI TELLS OF PLANS FOR FUTURE OF ORCHESTRA

Leader Will Organize Permarent Choral Society of 800 Voices to Aid in Symphonies—Wants Larger Organization.

A PERMANENT choral society of 800 voices for the purpose of assisting the Philadelphia Orchestra in the production of such symphonies as Beethoven's Ninth, and for that purpose alone, will be organized shortly in this city. An announcement to this effect was made yesterday by Leopold Stokowski, the conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, who has contracted to remain the leader of that body until 1921.

Many ambitious projects are being worked out for the development of the orchestra, and the formation of a choral society is only one of them. Hitherto Mr. Stokowski has been compelled to draw upon various singing organizations in the city when he wanted to produce symphonic compositions that require choral assistance. While they have performed nobly, said Mr. Stokowski, there are serious objections on account of the type of training they have undergone.

Their vocal efforts have been largely devoted to oratorios. While it does not totally unfit them for singing such works as Mendelssohn's symphony-cantata, "Lobgesang," which Mr. Stokowski conducted in the Academy of Music on Thursday night, he believes the result could be vastly improved if such a body of singers could devote the major part of their time to studying them.

Last year the Philadelphia Orchestra was heard in Beethoven's famous Ninth Symphony; this year it gave the "Lobgesang," and next it will produce Mahler's Choral Symphony, a composition which will require a supreme vocal effort to make it a musical success. Because he wishes to make the Mahler symphony surpass all other efforts in that direction for artistic finish, Mr. Stokowski has decided to organize a choral society as a part of the Philadelphia Orchestra. He expects to make it a permanent institution, and will give it the benefit of all his knowledge and talents. In fact, Mr. Stokowski will probably train this body himself.

The young conductor wanted it understood that the proposed choral society would not be used for any other purpose than singing such symphonies as are named. In a few days he will issue a call for candidates. He will use the most rigorous selective process in choosing members; everything to be decided by the kind of voice the applicant has.

In the six years he is yet to stay with the Philadelphia Orchestra Mr. Stokowski will make many changes and improvements in that organization. He expressed his desire to enlarge it to 100 regular playing members, such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra has.

BOSTON TRAVELER,
MARCH 13,

SOLOS GIVEN BY SYMPHONY MEN

Mr. Ferir and Mr. Longy Heard with Pleasure in Fine Concert.

The music-lover who did not find exceptional pleasure in the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon must indeed be hard to satisfy. It was a particularly interesting program, played in the orchestra's best style; in fact, one may well be pardoned for doubting whether the orchestra has any other style, and in addition afforded the audience an opportunity of hearing two soloists, Mr. Ferir, viola, and Mr. Longy, oboe, both members of the orchestra.

The program opened with a movement from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, played in memory of the late John Chipman Gray. Then came the Childe Harold symphony of Berlioz, with Mr. Ferir as the soloist, a wonderfully beautiful work, with both orchestra and soloist acquitting themselves with the greatest credit.

Mr. Longy plays the oboe so easily and with such charming results that the average listener is apt to go away with the impression that it is a simple task and therefore with an inadequate idea of the great artistry of the player, who, it is safe to say, has no equal. Thanks to Mr. Longy's fine artistry and Dr. Muck's great reading, Boston's first hearing of D'Indy's Fantasia as played by its orchestra placed that composer before the audience most favorably. It is a beautiful work.

Brahms's Festival Overture was played in the spirit of the rest of the concert, which means it left nothing to be desired.

126

[illegible] realism in [illegible] could have projected so intimate a relation between life and music in the year 1834; a realism which to the classicists must have been preposterous. Like Liszt, his great successor, Berlioz left autobiographical data on every page of his scores. How theatricalism, extravagance, morbidity, all phases of the new romanticism, beckoned to him. How easily he was obsessed with an idea, which grows tedious in its repetition, as in the episode, "The March of the Pilgrims." If there is emptiness of thought, as in the last movement, noisy instrumentation nevertheless shields it with variety and vivacity of sound. The orgies of the brigands could not have greatly endangered innocence.

Berlioz found a closer kinsman than a brother in Byron. The diary of the English poet in the spirit of some of its pages might have been his. Byron wrote: "I always wake in actual despair and despondency, in all respects, even of that which pleased me over night. In England, five years ago, I had the same kind of hypochondria, but accompanied with so violent a thirst that I have drank as many as 15 bottles of soda water in one night after going to bed, and been still thirsty . . . striking off the necks of bottles from mere impatience." Beyle, a shrewd observer, who lived with Byron for a time, says that "on certain days he was mad," at other times, "in the presence of beautiful things he became sublime."

Byron's poems possessed a reasonable attraction for Berlioz. His "Childe Harold" might have been a prophetic biography of the French musician, who was ever plunged in emotion, whether in melancholy or exuberance of spirit. The adagio, mourning theme of the solo viola (Harold), an instrument beloved by Berlioz, is one of genuine beauty; its song throughout is expressive. Barring the orchestral portion of the serenade of the mountaineer to his mistress, which

---

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date
Establis

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the current season at the Lyric on Wednesday evening, March 17, when the soloist will be Beatrice Harrison, the English violoncellist. She will play Tscahikowsky's "Variations On a Rococo Theme." The symphony will be the one in E minor, by Jan Sibelius.

J. O. L.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
MAR 7
Date
Est
384

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, March 16. It will then present as soloist the young English 'cellist, Beatrice Harrison, who has had so remarkable a career in her chosen art. Miss Harrison first came to America a year ago. She was preceded by reports which were so glowing that they tended to rouse a certain amount of scepticism. It required, however, only one hearing to realize that Miss Harrison was a 'cellist of most unusual quality, perhaps comparable only to Casals himself.

Miss Harrison is an English girl in her early twenties. She was born in India where her father, Col. Harrison, of the Royal Engineers, was stationed In common with her two sisters she early developed remarkable musical gifts and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello.

Miss Harrison will play Tschaikowsky's charming variations on a Rococo theme. The symphony will be a novelty, the fourth in C Major by the French composer, J. Guy Ropartz.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR
Established:

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season in the Academy of Music Monday evening, March 15. It will then present as soloist the young English 'cellist, Beatrice Harrison, who has had so remarkable a career in her chosen art. Miss Harrison first came to America a year ago. She was preceded by reports which were so glowing that they tended to rouse a certain amount of skepticism. It required, however, only one hearing to realize that Miss Harrison was a 'cellist of most unusual quality, perhaps comparable only to Casals himself.

Miss Harrison is an English girl in her early twenties. She was born in India, where her father, Colonel Harrison, of the Royal Engineers, was stationed. In common with her two sisters, she early developed remarkable musical gifts and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello. As a little child she went to the Royal College of Music in London, where, when she was ten years old, she received the gold medal which is in the senior competition and never before had been given to one so young. From there she went to Frankfort, where she became a pupil of the famous German 'cellist, Hugo Becker, and with him she studied until she was able to work for herself. At the age of seventeen she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin, which is the most sought after distinction a musical student can have. This will be Miss Harrison's first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Harrison will play Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme. The symphony will be Brahms' Symphony in C Minor.

* * *

The subscription series of concerts

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date MAR 7 - 191
Est
34

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its last concert of the season in the Academy of Music Monday evening, March 15. It will then present as soloist the young English 'cellist, Beatrice Harrison, who has had so remarkable a career in her chosen art. Miss Harrison first came to America a year ago. She was preceded by reports which were so glowing that they tended to arouse a certain amount of skepticism. It required, however, only one hearing to realize that Miss Harrison was a 'cellist of most unusual quality, perhaps comparable only to Casals himself.

Miss Harrison is an English girl, in her early twenties. She was born in India, where her father, Colonel Harrison, of the Royal Engineers, was stationed. In common with her two sisters, she early developed remarkable musical gifts and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello. As a little child she went to the Royal College of Music, in London, where when she was ten years old she received the gold medal, which is in the senior competition and never before had been given to one so young. From there she went to Frankfort, where she became a pupil of the famous German 'cellist, Hugo Becker, and with him she studied until she was able to work for herself. At the age of 17 she received the Mendelssohn Prize in Berlin, which is the most-saught-after distinction a musical student can have. This will be Miss Harrison's first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Harrison will play Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme." The symphony will be Brahms' Symphony in C minor.

* * *

The Choral Society, directed by Henry

Date
Estab
384

FIFTH CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY PLEASES AUDIENCE

Anton Witek, Violin Soloist, Given Prolonged Applause After Playing Bruch's Concerto in G-Minor.—Sibelius, Wagner and Dvorak Represented.

That Dr. Muck aims to give to Providence in much the same measure that which Boston hears at its symphony concerts, was clearly shown in last night's programme for the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall, on which Sibelius, Wagner and Dvorak were represented by the same compositions which have been lately heard in Boston, while the assisting artist was Anton Witek, the virtuoso of the orchestra, who has found such favor as soloist in Boston that his appearance in that capacity with the orchestra has come to be a regular event of each season.

The first Sibelius symphony is not new to Providence audiences, which, like those of Boston, have just heard it for the third time, following a performance in 1912 and an earlier one under Dr. Muck in his first period in this country.

The composer, giving no programme as a clue to its meaning, has left the symphony to speak for itself in its message to each listener. In no uncertain tones, the sombre, rugged music paints pictures for each one, mostly full of mystery, at times exceedingly beautiful, and again turbulent, clashing and filled with strange dissonances.

Finland is to most of us an unknown country, and the music of Sibelius may easily be any expression of his national feeling, and yet there is a strange Oriental quality in the third movement that vaguely suggests a feeling for the Japanese.

Be that as it may, the music, romantic, emotional, with many passages of great beauty and dignity, was played last evening in such brilliant fashion as to make a deep impression and to call forth from the audience lasting applause as the last passionate climax came to an end.

Following the symphony came the other numbers on the programme, in the following order:

Sibelius....Symphony No. 1, in E-minor, Op. 39
I. Andante ma non troppo; Allegro energico.
II. Andante, ma non troppo lento.
III. Allegro.
IV. Finale (Quasi una fantasia): Andante; Allegro molto.
Bruch..
Concerto for Violin, No. 1, G-minor, Op. 26
I. Vorspiel. Allegro moderato.
II. Adagio.
III. Finale: Allegro energico.
Wagner........................"A Siegfried Idyl
Dvorak...........Overture, "Carnival," Op. 92

While it was Mr. Witek's first appearance in this city as soloist with the orchestra, he is still vividly remembered by those who heard him five years ago, shortly after his arrival in this country, in a recital which he gave with Mme. Vita Witek, pianist, before The Listeners in Churchill House.

The beauty of his tone, the brilliancy of his technique and the artistic quality manifested on that occasion, placed him at once in the class with the virtuosi whose appearances in this country had made their names more familiar here.

Last evening he played Bruch's Concerto in G-minor with a mastery of his instrument that was soul-satisfying to a degree. Especially beautiful was the fluency of his tone in the first movement, although the variety of themes throughout were handled with such sureness as to call forth [illegible]

What would have been three recalls, had not Mr. Witek modestly returned to the concert-master's desk, were given to him at the close of his performance, and he was forced to recognize the approval of the large audience by continued acknowledgment.

When the programme was ultimately resumed the orchestra gave a delightful presentation of the diverse numbers that completed the concert, the popular "Seigfried Idyl," which was given here less than two years ago, and the Bohemian "Carnival" of Dvorak, full of wild melody, with graceful interludes of a pastoral nature.

The contrast of these numbers completed the variety of a programme that seemed to please the vast majority; and one which added its individual note to the previous programme of the winter.

The sixth and last concert will be given on Tuesday evening, April 13, when Miss Florence Hinkle will be the soloist.

A. W. C.

126

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
MAR 7 1915
Date
Est
384

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season at the National Tuesday afternoon, March 16. It will then present as soloist the young English cellist, Beatrice Harrison. Miss Harrison first came to America a year ago. She was preceded by reports which were so glowing that they tended to rouse a certain amount of skepticism. It required, however, only one hearing to realize that Miss Harrison was a cellist of most unusual quality.

Miss Harrison is an English girl in her early twenties. She was born in India, where her father, Col. Harrison, of the Royal Engineers was stationed. In common with her two sisters she early developed remarkable musical gifts, and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello. As a little child she went to the Royal College of Music in London, where, when she was 10 years old, she received the gold medal, which is in the senior competition, and never before had been given to one so young. From there she went to Frankfort, where she became a pupil of the famous German cellist, Hugo Becker, and with him she studied until she was able to work for herself. At the age of 17 she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin. This will be Miss Harrison's first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Harrison will play Tschaikowsky's charming variations on a Rococo theme. The symphony will be a novelty, the fourth in C major by the French composer, J. Guy Ropartz.

---

om RECORD
ddress: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date
tal
384

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season in the Academy of Music, Monday evening, March 15. It will then present as soloist the young English 'cellist, Beatrice Harrison, who has had a remarkable career in her chosen art. Miss Harrison first came to America a year ago. She is an English girl in her early twenties. She was born in India where her father, Colonel Harrison, of the Royal Engineers, was stationed. In common with her two sisters she early developed remarkable musical gifts and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello. As a little child she went to the Royal College of Music, in London where, when she was 10 years old, she received the gold medal which is in the senior competition and never before had been given to one so young. Thence she went to Frankfort, where she became a pupil of the famous German 'cellist, Hugo Becker, and with him she studied until she was able to work for herself. At the age of 17, she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin which is the most sought distinction a musical student can have. This will be Miss Harrison's first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Miss Harrison will play Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo theme. The symphony will be Brahms', in C Minor.

* * *

[illegible] of the Matinee

ER ia
191

OWSKI TELLS OF PLANS OR FUTURE OF ORCHESTRA

Will Organize Permanent Choral Society of 800 Voices o Aid in Symphonies—Wants Larger Organization.

A MANENT choral society of 800 voices for the purpose of assisting the Philadelphia Orchestra in the production of such symphonies as Beethoven's Ninth, and for that purpose alone, will be organized shortly in this city. An announcement to this effect was made yesterday by Leopold Stokowski, the conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, who has contracted to remain the leader of that body until 1921.

Many ambitious projects are being worked out for the development of the orchestra, and the formation of a choral society is only one of them. Hitherto Mr. Stokowski has been compelled to draw upon various singing organizations in the city when he wanted to produce symphonic compositions that require choral assistance. While they have performed nobly, said Mr. Stokowski, there are serious objections on account of the type of training they have undergone.

RECORD

Their vocal efforts have been largely devoted to oratorios. While it does not totally unfit them for singing such works as Mendelssohn's symphony-cantata, "Lobgesang," which Mr. Stokowski conducted in the Academy of Music on Thursday night, he believes the result could be vastly improved if such a body of singers could devote the major part of their time to studying them.

Last year the Philadelphia Orchestra was heard in Beethoven's famous Ninth Symphony; this year it gave the "Lobgesang," and next it will produce Mahler's Choral Symphony, a composition which will require a supreme vocal effort to make it a musical success. Because he wishes to make the Mahler symphony surpass all other efforts in that direction for artistic finish, Mr. Stokowski has decided to organize a choral society as a part of the Philadelphia Orchestra. He expects to make it a permanent institution, and will give it the benefit of all his knowledge and talents. In fact, Mr. Stokowski will probably train this body himself.

The young conductor wanted it understood that the proposed choral society would not be used for any other purpose than singing such symphonies as are named. In a few days he will issue a call for candidates. He will use the most rigorous selective process in choosing members; everything to be decided by the kind of voice the applicant has.

In the six years he is yet to stay with the Philadelphia Orchestra Mr. Stokowski will make many changes and improvements in that organization. He expressed his desire to enlarge it to 100 regular playing members, such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra has.

BOSTON TRAVELER,
MARCH 13,

SOLOS GIVEN BY SYMPHONY MEN

Mr. Ferir and Mr. Longy Heard with Pleasure in Fine Concert.

The music-lover who did not find exceptional pleasure in the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon must indeed be hard to satisfy. It was a particularly interesting program, played in the orchestra's best style; in fact, one may well be pardoned for doubting whether the orchestra has any other style, and in addition afforded the audience an opportunity of hearing two soloists, Mr. Ferir, viola, and Mr. Longy, oboe, both members of the orchestra.

The program opened with a movement from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, played in memory of the late John Chipman Gray. Then came the Childe Harold symphony of Berlioz, with Mr. Ferir as the soloist, a wonderfully beautiful work, with both orchestra and soloist acquitting themselves with the greatest credit.

Mr. Longy plays the oboe so easily and with such charming results that the average listener is apt to go away with the impression that it is a simple task and therefore with an inadequate idea of the great artistry of the player, who, it is safe to say, has no equal. Thanks to Mr. Longy's fine artistry and Dr. Muck's great reading, Boston's first hearing of D'Indy's Fantasia as played by its orchestra placed that composer before the audience most favorably. It is a beautiful work.

Brahms's Festival Overture was played in the spirit of the rest of the concert, which means it left nothing to be desired.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date AR 3 1915

Est 884

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT FINE

Boston Orchestra and Anton Witek, Violin Soloist, Rendered Delightfully Varied Programme.

Infantry Hall was well filled last night again for the fifth of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The enjoyment of these musical events, which are unsurpassed during the season in this city, has seemed to increase as the winter has advanced, and there was no mistaking the opinion of the audience last night that the programme rendered compared most favorably with those that have preceded it. There is always shown by Dr. Muck, the conductor, a subtle faculty of selecting numbers and arranging them in such an order as to give variety to the programmes and yet present a harmony of composers and their great work which makes every programme a gem and every selection a delight. That happy faculty was displayed once more last night, and the numbers were played by the orchestra and the soloist with that masterly control of instruments and that vivid expression of talent that never fail to mark the work of this organization and its members. There was hearty applause for every number and every evidence of appreciation by the audience was thoroughly deserved.

The programme was in the following order:

Sibelius ....
..Symphony No. 1, in E-minor, Op. 39
I. Andante ma non troppo; Algro energico.
II. Andante, ma non troppo lento.
III. Allegro.
IV. Finale (Quasi una fantasia): Andante; Allegro molto.
Bruch ....
Concerto for Violin, No. 1, G-minor, Op. 26.
I. Vorspiel. Allegro moderato.
II. Adagio.
III. Finale: Allegro energico.
Wagner..............."A Siegfried Idyl"
Dvorak....Overture, "Carnival," Op. 92

Anton Witek, the concert master, who has won fame wherever the orchestra has played, was selected for solo honors, and the honor was well merited by him, and he did not fail in any particular to measure up to the responsibility that was placed upon him to uphold the credit of the organization he represented. Mr. Witek has achieved the distinction of being regarded as one of the leading violinists in the world, and has held some important posts. His connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as concert master dates back now five years, and during that time he has become very widely known for his skill and ability as a master of the instrument he has chosen for the expression of his talent.

He has appeared each season as a soloist during the Boston season of the orchestra, but has never before played here in this capacity. His work last night was brilliant and fascinating. His single selection was Bruchu's concerto, in G-minor, which was a very happy one and was played with beautiful harmony, remarkable mastery of technique and studied expression and yet with an ease and simplicity of manner and movement that gave it added charm. He gave his hearers some moments of intense delight and was rewarded with most hearty expressions of satisfaction and pleasure.

The orchestra was up to its highest standard of excellence last night, and nothing more need be said to any one who has heard this musical organization to indicate that its work was of the highest quality. The symphony was the first by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelus in E-minor. This is one of the most notable contributions to symphonic literature in recent years and is pronounced without contradiction the best of modern creations of this sort. The composer in his music shows strongly his nationality and his love of his country, and all through it is felt the breath of the race from which he sprang, strong, rugged but given to moods and inclined to melancholy. The score was played by the orchestra with careful precision and due attention to instrumentation and yet with a freedom and fullness of tone that impressed deeply and intensified the pleasure afforded.

The two other orchestral numbers that completed the programme were of quite a different character but highly enjoyable and gave a bright and joyous ending to the concert of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Dvorak's "Carnival" The one is exquisite in its beauty and delicacy and the other is brilliant in its tone and treatment. Both were rendered with almost perfect finish and left nothing to be desired.

From WORLD Brooklyn Ed.
Address: New York City
Date 7 1915

Estab 84

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season in the Academy of Music Friday evening, March 19. It will present as soloist the young English 'cellist, Beatrice Harrison, who has had a remarkable career in her chosen art. Miss Harrison first came to America a year ago. She was preceded by reports which were so glowing that they roused a certain amount of scepticism. It required only one hearing to realize that Miss Harrison is a 'cellist of unusual quality, perhaps comparable only to Casals. Miss Harrison is an English girl in her early twenties. She was born in India, where her father, Col. Harrison of the Royal Engineers, is stationed. In common with her two sisters she early deevloped remarkable musical gifts and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello. As a child she went to the Royal College of Music in London, where when she was ten years old she received the gold medal which is in the senior competition and never before had been given to one so young. From there she went to Frankfort, where she became a pupil of the famous German 'cellist, Hugo Becker, and with him she studied until she was able to work for herself. At the age of seventeen she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin, which is the most sought after distinction a musical student can have. This will be Miss Harrison's first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra. Miss Harrison will play Tschaikowsky's charming variations on a rococo theme. The symphony will be Mozart's in C major, "Jupiter."

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date FEB 28 191

Establi

THE fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening will be principal musical event of the week come, and those who heard Anton Wit in the recital which he gave with Mn Witek before The Listeners in Church House shortly after his arrival in th country will await with interest his a pearance here as soloist with the orche tra of which he is concert master.

A concert of considerable local intere will be that of the Place Mandolin Strin Quartet to-morrow evening in Churchil House, which will be notable for th continuance of the efforts made by tha organization to prove the adaptability o plectral instruments to serious chamber music.

Numerous recitals of various sorts, including the usual number of Lenten organ recitals, will complete the offerings of the week.

* * *

Anton Witek, who has held the position of concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since the fall of 1910, and will be its soloist at the fifth concert in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, has appeared as soloist with the orchestra at its concerts in Boston each season since he came to America.

He was born in Saaz, Bohemia, on Jan. 7, 1872, studied the violin under Bennewitz at Prague and in 1894, at the age of 22, was appointed concert master and first soloist by the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin. This is the most important post for violinists in Germany, and Mr. Witek's appointment marked him at once as one of the world's great violinists.

He early commanded attention in Germany (in 1895) by the performance in one evening of three violin concertos, those by Beethoven, Brahms and Paganini. During his engagement with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, which ended on Sept. 1, 1910, he toured Europe as a virtuoso, and with his wife, Vita Witek, and Josef Malkin, who is now one of the first 'cellists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, formed the Berlin Trio, which played an important part in the musical life of Berlin. In 1907 Mr. Witek played in Berlin the newly discovered violin concerto in A-major by Mozart for the first time, and in 1909 in the same city the newly discovered concerto in C-major l Haydn, also for the first time.

The symphony on Tuesday evening w be the First, in E-minor, by Jan Sibeliu the Finnish composer, which is one the most notable contributions to syr phonic literature in the last quarter of century. Sibelius, who was in this cou try last spring as a guest of the Norfo Festival in Connecticut, is one of t few original talents now writing mus He is nothing if not nationalistic, but l music is not dependent, like that Grieg, for example, on the folk music his country. Rather does it reflect moods and temperament of the race which he is one.

The full programme is as follo Sibelius, Symphony in E-minor, No. Bruch, Concerto for violin and orches in G-minor, No. 1; Wagner, "A Siegfri Idyl;" Dvorak, overture, "Carnaval."

* * *

[illegible] Society [illegible] 60

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date MAR 7 15

Establ 384

The final Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall, one on Thursday evening, March 18, and the other on Saturday afternoon, March 20. The feature of Thursday evening's programme will be the "Harold in Italy" Symphony of Hector Berlioz. Emile Ferir will play the viola obligato. The other numbers on the programme will be Frederick S. Converse's Symphonic Poem "Ormazd," and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture.

A very interesting feature of the programme for Saturday afternoon will be Vincent d' Indy's Fantasia for oboe and orchestra. The solo part in this will be played by Georges Longy, first oboe of the orchestra. The Symphony will be Schubert's in C major and the other number will be Dvorak's "Carneval" overture.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 7

Esta 84

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 19, when it will present as soloist the young English 'cellist, Beatrice Harrison, who first came to America a year ago. She was preceded by such glowing reports that they tended to rouse a certain amount of skepticism. It required, however, only one hearing to realize that she is a 'cellist of unusual quality, perhaps comparable only to Casals. She was born in India, where her father, Colonel Harrison of the Royal Engineers, was stationed. In common with her two sisters she early developed remarkable musical gifts and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello. She went to the Royal College of Music in London, where, when she was 10 years old, she won the gold medal in the senior competition; never before had it been given to one so young. In Frankfort, where she was a pupil of the famous German 'cellist, Hugo Becker, she studied until she was able to work for herself. At the age of seventeen she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin, which is a distinction most sought by musical students. This will be her first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra and she will play Tschaikowsky's charming "Variations on a Rococo Theme." The symphony will be Mozart's in C major, the "Jupiter."

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date AR 7 191

Esta 884

MISS HARRISON TO APPEAR

With Boston Symphony Orchestra's Last Concert of the Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season in the Academy of Music Friday evening, March 19. It will present as soloist the young English 'cellist, Beatrice Harrison. Miss Harrison first came to America a year ago. She was preceded by reports which were so glowing that they tended to rouse a certain amount of skepticism. It required, however, only one hearing to realize that Miss Harrison was a 'cellist of most unusual quality, perhaps comparable only to Casals himself.

Miss Harrison is an English girl in her early 20's. She was born in India, where her father, Colonel Harrison, of the Royal Engineers, was stationed. In common with her two sisters, she early developed remarkable musical gifts and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello. As a child she went to the Royal College of Music in London, where, when she was 10 years old, she received the gold medal which is in the senior competition and which never before had been given to one so young. From there she went to Frankfort, where she became a pupil of the famous German 'cellist, Hugo Becker, and with him she studied until she was able to work for herself. At the age of 17 she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin, which is the most sought-after distinction a musical student can have.

This will be Miss Harrison's first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra. She will play Tschaikowsky's charming Variations on a Rococo Theme. The symphony will be Mozart's in C major, "Jupiter."

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date

Esta 384

The final Boston symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall, one on Thursday evening, March 18, and the other on Saturday afternoon, March 20. The feature of Thursday evening's programme will be the "Harold in Italy" symphony of Hector Berlioz. Mr. Emile Ferir will play the viola obbligato. The other numbers on the programme will be Frederick S. Converse's symphonic poem, "Ormazd," and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture.

A very interesting feature of the programme for Saturday afternoon will be Vincent d'Indy's Fantasia for oboe and orchestra. The solo part in this will, of course, be played by Mr. Georges Longy, first oboe of the orchestra. The symphony will be Schubert's in C major, and the other number will be Dvorak's [illegible] overture.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 3 191

Esta

SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES AUDIENCE

Anton Witek, Soloist, is Given Prolonged Applause.

PLAYS BRUCH'S CONCERTO

Programme for Orchestral Numbers Includes Sibelius's Symphony, No. 1, Wagner's "Siegfried" and Dvorak's Overture.—Soloist is Also Heard Several Times.

That Dr. Muck aims to give to Providence in much the same measure that which Boston hears at its symphony concerts, was clearly shown in last night's programme for the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall, on which Sibelius, Wagner and Dvorak were represented by the same compositions which have been lately heard in Boston, while the assisting artist was Anton Witek, the virtuoso of the orchestra, who has found such favor as soloist in Boston that his appearance in that capacity with the orchestra has come to be a regular event of each season.

The first Sibelius symphony is not new to Providence audiences, which, like those of Boston, have just heard it for the third time, following a performance in 1912 and an earlier one under Dr. Muck in his first period in this country.

The composer, giving no programme as a clue to its meaning, has left the symphony to speak for itself in its message to each listener. In no uncertain tones, the sombre, rugged music paints pictures for each one, mostly full of mystery, at times exceedingly beautiful, and again turbulent, clashing and filled with strange dissonances.

Finland is to most of us an unknown country, and the music of Sibelius may easily be any expression of his national feeling, and yet there is a strange Oriental quality in the third movement that vaguely suggests a feeling for the Japanese.

Be that as it may, the music, romantic, emotional, with many passages of great beauty and dignity, was played last evening in such brilliant fashion as to make a deep impression and to call forth from the audience lasting applause as the last passionate climax came to an end.

Following the symphony came the other numbers on the programme, in the following order:

Sibelius....Symphony No. 1, in E-minor, Op. 39
1. Andante ma non troppo; Allegro energico.
II. Andante, ma non troppo lento.
III. Allegro.
IV. Finale (Quasi una fantasia): Andante; Allegro molto.
Bruch..................................
Concerto for Violin, No. 1, G-minor, Op. 26
I. Vorspiel. Allegro moderato.
II. Adagio.
III. Finale: Allegro energico.
Wagner......................"A Siegfried Idyl
Dvorak..........Overture. "Carnival," Op. 92

While it was Mr. Witek's first appearance in this city as soloist with the orchestra, he is still vividly remembered by those who heard him five years ago, shortly after his arrival in this country, in a recital which he gave with Mme. Vita Witek, pianist, before The Listeners in Churchill House.

The beauty of his tone, the brilliancy of his technique and the artistic quality manifested on that occasion, placed him at once in the class with the virtuosi whose appearances in this country had made their names more familiar here.

Last evening he played Bruch's Concerto in G-minor with a mastery of his instrument that was soul-satisfying to a degree. Especially beautiful was the fluency of his tone in the first movement, although the variety of themes throughout were handled with such sureness as to call forth unbounded admiration.

What would have been three recalls, had not Mr. Witek modestly returned to the concert-master's desk, were given to him at the close of his performance, and he was forced to recognize the approval of the large audience by continued acknowledgment.

When the programme was ultimately resumed the orchestra gave a delightful presentation of the diverse numbers that completed the concert, the popular "Seigfried Idyl," which was given here less than two years ago, and the Bohemian "Carnival" of Dvorak, full of wild melody, with graceful interludes of a pastoral nature.

The contrast of these numbers completed the variety of a programme that seemed to please the vast majority; and one which added its individual note to the previous programme of the winter.

The sixth and last concert will be given on Tuesday evening, April 13, when Miss Florence Hinkle will be the soloist.

A. W. C.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 3 1915

Est 884

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT FINE

Boston Orchestra and Anton Witek, Violin Soloist, Rendered Delightfully Varied Programme.

Infantry Hall was well filled last night again for the fifth of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The enjoyment of these musical events, which are unsurpassed during the season in this city, has seemed to increase as the winter has advanced, and there was no mistaking the opinion of the audience last night that the programme rendered compared most favorably with those that have preceded it. There is always shown by Dr. Muck, the conductor, a subtle faculty of selecting numbers and arranging them in such an order as to give variety to the programmes and yet present a harmony of composers and their great work which makes every programme a gem and every selection a delight. That happy faculty was displayed once more last night, and the numbers were played by the orchestra and the soloist with that masterly control of instruments and that vivid expression of talent that never fail to mark the work of this organization and its members. There was hearty applause for every number and every evidence of appreciation by the audience was thoroughly deserved.

The programme was in the following order:

Sibelius ....
..Symphony No. 1, in E-minor, Op. 39
I. Andante ma non troppo; Algro energico.
II. Andante, ma non troppo lento.
III. Allegro.
IV. Finale (Quasi una fantasia): Andante; Allegro molto.
Bruch ....
Concerto for Violin, No. 1, G-minor, Op. 26.
I. Vorspiel. Allegro moderato.
II. Adagio.
III. Finale: Allegro energico.
Wagner.............."A Siegfried Idyl"
Dvorak....Overture, "Carnival," Op. 92

Anton Witek, the concert master, who has won fame wherever the orchestra has played, was selected for solo honors, and the honor was well merited by him, and he did not fail in any particular to measure up to the responsibility that was placed upon him to uphold the credit of the organization he represented. Mr. Witek has achieved the distinction of being regarded as one of the leading violinists in the world, and has held some important posts. His connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as concert master dates back now five years, and during that time he has become very widely known for his skill and ability as a master of the instrument he has chosen for the expression of his talent.

He has appeared each season as a soloist during the Boston season of the orchestra, but has never before played here in this capacity. His work last night was brilliant and fascinating. His single selection was Bruchu's concerto in G-minor, which was a very happy one and was played with beautiful harmony, remarkable mastery of technique and studied expression and yet with an ease and simplicity of manner and movement that gave it added charm. He gave his hearers some moments of intense delight and was rewarded with most hearty expressions of satisfaction and pleasure.

The orchestra was up to its highest standard of excellence last night, and nothing more need be said to any one who has heard this musical organization to indicate that its work was of the highest quality. The symphony was the first by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelus in E-minor. This is one of the most notable contributions to symphonic literature in recent years and is pronounced without contradiction the best of modern creations of this sort. The composer in his music shows strongly his nationality and his love of his country, and all through it is felt the breath of the race from which he sprang, strong, rugged but given to moods and inclined to melancholy. The score was played by the orchestra with careful precision and due attention to instrumentation and yet with a freedom and fulness of tone that impressed deeply and intensified the pleasure afforded.

The two other orchestral numbers that completed the programme were of quite a different character but highly enjoyable and gave a bright and joyous ending to the concert of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Dvorak's "Carnival" The one is exquisite in its beauty and delicacy and the other is brilliant in its tone and treatment. Both were rendered with almost perfect finish and left nothing to be desired.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date

Estab 84

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season in the Academy of Music Friday evening, March 19. It will present as soloist the young English 'cellist, Beatrice Harrison, who has had a remarkable career in her chosen art. Miss Harrison first came to America a year ago. She was preceded by reports which were so glowing that they roused a certain amount of scepticism. It required only one hearing to realize that Miss Harrison is a 'cellist of unusual quality, perhaps comparable only to Casals. Miss Harrison is an English girl in her early twenties. She was born in India, where her father, Col. Harrison of the Royal Engineers, is stationed. In common with her two sisters she early deevloped remarkable musical gifts and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello. As a child she went to the Royal College of Music in London, where when she was ten years old she received the gold medal which is in the senior competition and never before had been given to one so young. From there she went to Frankfort, where she became a pupil of the famous German 'cellist, Hugo Becker, and with him she studied until she was able to work for herself. At the age of seventeen she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin, which is the most sought after distinction a musical student can have. This will be Miss Harrison's first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra. Miss Harrison will play Tschaikowsky's charming variations on a rococo theme. The symphony will be Mozart's in C major, "Jupiter."

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date FEB 2

Establi

THE fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening will be principal musical event of the week come, and those who heard Anton Wit in the recital which he gave with Mn Witek before The Listeners in Church House shortly after his arrival in th country will await with interest his a pearance here as soloist with the orche tra of which he is concert master.

A concert of considerable local interes will be that of the Place Mandolin Strin Quartet to-morrow evening in Churchil House, which will be notable for the continuance of the efforts made by that organization to prove the adaptability of plectral instruments to serious chamber music.

Numerous recitals of various sorts, including the usual number of Lenten organ recitals, will complete the offerings of the week.

* * *

Anton Witek, who has held the position of concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since the fall of 1910, and will be its soloist at the fifth concert in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, has appeared as soloist with the orchestra at its concerts in Boston each season since he came to America.

He was born in Saaz, Bohemia, on Jan. 7, 1872, studied the violin under Benewitz at Prague and in 1894, at the age of 22, was appointed concert master and first soloist by the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin. This is the most important post for violinists in Germany, and Mr. Witek's appointment marked him at once as one of the world's great violinists.

He early commanded attention in Germany (in 1895) by the performance in one evening of three violin concertos, those by Beethoven, Brahms and Paganini. During his engagement with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, which ended on Sept. 1, 1910, he toured Europe as a virtuoso, and with his wife, Vita Witek, and Josef Malkin, who is now one of the first 'cellists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, formed the Berlin Trio, which played an important part in the musical life of Berlin. In 1907 Mr. Witek played in Berlin the newly discovered violin concerto in A-major by Mozart for the first time, and in 1909 in the same city the newly discovered concerto in C-major l Haydn, also for the first time.

The symphony on Tuesday evening w be the First, in E-minor, by Jan Sibeliu the Finnish composer, which is one the most notable contributions to syr phonic literature in the last quarter of century. Sibelius, who was in this cou try last spring as a guest of the Norfo Festival in Connecticut, is one of t few original talents now writing mus He is nothing if not nationalistic, but h music is not dependent, like that Grieg, for example, on the folk music his country. Rather does it reflect moods and temperament of the race which he is one.

The full programme is as follow Sibelius, Symphony in E-minor, No. Bruch, Concerto for violin and orchest in G-minor, No. 1; Wagner, "A Siegfried Idyl;" Dvorak, overture, "Carnaval."

* * *

Choral Society of 60

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date

Establ 384

The final Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall, one on Thursday evening, March 18, and the other on Saturday afternoon, March 20. The feature of Thursday evening's programme will be the "Harold in Italy" Symphony of Hector Berlioz. Emile Ferir will play the viola obligato. The other numbers on the programme will be Frederick S. Converse's Symphonic Poem "Ormazd," and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture.

A very interesting feature of the programme for Saturday afternoon will be Vincent d' Indy's Fantasia for oboe and orchestra. The solo part in this will be played by Georges Longy, first oboe of the orchestra. The Symphony will be Schubert's in C major and the other number will be Dvorak's "Carneval" overture.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

Estab 84

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 19, when it will present as soloist the young English 'cellist, Beatrice Harrison, who first came to America a year ago. She was preceded by such glowing reports that they tended to rouse a certain amount of skepticism. It required, however, only one hearing to realize that she is a 'cellist of unusual quality, perhaps comparable only to Casals. She was born in India, where her father, Colonel Harrison of the Royal Engineers, was stationed. In common with her two sisters she early developed remarkable musical gifts and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello. She went to the Royal College of Music in London, where, when she was 10 years old, she won the gold medal in the senior competition; never before had it been given to one so young. In Frankfort, where she was a pupil of the famous German 'cellist, Hugo Becker, she studied until she was able to work for herself. At the age of seventeen she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin, which is a distinction most sought by musical students. This will be her first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra and she will play Tschaikowsky's charming "Variations on a Rococo Theme." The symphony will be Mozart's in C major; the "Jupiter."

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

Esta 884

MISS HARRISON TO APPEAR

With Boston Symphony Orchestra's Last Concert of the Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season in the Academy of Music Friday evening, March 19. It will present as soloist the young English 'cellist, Beatrice Harrison. Miss Harrison first came to America a year ago. She was preceded by reports which were so glowing that they tended to rouse a certain amount of skepticism. It required, however, only one hearing to realize that Miss Harrison was a 'cellist of most unusual quality, perhaps comparable only to Casals himself.

Miss Harrison is an English girl in her early 20's. She was born in India, where her father, Colonel Harrison, of the Royal Engineers, was stationed. In common with her two sisters, she early developed remarkable musical gifts and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello. As a child she went to the Royal College of Music in London, where, when she was 10 years old, she received the gold medal which is in the senior competition and which never before had been given to one so young. From there she went to Frankfort, where she became a pupil of the famous German 'cellist, Hugo Becker, and with him she studied until she was able to work for herself. At the age of 17 she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin, which is the most sought-after distinction a musical student can have.

This will be Miss Harrison's first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra. She will play Tschaikowsky's charming Variations on a Rococo Theme. The symphony will be Mozart's in C major, "Jupiter."

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date

Esta 384

The final Boston symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall, one on Thursday evening, March 18, and the other on Saturday afternoon, March 20. The feature of Thursday evening's programme will be the "Harold in Italy" symphony of Hector Berlioz. Mr. Emile Ferir will play the viola obbligato. The other numbers on the programme will be Frederick S. Converse's symphonic poem, "Ormazd," and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture.

A very interesting feature of the programme for Saturday afternoon will be Vincent d'Indy's Fantasia for oboe and orchestra. The solo part in this will, of course, be played by Mr. Georges Longy, first oboe of the orchestra. The symphony will be Schubert's in C major, and the other number will be Dvorak's "Carnival" overture.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date MAR

Esta

SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES AUDIENCE

Anton Witek, Soloist, is Given Prolonged Applause.

PLAYS BRUCH'S CONCERTO

Programme for Orchestral Numbers Includes Sibelius's Symphony, No. 1, Wagner's "Siegfried" and Dvorak's Overture.—Soloist is Also Heard Several Times.

That Dr. Muck aims to give to Providence in much the same measure that which Boston hears at its symphony concerts, was clearly shown in last night's programme for the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall, on which Sibelius, Wagner and Dvorak were represented by the same compositions which have been lately heard in Boston, while the assisting artist was Anton Witek, the virtuoso of the orchestra, who has found such favor as soloist in Boston that his appearance in that capacity with the orchestra has come to be a regular event of each season.

The first Sibelius symphony is not new to Providence audiences, which, like those of Boston, have just heard it for the third time, following a performance in 1912 and an earlier one under Dr. Muck in his first period in this country.

The composer, giving no programme as a clue to its meaning, has left the symphony to speak for itself in its message to each listener. In no uncertain tones, the sombre, rugged music paints pictures for each one, mostly full of mystery, at times exceedingly beautiful, and again turbulent, clashing and filled with strange dissonances.

Finland is to most of us an unknown country, and the music of Sibelius may easily be any expression of his national feeling, and yet there is a strange Oriental quality in the third movement that vaguely suggests a feeling for the Japanese.

Be that as it may, the music, romantic, emotional, with many passages of great beauty and dignity, was played last evening in such brilliant fashion as to make a deep impression and to call forth from the audience lasting applause as the last passionate climax came to an end.

Following the symphony came the other numbers on the programme, in the following order:

Sibelius....Symphony No. 1, in E-minor, Op. 39
1. Andante ma non troppo; Allegro energico.
II. Andante, ma non troppo lento.
III. Allegro.
IV. Finale (Quasi una fantasia): Andante; Allegro molto.
Bruch..
Concerto for Violin, No. 1, G-minor, Op. 26
I. Vorspiel. Allegro moderato.
II. Adagio.
III. Finale: Allegro energico.
Wagner........................"A Siegfried Idyl
Dvorak...........Overture, "Carnival," Op. 92

While it was Mr. Witek's first appearance in this city as soloist with the orchestra, he is still vividly remembered by those who heard him five years ago, shortly after his arrival in this country, in a recital which he gave with Mme. Vita Witek, pianist, before The Listeners in Churchill House.

The beauty of his tone, the brilliancy of his technique and the artistic quality manifested on that occasion, placed him at once in the class with the virtuosi whose appearances in this country had made their names more familiar here.

Last evening he played Bruch's Concerto in G-minor with a mastery of his instrument that was soul-satisfying to a degree. Especially beautiful was the fluency of his tone in the first movement, although the variety of themes throughout were handled with such sureness as to call forth unbounded admiration.

What would have been three recalls, had not Mr. Witek modestly returned to the concert-master's desk, were given to him at the close of his performance, and he was forced to recognize the approval of the large audience by continued acknowledgment.

When the programme was ultimately resumed the orchestra gave a delightful presentation of the diverse numbers that completed the concert, the popular "Seigfried Idyl," which was given here less than two years ago, and the Bohemian "Carnival" of Dvorak, full of wild melody, with graceful interludes of a pastoral nature.

The contrast of these numbers completed the variety of a programme that seemed to please the vast majority; and one which added its individual note to the previous programme of the winter.

The sixth and last concert will be given on Tuesday evening, April 13, when Miss Florence Hinkle will be the soloist.

A. W. C.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date AR 3 1915
Est 884

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT FINE

Boston Orchestra and Anton Witek, Violin Soloist, Rendered Delightfully Varied Programme.

Infantry Hall was well filled last night again for the fifth of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The enjoyment of these musical events, which are unsurpassed during the season in this city, has seemed to increase as the winter has advanced, and there was no mistaking the opinion of the audience last night that the programme rendered compared most favorably with those that have preceded it. There is always shown by Dr. Muck, the conductor, a subtle faculty of selecting numbers and arranging them in such an order as to give variety to the programmes and yet present a harmony of composers and their great work which makes every programme a gem and every selection a delight. That happy faculty was displayed once more last night, and the numbers were played by the orchestra and the soloist with that masterly control of instruments and that vivid expression of talent that never fail to mark the work of this organization and its members. There was hearty applause for every number and every evidence of appreciation by the audience was thoroughly deserved.

The programme was in the following order:

Sibelius ....
Symphony No. 1, in E-minor, Op. 39
I. Andante ma non troppo; Algro energico.
II. Andante, ma non troppo lento.
III. Allegro.
IV. Finale (Quasi una fantasia): Andante; Allegro molto.
Bruch ....
Concerto for Violin, No. 1, G-minor, Op. 26.
I. Vorspiel. Allegro moderato.
II. Adagio.
III. Finale: Allegro energico.
Wagner.............."A Siegfried Idyl"
Dvorak....Overture, "Carnival," Op. 92

Anton Witek, the concert master, who has won fame wherever the orchestra has played, was selected for solo honors, and the honor was well merited by him, and he did not fail in any particular to measure up to the responsibility that was placed upon him to uphold the credit of the organization he represented. Mr. Witek has achieved the distinction of being regarded as one of the leading violinists in the world, and has held some important posts. His connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as concert master dates back now five years, and during that time he has become very widely known for his skill and ability as a master of the instrument he has chosen for the expression of his talent.

He has appeared each season as a soloist during the Boston season of the orchestra, but has never before played here in this capacity. His work last night was brilliant and fascinating. His single selection was Bruchu's concerto, in G-minor, which was a very happy one and was played with beautiful harmony, remarkable mastery of technique and studied expression and yet with an ease and simplicity of manner and movement that gave it added charm. He gave his hearers some moments of intense delight and was rewarded with most hearty expressions of satisfaction and pleasure.

The orchestra was up to its highest standard of excellence last night, and nothing more need be said to any one who has heard this musical organization to indicate that its work was of the highest quality. The symphony was the first by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelus in E-minor. This is one of the most notable contributions to symphonic literature in recent years and is pronounced without contradiction the best of modern creations of this sort. The composer in his music shows strongly his nationality and his love of his country, and all through it is felt the breath of the race from which he sprang, strong, rugged but given to moods and inclined to melancholy. The score was played by the orchestra with careful precision and due attention to instrumentation and yet with a freedom and fullness of tone that impressed deeply and intensified the pleasure afforded.

The two other orchestral numbers that completed the programme were of quite a different character but highly enjoyable and gave a bright and joyous ending to the concert of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Dvorak's "Carnival" The one is exquisite in its beauty and delicacy and the other is brilliant in its tone and treatment. Both were rendered with almost perfect finish and left nothing to be desired.

Brooklyn Ed.
From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date 7 1915
Estab 84

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season in the Academy of Music Friday evening, March 19. It will present as soloist the young English 'cellist, Beatrice Harrison, who has had a remarkable career in her chosen art. Miss Harrison first came to America a year ago. She was preceded by reports which were so glowing that they roused a certain amount of scepticism. It required only one hearing to realize that Miss Harrison is a 'cellist of unusual quality, perhaps comparable only to Casals. Miss Harrison is an English girl in her early twenties. She was born in India, where her father, Col. Harrison of the Royal Engineers, is stationed. In common with her two sisters she early deevloped remarkable musical gifts and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello. As a child she went to the Royal College of Music in London, where when she was ten years old she received the gold medal which is in the senior competition and never before had been given to one so young. From there she went to Frankfort, where she became a pupil of the famous German 'cellist, Hugo Becker, and with him she studied until she was able to work for herself. At the age of seventeen she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin, which is the most sought after distinction a musical student can have. This will be Miss Harrison's first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra. Miss Harrison will play Tschaikowsky's charming variations on a rococo theme. The symphony will be Mozart's in C major, "Jupiter."

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date FEB 28 191
Establi

THE fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening will be the principal musical event of the week to come, and those who heard Anton Witek in the recital which he gave with Mme. Witek before The Listeners in Churchill House shortly after his arrival in this country will await with interest his appearance here as soloist with the orchestra of which he is concert master.

A concert of considerable local interest will be that of the Place Mandolin String Quartet to-morrow evening in Churchill House, which will be notable for the continuance of the efforts made by that organization to prove the adaptability of plectral instruments to serious chamber music.

Numerous recitals of various sorts, including the usual number of Lenten organ recitals, will complete the offerings of the week.

* * *

Anton Witek, who has held the position of concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since the fall of 1910, and will be its soloist at the fifth concert in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, has appeared as soloist with the orchestra at its concerts in Boston each season since he came to America.

He was born in Saaz, Bohemia, on Jan. 7, 1872, studied the violin under Bennewitz at Prague and in 1894, at the age of 22, was appointed concert master and first soloist by the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin. This is the most important post for violinists in Germany, and Mr. Witek's appointment marked him at once as one of the world's great violinists.

He early commanded attention in Germany (in 1895) by the performance in one evening of three violin concertos, those by Beethoven, Brahms and Paganini. During his engagement with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, which ended on Sept. 1, 1910, he toured Europe as a virtuoso, and with his wife, Vita Witek, and Josef Malkin, who is now one of the first 'cellists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, formed the Berlin Trio, which played an important part in the musical life of Berlin. In 1907 Mr. Witek played in Berlin the newly discovered violin concerto in A-major by Mozart for the first time, and in 1909 in the same city the newly discovered concerto in C-major by Haydn, also for the first time.

The symphony on Tuesday evening will be the First, in E-minor, by Jan Sibelius, the Finnish composer, which is one of the most notable contributions to symphonic literature in the last quarter of a century. Sibelius, who was in this country last spring as a guest of the Norfolk Festival in Connecticut, is one of the few original talents now writing music. He is nothing if not nationalistic, but his music is not dependent, like that of Grieg, for example, on the folk music of his country. Rather does it reflect the moods and temperament of the race of which he is one.

The full programme is as follows: Sibelius, Symphony in E-minor, No. 1; Bruch, Concerto for violin and orchestra in G-minor, No. 1; Wagner, "A Siegfried Idyl;" Dvorak, overture, "Carnaval."

* * *

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date MAR 7 15
Establ 384

The final Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall, one on Thursday evening, March 18, and the other on Saturday afternoon, March 20. The feature of Thursday evening's programme will be the "Harold in Italy" Symphony of Hector Berlioz. Emile Ferir will play the viola obligato. The other numbers on the programme will be Frederick S. Converse's Symphonic Poem "Ormazd," and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture.

A very interesting feature of the programme for Saturday afternoon will be Vincent d' Indy's Fantasia for oboe and orchestra. The solo part in this will be played by Georges Longy, first oboe of the orchestra. The Symphony will be Schubert's in C major and the other number will be Dvorak's "Carneval" overture.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 7
Esta 84

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 19, when it will present as soloist the young English 'cellist, Beatrice Harrison, who first came to America a year ago. She was preceded by such glowing reports that they tended to rouse a certain amount of skepticism. It required, however, only one hearing to realize that she is a 'cellist of unusual quality, perhaps comparable only to Casals. She was born in India, where her father, Colonel Harrison of the Royal Engineers, was stationed. In common with her two sisters she early developed remarkable musical gifts and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello. She went to the Royal College of Music in London, where, when she was 10 years old, she won the gold medal in the senior competition; never before had it been given to one so young. In Frankfort, where she was a pupil of the famous German 'cellist, Hugo Becker, she studied until she was able to work for herself. At the age of seventeen she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin, which is a distinction most sought by musical students. This will be her first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra and she will play Tschaikowsky's charming "Variations on a Rococo Theme." The symphony will be Mozart's in C major, the "Jupiter."

ZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.
AR 7 1915
884

HARRISON TO APPEAR

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Last Concert of the Season.

he Boston Symphony Orchestra will its last concert of the season in Academy of Music Friday evening, rch 19. It will present as soloist the ung English 'cellist, Beatrice Harrison. Miss Harrison first came to America a year ago. She was preceded by reports which were so glowing that they tended to rouse a certain amount of skepticism. It required, however, only one hearing to realize that Miss Harrison was a 'cellist of most unusual quality, perhaps comparable only to Casals himself.

Miss Harrison is an English girl in her early 20's. She was born in India, where her father, Colonel Harrison, of the Royal Engineers, was stationed. In common with her two sisters, she early developed remarkable musical gifts and seemed to take naturally to the violoncello. As a child she went to the Royal College of Music in London, where, when she was 10 years old, she received the gold medal which is in the senior competition and which never before had been given to one so young. From there she went to Frankfort, where she became a pupil of the famous German 'cellist, Hugo Becker, and with him she studied until she was able to work for herself. At the age of 17 she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin, which is the most sought-after distinction a musical student can have.

This will be Miss Harrison's first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra. She will play Tschaikowsky's charming Variations on a Rococo Theme. The symphony will be Mozart's in C major, "Jupiter."

---

rom MORNING TELEGRAPH
ddress: New York City
Date
Esta 384

The final Boston symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall, one on Thursday evening, March 18, and the other on Saturday afternoon, March 20. The feature of Thursday evening's programme will be the "Harold in Italy" symphony of Hector Berlioz. Mr. Emile Ferir will play the viola obbligato. The other numbers on the programme will be Frederick S. Converse's symphonic poem, "Ormazd," and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture.

A very interesting feature of the programme for Saturday afternoon will be Vincent d'Indy's Fantasia for oboe and orchestra. The solo part in this will, of course, be played by Mr. Georges Longy, first oboe of the orchestra. The symphony will be Schubert's in C major, and the other number will be Dvorak's "Carnival" overture.

OURNAL
Providence, R. I. ate MAR 3 1915
Esta

SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES AUDIENCE

Anton Witek, Soloist, is Given Prolonged Applause.

[121]

PLAYS BRUCH'S CONCERTO

Programme for Orchestral Numbers Includes Sibelius's Symphony, No. 1, Wagner's "Siegfried" and Dvorak's Overture.—Soloist is Also Heard Several Times.

That Dr. Muck aims to give to Providence in much the same measure that which Boston hears at its symphony concerts, was clearly shown in last night's programme for the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall, on which Sibelius, Wagner and Dvorak were represented by the same compositions which have been lately heard in Boston, while the assisting artist was Anton Witek, the virtuoso of the orchestra, who has found such favor as soloist in Boston that his appearance in that capacity with the orchestra has come to be a regular event of each season.

The first Sibelius symphony is not new to Providence audiences, which, like those of Boston, have just heard it for the third time, following a performance in 1912 and an earlier one under Dr. Muck in his first period in this country.

The composer, giving no programme as a clue to its meaning, has left the symphony to speak for itself in its message to each listener. In no uncertain tones, the sombre, rugged music paints pictures for each one, mostly full of mystery, at times exceedingly beautiful, and again turbulent, clashing and filled with strange dissonances.

Finland is to most of us an unknown country, and the music of Sibelius may easily be any expression of his national feeling, and yet there is a strange Oriental quality in the third movement that vaguely suggests a feeling for the Japanese.

Be that as it may, the music, romantic, emotional, with many passages of great beauty and dignity, was played last evening in such brilliant fashion as to make a deep impression and to call forth from the audience lasting applause as the last passionate climax came to an end.

Following the symphony came the other numbers on the programme, in the following order:

Sibelius....Symphony No. 1, in E-minor, Op. 39
I. Andante ma non troppo; Allegro energico.
II. Andante, ma non troppo lento.
III. Allegro.
IV. Finale (Quasi una fantasia): Andante; Allegro molto.
Bruch..................................
Concerto for Violin, No. 1, G-minor, Op. 26
I. Vorspiel. Allegro moderato.
II. Adagio.
III. Finale: Allegro energico.
Wagner......................"A Siegfried Idyl
Dvorak............Overture, "Carnival," Op. 92

While it was Mr. Witek's first appearance in this city as soloist with the orchestra, he is still vividly remembered by those who heard him five years ago, shortly after his arrival in this country, in a recital which he gave with Mme. Vita Witek, pianist, before The Listeners in Churchill House.

The beauty of his tone, the brilliancy of his technique and the artistic quality manifested on that occasion, placed him at once in the class with the virtuosi whose appearances in this country had made their names more familiar here.

Last evening he played Bruch's Concerto in G-minor with a mastery of his instrument that was soul-satisfying to a degree. Especially beautiful was the fluency of his tone in the first movement, although the variety of themes throughout were handled with such sureness as to call forth unbounded admiration.

What would have been three recalls, had not Mr. Witek modestly returned to the concert-master's desk, were given to him at the close of his performance, and he was forced to recognize the approval of the large audience by continued acknowledgment.

When the programme was ultimately resumed the orchestra gave a delightful presentation of the diverse numbers that completed the concert, the popular "Seigfried Idyl," which was given here less than two years ago, and the Bohemian "Carnival" of Dvorak, full of wild melody, with graceful interludes of a pastoral nature.

The contrast of these numbers completed the variety of a programme that seemed to please the vast majority; and one which added its individual note to the previous programme of the winter.

The sixth and last concert will be given on Tuesday evening, April 13, when Miss Florence Hinkle will be the soloist.

A. W. C.

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date MAR 4 - 1915

k, 1884

Gustav Strube, who occupies the chair of harmony and composition at the Peabody Conservatory of Music, received a triumph as a composer in Boston last Friday, when his "Variations on an Original Theme" was given its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck conducting. That it made a deep impression can best be judged by the musical reviewer, who were lavish in their praise of Mr. Strube as a comosper. Incidentally, the triumph brought Baltimore again forward as a musical centre, for Mr. Strube now boasts of Baltimore as his headquarters. Indeed, musical Baltimore is very much in the public eye at present. Next week Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory, will be the soloist with the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia on Friday and Saturday, and the following week Edward M. Morris, the talented young Peabody graduate, will play with the same orchestra at the University of Pennsylvania. A few weeks ago Mr. Morris played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge, Mass.

Speaking of the performance of Mr. Strube's composition, Philip Hale, the veteran critic, writing in the Boston Herald, said: "The theme is in itself beautiful and it is beautifully exposed. The exposition of the first two variations and the double variations with the theme, first for horn, then for oboe, are the crowning features of this composition. Mr. Strube is known as a cunning master of instrumentation. His scoring is sometimes super-refined, and in his interest to gain unusual and original effects he forgets or disdains weightier matters. His variations are on the whole interesting." Olin Downes, writing for the Boston Post, commented on Mr. Strube's Variations as follows: "There was interest in the work of Mr. Strube, for many years a member of the orchestra, a composer of high accomplishments, and now head of the department of theory and composition at the Peabody Conservatory. Mr. Strube, some of his friends may insist, has gone a step backward instead of forward in his musical development in this latest composition, because he has forsaken, temporarily, the symphonic poem, and ultra-impressionistic methods, and written in the traditional variation form. But with these people we do not agree. The theme which Mr. Strube has set down as his text is for us the most conventional page of the composition. This was probably deliberate on the part of the composer. It is a broad theme, chorale-like in its simple harmonies and its melodic line. But the theme is treated with a wealth of technical resource and striking effects of color which were always characteristic of Mr. Strube's writing, but which have been especially cultivated of late years by his sympathy with recent French composition. The fact that this piece has line as well as color is not to its disadvantage. In a well-worn medium Mr. Strube keeps the interest of the hearer from the beginning to the end. The variations are free, but not so free that all trace of the original theme is lost. Most of them are in a poetical vein. One or two are brilliant and dramatic."

The Boston Globe says: "Gustav Strube, now instructing musical youth in Baltimore, sometime conductor, violinist, teacher in this city, is an indefatigable musician. His compositions played at the Symphony concerts have denoted a steady assimilation, not that they have lacked originality, rather that they have shown the absorption of more than one idiom. Mr. Strube has not closed his ears to modern harmonic combinations. Yesterday afternoon the 'Variations on an Original Theme,' played by Dr. Muck for the first time anywhere, showed Mr. Strube more than a clever and skillful stylist." The Boston Traveler says: "The appearance of a composition by Gustav Strube on a symphony program always awakens interest, particulary so when the composition is given for the first time by the orchestra, as was the case yesterday afternoon with the 'Variation on an Original Theme.' It is in the composer's best vein, clear and interesting throughout and written by one who speaks with authority. Fortunate indeed is the composer who can have his compositions interpreted by such an orchestra."

An exhibition of original etchings by Albany E. Howarth is now being shown at the Purnell Galleries in Charles street, where it will remain on view through March 20. This will be followed by a special exhibition of unusual prints, in color, by Whitcomb.

J. O. L.

BOSTON POST,

MARCH 8,

CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Symphony Hall was unable to seat the audience that assembled yesterday afternoon for the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck, director, in aid of its pension fund. The fact that this is one of the few occasions in the year when every seat in Symphony Hall is for sale to the public for a Boston Symphony concert is becoming more and more appreciated. Until last year it was the custom to give the pension fund concerts on Sunday evenings. The change from evening to afternoon has proven advantageous, for many who live out of town and who would gladly come in the afternoon to hear the orchestra find it inconvenient to come in for the same concert in the evening. Given the opportunity and a programme calculated to make a wide general appeal, the reputation of the orchestra is more than sufficient to insure the audiences at these concerts.

Tschaikowsky's Symphonic Pathetique and music by Wagner from "Die Meistersinger," "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdamerung," with the overture to Tannhauser made the programme. With all of this music the orchestra is thoroughly acquainted. It is pre-eminently music which makes the modern orchestra sound in all its glory. It is also music of great emotional power, whether it be the impulsive and very Russian emotion of Tschaikowsky, or the splendid epic passion of Wagner. All of the music was played with the utmost brilliancy and tonal splendor. Tschaikowsky, in one of the most tragic works of the orchestral repertoire, and Wagner, long since a popular idol with masses as well as music lovers, found the warmest of welcomes, Dr. Muck led with his accustomed authority and skill, and was very enthusiastically applauded.

BOSTON GLOBE

MARCH 8.

PENSION CONCERT.

Symphony Hall Filled to Capacity.

The spell of Wagner continued effective at the concert for the aid of the Symphony Pension Fund yesterday afternoon. Owing to Dr Muck's keen sense of the inevitable incongruities of the music dramas relegated piecemeal to the concert hall, these concerts for the pension fund are practically the only occasion to hear the orchestra play Wagner. The audience proved the wisdom of the policy. Every seat was taken and many stood in the aisles.

While Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" symphony vies with Wagner in popularity, none can doubt it has been played too much in former years. Its sordid lamentations and the saccharine second movement do not wear well. Dr Muck chooses not to accentuate the barbaric fury in the third. There is a frenzy of elemental passion in these pages which might be interpreted in a more fiery and a more pompous manner, but the reading throughout was one to subdue and temper rather than to excite hysteria.

The selections from Wagner were from the third act of "The Mastersingers," and an arrangement by Hans Richter of excerpts from "Siegfried" and "Dusk of the Gods"; in the first, Siegfried's passage to Bruennhilde's rock, and the second, Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine Journey. For these Dr Muck is to be thanked.

The eminent conductor displayed a spirit which he has not always permitted himself of late. There was the true manner of epic grandeur in the second number, passages that sounded with incomparable euphony of tonal quality and with majesty of utterance. In the Mastersingers music there was eloquent discrimination between the spirit of magnanimity, of breadth of understanding, of the poet's appreciation, in the pages delineative of Sachs, and the gayety of the apprentices and the festivities of the tournament of song. The overture to "Tannhaeuser" completed the program.

The announcements of future Sunday afternoon concerts of this series are as follows: Next Sunday, Elena Gerhardt, soprano, and Beatrice Harrison, cellist; March 21, Julia Culp and Percy Grainger; March 28, Mme Matzenauer and Mr Gabrilowitsch.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

MARCH 8, 1915

WAGNER IN GLIMPSES

DR. MUCK OPERATIC CONDUCTOR AGAIN

Fragments of "Die Meistersinger," "Siegfried" and "Goetterdamerung" in Thrillingly Eloquent Performance — Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony" in the Normal Voice of an Abnormal Music—Dr. Muck and Our Present Operatic and Wagnerian Plight

THROUGH two numbers of the concert at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for the profit of the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra and before an audience the numbers and the eagerness of which must have rejoiced the hearts of the band, Dr. Muck was again an operatic conductor and an operatic conductor in Wagner's music-dramas. One Berliner, wise in the ways of the leaders of the Royal Opera, will say that Dr. Muck is incomparable in "Carmen"; another is sure that he deserves that distinction in "Der Rosenkavalier"; a third who has visited Baireuth as well, avers that it is in "Parsifal" that his abilities and imagination most shine; a fourth, unless he includes nearly all of Wagner's music-dramas in his sayings, pitches upon "Die Meistersinger" as the opera in which the conductor is preëminent; while in little Salzburg they are as confident that there is none to match him in the operas of Mozart.

Here in Boston, where Dr. Muck has tarried and will tarry longer than in any other city, except Berlin, in which he has dwelt, we know him not at all as yet as an operatic conductor in the theatre itself. Instead, we sample him as such—so to say—when he leads in an operatic overture at the Symphony Concerts and at the end the imaginative somehow expect to see an invisible curtain rise over the stage of Symphony Hall and show it magically transformed into the first scene of the "Tristan" or the "Emyanthe," to which they have just heard such magnificent preluding. Or else at one of the concerts of the Pension Fund we hear Dr. Muck in coördinated or dissevered fragments of "Die Meistersinger" or the "Ring" operas and hope beats high that sooner or later, under one or another auspices, and with an orchestra, singers and a "general representation" worthy of him, he will conduct in opera in Boston. Somehow the chaos into which operatic affairs in this town have fallen encourages such happy, if futile, anticipation. For there is not, and there never has been in the United States an operatic conductor so eloquent with the music of Wagner, when he has such a band as the Symphony Orchestra to play it, as Dr. Muck once more proved himself yesterday and in mere fragments. Not even the Toscanini of "Tristan" excels him.

For yet another and as irritating an anomaly, the fragments of "Die Meistersinger," "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung" played yesterday, plus the overtures and the preludes to Wagner's operas and music-dramas played last November at the other Pension-Fund concert with the total glorification of the dead Siegfried actually sum all the music of Wagner that we in Boston have heard through the normal course of a whole season of music. In Boston alone, of the musical capitals, so-called, of the world, "Rheingold" and "Siegfried" and Götterdämmerung" are still unfamiliar operas; "Die Walkure" and "Die Meistersinger" are in not much better case; "Tristan," "Lohengrin" and "Parsifal" we know; but of late "Tannhäuser" has well nigh vanished from our stage. Only late in its existence did the Boston Opera Company discover the music-dramas of Wagner and give us "Tristan" and 'Die Meistersinger." The Metropolitan company, in the days of its fitful visits, was sparing of Wagner's pieces, partly because they happened to display neither Mr. Caruso nor Miss Farrar, and partly because our public was assumed to be indifferent to them. But if it is indifferent, why does it fill Symphony Hall merely to hear overtures, preludes and detached fragments in mere concert performance? By every token that audiences can give, the public of Boston would go to hear Wagner's operas, given such a performance of them on the stage as excerpts from them receive in concerts. Such performances are not impossible and they would be not only possible, but probable under Dr. Muck himself.

The recital of these conditions and regret over them are indeed an old story; but repetition only emphasizes the fact that Boston is the one city of musical pretension the world over—and not even London aside—that in normal times does not hear Wagner's operas in plenty in the theatre for which they are designed. It is more than a reproach to the reputation of the city as a musical capital that it does not so hear them; it is a deprivation, year after year, of the pleasures of six or eight master-pieces of music-drama. An English-speaking stage without its frequent or occasional Shakspeare is non-existent and almost unthinkable. Here in Boston we have accomplished the abnormal feat of an opera house that until the last years of its existence was almost Wagnerless and of a city that professes to be a musical capital in the twentieth century and knows not his music-dramas in familiar repetition. However much such conditions may minister to a perverse pride, it is not good to be "singular" or "superior" in this queer fashion. Strauss we know; Debussy we know; d'Indy we know and so forth through a long list of modern and ultra-modern composers; but Wagner, by universal consent the greatest genius that has yet set his hand to the music of the theatre, we virtually know not. By some fortunate turn of the fates of music, Dr. Muck ought to be the discoverer of him to us. The anomalies of our ignorance of Wagner and of Dr. Muck as a operatic conductor, seem too strange to endure indefinitely.

Imagine hearing the introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" played in its place in the opera—where it concentrates for the instant the romantic mood and the homely atmosphere of all that has gone before and all that is to come after—imagine hearing it there in such mingling of tonal beauty and of poetic significance as Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave it yesterday, in such richness of harmonic and instrumental color and in such glory of expressive melody and phrase. Imagine the dance of the youth played in the actual fete on the stage with such lightness of rhythm so sensitively varied and with such variety of bright and changeful tonal color. Imagine the effect in the theatre of such climaceric sonorities, such thrilling suspense and such large and deep expansion, as out of the opened hearts of the singing multitude that Dr. Muck brought to the choral extolling of Sachs. From "Die Meistersinger" under Richter to "Die Meistersinger" under Toscanini, it is hard to recall such eloquence as that of yesterday. Or see in fancy young Siegfried scaling the rocks and piercing the mists through the darting fires on his way to the sleeping Brünnhilde and so summon the stage while the orchestra sings as it did yesterday with his undaunted progress or crackles and gleams with the parted fires.

In a mere paragraph, as it were, Richter's arrangement for the concert hall sings the heroic ecstasies of Siegfried and Brünnhilde but in that paragraph quivering intensity of radiant tone might hardly go further than it did yesterday. Then the music deepened and broadened into Siegfried's descent of the Rhine to Gunther's house and all the daughters of the river sang golden-mouthed. Through all this music the mind marvelled at the conductor's play with the interwoven motives—each exposed, each vitalized and each characterized; while the ear rejoiced in the sensuous beauty and color of the tone; and the heart stirred to the passionate mood and the dramatic movement of the whole. Again in the overture to "Tannhäuser," fortunate the tenor who can sing the knight's song to the glory of Venus, with such beauty of tone, such expressiveness of phrase, such musical and histrionic ardor of feeling as those that Mr. Sand drew yesterday from his clarinet. He was, indeed, the actor in the opera that each player in a Wagnerian orchestra should be. Remarkable clarinetist that he is, he has not before given such proof of his quality. Such singing of the song was true supplement to the biting rhythms and the sharp-set phrases with which Dr. Muck keeps the sensual sting of the Venusberg or to his noble sonorities with the conquering hymn of the pilgrims. Since Mr. Toscanini conducted for the first time here in "Tristan" and Dr. Muck led for the first time in the assembled overtures and preludes, this town has heard no such thrilling Wagner as stirred the audience of yesterday.

From RECORD

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony," which began the concert, holds its own and in spite of many more repetitions, far better than did the overture-fantasia to "Romeo and Juliet" of the preceding Symphony Concerts. It held its own the better yesterday because Dr. Muck was content with the normal voice, so to say, of an abnormal music. Time was—and perhaps still continues—when every conductor that essayed the symphony, believed he must be "different" and "individual" with the music. He wreaked himself upon the march until it became a wild tonal phantasmagoria of broken rhythms, suspended progressions and hectic outbursts. Or he tried to make the syncopated second movement more hollow and fantasmal than it naturally sounds. Or he prolonged and intensified the voluptuous melody of the first movement until some called it "obscene"; or he writhed and clamored through the tumultuous passages around it as though they were not the wild stirrings of a perturbed and moody soul, but the frenzies of a revel of fiends. Now, the "Pathetic Symphony" is a very transparent and personal music. There is not a melody, a rhythm, a progression, a stroke of harmonic and instrumental color in it that is not as clear as the day. It is cherished and understanded of the people because it is so transparent.

The music seems hardly less clear of mood and passion—the familiar Tschaikowsky of the symphonies, sensitive, morbid and rejoicing prey to the emotions of voluptuous struggle with the impulse to despair and with the believed omnipresence of fate; the Tschaikowsky who tries tonally various reliefs and escapes in slow movement and scherzo and finds them equally exciting and disillusioning and then, in this particular symphony and contrary to the precedent of the rest, succumbs to black and deadening desolation. The music is the expression of a morbidly nervous mind, imagination and spirit, but it is a sincere and impassioned expression with all its morbidity—a kind of human document in tones, that touches listening ears and hearts. Dr. Muck and the orchestra were content yesterday to read it out as Tschaikowsky had written it, in clear, just, sympathetic and illuminating voice, without a hint of rhetorical emphasis, distorting exaggeration or personal display. So heard, the music kept its sincerity of passion and its revelation of a morbid and perturbed spirit. So heard also, it lived and thrilled again.

H. T. P.

[128]

Over—

From EVENING SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date MAR [illegible]

Gustav Strube, who occupies the chair of harmony and composition at the Peabody Conservatory of Music, received a triumph as a composer in Boston last Friday, when his "Variations on an Original Theme" was given its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck conducting. That it made a deep impression can best be judged by the musical reviewer, who were lavish in their praise of Mr. Strube as a comosper. Incidentally, the triumph brought Baltimore again forward as a musical centre, for Mr. Strube now boasts of Baltimore as his headquarters. Indeed, musical Baltimore is very much in the public eye at present. Next week Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory, will be the soloist with the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia on Friday and Saturday, and the following week Edward M. Morris, the talented young Peabody graduate, will play with the same orchestra at the University of Pennsylvania. A few weeks ago Mr. Morris played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge, Mass.

k, 1884

Speaking of the performance of Mr. Strube's composition, Philip Hale, the veteran critic, writing in the Boston Herald, said: "The theme is in itself beautiful and it is beautifully exposed. The exposition of the first two variations and the double variations with the theme, first for horn, then for oboe, are the crowning features of this composition. Mr. Strube is known as a cunning master of instrumentation. His scoring is sometimes super-refined, and in his interest to gain unusual and original effects he forgets or disdains weightier matters. His variations are on the whole interesting." Olin Downes, writing for the Boston Post, commented on Mr. Strube's Variations as follows: "There was interest in the work of Mr. Strube, for many years a member of the orchestra, a composer of high accomplishments, and now head of the department of theory and composition at the Peabody Conservatory. Mr. Strube, some of his friends may insist, has gone a step backward instead of forward in his musical development in this latest composition, because he has forsaken, temporarily, the symphonic poem, and ultra-impressionistic methods, and written in the traditional variation form. But with these people we do not agree. The theme which Mr. Strube has set down as his text is for us the most conventional page of the composition. This was probably deliberate on the part of the composer. It is a broad theme, chorale-like in its simple harmonies and its melodic line. But the theme is treated with a wealth of technical resource and striking effects of color which were always characteristic of Mr. Strube's writing, but which have been especially cultivated of late years by his sympathy with recent French composition. The fact that this piece has line as well as color is not to its disadvantage. In a well-worn medium Mr. Strube keeps the interest of the hearer from the beginning to the end. The variations are free, but not so free that all trace of the original theme is lost. Most of them are in a poetical vein. One or two are brilliant and dramatic."

The Boston Globe says: "Gustav Strube, now instructing musical youth in Baltimore, sometime conductor, violinist, teacher in this city, is an indefatigable musician. His compositions played at the Symphony concerts have denoted a steady assimilation, not that they have lacked originality, rather that they have shown the absorption of more than one idiom. Mr. Strube has not closed his ears to modern harmonic combinations. Yesterday afternoon the 'Variations on an Original Theme,' played by Dr. Muck for the first time anywhere, showed Mr. Strube more than a clever and skillful stylist." The Boston Traveler says: "The appearance of a composition by Gustav Strube on a symphony program always awakens interest, particulary so when the composition is given for the first time by the orchestra, as was the case yesterday afternoon with the 'Variation on an Original Theme.' It is in the composer's best vein, clear and interesting throughout and written by one who speaks with authority. Fortunate indeed is the composer who can have his compositions interpreted by such an orchestra."

An exhibition of original etchings by Albany E. Howarth is now being shown at the Purnell Galleries in Charles street, where it will remain on view through March 20. This will be followed by a special exhibition of unusual prints, in color, by Whitcomb.

J. O. L.

BOSTON POST,

MARCH 8,

CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Symphony Hall was unable to seat the audience that assembled yesterday afternoon for the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck, director, in aid of its pension fund. The fact that this is one of the few occasions in the year when every seat in Symphony Hall is for sale to the public for a Boston Symphony concert is becoming more and more appreciated. Until last year it was the custom to give the pension fund concerts on Sunday evenings. The change from evening to afternoon has proven advantageous, for many who live out of town and who would gladly come in the afternoon to hear the orchestra find it inconvenient to come in for the same concert in the evening. Given the opportunity and a programme calculated to make a wide general appeal, the reputation of the orchestra is more than sufficient to insure the audiences at these concerts.

Tschaikowsky's Symphonic Pathetique and music by Wagner from "Die Meistersinger," "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdamerung," with the overture to Tannhauser made the programme. With all of this music the orchestra is thoroughly acquainted. It is pre-eminently music which makes the modern orchestra sound in all its glory. It is also music of great emotional power, whether it be the impulsive and very Russian emotion of Tschaikowsky, or the splendid epic passion of Wagner. All of the music was played with the utmost brilliancy and tonal splendor. Tschaikowsky, in one of the most tragic works of the orchestral repertoire, and Wagner, long since a popular idol with masses as well as music lovers, found the warmest of welcomes. Dr. Muck led with his accustomed authority and skill, and was very enthusiastically applauded.

BOSTON GLOBE

MARCH 8.

PENSION CONCERT.

Symphony Hall Filled to Capacity.

The spell of Wagner continued effective at the concert for the aid of the Symphony Pension Fund yesterday afternoon. Owing to Dr Muck's keen sense of the inevitable incongruities of the music dramas relegated piecemeal to the concert hall, these concerts for the pension fund are practically the only occasion to hear the orchestra play Wagner. The audience proved the wisdom of the policy. Every seat was taken and many stood in the aisles.

While Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" symphony vies with Wagner in popularity, none can doubt it has been played too much in former years. Its sordid lamentations and the saccharine second movement do not wear well. Dr Muck chooses not to accentuate the barbaric fury in the third. There is a frenzy of elemental passion in these pages which might be interpreted in a more fiery and a more pompous manner, but the reading throughout was one to subdue and temper rather than to excite hysteria.

The selections from Wagner were from the third act of "The Mastersingers," and an arrangement by Hans Richter of excerpts from "Siegfried" and "Dusk of the Gods"; in the first, Siegfried's passage to Bruennhilde's rock, and the second, Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine Journey. For these Dr Muck is to be thanked.

The eminent conductor displayed a spirit which he has not always permitted himself of late. There was the true manner of epic grandeur in the second number, passages that sounded with incomparable euphony of tonal quality and with majesty of utterance. In the Mastersingers music there was eloquent discrimination between the spirit of magnanimity, of breadth of understanding, of the poet's appreciation, in the pages delineative of Sachs, and the gayety of the apprentices and the festivities of the tournament of song. The overture to "Tannhaeuser" completed the program.

The announcements of future Sunday afternoon concerts of this series are as follows: Next Sunday, Elena Gerhardt, soprano, and Beatrice Harrison, cellist; March 21, Julia Culp and Percy Grainger; March 28, Mme Matzenauer and Mr Gabrilowitsch.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

MARCH 8, 1915

WAGNER IN GLIMPSES

DR. MUCK OPERATIC CONDUCTOR AGAIN

Fragments of "Die Meistersinger," "Siegfried" and "Goetterdamerung" in Thrillingly Eloquent Performance — Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony" in the Normal Voice of an Abnormal Music—Dr. Muck and Our Present Operatic and Wagnerian Plight

THROUGH two numbers of the concert at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for the profit of the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra and before an audience the numbers and the eagerness of which must have rejoiced the hearts of the band, Dr. Muck was again an operatic conductor and an operatic conductor in Wagner's music-dramas. One Berliner, wise in the ways of the leaders of the Royal Opera, will say that Dr. Muck is incomparable in "Carmen"; another is sure that he deserves that distinction in "Der Rosenkavalier"; a third who has visited Baireuth as well, avers that it is in "Parsifal" that his abilities and imagination most shine; a fourth, unless he includes nearly all of Wagner's music-dramas in his sayings, pitches upon "Die Meistersinger" as the opera in which the conductor is preëminent; while in little Salzburg they are as confident that there is none to match him in the operas of Mozart.

Here in Boston, where Dr. Muck has tarried and will tarry longer than in any other city, except Berlin, in which he has dwelt, we know him not at all as yet as an operatic conductor in the theatre itself. Instead, we sample him as such—so to say—when he leads in an operatic overture at the Symphony Concerts and at the end the imaginative somehow expect to see an invisible curtain rise over the stage of Symphony Hall and show it magically transformed into the first scene of the "Tristan" or the "Emyanthe," to which they have just heard such magnificent preluding. Or else at one of the concerts of the Pension Fund we hear Dr. Muck in coördinated or dissevered fragments of "Die Meistersinger" or the "Ring" operas and hope beats high that sooner or later, under one or another auspices, and with an orchestra, singers and a "general representation" worthy of him, he will conduct in opera in Boston. Somehow the chaos into which operatic affairs in this town have fallen encourages such happy, if futile, anticipation. For there is not, and there never has been in the United States an operatic conductor so eloquent with the music of Wagner, when he has such a band as the Symphony Orchestra to play it, as Dr. Muck once more proved himself yesterday and in mere fragments. Not even the Toscanini of "Tristan" excels him.

For yet another and as irritating an anomaly, the fragments of "Die Meistersinger," "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung" played yesterday, plus the overtures and the preludes to Wagner's operas and music-dramas played last November at the other Pension-Fund concert with the total glorification of the dead Siegfried actually sum all the music of Wagner that we in Boston have heard through the normal course of a whole season of music. In Boston alone, of the musical capitals, so-called, of the world, "Rheingold" and "Siegfried" and Götterdämmerung" are still unfamiliar operas; "Die Walkure" and "Die Meistersinger" are in not much better case; "Tristan," "Lohengrin" and "Parsifal" we know; but of late "Tannhäuser" has well nigh vanished from our stage. Only late in its existence did the Boston Opera Company discover the music-dramas of Wagner and give us "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger." The Metropolitan company, in the days of its fitful visits, was sparing of Wagner's pieces, partly because they happened to display neither Mr. Caruso nor Miss Farrar, and partly because our public was assumed to be indifferent to them. But if it is indifferent, why does it fill Symphony Hall merely to hear overtures, preludes and detached fragments in mere concert performance? By every token that audiences can give, the public of Boston would go to hear Wagner's operas, given such a performance of them on the stage as excerpts from them receive in concerts. Such performances are not impossible and they would be not only possible, but probable under Dr. Muck himself.

The recital of these conditions and regret over them are indeed an old story; but repetition only emphasizes the fact that Boston is the one city of musical pretension the world over—and not even London aside—that in normal times does not hear Wagner's operas in plenty in the theatre for which they are designed. It is more than a reproach to the reputation of the city as a musical capital that it does not so hear them; it is a deprivation, year after year, of the pleasures of six or eight master-pieces of music-drama. An English-speaking stage without its frequent or occasional Shakspeare is non-existent and almost unthinkable. Here in Boston we have accomplished the abnormal feat of an opera house that until the last years of its existence was almost Wagnerless and of a city that professes to be a musical capital in the twentieth century and knows not his music-dramas in familiar repetition. However much such conditions may minister to a perverse pride, it is not good to be "singular" or "superior" in this queer fashion. Strauss we know; Debussy we know; d'Indy we know and so forth through a long list of modern and ultra-modern composers; but Wagner, by universal consent the greatest genius that has yet set his hand to the music of the theatre, we virtually know not. By some fortunate turn of the fates of music, Dr. Muck ought to be the discoverer of him to us. The anomalies of our ignorance of Wagner and of Dr. Muck as a operatic conductor, seem too strange to endure indefinitely.

Imagine hearing the introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" played in its place in the opera—where it concentrates for the instant the romantic mood and the homely atmosphere of all that has gone before and all that is to come after—imagine hearing it there in such mingling of tonal beauty and of poetic significance as Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave it yesterday, in such richness of harmonic and instrumental color and in such glory of expressive melody and phrase. Imagine the dance of the youth played in the actual fete on the stage with such lightness of rhythm so sensitively varied and with such variety of bright and changeful tonal color. Imagine the effect in the theatre of such climaceric sonorities, such thrilling suspense and such large and deep expansion, as out of the opened hearts of the singing multitude that Dr. Muck brought to the choral extolling of Sachs. From "Die Meistersinger" under Richter to "Die Meistersinger" under Toscanini, it is hard to recall such eloquence as that of yesterday. Or see in fancy young Siegfried scaling the rocks and piercing the mists through the darting fires on his way to the sleeping Brünnhilde and so summon the stage while the orchestra sings as it did yesterday with his undaunted progress or crackles and gleams with the parted fires.

In a mere paragraph, as it were, Richter's arrangement for the concert hall sings the heroic ecstasies of Siegfried and Brünnhilde but in that paragraph quivering intensity of radiant tone might hardly go further than it did yesterday. Then the music deepened and broadened into Siegfried's descent of the Rhine to Gunther's house and all the daughters of the river sang golden-mouthed. Through all this music the mind marvelled at the conductor's play with the interwoven motives—each exposed, each vitalized and each characterized; while the ear rejoiced in the sensuous beauty and color of the tone; and the heart stirred to the passionate mood and the dramatic movement of the whole. Again in the overture to "Tannhäuser," fortunate the tenor who can sing the knight's song to the glory of Venus, with such beauty of tone, such expressiveness of phrase, such musical and histrionic ardor of feeling as those that Mr. Sand drew yesterday from his clarinet. He was, indeed, the actor in the opera that each player in a Wagnerian orchestra should be. Remarkable clarinetist that he is, he has not before given such proof of his quality. Such singing of the song was true supplement to the biting rhythms and the sharp-set phrases with which Dr. Muck keeps the sensual sting of the Venusberg or to his noble sonorities with the conquering hymn of the pilgrims. Since Mr. Toscanini conducted for the first time here in "Tristan" and Dr. Muck led for the first time in the assembled overtures and preludes, this town has heard no such thrilling Wagner as stirred the audience of yesterday.

From RECORD

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony," which began the concert, holds its own and in spite of many more repetitions, far better than did the overture-fantasia to "Romeo and Juliet" of the preceding Symphony Concerts. It held its own the better yesterday because Dr. Muck was content with the normal voice, so to say, of an abnormal music. Time was—and perhaps still continues—when every conductor that essayed the symphony, believed he must be "different" and "individual" with the music. He wreaked himself upon the march until it became a wild tonal phantasmagoria of broken rhythms, suspended progressions and hectic outbursts. Or he tried to make the syncopated second movement more hollow and fantasmal than it naturally sounds. Or he prolonged and intensified the voluptuous melody of the first movement until some called it "obscene"; or he writhed and clamored through the tumultuous passages around it as though they were not the wild stirrings of a perturbed and moody soul, but the frenzies of a revel of fiends. Now, the "Pathetic Symphony" is a very transparent and personal music. There is not a melody, a rhythm, a progression, a stroke of harmonic and instrumental color in it that is not as clear as the day. It is cherished and understanded of the people because it is so transparent.

The music seems hardly less clear of mood and passion—the familiar Tschaikowsky of the symphonies, sensitive, morbid and rejoicing prey to the emotions of voluptuous struggle with the impulse to despair and with the believed omnipresence of fate; the Tschaikowsky who tries tonally various reliefs and escapes in slow movement and scherzo and finds them equally exciting and disillusioning and then, in this particular symphony and contrary to the precedent of the rest, succumbs to black and deadening desolation. The music is the expression of a morbidly nervous mind, imagination and spirit, but it is a sincere and impassioned expression with all its morbidity—a kind of human document in tones, that touches listening ears and hearts. Dr. Muck and the orchestra were content yesterday to read it out as Tschaikowsky had written it, in clear, just, sympathetic and illuminating voice, without a hint of rhetorical emphasis, distorting exaggeration or personal display. So heard, the music kept its sincerity of passion and its revelation of a morbid and perturbed spirit. So heard also, it lived and thrilled again.

H. T. P.

[125]

Over

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MARCH 13, 1915

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

FROM BERLIOZ, AFTER MANY DAYS, TO BRAHMS

The "Harold" Symphony Heard Once More—Its Lasting Virtue and Self-Contained Appeal—Folk-Pieces by d'Indy and the "Academic Overture"—Mr. Ferir and Mr. Longy as Quasi-Soloists

TWO or three of Berlioz's overtures—to "Benvenuto Cellini" and "The Roman Carnival," for example—are perennial in orchestral repertories; but nowadays his three symphonies are relatively seldom played, even in his own France and in the Germany that, perhaps, yet more warmly admires him. Here in Boston, when they make intermittent return to our programmes, the conductor usually pitches upon "Harold in Italy." It is nine years since Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" has been played at the Symphony Concerts and the memorable performances of it hereabouts in recent days have been those under the visiting Weingartner and the visiting Mahler with orchestras from New York. It is more years still since Berlioz's music to "Romeo and Juliet" has been heard in Boston. Even the romantically minded Fiedler overlooked it; and Mr. Paur and Mr. Gericke were none too frequent with it. Yet it is richer in large and sustained invention and in glow of mood and voice than is the tone-picturing of Harold, while "The Fantastic Symphony" far transcends that succession of scenes and sensations in wildly romantic imagining and utterance. None the less, "Harold in Italy" was heard once more at the Symphony Concerts yesterday afternoon, after memorial music to the late John Chipman Gray; once more it held the audience intent; and once more it was covered with applause that was surely tribute to the music, as well as to conductor, orchestra, and Mr. Férir with the viola that sings the moods and the musings of Harold.

Beyond peradventure the clear beauty and the graphic power of the music, enduring for more than three quarters of a century, evoked this interest and applause. The average auditor at the Symphony Concerts, on a Friday afternoon, is more likely to come thither with a bag of the newest fashion in her hand rather than with a bundle of historical perspective on her back. She—or he—may vaguely know that Berlioz was one of "The Romantics" of Paris in the thirties and the forties, and that he led an appropriately romantic existence. If not, the omniscient programme-book will yield the information and add agreeable details of his troubled amours and his imaginative fabling about himself. But she—or again he—is not likely to know, nor will the programme-book inform her that Berlioz, taking more than a hint from Beethoven, was well-nigh the inventor of romantic programme-music; that he carried tonal delineation for pictorial purpose further than any of his predecessors; that he was the forerunner of Liszt and the whole brood of moderns in the adjusting of the symphonic progression and the graphic intent of music whence the contemporary tone-poem was born; and that students of instrumentation and composers with them still bend over his treatise on that art, and the scores wherein he practises it, as over perpetual fountains of suggestion. On the one side, in the scope and the quality of his imagination and his utterance he personified the romantic revolution of the thirties in music, as Hugo personified it in poetry, or the elder Dumas in plays, or Delacroix in painting. On the other side, in his effort to condition the form and the means of music to his purposes, he was the theorist by inspiration, who practised not merely with courage, but with an invention and a cunning that have made him one of the preceptors of all subsequent music. Has not Strauss himself reëdited and annotated Berlioz's treatise on instrumentation?

Of all these things and many akin to them, the auditors of yesterday, as human probability goes, thought not twice. Nor had they need to think of them even once; for the music of "Harold in Italy" still speaks for itself by its own transparent and graphic delineation and its own intrinsic charm or power. It speaks, also, for itself quite apart from any association with Byron's poem and its moody and maundering hero. The historical Byron in letters is almost as unfamiliar a figure to the knowledge and the imagination of most of us as the historical Berlioz in music and it is doubtful whether the poet's verse is read as often proportionately as the composer's music is heard. What little heed Harold gets from listeners to the symphony springs chiefly from the circumstance that the first viola of the orchestra who plays the music allotted to Berlioz's Byronic personage, has his name as a quasi-soloist on the programme and either stands in front of the orchestra or sits, as Mr. Férir did yesterday, in the chair of the concert-master. (It was good to see him thus modest and regardful of esprit de corps in the band, since Mr. Longy, who had a similar part in a later piece, chose to enter from the ante-room quite as though he were "the assisting artist" of the day.)

Yet it is still a novel, ingenious and imaginative idea to place a personage in a programmatic symphony or a tone-poem outside it, as it were, the mere spectator and receiver of sensations from what it delineates and suggests. And, as usual when such an idea was born in Berlioz, he accomplished it cunningly. Harold's music, outside an occasional passage in the first movement, is not wrought into the body and the development of the symphony. It is a voice that occasionally interrupts the course of the tone-picturing to utter moody impressions of it and of all that has gone before or else tinkles and murmurs through it, shrinking and remote. It was this suggestion of remoteness, of tremulous watching and listening, of troubling and musing sensations in play upon a restless and imaginative spirit, that Mr. Férir drew from Berlioz's music into his playing. If he did not characterize Harold, who, after all, is an exceedingly shadowy figure in the symphony, he did characterize with finely graphic sense. Berlioz's remote, sensitive and moody looker-on at his tone-picturing. To do so was a more remarkable feat of artistry in Mr. Férir than the soft, wistful and penetrating tone and the justness and the sensibility of phrase that were its means. He deserved the applause that the audience gave him and the unusual warmth that Dr. Muck showed to him.

Meanwhile, as independent of Harold as of history, the symphony went its way, winning those who heard by its own intrinsic virtue. Berlioz had felt and dreamed, as well as seen, the Italy in which he had dwelt, and he could translate into tones the lasting sensations and longings that it left within him. He does not refine them until they become too subtle like the fancies and savors of Wolf's Italian Serenade. He is not a pompous, patronizing and complacently moralizing British tourist like the Elgar of the overture "In Italy." He does not forget Italy for harmonic and instrumental exercise and experiment as Strauss is prone to do in his Italian symphony and, romantic that he is to the marrow, he escapes the pitfall of a realistic Italy that Charpentier and still more Wolf-Ferrari ostentatiously and joyously digged for themselves. The Italy of the "Harold" symphony, especially in the march of the pilgrims and the herdsman's serenade, is th pure poetic milk of the Italian word in th bible of romantic impression distilled int tones. The music sings of an Italy poetiz in actual vision and sensation and glan ored yet more by recollection and longin Berlioz, whatever the limitations of his i vention and imagination in what the o thodox call "development," could find mel dies that touch the ear with their intrinsi beauty and the imagination with their e pressive quality. He had not to maintai them too long in the second and the thi episodes of the "Harold" symphony and h imagination played warmly and his hat artfully about them.

Time and fashions in music have not touched at all, or have touched very lightly, this march of the pilgrims and this serenade of the mountaineer. They have not been so considerate of the final "orgy of brigands" or, perhaps, of the feverish and changeful moods and music of the first movement. In orgies, "the tonal art," as they say in Germany, has gone a long way in excitement of the nerves of ear and imagination beyond the finale of the "Harold" symphony. It does sound tame, beside some of the furies and frenzies of more modern music when dissonance screams jeeringly at dissonance, one harmony clutches another, as it were, by its squeaking throat, and the orchestra moves in thunders of tone and gashes of rhythm. Perhaps such music is more delineative than Berlioz's "orgy"; anyhow it is more nervously titillating and racking. At the least behold the ardent composer laying on and sparing not out of the full arsenal of his resources and with the full strength of his arm. Hear his strokes of delineation. Some devoted analyst will have already listed them for the universal benefit; 41 b—motiv of lustful and brooding frenzy or 63 D (4)—subsidiary of wild blasphemy against the saints.

Therein does the contemporary practice differ materially from that of Berlioz. For whatever the relative tameness of his "orgy," he works his harmonic and instrumental "strokes," chords, juxtapositions, transitions and all the rest—and some of them are still notably graphic and inventive—into the voice and the illusion of the whole. Therein he is true artist in tones who accomplishes his effect and yet conceals the means in the progress and substance of the music. Thereby als escapes the labelling analysts—a misbe ten brood that the fortunate thirties did know. At times in the first movemen is similarly artful and illusive, espec when he is beginning to establish the mosphere of the symphony as a whole; when once he has called Harold into t being and begins to wander about "scenes of melancholy, joy and happine the old reproach begins to hold against music that it is fragmentary, feverish thin. The first movement is the spo the "Harold" symphony that time is ma barren. Yet what "fragments" elsew in the symphony Berlioz has accomplis Perhaps he stilled his fever as he away his thinness in the fulness of workmanship. And what would he not l done had he had the range of contemporary harmonies to serve his sense of tonal coloring and suggestion. It is not his fault—it is the penalty of the everlasting progress of music—that some of his harmonies yesterday sounded by comparison bald and meagre.

The "Harold" symphony is not long, but the rest of an unusually short concert seemed only supplement to it. Continuing his new custom of pieces that shall display the talents of one and another of the virtuosi of the orchestra; that are interesting in themselves, and that are seldom heard, Dr. Muck gave Mr. d'Indy's "Fantasia for Orchestra and Oboe on French Folk-Tunes" a place in the Symphony Concerts, and Mr. Longy played the solo instrument. Within recollection, the first oboe has had his concerto at the concerts even as does the first violin and the first 'cello; but the hautboy, heard too long by itself, ceases to give pleasure and concertos for it, even by illustrious eighteenth-century hands, decline quickly into their tedium. On the other hand, Mr. d'Indy's piece—one of the very few from modern hands that considers the oboe as a solo instrument—has its intrinsic interest and charm. Whether he heard his folk-tunes from peasant lips in the Cévennes, or whether he added his own imagination and invention to scraps of song so heard—a frequent happening with folk-music in the concert-room, the gentle-voiced air of melancholy longing and the livelier-voiced air of amiable gayety, please the ear, touch the fancy and are wrought into an agreeable symphonic pattern with continence of hand, fertility of device and suggestion and with a scholarship, a fancy and a readiness of resource that hide themselves under a smiling simplicity. Mr. d'Indy had his emotions over his folk-tunes; but like all his feeling and all his expression, they were so true and ran so deep that they keep the spirit of that which kindled them. Of a like simplicity seemed Mr. Longy's accomplishment. Yet in fact it was a very subtle and adroit technical skill and a rare feeling, to the last shading of a minute phrase, for the voice at once suave and keen, penetrating and pungent of his instrument.

Thereafter Brahms's "Academic Overture," wherein he felt his student songs as truly as Mr. d'Indy felt his folk-songs and wove them as warmly into a symphonic piece. The Parisian has the advantage in distinction of substance and in finesse of treatment. Brahms could not go far in recondite handling of his material. If he had, it would have lost its savor and—what would have been more deplorable—its stimulating unlikeness to the rest of his music. What could not be done by reflection and artistry, Brahms for once accomplished by sheer gusto. The "Academic Overture" is a jovial music and Brahms who was quite capable of that mood, usually kept it off music-paper—perhaps with the fear of a "reverent" public before his eyes. Jovial Johannes and wise Johannes, too. With like gusto orchestra and conductor played him. H. T. P.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA GIVES FINAL CONCERT

Little enthusiasm attended the farewell scenes at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's final concert of the season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, and the reason may be that the closing half of the programme was singularly lacking in interest.

It consisted of Vincent d'Indy's fantasie for oboe and orchestra and was followed by Dvorak's brilliant but empty "Carnival" overture. After the final chord the audience applauded perfunctorily and called the orchestra's conductor, Dr. Muck, out, then put on its wraps and left the hall.

The solo part of the oboe fantasie was played beautifully by the orchestra's first oboist, Georges Longy, but it proved to be a work of little charm and less interest; and the Dvorak overture is not a fair sample of the musician's greatness.

But—if the programme had been reversed and if the Schubert C major symphony had been at the close instead of the beginning, it is safe to say that the scenes at parting for the season between orchestra and audience would have been one of fine enthusiasm. At the conclusion of the great symphony, superbly played, Dr. Muck had to bow his acknowledgment of the applause and the orchestra had to rise and bow, too. "This heavenly, long drawn out symphony," as Schumann termed it, was brilliantly conducted and beautifully and the impulsive, jubilant final movement would have been ideal for the season's final impression of music making by the remarkable orchestra. However, this was not to be, so the end was tame.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

ITS FINAL CONCERT HERE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Renders Mozart's Music Beautifully.

Last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth and last concert of the season at the Academy of Music. The concert opened with Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, which was beautifully rendered. Goldmark's "Sakuntala" followed and then Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Recoco Theme," and the "Carnival." The audience was most appreciative. Indeed after the "Sakuntala," the whole orchestra was forced to respond to the applause.

The variations were heard early in the season with Leo Schultz giving the violoncello solo with the Philharmonic Orchestra. Last night Beatrice Harrison, a young English 'cellist, was the soloist. She played with much poetic expression and was recalled a dozen times by the delighted audience.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Establish

Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring its thirtieth consecutive season in Philadelphia to an end to-morrow (Monday) evening with its fifth concert of the Winter in the Academy of Music. The concert should be more than usually interesting. At the beginning of the season the management of the orchestra promised but three soloists, Messrs. Amato, Bauer and Kreisler, all of whom have appeared. Notwithstanding this, there will be a soloist at this last concert, Beatrice Harrison, the young English violoncellist.

Those who have been fortunate enough to hear Miss Harrison play will agree readily that she has a most remarkable talent and those who have yet to hear her play have decidedly a treat before them. It seems to be accepted that Pablo Casals, the Spanish 'cellist, is a unique figure in the world of art. That being true, it is equally certain that Miss Harrison more nearly approaches him than any other practitioner of this instrument. Miss Harrison took the gold medal given jointly by the Royal Academy and Royal College of Music of London when she was nine years old, the youngest who had ever received that honor, and when she was seventeen she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin. A greater part of her studying was done with Hugo Becker, of Frankfort.

The program which Dr. Muck has arranged for this concert comprises the first symphony of Brahms in C Minor, the "Faust" Overture of Wagner, Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme for violoncello and orchestra and Weber's Overture, "Der Freischutz."

Soloists to Be Heard Here

BEATRICE HARRISON

ZOE FULTON

Miss Beatrice Harrison, the eminent 'cello soloist, will be heard with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to-morrow evening at the Academy, and Miss Zoe Fulton, a Pittsburgh contralto, will sing here Tuesday.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MARCH 13, 1915

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

FROM BERLIOZ, AFTER MANY DAYS, TO BRAHMS

The "Harold" Symphony Heard Once More—Its Lasting Virtue and Self-Contained Appeal—Folk-Pieces by d'Indy and the "Academic Overture"—Mr. Ferir and Mr. Longy as Quasi-Soloists

TWO or three of Berlioz's overtures—to "Benvenuto Cellini" and "The Roman Carnival," for example—are perennial in orchestral repertories; but nowadays his three symphonies are relatively seldom played, even in his own France and in the Germany that, perhaps, yet more warmly admires him. Here in Boston, when they make intermittent return to our programmes, the conductor usually pitches upon "Harold in Italy." It is nine years since Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" has been played at the Symphony Concerts and the memorable performances of it hereabouts in recent days have been those under the visiting Weingartner and the visiting Mahler with orchestras from New York. It is more years still since Berlioz's music to "Romeo and Juliet" has been heard in Boston. Even the romantically minded Fiedler overlooked it; and Mr. Paur and Mr. Gericke were none too frequent with it. Yet it is richer in large and sustained invention and in glow of mood and voice than is the tone-picturing of Harold, while "The Fantastic Symphony" far transcends that succession of scenes and sensations in wildly romantic imagining and utterance. None the less, "Harold in Italy" was heard once more at the Symphony Concerts yesterday afternoon, after memorial music to the late John Chipman Gray; once more it held the audience intent; and once more it was covered with applause that was surely tribute to the music, as well as to conductor, orchestra, and Mr. Férir with the viola that sings the moods and the musings of Harold.

Beyond peradventure the clear beauty and the graphic power of the music, enduring for more than three quarters of a century, evoked this interest and applause. The average auditor at the Symphony Concerts, on a Friday afternoon, is more likely to come thither with a bag of the newest fashion in her hand rather than with a bundle of historical perspective on her back. She—or he—may vaguely know that Berlioz was one of "The Romantics" of Paris in the thirties and the forties, and that he led an appropriately romantic existence. If not, the omniscient programme-book will yield the information and add agreeable details of his troubled amours and his imaginative fabling about himself. But she—or again he—is not likely to know, nor will the programme-book inform her that Berlioz, taking more than a hint from Beethoven, was well-nigh the inventor of romantic programme-music; that he carried tonal delineation for pictorial purpose further than any of his predecessors; that he was the forerunner of Liszt and the whole brood of moderns in the adjusting of the symphonic progression and the graphic intent of music whence the contemporary tone-poem was born; and that students of instrumentation and composers with them still bend over his treatise on that art, and the scores wherein he practises it, as over perpetual fountains of suggestion. On the one side, in the scope and the quality of his imagination and his utterance he personified the romantic revolution of the thirties in music, as Hugo personified it in poetry, or the elder Dumas in plays, or Delacroix in painting. On the other side, in his effort to condition the form and the means of music to his purposes, he was the theorist by inspiration, who practised not merely with courage, but with an invention and a cunning that have made him one of the preceptors of all subsequent music. Has not Strauss himself reëdited and annotated Berlioz's treatise on instrumentation?

Of all these things and many akin to them, the auditors of yesterday, as human probability goes, thought not twice. Nor had they need to think of them even once; for the music of "Harold in Italy" still speaks for itself by its own transparent and graphic delineation and its own intrinsic charm or power. It speaks, also, for itself quite apart from any association with Byron's poem and its moody and maundering hero. The historical Byron in letters is almost as unfamiliar a figure to the knowledge and the imagination of most of us as the historical Berlioz in music and it is doubtful whether the poet's verse is read as often proportionately as the composer's music is heard. What little heed Harold gets from listeners to the symphony springs chiefly from the circumstance that the first viola of the orchestra who plays the music allotted to Berlioz's Byronic personage, has his name as a quasi-soloist on the programme and either stands in front of the orchestra or sits, as Mr. Férir did yesterday, in the chair of the concert-master. (It was good to see him thus modest and regardful of esprit de corps in the band, since Mr. Longy, who had a similar part in a later piece, chose to enter from the ante-room quite as though he were "the assisting artist" of the day.)

Yet it is still a novel, ingenious and imaginative idea to place a personage in a programmatic symphony or a tone-poem outside it, as it were, the mere spectator and receiver of sensations from what it delineates and suggests. And, as usual when such an idea was born in Berlioz, he accomplished it cunningly. Harold's music, outside an occasional passage in the first movement, is not wrought into the body and the development of the symphony. It is a voice that occasionally interrupts the course of the tone-picturing to utter moody impressions of it and of all that has gone before or else tinkles and murmurs through it, shrinking and remote. It was this suggestion of remoteness, of tremulous watching and listening, of troubling and musing sensations in play upon a restless and imaginative spirit, that Mr. Férir drew from Berlioz's music into his playing. If he did not characterize Harold, who, after all, is an exceedingly shadowy figure in the symphony, he did characterize with finely graphic sense. Berlioz's remote, sensitive and moody looker-on at his tone-picturing. To do so was a more remarkable feat of artistry in Mr. Férir than the soft, wistful and penetrating tone and the justness and the sensibility of phrase that were its means. He deserved the applause that the audience gave him and the unusual warmth that Dr. Muck showed to him.

Meanwhile, as independent of Harold as of history, the symphony went its way, winning those who heard by its own intrinsic virtue. Berlioz had felt and dreamed, as well as seen, the Italy in which he had dwelt, and he could translate into tones the fasting sensations and longings that it left within him. He does not refine them until they become too subtle like the fancies and savors of Wolf's Italian Serenade. He is not a pompous, patronizing and complacently moralizing British tourist like the Elgar of the overture "In Italy." He does not forget Italy for harmonic and instrumental exercise and experiment as Strauss is prone to do in his Italian symphony and, romantic that he is to the marrow, he escapes the pitfall of a realistic Italy that Charpentier and still more Wolf-Ferrari ostentatiously and joyously digged for themselves. The Italy of the "Harold" symphony, especially in the march of the pilgrims and the herdsman's serenade, is the pure poetic milk of the Italian word in the bible of romantic impression distilled into tones. The music sings of an Italy poetized in actual vision and sensation and glamored yet more by recollection and longing. Berlioz, whatever the limitations of his invention and imagination in what the orthodox call "development," could find melodies that touch the ear with their intrinsic beauty and the imagination with their expressive quality. He had not to maintain them too long in the second and the third episodes of the "Harold" symphony and his imagination played warmly and his hand artfully about them.

Time and fashions in music have not touched at all, or have touched very lightly, this march of the pilgrims and this serenade of the mountaineer. They have not been so considerate of the final "orgy of brigands" or, perhaps, of the feverish and changeful moods and music of the first movement. In orgies, "the tonal art," as they say in Germany, has gone a long way in excitement of the nerves of ear and imagination beyond the finale of the "Harold" symphony. It does sound tame, beside some of the furies and frenzies of more modern music when dissonance screams jeeringly at dissonance, one harmony clutches another, as it were, by its squeaking throat, and the orchestra moves in thunders of tone and gashes of rhythm. Perhaps such music is more delineative than Berlioz's "orgy"; anyhow it is more nervously titillating and racking. At the least behold the ardent composer laying on and sparing not out of the full arsenal of his resources and with the full strength of his arm. Hear his strokes of delineation. Some devoted analyst will have already listed them for the universal benefit; 41 b—motiv of lustful and brooding frenzy or 63 D (4)—subsidiary of wild blasphemy against the saints.

Therein does the contemporary practice differ materially from that of Berlioz. For whatever the relative tameness of his "orgy," he works his harmonic and instrumental "strokes," chords, juxtapositions, transitions and all the rest—and some of them are still notably graphic and inventive—into the voice and the illusion of the whole. Therein he is true artist in tones who accomplishes his effect and yet conceals the means in the progress and the substance of the music. Thereby also he escapes the labelling analysts—a misbegotten brood that the fortunate thirties did not know. At times in the first movement he is similarly artful and illusive, especially when he is beginning to establish the atmosphere of the symphony as a whole; but when once he has called Harold into tonal being and begins to wander about in "scenes of melancholy, joy and happiness," the old reproach begins to hold against his music that it is fragmentary, feverish and thin. The first movement is the spot in the "Harold" symphony that time is making barren. Yet what "fragments" elsewhere in the symphony Berlioz has accomplished. Perhaps he stilled his fever as he cast away his thinness in the fulness of his workmanship. And what would he not have done had he had the range of contemporary harmonies to serve his sense of tonal coloring and suggestion. It is not his fault—it is the penalty of the everlasting progress of music—that some of his harmonies yesterday sounded by comparison bald and meagre.

The "Harold" symphony is not long, but the rest of an unusually short concert seemed only supplement to it. Continuing his new custom of pieces that shall display the talents of one and another of the virtuosi of the orchestra; that are interesting in themselves, and that are seldom heard, Dr. Muck gave Mr. d'Indy's "Fantasia for Orchestra and Oboe on French Folk-Tunes" a place in the Symphony Concerts, and Mr. Longy played the solo instrument. Within recollection, the first oboe has had his concerto at the concerts even as does the first violin and the first 'cello; but the hautboy, heard too long by itself, ceases to give pleasure and concertos for it, even by illustrious eighteenth-century hands, decline quickly into their tedium. On the other hand, Mr. d'Indy's piece—one of the very few from modern hands that considers the oboe as a solo instrument—has its intrinsic interest and charm. Whether he heard his folk-tunes from peasant lips in the Cévennes, or whether he added his own imagination and invention to scraps of song so heard—a frequent happening with folk-music in the concert-room, the gentle-voiced air of melancholy longing and the livelier-voiced air of amiable gayety, please the ear, touch the fancy and are wrought into an agreeable symphonic pattern with continence of hand, fertility of device and suggestion and with a scholarship, a fancy and a readiness of resource that hide themselves under a smiling simplicity. Mr. d'Indy had his emotions over his folk-tunes; but like all his feeling and all his expression, they were so true and ran so deep that they keep the spirit of that which kindled them. Of a like simplicity seemed Mr. Longy's accomplishment. Yet in fact it was a very subtle and adroit technical skill and a rare feeling, to the last shading of a minute phrase, for the voice at once suave and keen, penetrating and pungent of his instrument.

Thereafter Brahms's "Academic Overture," wherein he felt his student songs as truly as Mr. d'Indy felt his folk-songs and wove them as warmly into a symphonic piece. The Parisian has the advantage in distinction of substance and in finesse of treatment. Brahms could not go far in recondite handling of his material. If he had, it would have lost its savor and—what would have been more deplorable—its stimulating unlikeness to the rest of his music. What could not be done by reflection and artistry, Brahms for once accomplished by sheer gusto. The "Academic Overture" is a jovial music and Brahms who was quite capable of that mood, usually kept it off music-paper—perhaps with the fear of a "reverent" public before his eyes. Jovial Johannes and wise Johannes, too. With like gusto orchestra and conductor played him. H. T. P.

---

om HERALD dress: New York City
e

STON ORCHESTRA GIVES FINAL CONC

tle enthusiasm attended the f s at the Boston Symphony Orc tra's final coucert of the season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, and the reason may be that the closing half of the programme was singularly lacking in interest. It consisted of Vincent d'Indy's fantasie for oboe and orchestra and was followed by Dvorak's brilliant but empty "Carnival" overture. After the final chord the audience applauded perfunctorily and called the orchestra's conductor, Dr. Muck, out, then put on its wraps and left the hall.

The solo part of the oboe fantasie was played beautifully by the orchestra's first oboist, Georges Longy, but it proved to be a work of little charm and less interest; and the Dvorak overture is not a fair sample of the musician's greatness.

But—if the programme had been reversed and if the Schubert C major symphony had been at the close instead of the beginning, it is safe to say that the scenes at parting for the season between orchestra and audience would have been one of fine enthusiasm. At the conclusion of the great symphony, superbly played, Dr. Muck had to bow his acknowledgment of the applause and the orchestra had to rise and bow, too. "This heavenly, long drawn out symphony," as Schumann termed it, was brilliantly conducted and beautifully and the impulsive, jubilant final movement would have been ideal for the season's final impression of music making by the remarkable orchestra. However, this was not to be, so the end was tame.

---

ewspap

CITIZEN
s: Brooklyn, N. Y.

ITS FINAL CONCERT HERE

oston Symphony Orchestra R lers Mozart's Music Beautiful

ast night the Boston Symphony stra gave its fifth and last concer season at the Academy of M concert opened with Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, which was beautifully rendered. Goldmark's "Sakuntala" followed and then Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Recoco Theme," and the "Carnival." The audience was most appreciative. Indeed after the "Sakuntala," the whole orchestra was forced to respond to the applause.

The variations were heard early in the season with Leo Schultz giving the violoncello solo with the Philharmonic Orchestra. Last night Beatrice Harrison, a young English 'cellist, was the soloist. She played with much poetic expression and was recalled a dozen times by the delighted audience.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Establish

Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring its thirtieth consecutive season in Philadelphia to an end to-morrow (Monday) evening with its fifth concert of the Winter in the Academy of Music. The concert should be more than usually interesting. At the beginning of the season the management of the orchestra promised but three soloists, Messrs. Amato, Bauer and Kreisler, all of whom have appeared. Notwithstanding this, there will be a soloist at this last concert, Beatrice Harrison, the young English violoncellist.

Those who have been fortunate enough to hear Miss Harrison play will agree readily that she has a most remarkable talent and those who have yet to hear her play have decidedly a treat before them. It seems to be accepted that Pablo Casals, the Spanish 'cellist, is a unique figure in the world of art. That being true, it is equally certain that Miss Harrison more nearly approaches him than any other practitioner of this instrument. Miss Harrison took the gold medal given jointly by the Royal Academy and Royal College of Music of London when she was nine years old, the youngest who had ever received that honor, and when she was seventeen she received the Mendelssohn prize in Berlin. A greater part of her studying was done with Hugo Becker, of Frankfort.

The program which Dr. Muck has arranged for this concert comprises the first symphony of Brahms in C Minor, the "Faust" Overture of Wagner, Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme for violoncello and orchestra and Weber's Overture, "Der Freischutz."

Soloists to Be Heard Here

BEATRICE HARRISON

ZOE FULTON

Miss Beatrice Harrison, the eminent 'cello soloist, will be heard with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to-morrow evening at the Academy, and Miss Zoe Fulton, a Pittsburgh contralto, will sing here Tuesday.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

BOSTONSYMPHONY'S LAST CONCERT

A Woman 'Cellist, Beatrice Harrison, Displays Great Technique as Soloist.

Brahms.
Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68
Wagner................A Faust Overture
Tschaikowsky.
Variations on a Rococo Theme for Violoncello with Orchestral Accompaniment. Op. 33.
Weber.
Overture to the Opera, "Der Freischutz"

Conductor........Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist...........Miss Beatrice Harrison

Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra closed their season at the Academy of Music, which was one of the most remarkable this organization has ever given in this city. The last program was no exception to the four that preceded it. It was most brilliant from beginning to end, and its variety, like the previous concerts, was its chief charm, not forgetting that all the delight of these concerts this Winter is to the credit of the untiring efforts of Dr. Muck.

The playing of the Boston Symphony for many years has passed the pale of criticism, and yet Dr. Muck this season has added a finish to their work that is overpowering in its effect. He has brought his men to that state of harmonious perfection that no organization of its character has ever before attained, and this was especially noticeable in the absolutely perfect reading of the Brahms Symphony No. 1. The once not understandable Brahms, in the hands of Dr. Muck, is so clear as to be unquestioned in its meaning and intent.

Fine Choir Work.

Last evening the string choir was, if anything, more luscious and strikingly harmonious than ever before, and this was best demonstrated in the marvelous evenness displayed in the pazzicato passages in the third movement; but in this movement also the horns and the oboes gave a wonderful performance of the luscious melody, which is its striking feature.

The soloist was Miss Beatrice Harrison, a 'cellist. A woman soloist on this instrument is a novelty, and naturally her work was the most interesting feature of the concert. Miss Harrison must be credited with being a marvelous technicist. She played the exacting Tschaikowsky variations on a Rococo Theme with perfect ease. Its difficult scale passages and cadenzas were as child's play to her.

'Cellist's Tone Womanly.

Miss Harrison's tone is pure, but it must be classed as womanly, lacking in breadth and strength the big tone of the male artists on the instrument. This may be accounted for, in a measure, to her choice of composition, which requires so much dexterity that to properly present it, force must be eliminated, at times, to execution, and she was given admirable assistance by Dr. Muck, who was able to hold his orchestra so subdued that the soloist's playing stood out in bold relief, and much of the credit and impression she made is due to the fine discrimination of the conductor.

The other numbers were Wagner's "A Faust Overture" and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz," both of which were admirably presented. The orchestra will begin its next season on November 1, and three soloists are already announced, Geraldine Farrar, Madame Melba and Fritz Kreisler.

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY

Boston Orchestra Ends Its Thirtieth Philadelphia Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck gave its fifth and last concert for the present season—its thirtieth in this city before the usual large audience at the Academy of Music last evening, when the feature of a program which besides it comprised the "Faust" overture of Wagner's and the "Der Freyschutz" overture, was Brahms' noble symphony in C minor, the first of the four which must be regarded as his masterpieces.

This superb work was played here a short time ago by the New York Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Walter Damrosch, but its interpretation then did not in all respects exhibit its significance or express its beauty, and it was a great pleasure and a great privilege to hear it again as it was performed last night, with such an intelligently appreciative sense of its meaning, with such an admirable quality of tone and perfection of ensemble, with so much eloquence of sympathetic emotion and such an illuminative insight. Brahms' complicated score was analysed with an ability which made all its intricacies clear and invested with their full value all its details, and the famous episode in the fourth movement, where the horn enters like a voice from heaven and where a hush falls on the orchestra as though in the presence of some angelic messenger, was rendered with so much sincerity of feeling and with so exquisite a charm that none of its celestial loveliness was lost.

Just why such a mediocre pot boiler as Wagner's "Faust" was accorded a place on Dr. Muck's program is far from obvious, but the uninspired, commonplace music was at least well played, as was also the "Der Freyschutz" overture, with whose incomparably brilliant and masterly performance the concert closed. The assisting artist of the occasion was Miss Beatrice Harrison, who produced an extremely favorable impression and elicited a great deal of well deserved applause by the technical skill with which she played Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme," for violoncello and orchestra. The 'cello is an instrument which, because of the strength which its manipulation demands, few women are able to master. Miss Harrison has done so and she played it in a way for which no allowances whatever had to be made. In volume and quality of tone and in certainty and facility of execution her performance was entirely admirable.

It is announced that Miss Geraldine Farrar will be heard here in association with the orchestra next season.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Beatrice Harrison Soloist at Orchestra's Last Appearance of Season.

Ending their thirtieth season in Philadelphia, the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought the present year of concerts to a close in the Academy of Music last night before an audience unusually brilliant and appreciative. The program presented by Dr. Muck and his men was one that once more brought out to the full the wonderful sonority and smoothness of the organization and the well-nigh perfect ensemble to which it has been brought. In tonal quality and in unison of effect nothing seemed left to be desired.

Brahms' C minor symphony, his first and probably his most exquisite, opened the list of numbers. It was read with full appreciation of the depth and spirit of the work, the strings and brasses sharing alike the credit for a splendidly rounded interpretation. Wagner's "Faust" overture was played with equal mastery and impressiveness, and the same might be said of the "Freischuetz" overture, except that, for some reason, Dr. Muck dragged the reading beyond anything with which local audiences are familiar.

The soloist was Beatrice Harrison, a young English violoncellist of charming personality and considerable ability. She chose for her medium Tschaikowsky's variations on a rococo theme and played them in a way which won for her an enthusiastic reception, which was well deserved. Her touch is clean and sure, except for a slight tendency toward flatting, and her harmonies and double stopping showed a technical training and a physical dexterity which very evidently pleased her hearers.

From Evening PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last night concluded its series of five concerts in Philadelphia. The work of this organization, which adds annually so much to the pleasures of musical life in this city, is too important to be summed up in a scant review. It will, therefore, receive separate consideration. The present concert, at which Miss Beatrice Harrison was soloist, and in the course of which Doctor Muck conducted Brahm's first symphony, Wagner's "Faust" overture and Weber's overture to "Der Freischuetz," is matter enough for one review.

The Assisting Artist

One finds it easy to associate the confident grace of Miss Harrison's manner with the assurance and the artistic righteousness of her playing. Certainly this was a time when nothing but excellence was expected; yet the performance passed far beyond expectations. Miss Harrison, playing Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rocco Theme," indicated a mastery of the violoncello which was an impeccable as it was unobstrusive.

In her swift cadenzas, and even against the orchestra, her harmonics were clean and clear; her bowing when it needed to be rapid was never hurried, and the tone which she drew from her instrument was so rich, so fine, that quite apart from the graciousness of the music, it blessed the ear upon which it fell. It is not in point to say that one rarely hears the violoncello played by women; because one rarely hears it played so well by men. The sense of rhythm, the niceness of accent, the feeling for nuance of feeling even in such a work, are things which must be taken for granted in the case of any artist. They are, eventually, as much a part of the artist's technical equipment as mastery of the scale. Miss Harrison brings to these qualities a penetrative sympathy, a thoughtful loveliness and an artistic dignity of interpretation. She is wonderfully good.

Symphony and Players

Doctor Muck has been unkindly taken to task for his program, in other cities (excepting Boston, where he is properly worshiped.) Last night one could wonder, in advance, why the two overtures found place. After the fact it became clear that each had its justification in the wonderful orchestral qualities it could exhibit. Wagner for the wind and Weber for the horns were as gratifying as could well be. It is not often that the third choir of an orchestra finds opportunity for individual display of its talents.

When that choir contains such horns as those of the Boston Symphony it deserves, once in a season, to speak alone. The part song for four golden throats was as beautiful in "Der Freischuetz" as the rising beauty of the woodwind in the "Faust Overture." And in connection with the latter it may be called to the attention of those who fancy that Dr. Muck is temperamentally incapable of conducting only the first half, that it was the second half of the overture which passed in exaltation even the last movement of the symphony.

Brahms' first, the world's tenth according to Von Buelow, has had the good fortune of two playings within a very short time. As previously with the "Eroica," Dr. Muck chose to play the same symphony as Mr. Damrosch. In both cases he was justified, because it could hardly be said, after the two performances, that the same work was played. The first movement was certainly not of surpassing distinction; the allegretto received but a minimum of inspiration. There remained then the andante, to show the wondrous virtuosity of the oboe and clarinet, and the finale, to show the virtuosity, more wonderful still, of the orchestra and its conductor. To accept the synthesis, the slow creation of this glorious work, which leads neither to heaven nor to hell, but to earth with its own passions and its own pains, was an experience of the highest order.

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Final Concert of Season With Beatrice Harrison 'Cello Soloist

Giving the fifth and last concert of its thirty-fourth season in Philadelphia, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played once more before a large audience at the Academy of Music last evening, presenting a program of distinctive interest, and introducing a remarkable young violincellist in the person of Beatrice Harrison, who was the soloist.

Dr. Muck selected as the principal work for his final program of the season the first symphony of Brahms, in C minor, which is less familiar than the three later symphonic productions of the German composer, although it is by no means a novelty here; and it might also be said that it has less of real attraction than the others, at least for the average music lover. In fact, to the "average" listener the music of Brahms is not always grateful, for some there are who still confess that they find his works, especially in the symphonic form, "dry" and "unmelodious." His fourth symphony, however, in itself is sufficient to dispel this thought, and also in that heard last evening there are many places of real allurement. The passage for horns and flute in the fourth movement is one of entrancing charm, and beautifully indeed was it played last evening. This final movement, in fact, showed the noble orchestra at its impressive best.

Not so much can be said for the playing of the third, an allegretto replacing the traditional scherzo, in which the tonal quality had a tendency to thinness, even shrillness in the brasses, and less than the usual degree of beauty in the strings. It did not take long, however, for the opening adagio of the closing movement, and the brilliantly achieved finale to dispel this passing impression.

In her playing of the 'cello, Miss Harrison gives little evidence of her slender girlishness. While her tone is not big, it has plenty of "body," and is firm and true, as well as pure and melodious. She gave last evening Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme," an elaborate composition of many intricacies, which she conquered with surprising ease and fluency. The andante sostenuto measures brought forth many tones of mellow sweetness and emotional appeal, and in the cadenzas the execution was of unfaltering ease and brilliancy of effect. The audience surrendered to the attractive personality and musical proficiency of the young artist, and gave her a justly earned reward of enthusiastic applause.

The program was completed by the orchestra in its presentations of Wagner's "A Faust Overture," which was the second number, and the "Der Freischutz" overture of Weber, at the end. Both of these were given with the highest attainment of excellence, the beautiful Weber overture, with the soulful melody for the horn at the opening—familiar as the air of a favorite hymn—and its succeeding full sweep of rhapsodic melody, furnishing an appropriate and impressive climax.

The Boston Orchestra already has announced its five local concerts for next season, on Monday evenings, November 1 and 29, January 3, Febuary 14 and March

Farrar Madame Mel-

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

The first Sibelius symphony, which is to be heard at the Boston Orchestra concert this evening, was composed in 1899 and published in 1902. It is the first of four symphonies by the interesting Finnish composer, who was born in Tavastehus in 1865, but who is now living at Helsingfors, where the symphony was probably given its first performance, although there is no record of this event. It was first heard in Berlin in 1900 at a concert of Finnish music led by Kejanus in July, 1900. It was not played in Boston until 1907.

It seems to be of a very elemental and passionate nature, with characteristic beauties that will seem strange enough to unaccustomed ears. It opens, for instance, with a song for the clarinet that rises and falls over a drum roll, a mournful melody that is said to have an irresistible fascination. The work is full of mystery, of surprising crescendos, of syncopated ryhthms. The wood wind is used throughout to express unexpected moods. It is an emotional and colorful work, modern and different, with a scherzo that is said to have a national humor that to Southern nations must seem strangely wild and fantastic. The work ends with a mighty climax that is described as "tempestuously passionate." It will be interesting to hear this music, which is evidently so different from any music that has been played here for many months. The concert will have an additional interest for Baltimoreans because on this occasion Gustav Strube's "Variations on an Original Theme" will be heard here for the first time. Beatrice

---

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Beatrice Harrison, 'Cellist, Heard as Assisting Artist.

The thirtieth season of the Boston Orchestra in Philadelphia ended last night with a concert which attracted a capacity audience to the Academy of Music. Aside from the Brahms C Minor Symphony, the program was not entirely pleasing. Two overtures were used, the Wagner "Faust" and Weber's overture to "Der Freischuetz." Beatrice Harrison, a young English 'cellist, played Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme." The playing of the program was fully up to the artistic standards established by Dr. Muck, the symphony especially being wonderfully done. Miss Harrison is a newcomer to Philadelphia and was welcomed with that warmth which characterizes this city's attitude toward visiting artists. The Tchaikowsky "Variations" are not sufficiently novel to arouse great enthusiasm unless exceptionally well played. Miss Harrison is a player of pleasing personality, with a good technique, but with rather thin, colorless tone. She possesses the style of temperament that expresses itself in mannerisms, and for that reason her tone probably suffers in the loss of some of its natural richness. She apparently made a strong impression on the audience.

PERCY HEMUS' RECITAL

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date

Variety of inviting mood, refreshment for the jaded mind, marked the last evening of the Boston Symphony Orchstra in Carnegie Hall till next November. For the first time in many months, Dr. Muck forgot his countrymen and presented works by a Frenchman and a Russian, with a recent American novelty between. Among the fourteen composers in the series before, there had been but one "outlander" on a famous occasion, Sibelius, the Finn.

While last night's "Harold in Italy" may be as dead as Byron, it is yet true that Berlioz in his music invented all the thunders of latter-day despots of din. The premier band made his Gallic grace and clarity shine, and Emile Ferir won the leader's handshake for a solo viola of golden tone. At the evening's close, the tragic Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" still held the auditors spellbound.

It spoke well for a native tone poem three years "young," by the Bostonian F. S. Converse, to hold its own in such company. The Persian "Ormazd," a battle of worlds of light with powers of darkness, told its own story. As an approach to novelty in music, it was enjoyable to hear, particularly so in a sanely balanced programme of varied culture and sympathetic appeal. To-night the band bids farewell to Brooklyn, and to-morrow to all New York, when the Carnegie Hall series ends with Schubert, Dvorak and D'Indy.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date

MR. CONVERSE'S "ORMAZA" PLAYED

Boston Orchestra Presents Modern Work by Resident of Its Own City.

Coming from Boston for its last pair of concerts this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall presented as its chief novelty a work of a composer of its own city, Frederick S. Converse. The work was "Ormazd," a symphonic poem.

The subject matter of the work is taken from the mythology of ancient Persia, but the music is in the most modern vein, with a celeste, a piano, muted trumpets and most of the latest combinations of instruments now in favor with French composers, with the whole tone scale of Debussy and many other harmonic contrivances which put to shame the harmonies of Beethoven when it comes to picturing dark subjects. Mr. Converse has fashioned his music.

The work was played here at a meeting of the National Institute of Arts and Letters by the orchestra of the Symphony Society early in the season. It has one or two real melodies which crop out at rare intervals; it has some really effective moments of dramatic climax, but the general impression was that of a work put together none too smoothly or logically. It evidently made no impression on the audience, which was almost silent at its close, although its difficulties, which are many, were overcome brilliantly by Dr. Muck and the men whom he directed.

The applause which followed Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" was not much stronger. The notes were played precisely, with all the effectiveness which Berlioz, master of orchestral effect, could have asked for, and the viola solo running all through the four long movements was played by Emil Ferir. Somehow

INFORMATION OBSCURED

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Es

BOSTONSYMPHONY'S LAST CONCERT

A Woman 'Cellist, Beatrice Harrison, Displays Great Technique as Soloist.

Brahms.
Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68
Wagner.................A Faust Overture
Tschaikowsky.
Variations on a Rococo Theme for Violoncello with Orchestral Accompaniment. Op. 33.
Weber.
Overture to the Opera, "Der Freischutz"

Conductor........Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist..........Miss Beatrice Harrison

Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra closed their season at the Academy of Music, which was one of the most remarkable this organization has ever given in this city. The last program was no exception to the four that preceded it. It was most brilliant from beginning to end, and its variety, like the previous concerts, was its chief charm, not forgetting that all the delight of these concerts this Winter is to the credit of the untiring efforts of Dr. Muck.

The playing of the Boston Symphony for many years has passed the pale of criticism, and yet Dr. Muck this season has added a finish to their work that is overpowering in its effect. He has brought his men to that state of harmonious perfection that no organization of its character has ever before attained, and this was especially noticeable in the absolutely perfect reading of the Brahms Symphony No. 1. The once not understandable Brahms, in the hands of Dr. Muck, is so clear as to be unquestioned in its meaning and intent.

Fine Choir Work.

Last evening the string choir was, if anything, more luscious and strikingly harmonious than ever before, and this was best demonstrated in the marvelous evenness displayed in the pazzicato passages in the third movement; but in this movement also the horns and the oboes gave a wonderful performance of the luscious melody, which is its striking feature.

The soloist was Miss Beatrice Harrison, a 'cellist. A woman soloist on this instrument is a novelty, and naturally her work was the most interesting feature of the concert. Miss Harrison must be credited with being a marvelous technicist. She played the exacting Tschaikowsky variations on a Rococo Theme with perfect ease. Its difficult scale passages and cadenzas were as child's play to her.

'Cellist's Tone Womanly.

Miss Harrison's tone is pure, but it must be classed as womanly, lacking in breadth and strength the big tone of the male artists on the instrument. This may be accounted for, in a measure, to her choice of composition, which requires so much dexterity that to properly present it, force must be eliminated, at times, to execution, and she was given admirable assistance by Dr. Muck, who was able to hold his orchestra so subdued that the soloist's playing stood out in bold relief, and much of the credit and impression she made is due to the fine discrimination of the conductor.

The other numbers were Wagner's "A Faust Overture" and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz," both of which were admirably presented. The orchestra will begin its next season on November 1, and three soloists are already announced, Geraldine Farrar, Madame Melba and Fritz Kreisler.

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

'ork, 188

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY

Boston Orchestra Ends Its Thirtieth Philadelphia Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck gave its fifth and last concert for the present season—its thirtieth in this city before the usual large audience at the Academy of Music last evening, when the feature of a program which besides it comprised the "Faust" overture of Wagner's and the "Der Freyschutz" overture, was Brahms' noble symphony in C minor, the first of the four which must be regarded as his masterpieces.

This superb work was played here a short time ago by the New York Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Walter Damrosch, but its interpretation then did not in all respects exhibit its significance or express its beauty, and it was a great pleasure and a great privilege to hear it again as it was performed last night, with such an intelligently appreciative sense of its meaning, with such an admirable quality of tone and perfection of ensemble, with so much eloquence of sympathetic emotion and such an illuminative insight. Brahms' complicated score was analysed with an ability which made all its intricacies clear and invested with their full value all its details, and the famous episode in the fourth movement, where the horn enters like a voice from heaven and where a hush falls on the orchestra as though in the presence of some angelic messenger, was rendered with so much sincerity of feeling and with so exquisite a charm that none of its celestial loveliness was lost.

Just why such a mediocre pot boiler as Wagner's "Faust" was accorded a place on Dr. Muck's program is far from obvious, but the uninspired, commonplace music was at least well played, as was also the "Der Freyschutz" overture, with whose incomparably brilliant and masterly performance the concert closed. The assisting artist of the occasion was Miss Beatrice Harrison, who produced an extremely favorable impression and elicited a great deal of well deserved applause by the technical skill with which she played Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme," for violoncello and orchestra. The 'cello is an instrument which, because of the strength which its manipulation demands, few women are able to master. Miss Harrison has done so and she played it in a way for which no allowances whatever had to be made. In volume and quality of tone and in certainty and facility of execution her performance was entirely admirable.

It is announced that Miss Geraldine Farrar will be heard here in association with the orchestra next season.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Estab 34

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Beatrice Harrison Soloist at Orchestra's Last Appearance of Season.

Ending their thirtieth season in Philadelphia, the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought the present year of concerts to a close in the Academy of Music last night before an audience unusually brilliant and appreciative. The program presented by Dr. Muck and his men was one that once more brought out to the full the wonderful sonority and smoothness of the organization and the well-nigh perfect ensemble to which it has been brought. In tonal quality and in unison of effect nothing seemed left to be desired.

Brahms' C minor symphony, his first and probably his most exquisite, opened the list of numbers. It was read with full appreciation of the depth and spirit of the work, the strings and brasses sharing alike the credit for a splendidly rounded interpretation. Wagner's "Faust" overture was played with equal mastery and impressiveness, and the same might be said of the "Freischuetz" overture, except that, for some reason, Dr. Muck dragged the reading beyond anything with which local audiences are familiar.

The soloist was Beatrice Harrison, a young English violoncellist of charming personality and considerable ability. She chose for her medium Tschaikowsky's variations on a rococo theme and played them in a way which won for her an enthusiastic reception, which was well deserved. Her touch is clean and sure, except for a slight tendency toward flatting, and her harmonies and double stopping showed a technical training and a physical dexterity which very evidently pleased her hearers.

THIEVES

Fro Evening PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia

Date

'ork, 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last night concluded its series of five concerts in Philadelphia. The work of this organization, which adds annually so much to the pleasures of musical life in this city, is too important to be summed up in a scant review. It will, therefore, receive separate consideration. The present concert, at which Miss Beatrice Harrison was soloist, and in the course of which Doctor Muck conducted Brahm's first symphony, Wagner's "Faust" overture and Weber's overture to "Der Freischuetz," is matter enough for one review.

The Assisting Artist

One finds it easy to associate the confident grace of Miss Harrison's manner with the assurance and the artistic righteousness of her playing. Certainly this was a time when nothing but excellence was expected; yet the performance passed far beyond expectations. Miss Harrison, playing Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rocco Theme," indicated a mastery of the violoncello which was an impeccable as it was unobstrusive.

In her swift cadenzas, and even against the orchestra, her harmonics were clean and clear; her bowing when it needed to be rapid was never hurried, and the tone which she drew from her instrument was so rich, so fine, that quite apart from the graciousness of the music, it blessed the ear upon which it fell. It is not in point to say that one rarely hears the violoncello played by women; because one rarely hears it played so well by men. The sense of rhythm, the niceness of accent, the feeling fo nuance of feeling even in such a work, are things which must be taken for granted in the case of any artist. They are, eventually, as much a part of the artist's technical equipment as mastery of the scale. Miss Harrison brings to these qualities a penetrative sympathy, a thoughtful loveliness and an artistic dignity of interpretation. She is wonderfully good.

Symphony and Players

Doctor Muck has been unkindly taken to task for his program, in other cities (excepting Boston, where he is properly worshiped.) Last night one could wonder, in advance, why the two overtures found place. After the fact it became clear that each had its justification in the wonderful orchestral qualities it could exhibit. Wagner for the wind and Weber for the horns were as gratifying as could well be. It is not often that the third choir of an orchestra finds opportunity for individual display of its talents.

When that choir contains such horns as these of the Boston Symphony it deserves, once in a season, to speak alone. The part song for four golden throats was as beautiful in "Der Freischuetz" as the rising beauty of the woodwind in the "Faust Overture." And in connection with the latter it may be called to the attention of those who fancy that Dr. Muck is temperamentally incapable of conducting only the first half, that it was the second half of the overture which passed in exaltation even the last movement of the symphony.

Brahms' first, the world's tenth according to Von Buelow, has had the good fortune of two playings within a very short time. As previously with the "Eroica," Dr. Muck chose to play the same symphony as Mr. Damrosch. In both cases he was justified, because it could hardly be said, after the two performances, that the same work was played. The first movement was certainly not of surpassing distinction; the allegretto received but a minimum of inspiration. There remained then the andante, to show the wondrous virtuosity of the oboe and clarinet, and the finale, to show the virtuosity, more wonderful still, of the orchestra and its conductor. To accept the synthesis, the slow creation of this glorious work, which leads neither to heaven nor to hell, but to earth with its own passions and its own pains, was an experience of the highest order.

BULLETIN
: Philadelphia, Pa.

884

BOSTON SYMPHONY

al Concert of Season With Beatrice Harrison 'Cello Soloist

ing the fifth and last concert of its fourth season in Philadelphia, the Symphony Orchestra played once before a large audience at the Academy of Music last evening, presenting a program of distinctive interest, and introducing a remarkable young violincellist in the person of Beatrice Harrison, who was the soloist.

Dr. Muck selected as the principal work for his final program of the season the first symphony of Brahms, in C minor, which is less familiar than the three later symphonic productions of the German composer, although it is by no means a novelty here; and it might also be said that it has less of real attraction than the others, at least for the average music lover. In fact, to the "average" listener the music of Brahms is not always grateful, for some there are who still confess that they find his works, especially in the symphonic form, "dry" and "unmelodious." His fourth symphony, however, in itself is sufficient to dispel this thought, and also in that heard last evening there are many places of real allurement. The passage for horns and flute in the fourth movement is one of entrancing charm, and beautifully indeed was it played last evening. This final movement, in fact, showed the noble orchestra at its impressive best.

Not so much can be said for the playing of the third, an allegretto replacing the traditional scherzo, in which the tonal quality had a tendency to thinness, even shrillness in the brasses, and less than the usual degree of beauty in the strings. It did not take long, however, for the opening adagio of the closing movement, and the brilliantly achieved finale to dispel this passing impression.

In her playing of the 'cello, Miss Harrison gives little evidence of her slender girlishness. While her tone is not big, it has plenty of "body," and is firm and true, as well as pure and melodious. She gave last evening Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme," an elaborate composition of many intricacies, which she conquered with surprising ease and fluency. The andante sostenuto measures brought forth many tones of mellow sweetness and emotional appeal, and in the cadenzas the execution was of unfaltering ease and brilliancy of effect. The audience surrendered to the attractive personality and musical proficiency of the young artist, and gave her a justly earned reward of enthusiastic applause.

The program was completed by the orchestra in its presentations of Wagner's "A Faust Overture," which was the second number, and the "Der Freischutz" overture of Weber, at the end. Both of these were given with the highest attainment of excellence, the beautiful Weber overture, with the soulful melody for the horn at the opening—familiar as the air of a favorite hymn—and its succeeding full sweep of rhapsodic melody, furnishing an appropriate and impressive climax.

The Boston Orchestra already has announced its five local concerts for next season, on Monday evenings, November 1 and 29, January 3, Febuary 14 and March 13, with G [illegible] Farrar, Madame Melba and F

ING SUN
Baltimore, Md.

Est 1884

The first Sibelius symphony, which is to be heard at the Boston Orchestra concert this evening, was composed in 1899 and published in 1902. It is the first of four symphonies by the interesting Finnish composer, who was born in Tavastehus in 1865, but who is now living at Helsingfors, where the symphony was probably given its first performance, although there is no record of this event. It was first heard in Berlin in 1900 at a concert of Finnish music led by Kejanus in July, 1900. It was not played in Boston until 1907.

It seems to be of a very elemental and passionate nature, with characteristic beauties that will seem strange enough to unaccustomed ears. It opens, for instance, with a song for the clarinet that rises and falls over a drum roll, a mournful melody that is said to have an irresistible fascination. The work is full of mystery, of surprising crescendos, of syncopated ryhthms. The wood wind is used throughout to express unexpected moods. It is an emotional and colorful work, modern and different, with a scherzo that is said to have a national humor that to Southern nations must seem strangely wild and fantastic. The work ends with a mighty climax that is described as "tempestuously passionate." It will be interesting to hear this music, which is evidently so different from any music that has been played here for many months. The concert will have an additional interest for Baltimoreans because on this occasion Gustav Strube's "Variations on an Original Theme" will be heard here for the first time. Beatrice English violoncel- "Varia-

---

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Establishe

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Beatrice Harrison, 'Cellist, Heard as Assisting Artist.

The thirtieth season of the Boston Orchestra in Philadelphia ended last night with a concert which attracted a capacity audience to the Academy of Music. Aside from the Brahms C Minor Symphony, the program was not entirely pleasing. Two overtures were used, the Wagner "Faust" and Weber's overture to "Der Freischuetz." Beatrice Harrison, a young English 'cellist, played Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme." The playing of the program was fully up to the artistic standards established by Dr. Muck, the symphony especially being wonderfully done. Miss Harrison is a newcomer to Philadelphia and was welcomed with that warmth which characterizes this city's attitude toward visiting artists. The Tchaikowsky "Variations" are not sufficiently novel to arouse great enthusiasm unless exceptionally well played. Miss Harrison is a player of pleasing personality, with a good technique, but with rather thin, colorless tone. She possesses the style of temperament that expresses itself in mannerisms, and for that reason her tone probably suffers in the loss of some of its natural richness. She apparently made a strong impression on the audience.

PERCY HEMUS' RECITAL

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City

Date

Esta 1884

Variety of inviting mood, refreshment for the jaded mind, marked the last evening of the Boston Symphony Orchstra in Carnegie Hall till next November. For the first time in many months, Dr. Muck forgot his countrymen and presented works by a Frenchman and a Russian, with a recent American novelty between. Among the fourteen composers in the series before, there had been but one "outlander" on a famous occasion, Sibelius, the Finn.

While last night's "Harold in Italy" may be as dead as Byron, it is yet true that Berlioz in his music invented all the thunders of latter-day despots of din. The premier band made his Gallic grace and clarity shine, and Emile Ferir won the leader's handshake for a solo viola of golden tone. At the evening's close, the tragic Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" still held the auditors spellbound.

It spoke well for a native tone poem three years "young," by the Bostonian F. S. Converse, to hold its own in such company. The Persian "Ormazd," a battle of worlds of light with powers of darkness, told its own story. As an approach to novelty in music, it was enjoyable to hear, particularly so in a sanely balanced programme of varied culture and sympathetic appeal.

To-night the band bids farewell to Brooklyn, and to-morrow to all New York, when the Carnegie Hall series ends with Schubert, Dvorak and D'Indy.

From HERALD
Address: New York City

Date

k, 188

MR. CONVERSE'S "ORMAZA" PLAYED

Boston Orchestra Presents Modern Work by Resident of Its Own City.

Coming from Boston for its last pair of concerts this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall presented as its chief novelty a work of a composer of its own city, Frederick S. Converse. The work was "Ormazd," a symphonic poem.

The subject matter of the work is taken from the mythology of ancient Persia, but the music is in the most modern vein, with a celeste, a piano, muted trumpets and most of the latest combinations of instruments now in favor with French composers, with the whole tone scale of Debussy and many other harmonic contrivances which put to shame the harmonies of Beethoven when it comes to picturing dark subjects, Mr. Converse has fashioned his music.

The work was played here at a meeting of the National Institute of Arts and Letters by the orchestra of the Symphony Society early in the season. It has one or two real melodies which crop out at rare intervals; it has some really effective moments of dramatic climax, but the general impression was that of a work put together none too smoothly or logically. It evidently made no impression on the audience, which was almost silent at its close, although its difficulties, which are many, were overcome brilliantly by Dr. Muck and the men whom he directed.

The applause which followed Berliz's "Harold in Italy" was not much stronger. The notes were played precisely, with all the effectiveness which Berlioz, master of orchestral effect, could have asked for, and the viola solo running all through the four long movements was played well by Emil Ferir. Somehow

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date MAR 19 1915

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Dr. Muck führte uns im geſtrigen Abendkonzert der Boſtoner, dem vorletzten der Saiſon, ein „Ormazd" genanntes ſymphoniſches Poem des amerikaniſchen Komponiſten Frederick Shepherd Converſe, Op. 30, vor. Die dem Tongedicht zu Grunde liegende Idee ſtammt aus der altperſiſchen Mythologie und behandelt den Konflikt zwiſchen den nach Zoroaſter zu Göttern gewordenen Prinzipienträgern von Gut und Böſe: Ormazd und Ahriman, dem aufbauenden, reſp. dem vernichtenden Prinzip im Weltall. Dieſer intermittirende Konflikt wird ſeiner Zeit mit dem Siege von Ormazd und der Läuterung von Ahriman und deſſen Opfern durch das reinigende Feuer von Ormazd erfolgen.

Das Werk iſt in einem Satze in durchaus freier Form aufgebaut. Nach den vom Komponiſten ſelbſt beigeſtellten Erklärungen verſammelt Ormazd zu Beginn die himmliſchen Heerſcharen, was durch einander antwortende Trompetenſignale illuſtrirt wird. Die Signale kommen näher, vereinigen ſich, bis eine martialiſch anmuthende Melodie die Sammlung und den Vorbeimarſch der Heerſcharen des Lichts ankündigt. Nachdem dieſe Klänge verhallen, ertönen die Lobeshymnen der geſegneten „Fravaſhis", der Seelen der Guten und Gerechten, zum Preiſe von Ormazd. In lebhaftem Kontraſte hierzu hört man, ein ſchauerliches Stöhnen, die Aeußerungen von Ahriman und den verlornen Seelen, wobei die Muſik nach emotioneller und pſychologiſcher Bedeutung ſtrebt. Drei Mal arbeitet ſich das dunkle Motiv Ahriman's zu einem Höhepunkt auf, bis der Konflikt zwiſchen ihm und Ormazd ausbricht, in welchem Ahriman den Untergang erleidet. Dazwiſchen ſind Epiſoden eingeſchoben, welche das Sehnen und die Reue der verlorenen Seelen ,traurige und dann wieder ſüße Erinnerungen verfloſſener Freuden ausmalen. Das Tonpoem endet mit einem Reſumé der Freudenhymnen der Heerſcharen des Lichts und der Lobesgeſänge der Fravaſhis.

Converſe bemerkt hierzu: „Ich habe keine „orientaliſche" Muſik geſchrieben. Mein muſikaliſches Idiom iſt durchweg modern. Die poetiſche Idee hat mich lediglich wegen ihres reichen dekorativen und pittoresken Ausdrucks elementarer Wahrheiten gefeſſelt, Wahrheiten, welche heute für uns in Amerika ebenſo richtgebend ſind, als für die Gefolgſchaft Zoroaſter's. Unzweifelhaft hat ein Jeder von uns ſowohl einen Ormazd als einen Ahriman in ſich, daher meinem Werke möglicherweiſe ſubjektive, emotionelle Bedeutung zukommt, ſowie ihm auch dekorative und phantaſtiſche Momente inne wohnen mögen."

Das allzulang ausgeſponnene Converſe'ſche Werk leidet vor allem an einem nichts weniger als wähleriſchen thematiſchen Material, und namentlich das Marſchthema, das Ormazd, den Gott des Lichts, charakteriſiren ſoll, iſt eigentlich unerlaubt unfein. Wir ſind es aber nun ſchon einmal gewöhnt, bei den modernen Komponiſten mehr nach dem „Wie" zu fragen, als nach dem „Was", und da ſoll denn anerkannt werden, daß Converſe, der übrigens ſtark von Richard Strauß beeinflußt iſt, ganz artige Klangkombination zuſammenzubrauen verſteht, die ſeinem Poem ſtellenweiſe ein üppiges Kolorit geben. Was fehlt, iſt Ordnung und Harmonie im archetektoniſchen Aufbau, ſind logiſche Entwicklung. Die Harmonie iſt modern ſtark gewürzt, ohne gerade anarchiſtiſch zu werden. Bei einer ſo pompöſen Ausführung, wie ſie dem Werk geſtern zutheil wurde, wird es ſtets einen gewiſſen Effekt machen. Das Publikum zeigte ſich geſtern nicht gerade ſehr entzückt.

Berlioz' „Harold"-Symphonie habe ich ſelten ſo berückend tonſchön und mit liebevoller Herausſtreichung ſeiner koloriſtiſchen Wirkungen ſpielen gehört als geſtern unter Dr. Muck's Stab. Alles was an Feingehalt, an Farbe und Glanz in dieſem Werk ſteckt, wurde prächtig gehoben, und der dunkelſammtne Klang der Bratſche Herrn Emile Férir's verlieh der Aufführung einen einheitlichen Zug, einen ſtimmungsvollen Grundton ohne Gleichen. Ich wüßte keiner Orcheſtergruppe den Vorzug zu geben, wenn ich auch der ungemein feinen Filigranarbeit der Holzbläſer in der „Serenade", dem dritten Satz der Symphonie, beſonders gedenken möchte. Tſchaikowsky's „Romeo und Julie"-Phantaſie, wie mir geſagt wird, ganz unvergleichlich geſpielt, beendete ein den Alliirten und Neutralen gewidmetes Programm, das aber auch den Nicht-Alliirten einen vollen Genuß gewähren mußte. H.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date MAR 19 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Dr. Muck Gives Another Dry Gaunt Pro-Ally Programme.

Can Dr. Carl Muck possibly feel any gratification in seeing a large, eager and trustful audience, assembled in a mood of docile enthusiasm, and then proceeding to bore it to actual pallor, dejection and spiritual death by gaunt and tedious programmes? So one was compelled to think last night at the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall, as on certain similar occasions during the season. The musical pabulum proffered last night included Hector Berlioz's decidedly unpopular "Harold in Italy," and a work—very decidedly a work—called "Ormazd," by the Boston Berlioz, Mr. Converse, at the conclusion of which the auditory which crowded the house was in no good humor. For Berlioz there is no possible excuse; but of Converse we have had all we had deserved. Has Dr. Muck really paid attention to certain absurd nonsense spoken at the beginning of the season, and is he giving us pro-Ally music.? It is not very good.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

An American Composition by F. S. Converse Played.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has come to New York for the last concerts of its series here this season, the first of which was given last evening in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Muck presented one of his modern programs; or, at least, a program that suggested modernity. Berlioz's symphony "Harold in Italy" no longer sounds very modern, and has been known to New York for a good many years, more than fifty. It is doubtful, however, whether New York has learned to like it or whether it really will.

Like many of Berlioz's works, it is more interesting to read about than to hear. Its history embodies some of the romantic incidents that appear in Berlioz's career, and the music some of his ambitious strivings toward a new and revolutionary style. But at this day his inspiration seems to lag woefully behind his striving. It is unmistakably dull, and even so beautifully wrought a performance as it received last night cannot make it seem other than dull. Mr. Emile Férir played the viola obligato most artistically and authoritatively, with fine tone and finished style.

Dr. Muck "recognized" the American composer in this concert by playing Mr. Frederick S. Converse's symphonic poem "Ormazd," that was heard here last November at a special concert, when compositions of the members of the National Institute of Art and Letters were played at a meeting of that body. Last night's performance was more favorable to the piece. The composer has been most ambitious in it; he has used all the resources of the largest modern orchestra, adding thereto the pianoforte and the celesta. It is intended to represent the defeat of the malevolent Ahriman by Ormazd, as related in Persian mythology. It is elaborate in its themes and their development in its wealth of detail.

It is undoubtedly descriptive in intent, interpreting an Oriental poem that was printed in the program notes in a translation by Percy Mackaye. But Mr. Converse has not made the mistake of lapsing from the ideal of presenting, first and foremost, musical values in a whole that is essentially musical in its conception.

The composer has been more fortunate in passages that relate to the triumph of the forces of light than in the conflict, in the moaning of Ahreman, his loathing of Ormazd. There are passages in which the instrumentation seems to have fallen short of the intention; passages in which the results are not wholly commensurate with the means employed—not in violence, but in color and richness, in dramatic expressiveness. But its most successful portions are extremely fine, imposing, not unworthy of the gorgeous imagery of the poem.

The last number was Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasy on "Romeo and Juliet," one of his compositions that best holds its own. It was played with impressive and gloomy power, with sweep and passion.

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date MAR 19

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Last Evening Concert Not an Exciting Event.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last evening concert of its current season in this city in Carnegie Hall last evening. The programme comprised Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, F. S. Converse's symphonic poem, "Ormazd" and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet." Mr. Converse's composition was new to audiences at these concerts. The work was produced in Boston on February 10, 1912, and was played in this city in November at a concert which was part of the proceedings of the annual meeting of the National Institute of Arts and Letters.

The literary materials behind the composition are found in Persian mythology. Zoroaster's followers deified light and darkness as Ormazd and Ahriman, gods of good and evil. Naturally they are in conflict and in time good conquers. Mr. Converse found in the story "decorative and picturesque expression of elemental truths," for each of us has his own inner [illegible] Ahriman.

If the composer had been greatly inspired by his material it would have been a cause for general joy; but he has given us only an ambitious piece of music which is replete with brilliant orchestral effects, but poor in thematic invention and development. It was admirably played last night and was kindly received.

Many people love the music of Berlioz. Among them are the principal orchestra conductors, who find in it heights and depths not discoverable by common minds. Dr. Muck has always loved Berlioz and he conducted the "Harold in Italy" symphony in a masterly manner, while Emile Ferir played the viola obligato beautifully. But it was all unavailing with those dull ones to whom the glorification of this symphony becomes more and more incomprehensible with each repetition.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date MAR 19 191

MUCK GIVES AMERICAN SYMPHONY

"Ormazd," a Tone Poem by Frederick S. Converse, Is Made the Feature of the Programme Played by the Boston Orchestra

Work Inspired by Ancient Persian Mythology Represents the Struggle Between Light and Darkness, Good and Evil

Many complaints have been heard regarding the lack of interest manifested by important orchestral leaders in the efforts of modern American composers. Dr. Muck is not to be classed with the neglectful ones, for at last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall an American symphonic poem occupied the place of honor on the programme.

The work in question was entitled "Ormazd"; the composer, Frederick S. Converse; the inspiration, a chapter of ancient Persian mythology. The basic idea of "Ormazd" is the struggle between light and darkness: the battle of good and evil, which, after the usual experiences of triumph and defeat, terminates in the vanquishing of the sinister influence.

Mr. Converse has made no attempt to tell his story in Oriental fashion. His music is essentially modern, lucid and eloquent. The score contains tremendous passages in the presentation of the great conflict. The composer's use of ascending and descending chromatic scales to the accompaniment of the booming drums and clashing cymbals gave the auditor a vivid picture of the struggle of the two powers.

The termination—the conquest of the heavenly hosts—was set forth in new and pleasing tonalities, elaborated in an ingenious and skilful fashion.

The symphony was "Harold in Italy," by Berlioz, in which the solo viola part was magnificently interpreted by Emile Ferir. Tschaikowsky's overture fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," was the last number on a long programme, but a programme interpreted with scholarliness, unblemished balance and delightful tonal color.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date

"ORMAZD" NOT IMPRESSIVE.

Converse Symphonic Poem Given by the Boston Orchestra.

The last of the evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Carnegie Hall. On Saturday afternoon the final New York performance of the season will be given. There was the customarily large audience last night, but after the tedious Converse symphonic poem "Ormazd" persons started to leave. This, despite the fact that there remained to be performed Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture fantasia.

The programme was by no means as uninteresting as some Dr. Muck has fashioned for his New York audiences this year, yet it was wanting in contrast. The Berlioz "Harold in Italy" symphony was masterfully played, and the viola music running throughout was in the most efficient care of Emile Ferir.

Mr. Converse's symphonic poem had its first public hearing in this city.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date MAR 19 1915

The fifth and last evening concert of its twenty-ninth season in New York was given in Carnegie Hall yesterday by the Boston Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Muck. There was no solo performer, and the programme comprised three numbers only, two of which had had previous performances in New York this season. They were Frederick Converse's symphonic poem, "Ormazd," and Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." Mr. Converse's composition had a quasi-public hearing last November at a concert of American music given by Walter Damrosch and the orchestra of the Symphony Society for the edification of the American Academy and the National Institute of Arts and Letters and their friends.

It is a piece of programme music of large dimensions and equally large strivings, its theme, as was set forth with considerable fullness in this journal on the earlier occasion, being nothing less than the warfare between Ormazd and Ahriman, the representatives of good and evil in the religious system of Zoroaster. It was not thee Nietzschean interpretation of the Zoroastrian philosophy which Mr. Converse tried to set to music, but the contest between the two opposing gods and their hosts conceived as Milton conceived the battle of the angels, with a relief bringing section in which the blest Fravashis (the souls of the good) hymn the virtues of Ormazd, and a finale in which Ahriman and his followers are purified by the purging fires of Ormazd. In these two sections the most of Mr. Converse's music which appeals to ears attuned to beauty and to the emotions and imagination is found. Here there are plastic themes as well as much fascinating harmonic and instrumental color.

The work was magnificently played. It fell between Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, which sounded decidedly threadbare, though Mr. Ferrir held the close attention of the audience by his masterly playing of the viola solo, and the Tschaikowsky number.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 17
Established:

LAST OF THE SERIES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Give a Concert Here Friday Evening.

The last concert of the season 1914-15 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the opera house of the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 19, at 8:15. The soloist will be Miss Beatrice Harrison, the young English 'cellist, from whom much may be expected in the way of finished work.

The programme to be presented by Dr. Muck includes Mozart's Symphony in C major, No. 4, "Jupiter" (K. 551); Goldmark's overture "Sakuntala," and Dvorak's overture "Carnival."

Miss Harrison will play Tschaikowsky's variations on a Rococo theme for violoncello with orchestral accompaniment, Op. 33.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 17 1915

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, March 19. The concert should be more than usually interesting. At the beginning of the season the management of the orchestra promised but three soloists, Messrs. Amato, Bauer and Kreisler, all of whom have appeared. Notwithstanding this, there will be a soloist at this last concert, Beatrice Harrison, the young English violoncellist. Those who have been fortunate enough to hear Miss Harrison play will agree readily that she has a most remarkable talent, and those who have yet to hear her play have decidedly a treat before them. It seems to be accepted that Pablo Casals, the Spanish 'cellist, is a unique figure in the world of art. That being true, it is equally certain that Miss Harrison more nearly approaches him than any other practitioner of this instrument. Miss Harrison took the gold medal given jointly by the Royal Academy and Royal College of Music of London when she was nine years old, the youngest who had ever received that honor, and when she was seventeen she received the Mendelssohn Prize in Berlin. A greater part of her studying was done with Hugo Becker, of Frankfort. The programme comprises Mozart's symphony in C major, "Jupiter"; Goldmark's glowingly Oriental overture, "Sakuntala"; Tschaikowsky's variations on a rococo theme for violoncello and orchestra, and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture.

[131]

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date [illegible] 2 1915

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Dr. Muck führte uns im geſtrigen Abendkonzert der Boſtoner, dem vorletzten der Saiſon, ein „Ormazd" genanntes ſymphoniſches Poem des amerikaniſchen Komponiſten Frederick Shepherd Converſe, Op. 30, vor. Die dem Tongedicht zu Grunde liegende Idee ſtammt aus der altperſiſchen Mythologie und behandelt den Konflikt zwiſchen den nach Zoroaſter zu Göttern gewordenen Prinzipienträgern von Gut und Böſe: Ormazd und Ahriman, dem aufbauenden, reſp. dem vernichtenden Prinzip im Weltall. Dieſer intermittirende Konflikt wird ſeiner Zeit mit dem Siege von Ormazd und der Läuterung von Ahriman und deſſen Opfern durch das reinigende Feuer von Ormazd erfolgen.

Das Werk iſt in einem Satze in durchaus freier Form aufgebaut. Nach den vom Komponiſten ſelbſt beigeſtellten Erklärungen verſammelt Ormazd zu Beginn die himmliſchen Heerſcharen, was durch einander antwortende Trompetenſignale illuſtrirt wird. Die Signale kommen näher, vereinigen ſich, bis eine martialiſch anmuthende Melodie die Sammlung und den Vorbeimarſch der Heerſcharen des Lichts ankündigt. Nachdem dieſe Klänge verhallen, ertönen die Lobeshymnen der geſegneten „Fravaſhis", der Seelen der Guten und Gerechten, zum Preiſe von Ormazd. In lebhaftem Kontraſte hierzu hört man, ein ſchauerliches Stöhnen, die Aeußerungen von Ahriman und den verlornen Seelen, wobei die Muſik nach emotioneller und pſychologiſcher Bedeutung ſtrebt. Drei Mal arbeitet ſich das dunkle Motiv Ahriman's zu einem Höhepunkt auf, bis der Konflikt zwiſchen ihm und Ormazd ausbricht, in welchem Ahriman den Untergang erleidet. Dazwiſchen ſind Epiſoden eingeſchoben, welche das Sehnen und die Reue der verlorenen Seelen ,traurige und dann wieder ſüße Erinnerungen verfloſſener Freuden ausmalen. Das Tonpoem endet mit einem Reſumé der Freudenhymnen der Heerſcharen des Lichts und der Lobesgeſänge der Fravaſhis.

Converſe bemerkt hierzu: „Ich habe keine „orientaliſche" Muſik geſchrieben. Mein muſikaliſches Idiom iſt durchweg modern. Die poetiſche Idee hat mich lediglich wegen ihres reichen dekorativen und pittoresken Ausdrucks elementarer Wahrheiten gefeſſelt, Wahrheiten, welche heute für uns in Amerika ebenſo richtgebend ſind, als für die Gefolgſchaft Zoroaſter's. Unzweifelhaft hat ein Jeder von uns ſowohl einen Ormazd als einen Ahriman in ſich, daher meinem Werke möglicherweiſe ſubjektive, emotionelle Bedeutung zukommt, ſowie ihm auch dekorative und phantaſtiſche Momente inne wohnen mögen."

Das allzulang ausgeſponnene Converſe'ſche Werk leidet vor allem an einem nichts weniger als wähleriſchen thematiſchen Material, und namentlich das Marſchthema, das Ormazd, den Gott des Lichts, charakteriſiren ſoll, iſt eigentlich unerlaubt unfein. Wir ſind es aber nun ſchon einmal gewöhnt, bei den modernen Komponiſten mehr nach dem „Wie" zu fragen, als nach dem „Was", und da ſoll denn anerkannt werden, daß Converſe, der übrigens ſtark von Richard Strauß beeinflußt iſt, ganz artige Klangkombination zuſammenzubrauen verſteht, die ſeinem Poem ſtellenweiſe ein üppiges Kolorit geben. Was fehlt, iſt Ordnung und Harmonie im archetektoniſchen Aufbau, ſind logiſche Entwicklung. Die Harmonie iſt modern ſtark gewürzt, ohne gerade anarchiſtiſch zu werden. Bei einer ſo pompöſen Ausführung, wie ſie dem Werk geſtern zutheil wurde, wird es ſtets einen gewiſſen Effekt machen. Das Publikum zeigte ſich geſtern nicht gerade ſehr entzückt.

Berlioz' „Harold"-Symphonie habe ich ſelten ſo berückend tonſchön und mit liebevoller Herausſtreichung ſeiner koloriſtiſchen Wirkungen ſpielen gehört als geſtern unter Dr. Muck's Stab. Alles was an Feingehalt, an Farbe und Glanz in dieſem Werk ſteckt, wurde prächtig gehoben, und der dunkelſammtne Klang der Bratſche Herrn Emile Férir's verlieh der Aufführung einen einheitlichen Zug, einen ſtimmungsvollen Grundton ohne Gleichen. Ich wüßte keiner Orcheſtergruppe den Vorzug zu geben, wenn ich auch der ungemein feinen Filigranarbeit der Holzbläſer in der „Serenade", dem dritten Satz der Symphonie, beſonders gedenken möchte. Tſchaikowſky's „Romeo und Julie"-Phantaſie, wie mir geſagt wird, ganz unvergleichlich geſpielt, beendete ein den Alliirten und Neutralen gewidmetes Programm, das aber auch den Nicht-Alliirten einen vollen Genuß gewähren mußte. H.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Dr. Muck Gives Another Dry Gaunt Pro-Ally Programme.

Can Dr. Carl Muck possibly feel any gratification in seeing a large, eager and trustful audience, assembled in a mood of docile enthusiasm, and then proceeding to bore it to actual pallor, dejection and spiritual death by gaunt and tedious programmes? So one was compelled to think last night at the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall, as on certain similar occasions during the season. The musical pabulum proffered last night included Hector Berlioz's decidedly unpopular "Harold in Italy," and a work—very decidedly a work—called "Ormazd," by the Boston Berlioz, Mr. Converse, at the conclusion of which the auditory which crowded the house was in no good humor. For Berlioz there is no possible excuse; but of Converse we have had all we had deserved. Has Dr. Muck really paid attention to certain absurd nonsense spoken at the beginning of the season, and is he giving us pro-Ally music.? It is not very good.

DIVORCED

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

An American Composition by F. S. Converse Played.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has come to New York for the last concerts of its series here this season, the first of which was given last evening in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Muck presented one of his modern programs; or, at least, a program that suggested modernity. Berlioz's symphony "Harold in Italy" no longer sounds very modern, and has been known to New York for a good many years, more than fifty. It is doubtful, however, whether New York has learned to like it or whether it really will.

Like many of Berlioz's works, it is more interesting to read about than to hear. Its history embodies some of the romantic incidents that appear in Berlioz's career, and the music some of his ambitious strivings toward a new and revolutionary style. But at this day his inspiration seems to lag woefully behind his striving. It is unmistakably dull, and even so beautifully wrought a performance as it received last night cannot make it seem other than dull. Mr. Emile Férir played the viola obligato most artistically and authoritatively, with fine tone and finished style.

Dr. Muck "recognized" the American composer in this concert by playing Mr. Frederick S. Converse's symphonic poem "Ormazd," that was heard here last November at a special concert, when compositions of the members of the National Institute of Art and Letters were played at a meeting of that body. Last night's performance was more favorable to the piece. The composer has been most ambitious in it; he has used all the resources of the largest modern orchestra, adding thereto the pianoforte and the celesta. It is intended to represent the defeat of the malevolent Ahriman by Ormazd, as related in Persian mythology. It is elaborate in its themes and their development in its wealth of detail.

It is undoubtedly descriptive in intent, interpreting an Oriental poem that was printed in the program notes in a translation by Percy Mackaye. But Mr. Converse has not made the mistake of lapsing from the ideal of presenting, first and foremost, musical values in a whole that is essentially musical in its conception.

The composer has been more fortunate in passages that relate to the triumph of the forces of light than in the conflict, in the moaning of Ahreman, his loathing of Ormazd. There are passages in which the instrumentation seems to have fallen short of the intention; passages in which the results are not wholly commensurate with the means employed—not in violence, but in color and richness, in dramatic expressiveness. But its most successful portions are extremely fine, imposing, not unworthy of the gorgeous imagery of the poem.

The last number was Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasy on "Romeo and Juliet," one of his compositions that best holds its own. It was played with impressive and gloomy power, with sweep and passion.

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Last Evening Concert Not an Exciting Event.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last evening concert of its current season in this city in Carnegie Hall last evening. The programme comprised Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, F. S. Converse's symphonic poem, "Ormazd" and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet." Mr. Converse's composition was new to audiences at these concerts. The work was produced in Boston on February 10, 1912, and was played in this city in November at a concert which was part of the proceedings of the annual meeting of the National Institute of Arts and Letters.

The literary materials behind the composition are found in Persian mythology. Zoroaster's followers deified light and darkness as Ormazd and Ahriman, gods of good and evil. Naturally they are in conflict and in time good conquers. Mr. Converse found in the story "decorative and picturesque expression of elemental truths," for each of us has his own [illegible] Ahriman.

If the composer had been greatly inspired by his material it would have been a cause for general joy; but he has given us only an ambitious piece of music which is replete with brilliant orchestral effects, but poor in thematic invention and development. It was admirably played last night and was kindly received.

Many people love the music of Berlioz. Among them are the principal orchestra conductors, who find in it heights and depths not discoverable by common minds. Dr. Muck has always loved Berlioz and he conducted the "Harold in Italy" symphony in a masterly manner, while Emile Ferir played the viola obbligato beautifully. But it was all unavailing with those dull ones to whom the glorification of this symphony becomes more and more incomprehensible with each repetition.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date

MUCK GIVES AMERICAN SYMPHONY

"Ormazd," a Tone Poem by Frederick S. Converse, Is Made the Feature of the Programme Played by the Boston Orchestra

Work Inspired by Ancient Persian Mythology Represents the Struggle Between Light and Darkness, Good and Evil

MANY complaints have been heard regarding the lack of interest manifested by important orchestral leaders in the efforts of modern American composers. Dr. Muck is not to be classed with the neglectful ones, for at last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall an American symphonic poem occupied the place of honor on the programme.

The work in question was entitled "Ormazd"; the composer, Frederick S. Converse; the inspiration, a chapter of ancient Persian mythology. The basic idea of "Ormazd" is the struggle between light and darkness: the battle of good and evil, which, after the usual experiences of triumph and defeat, terminates in the vanquishing of the sinister influence.

Mr. Converse has made no attempt to tell his story in Oriental fashion. His music is essentially modern, lucid and eloquent. The score contains tremendous passages in the presentation of the great conflict. The composer's use of ascending and descending chromatic scales to the accompaniment of the booming drums and clashing cymbals gave the auditor a vivid picture of the struggle of the two powers.

The termination—the conquest of the heavenly hosts—was set forth in new and pleasing tonalities, elaborated in an ingenious and skillful fashion.

The symphony was "Harold in Italy," by Berlioz, in which the solo viola part was magnificently interpreted by Emile Ferir. Tschaikowsky's overture fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," was the last number on a long programme, but a programme interpreted with scholarliness, unblemished balance and delightful tonal color.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date

"ORMAZD" NOT IMPRESSIVE.

Converse Symphonic Poem Given by the Boston Orchestra.

The last of the evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Carnegie Hall. On Saturday afternoon the final New York performance of the season will be given. There was the customarily large audience last night, but after the tedious Converse symphonic poem "Ormazd" persons started to leave. This, despite the fact that there remained to be performed Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture fantasia.

The programme was by no means as uninteresting as some Dr. Muck has fashioned for his New York audiences this year, yet it was wanting in contrast. The Berlioz "Harold in Italy" symphony was masterfully played, and the viola music running throughout was in the most efficient care of Emile Ferir.

Mr. Converse's symphonic poem had its first public hearing in this city.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date [illegible] 19 1915

The fifth and last evening concert of its twenty-ninth season in New York was given in Carnegie Hall yesterday by the Boston Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Muck. There was no solo performer, and the programme comprised three numbers only, two of which had had previous performances in New York this season. They were Frederick Converse's symphonic poem, "Ormazd," and Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." Mr. Converse's composition had a quasi-public hearing last November at a concert of American music given by Walter Damrosch and the orchestra of the Symphony Society for the edification of the American Academy and the National Institute of Arts and Letters and their friends.

It is a piece of programme music of large dimensions and equally large strivings, its theme, as was set forth with considerable fullness in this journal on the earlier occasion, being nothing less than the warfare between Ormazd and Ahriman, the representatives of good and evil in the religious system of Zoroaster. It was not thee Nietzschean interpretation of the Zoroastrian philosophy which Mr. Converse tried to set to music, but the contest between the two opposing gods and their hosts conceived as Milton conceived the battle of the angels, with a relief bringing section in which the blest Fravashis (the souls of the good) hymn the virtues of Ormazd, and a finale in which Ahriman and his followers are purified by the purging fires of Ormazd. In these two sections the most of Mr. Converse's music which appeals to ears attuned to beauty and to the emotions and imagination is found. Here there are plastic themes as well as much fascinating harmonic and instrumental color.

The work was magnificently played. It fell between Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, which sounded decidedly threadbare, though Mr. Ferrir held the close attention of the audience by his masterly playing of the viola solo, and the Tschaikowsky number.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date
Established:

LAST OF THE SERIES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Give a Concert Here Friday Evening.

The last concert of the season 1914-15 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the opera house of the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 19, at 8:15. The soloist will be Miss Beatrice Harrison, the young English 'cellist, from whom much may be expected in the way of finished work.

The programme to be presented by Dr. Muck includes Mozart's Symphony in C major, No. 4, "Jupiter" (K. 551); Goldmark's overture "Sakuntala," and Dvorak's overture "Carnival."

Miss Harrison will play Tschaikowsky's variations on a Rococo theme for violoncello with orchestral accompaniment, Op. 33.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date [illegible] 7 1915

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, March 19. The concert should be more than usually interesting. At the beginning of the season the management of the orchestra promised but three soloists, Messrs. Amato, Bauer and Kreisler, all of whom have appeared. Notwithstanding this, there will be a soloist at this last concert, Beatrice Harrison, the young English violoncellist. Those who have been fortunate enough to hear Miss Harrison play will agree readily that she has a most remarkable talent, and those who have yet to hear her play have decidedly a treat before them. It seems to be accepted that Pablo Casals, the Spanish 'cellist, is a unique figure in the world of art. That being true, it is equally certain that Miss Harrison more nearly approaches him than any other practitioner of this instrument. Miss Harrison took the gold medal given jointly by the Royal Academy and Royal College of Music of London when she was nine years old, the youngest who had ever received that honor, and when she was seventeen she received the Mendelssohn Prize in Berlin. A greater part of her studying was done with Hugo Becker, of Frankfort. The programme comprises Mozart's symphony in C major, "Jupiter"; Goldmark's glowingly Oriental overture, "Sakuntala"; Tschaikowsky's variations on a rococo theme for violoncello and orchestra, and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City
MAR 19 1

Music.

The Boston Symphony's Last Evening Concert.

Dr. Muck has been niggardly of French and of Russian music on his programmes this season. For the fifth and last evening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night he chose to open the programme with a French symphony—Berlioz's "Harold in Italy"—and to close it with a Russian overture-fantasia—Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet." The remaining number on the programme was a symphonic poem. "Ormazd," by F. S. Converse, often spoken of as a Boston composer, though he happened to be born in Newton, Mass., and is now a resident of Westwood in the same state.

Some of us regret that Dr. Muck neglects certain modern French pieces—two symphonies by d'Indy, the symphony of the lamented Chausson, the superb "Istar" variations of d'Indy. The names of Debussy, Chabrier, Dukas, Ravel, even of the venerable Saint-Saëns have not appeared on the programmes of the New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season; nor has the great name of César Franck, the Belgian who left his indelible imprint on modern French music. But I am far from being one of those who decry Hector Berlioz, and his "Harold in Italy" symphony, though not embodying his best work, can enchain the attention to-day when performed as it was last night.

We may smile now at the romantic gloom of Byron and we may find this symphony of Berlioz fundamentally naïve, but listening can we deny the beauty and charm of many a page of Berlioz's score, the spell the march of the pilgrims still casts, the exotic quaintness of the mountaineer's serenade, the vigor and dash of the finale? The symphony was written in 1834, and yet in this year of grace the orchestration is still fascinating, still gorgeous. Dr. Muck read the work with the right romantic feeling and the orchestra played with the finish for which it is famed and with splendid energy. The solo viola part was entrusted to Emile Férir, a Belgian, and one of the men who make the Boston Symphony Orchestra the supreme thing it is. In his hands the viola part was notable for richness of tone, sureness, and elegance of delivery, and emotional warmth. The applause of the great audience at the conclusion of the symphony was hearty and long continued.

There is Russian music that would have been thrice welcome last night, but carrying coals to Newcastle is a phrase that should yield its place to carrying Tschaikowsky to New York. Ever since Wassily Safonoff brought his batonless hands to the gold coast of this little island Tschaikowsky has been an increasing nuisance to our steady concertgoer. The mere occasional concertgoer may revel in his occasional collision with Tschaikowsky's music, as he may in the plum pudding of Thanksgiving and Christmas, or the secret, awful frenzy of an annual chocolate ice cream soda jag. But the dismay of the steady concertgoer when the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town carrying Tschaikowsky in its music rolls! However, let us be glad it was "Romeo and Juliet" and not one of the two symphonies that are pitiably overworked.

"Ormazd" might. I suppose, be termed an indigenous novelty. "Exotic novelty" is flung so freely at anything by Schönberg or Stravinsky that some ardent souls seem to lose sight of the fact that "exotic" being what it is the Ninth Symphony was once an "exotic novelty" and remains for us an exotic. "Ormazd," however, is indigenous to Boston, or Westwood, and can be carried about the country by a distinguished Boston organization with propriety and safety. At least one supposes such is the theory. But every once in a while one longs to get up and throw something at the Boston Symphony Orchestra for wasting its time and ours.

It is one of the blessings of peace and neutrality that music in New York is still music, whether it be the music of Boston, London, Paris, Petrograd, or Spillville, Iowa, the community in which the late Dvorak composed his one symphony that posterity is likely to listen to. It is easy to see why Belgians might prefer to turn a deaf ear to German music for some time to come, and it is possible to understand, if it is difficult altogether to approve, the stand taken by the venerable Saint-Säens against the composer whom he at one time worked so steadfastly to establish in France, Richard Wagner. But New York is happily at peace with Boston and has every prospect of remaining at peace unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra insists on forcing upon us many more Boston products like unto this "Ormazd."

The work in question was played here last autumn by the Symphony Society of New York at a meeting in Aeolian Hall of the National Institute of Arts and Letters. That performance if not exactly private was certainly not public. "Ormazd" has to do with the Zoroastrian deification of light and darkness as the gods of good and evil under the respective names of Ormazd and Ahriman. It is an orchestral struggle between two principles ending with the victory of Ormazd. It is also a bombastic, empty, noisy piece, recalling now Rimsky-Korsakoff, now Liszt, always with the thought of how much better either would have done. Well, Mr. Converse has done better things, for that matter.

The performance of "Ormazd" by the orchestra was indubitably very

---

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 2

FINAL BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck Makes Attractive Programme for Concert at Academy.

For the closing concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Academy of Music last night Dr. Muck for once made up his programme with due regard for contrasts which would sustain the interest of the audience. The result was that he had one of the most successful and attractive concerts of the season, although there have been single compositions of greater value and interest in most of those which preceded. But when Dr. Much has musical gems to offer he seems to have a genius for dulling them by the settings which he selects and for tiring his audience by monotony. Such monotony as there was last night was due to the length of two of the compositions played. Both Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture and Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme" for violoncello seem too long drawn out, so that their unmistakable sweetness and charm are in danger of cloying on the ear, but there was no carrying over of the mood of one composition into another and variety proved the spice of music, as of life.

The programme opened with Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony which, however hard it may be to play, is simple enough to understand. Its clear, crisp phrases sparkled on the most perfect strings in the world until they were an unfailing delight. The old overture is rarely revived and never does it get such a performance as that of last night. The woodwinds in the lovely melody of the slow movement were like fairy land, and a great sigh went up from the audience when the movement came to an end. The rondo of the last movement sang and sparkled in its perfect clearness. It was lovely—and it was not too long. Then came the "Sakuntala," with its langourous Eastern melodies and with its skillful and varied use of the resources of the modern orchestra, or, at least, more modern than Mozart's. The contrast helped both pieces and helped to display to the fullest advantage the virtuosity of the band. But there was one other novelty rarer than the Mozart revival. Last night's audience heard a Boston symphony player make a flat mistake, and that is news for its rarity. In the "Sakuntala" one of the oboists blew in a note where it did not belong and was not wanted.

The Tschaikowsky "Variations" introduced a violoncellist of pronounced musical temperament and taste and of excellent technical equipment in Beatrice Harrison, an English girl. In these variations Tschaikowsky wrote some of the broad, rich melodies which peculiarly belong to the 'cello and in them Miss Harrison's tone was very lovely, although it is not particularly large, and she made no effort to force it. She played the florid passages neatly and clearly, and her fine musical taste made them comport with the dignity of the instrument, which is not always the case when a 'cellist takes to dancing rapidly up and down the strings.

The programme ended with Dvorak's breezy and joyous "Carnival" overture, which is among the best possible selections to send an audience home with. There was hearty recall for conductor and players at the close, which expressed the general desire for their return next November. No other organization has quite the same hold on Brooklyn music lovers as has the Boston Symphony orchestra. That regard has been won by many years of fine work, and the hope is that the same high standard will be maintained for many years to come.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City.
Date MAR 19

For the fifth and final evening concert of the present season at Carnegie Hall last night Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra confined their efforts to three numbers, Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," Converse's symphonic poem on "Ormazd," which was given here earlier in the season by another body of musicians, and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture.

When the Boston players shall have concluded their final matinee on Saturday they will have given eighteen works at the evening concerts and seventeen at the matinees—a good record for their series of performances.

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City
Date

NEW AMERICAN MUSIC GIVEN BY BOSTON BAND

Dr. Karl Muck, for the final Thursday concert of the season at Carnegie Hall, last night presented an evening of programme music, beginning with one of its chief and best exponent's, Hector Berlioz, wandering through a work new to New York by the American composer, Frederick S. Converse and concluding with Tschaikowsky's overture fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet."

The combination of these items did not provide an over-exciting musical experience. Indeed, thrills have scarcely been a notable feature of this season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Some exception has been taken to Dr. Muck's programmes and a review of the nine concerts of the finest orchestra New York is privileged to listen to, would indicate that there is some justice to these complaints.

And yet the amateur reviser of the programmes after the event has a more facile task than Dr. Muck, and it is at least due him that his intent should be sought with intelligence and the difficulties in the matter appraised with some sort of discerning judgment. Last evening's programme might easily provide a text.

Berlioz's Third Symphony, "Harold in Italy"; Converse's symphonic poem, "Ormazd," and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" maintained a programatic unity. The objection is that the unity was so consistent as to make for monotony.

It may be that Dr. Muck, an overseas visitor in America, feels it incumbent upon him to bring some indubitably American—that is to say, probably, Bostonian—music to a hearing. This is a worthy enough attitude on the part of Dr. Muck, but perhaps he might feel his duty done by restricting this to within hearing of Boston. Sharp contrast after the Berlioz Symphony, to resort to paradox would have made the unity of the programme of striking force.

There was, indeed, contrast of a sort provided by the Converse work, but it was not the right sort. Other programmes of Dr. Muck have contained this same weakness. Their intent has been plain, but they have fallen foul of dull or almost worthless music, and no matter how brilliantly played or how logically correct the intent of arrangement, the result has now and again been just sheer ennui.

To be sure, Dr. Muck's task is made the more difficult from the fact that the Boston Orchestra is its own soloist. Conductors hereabouts have a pianist or a violinist or a singer of songs always with them and programmes under such circumstances make themselves. But it is the extraordinary thing that is expected of the Boston Orchestra.

If there is to be but one work of Berlioz presented in an orchestra's season, why should it not be one of the more mature works than the "Harold in Italy" symphony? This is intensely interesting from the standpoint of its instrumentation, its orchestration, but its chief idea has little that is striking or compelling; it dallies with one of the eddies of romanticism, and it has only a modicum of the characteristic fantastic power of Berliozs genius.

The Converse "Ormazd" was plainly sufficient evidence that there could not have been this sort of Converse had there not been a Berlioz. Perhaps this was one of Dr. Muck's little ironies. Berlioz is one of the composers who coins much new wealth for the art that comes after him. Converse is of the breed of Liszt and Richard Strauss, epigones of Berlioz. They manufactured literary music and stultified literature in the process; Berlioz created musical literature and thereby enriched music.

"Ormazd" is Strauss with its head buried unsuspectingly in dun-colored New England sand. The "Powers" of "Light" and "Darkness" are once more at war, Ormazd and Ahriman of Zoroastrianism providing Mr. Converse with two beautiful Persian names—and nothing more. Once more is the harp heaven and the contrabasses hell. And the latter rise to raise the last with the first, undeviatingly, according to the gospel of Liszt and Strauss.

"Romeo and Juliet," not the greatest Tschaikowsky, was nevertheless as a cool, moisture-laden wafting of beauty athwart a parch land after the aridity of "Ormazd." Dr. Muck gave the Tschaikowsky fantasia its touch of tragic power, even if not as much of the restrained passion it possesses.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

MUCK ENDS SEASON WITH HAPPY CLIMAX

Boston Symphony Gives Springtime Concert at the Academy of Music.

BEATRICE HARRISON PLAYS.

'Cellist Scores Success in Final Programme.

The final concert of the big orchestras in Brooklyn was given by the Boston Symphony last night at the Academy of Music. Last Sunday the Philharmonic closed its season here and the Symphony Society followed on Tuesday. Thus in a week more substantial music was heard than it will be possible to hear in the next five months, until the season re-opens in October.

The closing programme was the happiest of the five Dr. Karl Muck has given this year. Moreover, with the coming of spring, the frigidity that has marked many of his readings disappeared. The ice was broken and the stream of beautiful tone that is distinctive in the Bostonians was allowed to flow freely.

Dr. Muck Gets Excited.

The heretofore imperturbable conductor so warmed to his task, that in the last number, Dvorak's "Carnival," he swing his baton to the score, sending it flying to the floor. The incident did not interrupt the continuity of the playing. The score was replaced by one of the second violins and the players swept on to an exciting climax.

The concert opened with Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony. The god-like qualities found in it a century ago are not so evident to-day. The "Jupiter" is too much like a powered wig gentleman to fit modern conceptions of the heroic. He is a fine, noble courtly person, with all the airs and graces of the eighteenth century; as such, he demands respect from all and compels love from admirers of the type.

After the intermission the overture to Goldmark's "Sakuntala," Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme" and the "Carnival" were played.

Tschaikowsky's Rococo Theme.

The variations had been heard in Manhattan early in the season when Leo Schultz did the violoncello solo with the Philharmonic. Last night the services of a young English cellist, Beatrice Harrison, were enlisted. She played with a lovely tone and poetic expression. Her success was such that the audience burst in upon her with applause before she finished. At the end she answered a dozen recalls.

The audience was the most responsive of the Boston season. After the "Sakuntala" the whole orchestra took a bow amid enthusiastic applause. A real Indian, wearing an elaborate pink hair dress, heard the Oriental composition from a lower box, where, as a box-party guest, his appearance attracted considerable attention.

From
Address: New York City
Date MAR 21 1915

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Its Last Appearance Here This Season—Mr. Longy Soloist.

The last appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York this season was made yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The audience was as large as any that have heard the orchestra here in recent seasons, which means that it filled the hall completely. It showed great pleasure in the performance, and before it was through expressed its gratitude and appreciation to Dr. Muck and his men in an unmistakable manner.

The program contained but two orchestral pieces, Schubert's C major symphony and Dvorak's overture "Carneval," a combination which by the strange fatality that appears to rule such things, appeared on the program of a New York orchestra hardly more than a week ago. Dr. Muck's performance of the symphony was a singularly fine one, full of life and buoyance, of romantic vision; a performance that so engaged the interest of the listeners that the work no more seemed long.

Between symphony and overture came a fantasia for oboe and orchestra by Vincent d'Indy, played by Mr. Georges Longy, the distinguished first oboist of the orchestra. It is a fantasia on French folk tunes, from the Cevennes, a part of France said to be especially dear to the composer. These tunes are of contrasted character; there is charm in them all, and in the pastoral suggestion that is given them by the sound of the oboe. Perhaps this suggestion is more or less conventional, from the usual association of the oboe with the pastoral; but its tone and expression seem to become them peculiarly. The treatment is not characteristic of d'Indy's latest style, it is somewhat milder in its use of dissonant harmonies. Nor is the music profoundly significant; but it gives real pleasure. Especially its performance [illegible] Mr. Longy ng.

[132]

Give
14-15
will Acad-
March
Miss nglish
e ex-

ed by ony in 551); and ikowhe for npani-

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City

MAR 1

Music.

The Boston Symphony's Last Evening Concert.

Dr. Muck has been niggardly of French and of Russian music on his programmes this season. For the fifth and last evening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night he chose to open the programme with a French symphony—Berlioz's "Harold in Italy"—and to close it with a Russian overture-fantasia—Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet." The remaining number on the programme was a symphonic poem, "Ormazd," by F. S. Converse, often spoken of as a Boston composer, though he happened to be born in Newton, Mass., and is now a resident of Westwood in the same state.

Some of us regret that Dr. Muck neglects certain modern French pieces—two symphonies by d'Indy, the symphony of the lamented Chausson, the superb "Istar" variations of d'Indy. The names of Debussy, Chabrier, Dukas, Ravel, even of the venerable Saint-Saëns have not appeared on the programmes of the New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season; nor has the great name of César Franck, the Belgian who left his indelible imprint on modern French music. But I am far from being one of those who decry Hector Berlioz, and his "Harold in Italy" symphony, though not embodying his best work, can enchain the attention to-day when performed as it was last night.

We may smile now at the romantic gloom of Byron and we may find this symphony of Berlioz fundamentally naïve, but listening can we deny the beauty and charm of many a page of Berlioz's score, the spell the march of the pilgrims still casts, the exotic quaintness of the mountaineer's serenade, the vigor and dash of the finale? The symphony was written in 1834, and yet in this year of grace the orchestration is still fascinating, still gorgeous. Dr. Muck read the work with the right romantic feeling and the orchestra played with the finish for which it is famed and with splendid energy. The solo viola part was entrusted to Emile Férir, a Belgian, and one of the men who make the Boston Symphony Orchestra the supreme thing it is. In his hands the viola part was notable for richness of tone, sureness, and elegance of delivery, and emotional warmth. The applause of the great audience at the conclusion of the symphony was hearty and long continued.

There is Russian music that would have been thrice welcome last night, but carrying coals to Newcastle is a phrase that should yield its place to carrying Tschaikowsky to New York. Ever since Wassily Safonoff brought his batonless hands to the gold coast of this little island Tschaikowsky has been an increasing nuisance to our steady concertgoer. The mere occasional concertgoer may revel in his occasional collision with Tschaikowsky's music, as he may in the plum pudding of Thanksgiving and Christmas, or the secret, awful frenzy of an annual chocolate ice cream soda jag. But the dismay of the steady concertgoer when the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town carrying Tschaikowsky in its music rolls! However, let us be glad it was "Romeo and Juliet" and not one of the two symphonies that are pitiably overworked.

"Ormazd" might, I suppose, be termed an indigenous novelty. "Exotic novelty" is flung so freely at anything by Schönberg or Stravinsky that some ardent souls seem to lose sight of the fact that "exotic" being what it is the Ninth Symphony was once an "exotic novelty" and remains for us an exotic. "Ormazd," however, is indigenous to Boston, or Westwood, and can be carried about the country by a distinguished Boston organization with propriety and safety. At least one supposes such is the theory. But every once in a while one longs to get up and throw something at the Boston Symphony Orchestra for wasting its time and ours.

It is one of the blessings of peace and neutrality that music in New York is still music, whether it be the music of Boston, London, Paris, Petrograd, or Spillville, Iowa, the community in which the late Dvorak composed his one symphony that posterity is likely to listen to. It is easy to see why Belgians might prefer to turn a deaf ear to German music for some time to come, and it is possible to understand, if it is difficult altogether to approve, the stand taken by the venerable Saint-Säens against the composer whom he at one time worked so steadfastly to establish in France, Richard Wagner. But New York is happily at peace with Boston and has every prospect of remaining at peace unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra insists on forcing upon us many more Boston products like unto this "Ormazd."

The work in question was played here last autumn by the Symphony Society of New York at a meeting in Aeolian Hall of the National Institute of Arts and Letters. That performance if not exactly private was certainly not public. "Ormazd" has to do with the Zoroastrian deification of light and darkness as the gods of good and evil under the respective names of Ormazd and Ahriman. It is an orchestral struggle between two principles ending with the victory of Ormazd. It is also a bombastic, empty, noisy piece, recalling now Rimsky-Korsakoff, now Liszt, always with the thought of how much better either would have done. Well, Mr. Converse has done better things, for that matter.

The performance of "Ormazd" by the orchestra was indubitably very

---

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

FINAL BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck Makes Attractive Programme for Concert at Academy.

For the closing concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Academy of Music last night Dr. Muck for once made up his programme with due regard for contrasts which would sustain the interest of the audience. The result was that he had one of the most successful and attractive concerts of the season, although there have been single compositions of greater value and interest in most of those which preceded. But when Dr. Much has musical gems to offer he seems to have a genius for dulling them by the settings which he selects and for tiring his audience by monotony. Such monotony as there was last night was due to the length of two of the compositions played. Both Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture and Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme" for violoncello seem too long drawn out, so that their unmistakable sweetness and charm are in danger of cloying on the ear, but there was no carrying over of the mood of one composition into another and variety proved the spice of music, as of life.

The programme opened with Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony which, however hard it may be to play, is simple enough to understand. Its clear, crisp phrases sparkled on the most perfect strings in the world until they were an unfailing delight. The old overture is rarely revived and never does it get such a performance as that of last night. The woodwinds in the lovely melody of the slow movement were like fairy land, and a great sigh went up from the audience when the movement came to an end. The rondo of the last movement sang and sparkled in its perfect clearness. It was lovely—and it was not too long. Then came the "Sakuntala," with its langourous Eastern melodies and with its skillful and varied use of the resources of the modern orchestra, or, at least, more modern than Mozart's. The contrast helped both pieces and helped to display to the fullest advantage the virtuosity of the band. But there was one other novelty rarer than the Mozart revival. Last night's audience heard a Boston symphony player make a flat mistake, and that is news for its rarity. In the "Sakuntala" one of the oboists blew in a note where it did not belong and was not wanted.

The Tschaikowsky "Variations" introduced a violoncellist of pronounced musical temperament and taste and of excellent technical equipment in Beatrice Harrison, an English girl. In these variations Tschaikowsky wrote some of the broad, rich melodies which peculiarly belong to the 'cello and in them Miss Harrison's tone was very lovely, although it is not particularly large, and she made no effort to force it. She played the florid passages neatly and clearly, and her fine musical taste made them comport with the dignity of the instrument, which is not always the case when a 'cellist takes to dancing rapidly up and down the strings.

The programme ended with Dvorak's breezy and joyous "Carnival" overture, which is among the best possible selections to send an audience home with. There was hearty recall for conductor and players at the close, which expressed the general desire for their return next November. No other organization has quite the same hold on Brooklyn music lovers as has the Boston Symphony orchestra. That regard has been won by many years of fine work, and the hope is that the same high standard will be maintained for many years to come.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City.

Date

For the fifth and final evening concert of the present season at Carnegie Hall last night Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra confined their efforts to three numbers, Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," Converse's symphonic poem on "Ormazd," which was given here earlier in the season by another body of musicians, and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture.

When the Boston players shall have concluded their final matinee on Saturday they will have given eighteen works at the evening concerts and seventeen at the matinees—a good record for their series of performances.

Esta 884

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City

Date

NEW AMERICAN MUSIC GIVEN BY BOSTON BAND

Dr. Karl Muck, for the final Thursday concert of the season at Carnegie Hall, last night presented an evening of programme music, beginning with one of its chief and best exponent's, Hector Berlioz, wandering through a work new to New York by the American composer, Frederick S. Converse and concluding with Tschaikowsky's overture fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet."

The combination of these items did not provide an over-exciting musical experience. Indeed, thrills have scarcely been a notable feature of this season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Some exception has been taken to Dr. Muck's programmes and a review of the nine concerts of the finest orchestra New York is privileged to listen to, would indicate that there is some justice to these complaints.

And yet the amateur reviser of the programmes after the event has a more facile task than Dr. Muck, and it is at least due him that his intent should be sought with intelligence and the difficulties in the matter appraised with some sort of discerning judgment. Last evening's programme might easily provide a text.

Berlioz's Third Symphony, "Harold in Italy"; Converse's symphonic poem, "Ormazd," and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" maintained a programatic unity. The objection is that the unity was so consistent as to make for monotony.

It may be that Dr. Muck, an overseas visitor in America, feels it incumbent upon him to bring some indubitably American—that is to say, probably, Bostonian—music to a hearing. This is a worthy enough attitude on the part of Dr. Muck, but perhaps he might feel his duty done by restricting this to within hearing of Boston. Sharp contrast after the Berlioz Symphony, to resort to paradox would have made the unity of the programme of striking force.

There was, indeed, contrast of a sort provided by the Converse work, but it was not the right sort. Other programmes of Dr. Muck have contained this same weakness. Their intent has been plain, but they have fallen foul of dull or almost worthless music, and no matter how brilliantly played or how logically correct the intent of arrangement, the result has now and again been just sheer ennui.

To be sure, Dr. Muck's task is made the more difficult from the fact that the Boston Orchestra is its own soloist. Conductors hereabouts have a pianist or a violinist or a singer of songs always with them and programmes under such circumstances make themselves. But it is the extraordinary thing that is expected of the Boston Orchestra.

If there is to be but one work of Berlioz presented in an orchestra's season, why should it not be one of the more mature works than the "Harold in Italy" symphony? This is intensely interesting from the standpoint of its instrumentation, its orchestration, but its chief idea has little that is striking or compelling; it dallies with one of the eddies of romanticism, and it has only a modicum of the characteristic fantastic power of Berliozs genius.

The Converse "Ormazd" was plainly sufficient evidence that there could not have been this sort of Converse had there not been a Berlioz. Perhaps this was one of Dr. Muck's little ironies. Berlioz is one of the composers who coins much new wealth for the art that comes after him. Converse is of the breed of Liszt and Richard Strauss, epigones of Berlioz. They manufactured literary music and stultified literature in the process; Berlioz created musical literature and thereby enriched music.

"Ormazd" is Strauss with its head buried unsuspectingly in dun-colored New England sand. The "Powers" of "Light" and "Darkness" are once more at war, Ormazd and Ahriman of Zoroastrianism providing Mr. Converse with two beautiful Persian names—and nothing more. Once more is the harp heaven and the contrabasses hell. And the latter rise to raise the last with the first, undeviatingly, according to the gospel of Liszt and Strauss.

"Romeo and Juliet," not the greatest Tschaikowsky, was nevertheless as a cool, moisture-laden wafting of beauty athwart a parch land after the aridity of "Ormazd." Dr. Muck gave the Tschaikowsky fantasia its touch of tragic power, even if not as much of the restrained passion it possesses.

Th

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

MUCK ENDS SEASON WITH HAPPY CLIMAX

Boston Symphony Gives Springtime Concert at the Academy of Music.

BEATRICE HARRISON PLAYS.

'Cellist Scores Success in Final Programme.

The final concert of the big orchestras in Brooklyn was given by the Boston Symphony last night at the Academy of Music. Last Sunday the Philharmonic closed its season here and the Symphony Society followed on Tuesday. Thus in a week more substantial music was heard than it will be possible to hear in the next five months, until the season re-opens in October.

The closing programme was the happiest of the five Dr. Karl Muck has given this year. Moreover, with the coming of spring, the frigidity that has marked many of his readings disappeared. The ice was broken and the stream of beautiful tone that is distinctive in the Bostonians was allowed to flow freely.

Dr. Muck Gets Excited.

The heretofore imperturbable conductor so warmed to his task, that in the last number, Dvorak's "Carnival," he swing his baton to the score, sending it flying to the floor. The incident did not interrupt the continuity of the playing. The score was replaced by one of the second violins and the players swept on to an exciting climax.

The concert opened with Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony. The god-like qualities found in it a century ago are not so evident to-day. The "Jupiter" is too much like a powered wig gentleman to fit modern conceptions of the heroic. He is a fine, noble courtly person, with all the airs and graces of the eighteenth century; as such, he demands respect from all and compels love from admirers of the type.

After the intermission the overture to Goldmark's "Sakuntala," Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme" and the "Carnival" were played.

Tschaikowsky's Rococo Theme.

The variations had been heard in Manhattan early in the season when Leo Schultz did the violoncello solo with the Philharmonic. Last night the services of a young English cellist, Beatrice Harrison, were enlisted. She played with a lovely tone and poetic expression. Her success was such that the audience burst in upon her with applause before she finished. At the end she answered a dozen recalls.

The audience was the most responsive of the Boston season. After the "Sakuntala" the whole orchestra took a bow amid enthusiastic applause. A real Indian, wearing an elaborate pink hair dress, heard the Oriental composition from a lower box, where, as a box-party guest, his appearance attracted considerable attention.

From
Address: New York City
Date MAR 21 1915

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Its Last Appearance Here This Season—Mr. Longy Soloist.

Esta 1884

The last appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York this season was made yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The audience was as large as any that have heard the orchestra here in recent seasons, which means that it filled the hall completely. It showed great pleasure in the performance, and before it was through expressed its gratitude and appreciation to Dr. Muck and his men in an unmistakable manner.

The program contained but two orchestral pieces, Schubert's C major symphony and Dvorak's overture "Carneval," a combination which by the strange fatality that appears to rule such things, appeared on the program of a New York orchestra hardly more than a week ago. Dr. Muck's performance of the symphony was a singularly fine one, full of life and buoyance, of romantic vision; a performance that so engaged the interest of the listeners that the work no more seemed long.

Between symphony and overture came a fantasia for oboe and orchestra by Vincent d'Indy, played by Mr. Georges Longy, the distinguished first oboist of the orchestra. It is a fantasia on French folk tunes, from the Cevennes, a part of France said to be especially dear to the composer. These tunes are of contrasted character; there is charm in them all, and in the pastoral suggestion that is given them by the sound of the oboe. Perhaps this suggestion is more or less conventional, from the usual association of the oboe with the pastoral; but its tone and expression seem to become them peculiarly. The treatment is not characteristic of d'Indy's latest style, it is somewhat milder in its use of dissonant harmonies. Nor is the music profoundly significant; but it gives real pleasure. Especially its performance

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City
MAR 19 1919

Music.

The Boston Symphony's Last Evening Concert.

Dr. Muck has been niggardly of French and of Russian music on his programmes this season. For the fifth and last evening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night he chose to open the programme with a French symphony—Berlioz's "Harold in Italy"—and to close it with a Russian overture-fantasia—Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet." The remaining number on the programme was a symphonic poem, "Ormazd," by F. S. Converse, often spoken of as a Boston composer, though he happened to be born in Newton, Mass., and is now a resident of Westwood in the same state.

Some of us regret that Dr. Muck neglects certain modern French pieces—two symphonies by d'Indy, the symphony of the lamented Chausson, the superb "Istar" variations of d'Indy. The names of Debussy, Chabrier, Dukas, Ravel, even of the venerable Saint-Saëns have not appeared on the programmes of the New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season; nor has the great name of César Franck, the Belgian who left his indelible imprint on modern French music. But I am far from being one of those who decry Hector Berlioz, and his "Harold in Italy" symphony, though not embodying his best work, can enchain the attention to-day when performed as it was last night.

We may smile now at the romantic gloom of Byron and we may find this symphony of Berlioz fundamentally naïve, but listening can we deny the beauty and charm of many a page of Berlioz's score, the spell the march of the pilgrims still casts, the exotic quaintness of the mountaineer's serenade, the vigor and dash of the finale? The symphony was written in 1834, and yet in this year of grace the orchestration is still fascinating, still gorgeous. Dr. Muck read the work with the right romantic feeling and the orchestra played with the finish for which it is famed and with splendid energy. The solo viola part was entrusted to Emile Férir, a Belgian, and one of the men who make the Boston Symphony Orchestra the supreme thing it is. In his hands the viola part was notable for richness of tone, sureness, and elegance of delivery, and emotional warmth. The applause of the great audience at the conclusion of the symphony was hearty and long continued.

There is Russian music that would have been thrice welcome last night, but carrying coals to Newcastle is a phrase that should yield its place to carrying Tschaikowsky to New York. Ever since Wassily Safonoff brought his batonless hands to the gold coast of this little island Tschaikowsky has been an increasing nuisance to our steady concertgoer. The mere occasional concertgoer may revel in his occasional collision with Tschaikowsky's music, as he may in the plum pudding of Thanksgiving and Christmas, or the secret, awful frenzy of an annual chocolate ice cream soda jag. But the dismay of the steady concertgoer when the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town carrying Tschaikowsky in its music rolls! However, let us be glad it was "Romeo and Juliet" and not one of the two symphonies that are pitiably overworked.

"Ormazd" might, I suppose, be termed an indigenous novelty. "Exotic novelty" is flung so freely at anything by Schönberg or Stravinsky that some ardent souls seem to lose sight of the fact that "exotic" being what it is the Ninth Symphony was once an "exotic novelty" and remains for us an exotic. "Ormazd," however, is indigenous to Boston, or Westwood, and can be carried about the country by a distinguished Boston organization with propriety and safety. At least one supposes such is the theory. But every once in a while one longs to get up and throw something at the Boston Symphony Orchestra for wasting its time and ours.

It is one of the blessings of peace and neutrality that music in New York is still music, whether it be the music of Boston, London, Paris, Petrograd, or Spillville, Iowa, the community in which the late Dvorak composed his one symphony that posterity is likely to listen to. It is easy to see why Belgians might prefer to turn a deaf ear to German music for some time to come, and it is possible to understand, if it is difficult altogether to approve, the stand taken by the venerable Saint-Säens against the composer whom he at one time worked so steadfastly to establish in France, Richard Wagner. But New York is happily at peace with Boston and has every prospect of remaining at peace unless the Boston Symphony Orchestra insists on forcing upon us many more Boston products like unto this "Ormazd."

The work in question was played here last autumn by the Symphony Society of New York at a meeting in Aeolian Hall of the National Institute of Arts and Letters. That performance if not exactly private was certainly not public. "Ormazd" has to do with the Zoroastrian deification of light and darkness as the gods of good and evil under the respective names of Ormazd and Ahriman. It is an orchestral struggle between two principles ending with the victory of Ormazd. It is also a bombastic, empty, noisy piece, recalling now Rimsky-Korsakoff, now Liszt, always with the thought of how much better either would have done. Well, Mr. Converse has done better things, for that matter.

The performance of "Ormazd" by the orchestra was indubitably very

---

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 20

BOSTON SYMPHONY

ck Makes Attractive Programme for Concert at Academy.

For the closing concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Academy of Music last night Dr. Muck for once made up his programme with due regard for contrasts which would sustain the interest of the audience. The result was that he had one of the most successful and attractive concerts of the season, although there have been single compositions of greater value and interest in most of those which preceded. But when Dr. Much has musical gems to offer he seems to have a genius for dulling them by the settings which he selects and for tiring his audience by monotony. Such monotony as there was last night was due to the length of two of the compositions played. Both Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture and Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme" for violoncello seem too long drawn out, so that their unmistakable sweetness and charm are in danger of cloying on the ear, but there was no carrying over of the mood of one composition into another and variety proved the spice of music, as of life.

The programme opened with Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony which, however hard it may be to play, is simple enough to understand. Its clear, crisp phrases sparkled on the most perfect strings in the world until they were an unfailing delight. The old overture is rarely revived and never does it get such a performance as that of last night. The woodwinds in the lovely melody of the slow movement were like fairy land, and a great sigh went up from the audience when the movement came to an end. The rondo of the last movement sang and sparkled in its perfect clearness. It was lovely—and it was not too long. Then came the "Sakuntala," with its langourous Eastern melodies and with its skillful and varied use of the resources of the modern orchestra, or, at least, more modern than Mozart's. The contrast helped both pieces and helped to display to the fullest advantage the virtuosity of the band. But there was one other novelty rarer than the Mozart revival. Last night's audience heard a Boston symphony player make a flat mistake, and that is news for its rarity. In the "Sakuntala" one of the oboists blew in a note where it did not belong and was not wanted.

The Tschaikowsky "Variations" introduced a violoncellist of pronounced musical temperament and taste and of excellent technical equipment in Beatrice Harrison, an English girl. In these variations Tschaikowsky wrote some of the broad, rich melodies which peculiarly belong to the 'cello and in them Miss Harrison's tone was very lovely, although it is not particularly large, and she made no effort to force it. She played the florid passages neatly and clearly, and her fine musical taste made them comport with the dignity of the instrument, which is not always the case when a 'cellist takes to dancing rapidly up and down the strings.

The programme ended with Dvorak's breezy and joyous "Carnival" overture, which is among the best possible selections to send an audience home with. There was hearty recall for conductor and players at the close, which expressed the general desire for their return next November. No other organization has quite the same hold on Brooklyn music lovers as has the Boston Symphony orchestra. That regard has been won by many years of fine work, and the hope is that the same high standard will be maintained for many years to come.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City.

Date

For the fifth and final evening concert of the present season at Carnegie Hall last night Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra confined their efforts to three numbers, Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," Converse's symphonic poem on "Ormazd," which was given here earlier in the season by another body of musicians, and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture.

When the Boston players shall have concluded their final matinee on Saturday they will have given eighteen works at the evening concerts and seventeen at the matinees—a good record for their series of performances.

Esta 384

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City

EW AMERICAN MUSIC GIVEN BY BOSTON BAND

Dr. Karl Muck, for the final Thursday concert of the season at Carnegie Hall, last night presented an evening of programme music, beginning with one of its chief and best exponent's, Hector Berlioz, wandering through a work new to New York by the American composer, Frederick S. Converse and concluding with Tschaikowsky's overture fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet."

The combination of these items did not provide an over-exciting musical experience. Indeed, thrills have scarcely been a notable feature of this season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Some exception has been taken to Dr. Muck's programmes and a review of the nine concerts of the finest orchestra New York is privileged to listen to, would indicate that there is some justice to these complaints.

And yet the amateur reviser of the programmes after the event has a more facile task than Dr. Muck, and it is at least due him that his intent should be sought with intelligence and the difficulties in the matter appraised with some sort of discerning judgment. Last evening's programme might easily provide a text.

Berlioz's Third Symphony, "Harold in Italy"; Converse's symphonic poem, "Ormazd," and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" maintained a programatic unity. The objection is that the unity was so consistent as to make for monotony.

It may be that Dr. Muck, an overseas visitor in America, feels it incumbent upon him to bring some indubitably American—that is to say, probably, Bostonian—music to a hearing. This is a worthy enough attitude on the part of Dr. Muck, but perhaps he might feel his duty done by restricting this to within hearing of Boston. Sharp contrast after the Berlioz Symphony, to resort to paradox would have made the unity of the programme of striking force.

There was, indeed, contrast of a sort provided by the Converse work, but it was not the right sort. Other programmes of Dr. Muck have contained this same weakness. Their intent has been plain, but they have fallen foul of dull or almost worthless music, and no matter how brilliantly played or how logically correct the intent of arrangement, the result has now and again been just sheer ennui.

To be sure, Dr. Muck's task is made the more difficult from the fact that the Boston Orchestra is its own soloist. Conductors hereabouts have a pianist or a violinist or a singer of songs always with them and programmes under such circumstances make themselves. But it is the extraordinary thing that is expected of the Boston Orchestra.

If there is to be but one work of Berlioz presented in an orchestra's season, why should it not be one of the more mature works than the "Harold in Italy" symphony? This is intensely interesting from the standpoint of its instrumentation, its orchestration, but its chief idea has little that is striking or compelling; it dallies with one of the eddies of romanticism, and it has only a modicum of the characteristic fantastic power of Berliozs genius.

The Converse "Ormazd" was plainly sufficient evidence that there could not have been this sort of Converse had there not been a Berlioz. Perhaps this was one of Dr. Muck's little ironies. Berlioz is one of the composers who coins much new wealth for the art that comes after him. Converse is of the breed of Liszt and Richard Strauss, epigones of Berlioz. They manufactured literary music and stultified literature in the process; Berlioz created musical literature and thereby enriched music.

"Ormazd" is Strauss with its head buried unsuspectingly in dun-colored New England sand. The "Powers" of "Light" and "Darkness" are once more at war, Ormazd and Ahriman of Zoroastrianism providing Mr. Converse with two beautiful Persian names—and nothing more. Once more is the harp heaven and the contrabasses hell. And the latter rise to raise the last with the first, undeviatingly, according to the gospel of Liszt and Strauss.

"Romeo and Juliet," not the greatest Tschaikowsky, was nevertheless as a cool, moisture-laden wafting of beauty athwart a parch land after the aridity of "Ormazd." Dr. Muck gave the Tschaikowsky fantasia its touch of tragic power, even if not as much of the restrained passion it possesses.

Th-

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

MUCK ENDS SEASON WITH HAPPY CLIMAX

Boston Symphony Gives Springtime Concert at the Academy of Music.

BEATRICE HARRISON PLAYS.

'Cellist Scores Success in Final Programme.

The final concert of the big orchestras in Brooklyn was given by the Boston Symphony last night at the Academy of Music. Last Sunday the Philharmonic closed its season here and the Symphony Society followed on Tuesday. Thus in a week more substantial music was heard than it will be possible to hear in the next five months, until the season re-opens in October.

The closing programme was the happiest of the five Dr. Karl Muck has given this year. Moreover, with the coming of spring, the frigidity that has marked many of his readings disappeared. The ice was broken and the stream of beautiful tone that is distinctive in the Bostonians was allowed to flow freely.

Dr. Muck Gets Excited.

The heretofore imperturbable conductor so warmed to his task, that in the last number, Dvorak's "Carnival," he swing his baton to the score, sending it flying to the floor. The incident did not interrupt the continuity of the playing. The score was replaced by one of the second violins and the players swept on to an exciting climax.

The concert opened with Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony. The god-like qualities found in it a century ago are not so evident to-day. The "Jupiter" is too much like a powered wig gentleman to fit modern conceptions of the heroic. He is a fine, noble courtly person, with all the airs and graces of the eighteenth century; as such, he demands respect from all and compels love from admirers of the type.

After the intermission the overture to Goldmark's "Sakuntala," Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme" and the "Carnival" were played.

Tschaikowsky's Rococo Theme.

The variations had been heard in Manhattan early in the season when Leo Schultz did the violoncello solo with the Philharmonic. Last night the services of a young English cellist, Beatrice Harrison, were enlisted. She played with a lovely tone and poetic expression. Her success was such that the audience burst in upon her with applause before she finished. At the end she answered a dozen recalls.

The audience was the most responsive of the Boston season. After the "Sakuntala" the whole orchestra took a bow amid enthusiastic applause. A real Indian, wearing an elaborate pink hair dress, heard the Oriental composition from a lower box, where, as a box-party guest, his appearance attracted considerable attention.

From
Address: New York City
Date MAR 21 1919

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Its Last Appearance Here This Season—Mr. Longy Soloist.

The last appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York this season was made yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The audience was as large as any that have heard the orchestra here in recent seasons, which means that it filled the hall completely. It showed great pleasure in the performance, and before it was through expressed its gratitude and appreciation to Dr. Muck and his men in an unmistakable manner.

The program contained but two orchestral pieces, Schubert's C major symphony and Dvorak's overture "Carneval," a combination which by the strange fatality that appears to rule such things, appeared on the program of a New York orchestra hardly more than a week ago. Dr. Muck's performance of the symphony was a singularly fine one, full of life and buoyance, of romantic vision; a performance that so engaged the interest of the listeners that the work no more seemed long.

Between symphony and overture came a fantasia for oboe and orchestra by Vincent d'Indy, played by Mr. Georges Longy, the distinguished first oboist of the orchestra. It is a fantasia on French folk tunes, from the Cevennes, a part of France said to be especially dear to the composer. These tunes are of contrasted character; there is charm in them all, and in the pastoral suggestion that is given them by the sound of the oboe. Perhaps this suggestion is more or less conventional, from the usual association of the oboe with the pastoral; but its tone and expression seem to become them peculiarly. The treatment is not characteristic of d'Indy's latest style, it is somewhat milder in its use of dissonant harmonies. Nor is the music profoundly significant; but it gives real pleasure. Especially its performance [illegible] Mr. Longy [illegible]

Esta 1884

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Mr. Strube's Latest Composition For Orchestra.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EVENING SUN:

Sir—At the Boston Symphony concert on Wednesday evening we will hear a new work of special interest to Baltimoreans. It is "Variations on an Original Theme," by Gustav Strube, for many years assistant conductor and first violinist of the Boston Orchestra, and now professor of theory at the Peabody.

Mr. Strube is without doubt one of the most gifted living writers for the orchestra, and has achieved a profound mastery of orchestra color and technique. The warmest admirers of his talent are the Boston Symphony musicians who play his compositions—and they know. Dr. Karl Muck, who gave the first performance of Mr. Strube's new work in Boston about two weeks ago, has said that he regarded it as the most interesting novelty which he had produced this year. The composition was again performed by the Boston Symphony in Worcester a few days ago. One of the Worcester papers comments thus:

> Certain it is that Mr. Strube has devised not merely a theme of great melodic beauty, but he has given it a set of variations some of which are positively fascinating in their charm and color.

The performance in Baltimore on Wednesday will therefore be the third reading by the famous orchestra within a few weeks. Fortunate indeed is the composer whose work falls into the hands of Dr. Muck and the incomparable artists of the greatest orchestra in the world, and it is needless to add that Baltimore will welcome this opportunity to hear the work of a distinguished musician whom we may now claim as a citizen.

For every creator of music—the highest form of art—who wins a deserving title to fame there are literally thousands of successful executant musicians. In New York alone there are 25,000 orchestral players, many of them of the first rank. There is a whole army of executant musicians in Germany, but there is only a bare handful of living composers of great music in the whole world today. How fortunate we are in Baltimore to have one of these connected with the staff of the Peabody Conservatory!

Last year a very beautiful composition by Mr. Strube for wood wind instruments and French horn was played at the Florestan Club by the famous Longy Club of Boston Symphony musicians, and last summer Mr. Strube began work on the music for an opera, the libretto for which was written by Frederic Arnold Kummer.

The "Variations on an Original Theme" were composed by Mr. Strube in the spring of 1914. The theme, molto adagio is in F major, and there are 10 variations and a finale.

EDWIN L. TURNBULL.

Baltimore, March 15.

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
AR 1 6 1915
Date

WOMAN CELLIST WINS SUCCESS AT ACADEMY

Beatrice Harrison, Soloist With Boston Orchestra, Captivates Great Audience

LAST DR. MUCK CONCERT

Immortal Freischutz Overture Is Given as a Delightful Finale

BEATRICE HARRYSON, a soloist new to this public, scraped and bowed her way into the good graces of a Boston orchestra audience at the Academy of Music last evening. in the final concert of Doctor Muck's local series. The scraping was on the strings of a superb cello—for Miss Harrison is a cello player of high degree—the bowing, likewise educed from this noble instrument the wayward, fascinating strains of Tschaikowsky's dazzling "Variations on a Rococo Theme," drowned, at times, in the all-pervading immensity of accompaniment by Doctor Muck's galaxy of star instrumentalists.

Miss Harrison is plump, petite and pretty. In her right arm is muscularity and wondrous flexibility, and the fingers of her sinister hand seemed multiplied again and again as they flashed over the resonant strings.

The seven variations in their entirety were played with artistic authority and graceful refinement, together with a naive, earnest enthusiasm that quite captivated the great audience, and ban-heavy preliminary installments of Brahms and Wagner.

Miss Harrison scored an artistic and popular success—and this without the Sandow strength and Hennig technique traditionally associated with cello playing by virtuosi. Her stopping is flawless, her technique facile and brilliant, and her range of tonal expression large, flexible and under instant control. And her style, moreover, is all her own, proclaimed and enforced without reminiscent suggestion or ad captandum mannerisms.

Before this grateful disclosure of a new star soloist, Doctor Muck's great orchestra ran through the movements of Johannes Brahm's first symphony in C minor over which inharmonious pundits in south Germany are still at war. Afterward came Wagner's mighty "Faust" overture, played as only the Boston musicians can play it.

As a delightful finale was given the immortal "Freischutz" overture—for the most part in the peculiar tempi so strangely affected by orchestral concert conductors, who sometimes love to smite dramatism with an ax.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date MAR - 6 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT

Series Closes With Magnificent Cello Performance by Beatrice Harrison and a Brahms Symphony.

PROGRAM.

First Symphony	Brahms
Faust Overture	Wagner
Variations on a Rococo Theme	Tschaikowsky
Overture, "Der Freischuetz"	Weber

The patient vigil of hours which many of the hearers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra cheerfully undergo at the Academy doors for each concert was never more richly rewarded than in last night's finale of the 30th season.

Beatrice Harrison, the young English artist, was the soloist in the Tschaikowsky Variations for the violoncello. This is her first season in this country. She carried all before her in Russia and Germany ere coming to America. English by birth she took at 9 the gold medal offered conjointly by the Royal Academy and Royal College of Music in London—the youngest of all who have been thus honored—and at 17 received the Mendelsshon prize in Berlin. Her chief teacher has been Hugo Becker, the Frankfort master.

Her playing was the poetry of motion in the supple grace of the bowing wrist and arm. With fingers holding the strings in vise-like tenacity she drew from the fine old instrument tones of unctuous sonority and sweetness. It was a rare combination of tenderness and power—of compelling pathos and virile strength. Like the rest of the few who have conquered this elusive and difficult instrument so seldom essayed by a woman, incessant study has brought her to the point where the effort entailed vanishes into the perfected art, and the arduous precedent toil of the studio is obliterated. Miss Harrison is an artist in the true sense consecrated to her calling and convincingly endowed with the divine fire—the true Promethean flame that burns in the inspiration of a Bloomfield Zeisler.

The audience applauded and recalled to the echo, and the tribute was acknowledged with unaffected modesty and a genuflection not less rhythmically graceful than the manipulation of the bow. It was completely a triumph.

The Weber "Der Freischuetz" overture, with Agatha's Prayer taken at a strikingly deliberate pace to elicit the full mellow concordance of the horns, held contrasting episodes of sparkling gayety such as only Weber can write and only such leadership as Muck's can properly set forth; the Faust overture, in nowise memorably great music, was given with its full quota of Byronic stress and sentiment. But the orchestral glory of the program was the noble symphony and the glory of the symphony was the work of the choir of wood-wind. Such a luscious voice as that of the oboe in the first movement, and in its more extended opportunity in the Andante, places Mr. Longy in a class by himself. The flute was admirable, so was the clarinet, and it was a wonderful out pouring of the violas in the Andante. The thir movement passed without cessation into th finale at the Adagio where first the horns, the the flute, then the trombones—silenced till tha time—were heard in tones of supreme and en chanting beauty. The Chestertonian Mr. Wite as concertmeister comported himself admirabl

---

From Freie Presse
Address BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Date MAR 2 0 1915

Established

uthun.

Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra.

Das Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra gab geſtern Abend unter der Leitung ſeines genialen Dirigenten, Dr. Carl Muck, in der Academy of Muſic das letzte Konzert in dieſer Saiſon und war die Soliſtin die Celliſtin Beatrice Harriſon. Die Küſtlerin ſpielte höchſtvollendet Tſchaikowſki's Variationen über ein Roccoco-Thema und endete großen Applaus ſeitens des das Haus anſehnlich füllenden Publikums. Das Orcheſter wartete mit
Mozarts bekannter Jupiter Symphon Gehör
(C-Dur), Goldmarks „Sakuntala" reizender vertüre, die ganz vorzüglich zu Sowohl gebracht wurde, und Dvoraks die auch die
Ouvertüre „Karneval" auf. en ſich meh-
Dr. Carl Muck anganhaltend erbeugen.

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
MAR 17 1915
Date

Established

SYMPHONY TO PLAY HIS COMPOSITION

GUSTAV STRUBE

ORCHESTRA TO PLAY STRUBE COMPOSITION

Concert At Lyric Tonight To Be Last Of The Boston Symphony Series.

A feature of particular interest at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Lyric tonight will be the first performance in this city of the work of a Baltimore composer, the "Original Theme with Variations," by Gustave Strube, who succeeded the late O. B. Boise at the Peabody Conservatory as director of the department of harmony and composition.

Mr. Strube is well known as a composer and his works have frequently found a prominent place on the programs of organizations as important as the Boston Symphony. The number that will be heard tonight was splendidly received at its initial Boston performance a few weeks ago. The composer was for 21 years a member of the Boston Symphony organization, having served for some time as assistant director.

The concert tonight will be the fifth and last of the Boston orchestra's local season. Beatrice Harrison, the English cellist, will be the soloist, her number being Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Roroco Theme."

Dr. Karl Muck, the director, will present Sibelius First Symphony as the principal orchestral offering and will close the concert with Dvorak's "Carnival" overture.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
MAR 22 1915
Date

Establishe

Am Samstag Nachmittag brachte
Muck die diesjährige New Yorker Sai der Boſtoner mit einem virtuos d führten Programm zu einem höc
freulichen Ende. Die Schubert'ſ
Dur-Symphonie eine der köſtlichſt ſtungen der Boſtoner, in Klangſ getaucht, von einer liebevollen Au ſung der Melodie, die hinreißend dabei von Muck mit jener edlen heit dirigirt, die das Wort von de liſchen „Länge" vergeſſen macht.
erquicklich war eine recht ausgede gekünſtelte „Phantaſie" für Orche
Oboe von d'Indy, welche franzöſch lieder verarbeitet, ſie dabei jedo verunziert. Geſpielt wurde gan zeichnet, und der erſte Oboiſt de ſters, Herr Longy, heiſchte wi wunderung für ſeinen entzückenden leichten Ton, ſeine reife Phraſirung und die Geläufigkeit ſeiner Technik. Dvorak's „Carneval"-Ouverture beendete das Konzert und die Spielzeit der Boſtoner in einer Weiſe, die nur den Wunſch zuläßt: „Auf Wiederſehen im nächſten Jahre!"

H.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date MAR 21

BOSTON ORCHESTRA ENDS SERIES HERE

Schubert Symphony, d'Indy Fantasia and Dvorak Overture Given.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final concert of its New York season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, and the perfection of the great band's playing gave renewed cause for regret that the Boston's concerts are so few. If only Dr. Muck would make his programmes equal in interest to his readings! But this is an apt and apparently hopeless plaint.

There were only three numbers on the programme yesterday—the Schubert C major Symphony, Vincent d'I.id.'s Fantasia for oboe and orchestra on French folk tunes, and Dvorak's "Carneval" Overture.

The great Schubert symphony was given a most beautiful performance, especially in the scherzo and the finale. Dr. Muck brought out superbly the romantic poetry of the composition, and his musicians responded to his slightest wish. At least for the Schubert numbers we must be grateful.

The d'Indy fantasia was a novelty to New York. Dr. Muck has not been partial to French music this season, and the introduction of this work, which, though first published in Paris in 1888, has only just reached the shores of the New World, will therefore add to the Boston orchestra leader's claim to eclecticism of taste. But the work itself will add to neither M. d'Indy's fame nor to the pleasure of musical remembrance. It was a well made composition, but the oboe is not an instrument suited to a large hall, accompanied by a full orchestra. To a piano accompaniment in a chamber music concert the fantasia might possess a certain limited appeal. In the vast reaches of Carnegie Hall all effect was lost and only monotony remained. Mr. George Longy, who sustained the solo part, did all that he could to bring recognition to the work, and such an excellent artist could not altogether fail.

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 2 0 1915
Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CHARMS IN FINAL ACADEMY CONCERT

Beatrice Harrison, the young English 'cellist, was the soloist at the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music last night. The programme comprised Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Goldmark's Overture to "Sakuntala," Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme for violoncello with orchestral accompaniment, and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, spanning a century of orchestral composition and preserving neutrality between the forces at war.

The opening number was played in a manner that seemed to solve the mystery that enshrouds its name. The air of supernatural dignity and power, the calm impressive sweep of the theme, interspersed with the unexpected triplets, and followed by the optimistic brilliancy of the fugue finale sounded as though Dr. Muck were seeking to strengthen the theory that Mozart's work was the description of a great god in rare good humor.

"Sakuntala," the first and most popular of Goldmark's important works, was presented with the same descriptive fidelity, and if the audience was not quick to perceive the indications of its composer's intent in the various themes, as emphasized by the commentatore, the performance was not less pleasing.

Miss Harrison played in the Tschaikowsky number in a manner that merited every one of the six recalls she received. This piece is not a work for public performance by any save artists of the first rank, but the demure English 'cellist was mistress of every variation. Retaining a firm grip with her knees upon the body of the instrument, she swept a strong free bow across the strings, with an accuracy of technical skill that, far from sacrificing tone, set the 'cello singing in sympathy. Miss Harrison's performance furnished more than a glimpse of the possibilities of the 'cello as a tenor instrument.

"Carnival," with its swift play of the emotions furnished a fitting finale to the concert and the series. In the five concerts of the season Dr. Muck has presented four works of Beethovan, two of Brahms, two of Sibelius, two of Richard Strauss, one from Handel, Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, Ropartz, Saint-Saens, Schumann, and Weber, in addition to those on the programme last night. Four soloists have appeared—Pasquale Amato, Harold Bauer, Fritz Kreisler and the 'cellist of last evening.

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Calais.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE NEXT SEASON

